That was a good point, Parson felt. And it might’ve also accounted for why that one horse was such an asshole.

“Hmph. Don’t worry about it. I’ll spook those stupid horses.” Damian seemed confident.

Parson wasn’t sure why, though. “What’re you gonna do?”

Damian revealed a hefty stick that he must’ve picked up earlier. “Jam this up their asses.”

Parson opened his mouth but had no words. Yeah. That sure sounded like a plan that Damian would come up with.

“You’ve still got that knife, don’t you?” said Damian.

Parson pulled it out. “Yeah.”

“If they don’t run, just use that.”

“What about me?” said Germal.

“Use your finger,” said Damian.

"1681

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Parson was a little surprised when Germal didn’t complain. He actually looked like he might do as Damian said, but there wasn’t time for Parson to tell him not to, because Damian was already sneaking over to the horses again. Parson and Germal followed.

They were more careful this time. The same horse from before still snorted and neighed lowly at him, and Parson tried not to let his fingers get too close to the horse’s big mouth. It took a bit of time, but he finally managed to undo the tie on the post and move on to the next horse.

Soon enough, the boys' work was done, and they were ready for the next stage. Parson decided to take the initiative before Damian did anything drastic with that stick, and he poked one of the horses just above the tail with his knife.

It wasn't quite enough, but the horse was obviously displeased. Parson slapped its behind and gave a low, "Hyah!"

That did it. The horse scrambled away from him, bumping into the other beasts and disturbing them, too. The other boys slapped them, too, and Germal narrowly avoided a kick that probably would've sent him flying. Nonetheless, they accomplished their goal, and the horses all ran off into the night, creating enough of a clamor to alert the men in the tavern.

The boys scuttled up by the window just before a pair of men's faces appeared in it. A wooden barrel was all that hid them from view.

The men ran out of the building in time to see their horses bolting toward the horizon. And after a brief exchange of indistinguishable words that sounded like an argument, all five of the men ran off to chase them.

Wait.

Five?

Damian and Germal were already rushing into the tavern.

"Wait!" Parson tried to tell them as he followed.

Sure enough, the sixth man in his black-and-brown uniform was still there, standing by the stairs and having a word with the elderly bartender. He saw them come in and seemed confused, though not for long. Perhaps their body language or the looks on their faces gave them away, somehow.

"What do you rascals think you're doin'?" the man said, placing a hand on the pommel of his still-sheathed sword.

They all hesitated, none answering him.

"Boys?" said the bartender, apparently not understanding the situation.

"You're too young to be in here. Run on home, now. Go on."

One of the doors upstairs creaked, and everyone looked up at the same time to see a girl standing there. It wasn't Alisa, but Parson did recognize those pigtails and big eyebrows. Claudia was her name, and she was definitely from Trintol. She looked frightened.

Perhaps Damian thought it best to take advantage of the distraction she provided, because the boy chose that moment to rush in headfirst. He didn't seem to care that all he had on him was a stick."

"1682

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

And for some reason, Parson followed his lead. Not wanting to be outdone, maybe. Not wanting to be a coward. So he bolted forward, too, knife in hand. He went for the man's side while Damian soon acquired the soldier's attention.

It didn't last long. The man's sword came free, and he cut through Damian's stick and chest in one heavy downward stroke. Blood splattered across the floor.

Parson wasn't even thinking anymore. He was already in the blind spot, so he just jammed the knife into the man's thigh and yanked it upward.

The soldier howled and turned on him. The sword flashed up in Parson's vision, but then Germal was there, holding onto the man's sword arm like a wild monkey and trying to bite at his hand. The other hand came in hard and clobbered Germal in the face. The boy barely held on as the man changed his sword hand. Dangling, Germal couldn't do much more than watch as the blade skewered him through the chest, all the way to the hilt.

Parson had found his way to the man's back and jammed the knife through the uniform while he climbed up. The man flailed, and Parson tried to hang on, still pulling the knife out and jabbing it in repeatedly, working his way up to the man's neck.

And he found it, too. The knife dug deep into bare flesh just below the soldier's ear. The man stumbled back and slammed Parson against the wall. He finally lost his grip and dropped to the floor.

Disoriented, Parson scrambled to his feet, but the monster of a man rounded on him one more time. Despite being covered in blood, despite blood even spurting out of his snarling mouth as he struggled to breathe, the soldier still drove his sword through Parson's stomach and tore the blade out through the side.

Parson fell. He heard himself scream in agony and watched as the soldier staggered back and dropped his sword. There was so much pain coursing through Parson's whole body that it almost reverted back in on itself, numbing every sensation at once.

He tried to move, to get up, but it was all he could do to crawl. His body wasn't listening. Even just breathing was becoming difficult. And the blood. There was so much blood. All over the floor.

Damian hadn't gotten back up. Nor had Germal. Even the soldier was on his back now, hardly moving at all and still coughing up red.

The girl from upstairs arrived in his field of view. Claudia. And a few others, too, though it was hard to recognize them. His mind was foggy, and it was a strain even to think. He looked for Alisa Brandt, but she wasn't there. Maybe she never had been.

Oh well.

Didn't matter, he supposed. Would've been nice to see her again, though.

The girls were huddling around him and the other two boys. What were they doing?

Oh, they were crying.

Stupid girls. They should've been running. The other soldiers could come back at any time. He tried to say something, tell them how stupid they were, but his voice didn't work anymore.

Then, finally, darkness took him.

But of course, that was not the end.

"Hello there, brave boy," were Overra's first words to him. "Looks like you could use a hand."

"1683 -- CLXXXI.

It took a while for him to understand what was happening. Even after the reaper explained it twice, he still wasn't sure he got it all.

But he could keep living. And he could be strong. Those things, he understood. There wasn't much more to think about besides that.

Aside from one thing.

"...What about my friends?" he asked.

"Little Damian and Germal? Don't worry. I've got friends, too. Their names are Feromas and Nerovoy. They're talking to them as we speak."

"So we'll all get to come back?"

"That's right," she said.

"You're... not lying, are you?"

"Oh, you dear boy. That's not a very good method of testing someone's honesty. But don't worry. I'll teach you. All in good time." She paused. "Oh, but yes, I am telling the truth. Worry not."

That hadn't done much to curb Parson's suspicion, but he didn't know what else to say.

"Hmm," said Overra. "Very well. If you would like the complete truth of it--and I assume you do--then I must admit that the three of us were originally only going to revive Damian and his family. Feromas is Damian's great grandfather, you see. That was why we returned to fair little Trintol in the first place. But sadly, we arrived too late. And when we saw that Damian was not among the dead there, we decided to search for him--and good thing we did. We nearly arrived here too late, as well."

And again, Parson wasn't sure he understood. How much time had passed? He had no idea.

"You should be glad," said Overra. "You're lucky boys. The three of you are going to help us change the world."

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It took quite some time to locate the captive Rainlords. Even with Roman's instructions and all the reapers around to guide them, Capaporo was not the easiest city to navigate. The walls along the pit stretched far and wide, and there were no bridges to use as shortcuts--something Hector considered to be a huge architectural oversight. Why, if he'd been the one in charge of building this city, there definitely would've been bridges galore. Maybe there would've even been some like the Rainlords had back in Sair--ones that were so big they could hold up entire buildings with ease.

Maybe that would've been expensive, but whatever. It didn't seem like Capaporo was dirt poor, what with all these climate-controlled areas near the bottom of the pit. They could probably afford it. Maybe.

At length, they finally arrived at a cluster of warehouses. The buildings were squirreled away in the back of a temperature-controlled cave, which turned out to be below even what the group previously thought was the lowest level of the city. Finding the narrow path down there had caused them considerable grief, because apparently, Voreese couldn't guide them to it very well, having not actually visited this place yet. Roman had wanted her to keep her distance for her own safety, she explained."

"1687

'By the way,' said Garovel privately as they waited for Zeff to finish drilling through, 'I saw what you did earlier.'

'What are you talking about?' said Hector.

'The way you tried to pat Diego on the shoulder and then gave up.'

Aw, shit.

'I'll give you points for trying, at least,' said Garovel. 'A solid B for effort.'

'The saying is "A for effort," Garovel.'

'I know, but you didn't do that well.'

'Shut--fuck--you...'

The reaper laughed, still privately. 'Say what? Shut fuck me? What does that mean?'

'You--I--it means shut up and fuck you, that's what it means.'

'Oh, okay.'

As the time drew out, Voreese in particular seemed to grow impatient and began scouting around the warehouses. Hector would have preferred she not do that, as they didn't know what other sorts of surprises or traps they might encounter, but when Garovel gave voice to Hector's concerns for him, she was unsurprisingly flippant about it.

'A girl needs her space, Garovel,' she said from around the farther warehouses. 'You can't expect to get in my pants by smothering me.'

Garovel didn't miss a step, however. 'Getting in your pants, eh? That would be a fascinating trick, considering you're not wearing any.'

'Hoho!' she laughed.

Hector was uncomfortable. Though, at the same time, it did make him wonder how Garovel viewed reapers.

Now there was a question he probably should have asked a while ago.

'Wow,' said Axiolis, sounding equal parts surprised and disgusted. 'How long has it been since I last heard two reapers flirting with one another?'

'Jealous?' said Voreese.

'Irritated,' said Axiolis. 'This is hardly the time or the place for such behavior, no?'

'And what, pray tell, would be the correct time and place, exactly?' said Voreese.

'When we are no longer in mortal danger, perhaps,' offered Yangéra.

'I'm not so sure we ever will be,' said Voreese. 'It's a mad and dangerous world, you know.'

‘Yes, and it is not made any safer by the carelessness brought on by poorly timed humor,’ said Axiolis.

‘Oof!’ said Voreese. ‘What a stick-in-the-mud!’ She broke for a snorting laugh, which Hector found interesting, considering she didn’t even have a nose. ‘Look, buddy, I know the world is a horrible place ‘n all, but that horribleness ain’t goin’ anywhere, either. It’ll still be there after every little vacation away from it that we decide to take. So you won’t have to worry about your fucking dourness going out of style.’

‘And you continue to make history,’ said Axiolis. ‘It has been many years since I have heard anyone say something so utterly nonsensical.’

‘Oh, so there IS some sharpness to that tongue!’ said Voreese. ‘I was beginning to wonder if you were just a fucking simpleton!’

‘Voreese,’ said Garovel. ‘Please don’t be so rude to our new friends.’

‘Hey, he started it, not me.’

‘You needn’t worry about my feelings,’ said Axiolis. ‘I know better than to take the reckless words of an unruly child to heart.’

Voreese let out a laugh that sounded like it could’ve come from a horse. ‘Wow! Where the hell did you find this guy, Garovel?! I like him! He’s a real piece of shit! But like an upper class piece of shit!’

‘I suppose I will take that as a compliment,’ said Axiolis.

‘Yeah, why wouldn’t you?! I meant it as one!’

Hector wasn’t sure he understood this conversation anymore."
"1688

‘By the way,’ said Voreese, still talking from behind one of the other buildings, ‘how old are you, Axiolis? I only ask because usually, I find that you uppity-types are quite young, but if you’re a Rainlord, then there’s a good chance you’re pretty damn ancient, eh?’

‘I am older than most reapers, yes,’ said Axiolis. ‘And you?’

‘Oh, I’ve got a fair few years on me,’ she said. ‘Have you ever met any of the current emperors?’

‘Yes, Zeff and I have both met Sermung several times. I have also met Sai-hee once, though that was over two hundred years ago now.’

‘Oh?’ said Voreese. ‘And what was she like?’

‘Hospitable. And quite passionate. Still building her reputation in those days. I do not think she would be quite so welcoming to us now.’

‘Yeah, Roman mentioned that she’s got a grudge against you guys. Said that Leo told him as much. Don’t suppose you’d have any idea as to why that might be, hmm?’

Axiolis spared a glance toward Garovel and the others. ‘In fact, I do. Have you heard of something called the Richland Affair?’

Voreese floated up over the farthest warehouse and was visible to Hector again. ‘The incident that gave birth to a brand new country in the middle of the Jungle Wars?’

‘That is the one, yes.’

Voreese hovered over to the group again, having apparently lost interest in her scouting. ‘You guys were responsible for that shit?’

‘I would not say we were “responsible” for it, no, but our kin did play a fairly significant role.’

‘Your kin? Not you, yourself?’

‘In truth, it was our Intarian brethren. Many of us from Sair might like to place the blame wholly upon them, but the fact of the matter is that we share blood ties, and the rest of the world is not going to forget that for quite some time.’

‘Hmm. So you’re saying, your cousins fucked everything up big time during the Jungle Wars, and now Sai-hee just hates all of you guys as a result?’

Axiolis paused. ‘That is... an oversimplification of what happened, but... not terribly inaccurate, either.’

‘Well, fork over some juicy details, then.’

Axiolis looked at Zeff a moment, who was still diligently drilling away. The hole that the man had thus far managed to make was big enough for most of Hector's hovering platform to fit inside, but there was still no telling how close they were to breaking through yet.

'I was not involved in the Richland Affair personally,' said Axiolis, 'so I cannot give you a firsthand account of what happened. Perhaps Orric might be able to.'

'Who's that?' said Voreese.

'The reaper of Melchor Blackburn.'

Voreese's skeletal brow rose a little. 'Ooh, Darktide, huh? I've heard of him. Is he here, by the way?

'He should be, yes,' said Axiolis. 'We'll soon find out for certain.'

Hector recalled having a fairly pleasant conversation with that man. He also recalled having a fairly unpleasant fight against him."

"1689

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

'Okay, well, you can still give us the basic gossip, right?' said Voreese. 'I mean, you're a damn reaper, aren't you? This kinda shit is what we live for.'

'She's not wrong,' said Garovel. 'I'd be interested to hear more from you as well.'

Axiolis gave a small sigh. 'If you insist.' He turned to Yangéra and Lorios first, however, who had both been rather quiet this whole time. 'Would either of you care to tell the tale?'

'Oh, no, thank you,' said Yangéra.

'Yeah, you go ahead,' said Lorios.

Axiolis paused again, perhaps considering how to begin. 'Well... the Jungle Wars had been raging on and off for some years when it happened. In fact, that was ostensibly the root cause behind it. A number of Melmoorian and Corricooan aristocrats claimed that they sought "a true end to the conflict" and so decided to break away from their respective nations and form their own.'

‘Richland,’ said Voreese.

‘Yes,’ said Axiolis. ‘The name is not a misnomer. They managed to get away with a considerable portion of the most arable land in the region, as well as seventy percent of the diamonds that had been the chief cause of the conflict from the beginning.’

Voreese laughed. ‘Gotta admire the sheer audacity it takes to even attempt something like that, let alone to actually pull it off. That’d be like runnin’ up to a group of guys who are already fighting, waiting until they’re a little tired, and then just kicking them all in the balls.’

‘Mm,’ hummed Axiolis. ‘They certainly managed to anger everyone at once with that move. And my Intarian brethren helped them both acquire and secure their wealth.’

‘How did Sai-hee factor into it?’

‘She had been trying to broker a peace between all of the warring nations for decades. She had even managed to succeed, though only briefly. There was a cultural hatred that was born during those conflicts, and I imagine that proved difficult to overcome in a sustainable manner.’

‘So she blames you guys for prolonging the war?’

‘My understanding is that she believed she was getting close to achieving a true, lasting peace which would have been to the benefit of all parties. Whether or not that was actually the case--well, that is something we may never know.’

‘Hmm,’ said Voreese. ‘Still seems like a strange thing to blame you guys for. Why not the audacious pricks in Richland?’

‘Oh, I imagine she does reserve some hatred for them as well,’ said Axiolis. ‘But there was also... another element to it.’

Voreese perked up at that. ‘Oh? Do I sense something salacious in what you are about to say?’

Axiolis tilted his head at her. ‘You have heard a few rumors, I presume?’

‘I may have,’ she said with a smirk. ‘What can I say? I’m a gossip-loving girl at heart.’

‘Yes, well... from what I have been told, there was at least a degree of truth in those rumors.’”

"1690

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

‘You mean the rumors about an actual “affair” within the Richland Affair?’ said Voreese. ‘The forbidden and sexual kind of affair?’

‘I am afraid so,’ said Axiolis.

‘Ooh. And you’re saying Sai-hee was involved in it?’

‘Yes. And so was one of our kin. A bold and brazen lad by the name of Eric Olmos. I met him on the occasion of the Generational Rite.’ Axiolis paused to look over his audience again. ‘Which, I suppose, you may be unfamiliar with?’

‘It’s a coming-of-age ceremony, I presume?’ said Garovel.

‘Yes,’ said Axiolis. ‘A chance for the families to gather and present their children who have recently reached adulthood. Eric was only one of twelve whom were presented on that occasion, but you would hardly have guessed such, had you been there. Most people at that age are timid as a lamb in front of so many relatives whom they have likely never met before, but not Eric. He adored the attention--and handled it gracefully, as well. Rarely have I ever seen such a naturally charismatic young man.’ His hollow gaze fell on the still-meditating Diego Redwater. ‘That one there is not entirely dissimilar, I suppose.’

Diego opened one eye and looked around with it. “Is that flattery I hear? Because I sure wouldn’t mind some right now.”

‘You should not be allowing yourself to be distracted by our words,’ said Axiolis.

“Oh, c’mon, I have to pay at least a little attention to what you guys are saying. What if we get attacked?”

‘I’m sure Zeff would be happy to slap you,’ said Axiolis.

“Mm,” said Diego. “As generous as that offer is, I don’t find it particularly motivating for some reason.”

‘Regardless,’ said Axiolis, ‘I brought the subject up, because I suspect that Eric’s charisma had something to do with why Sai-hee fell in love with him.’

‘Ahhh,’ said Voreese. ‘Seduced by a younger man, was she? At least, I’m assuming he wasn’t nearly as old as her, considering the Richland Affair was only about seventy-five years ago, and she’s currently, what, pushin’ six hundred?’

‘Something like that,’ said Axiolis.

‘So what’d this idiot do to piss her off so much, then?’

‘He promised to leave his fiancée for her. And then he didn’t.’

‘Ah. A truly classic douche maneuver. That’d do it, alright. But if she knew he was already betrothed, then I mean, she’s partly to blame, too.’

‘Again, I cannot speak to the validity of the details, but the story goes that his parents had arranged a marriage for him to a young woman among the Richland aristocracy--the very same ones whom they had recently helped secure new territory. And when the aristocracy heard about the possibility of Eric’s elopement, they increased the promised dowry by such a substantial amount that it caused Eric to change his mind. “For the future of House Olmos,” was the argument put forward.’”

"1691

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

‘Hmm,’ said Voreese. ‘I suppose when you put it like that, it ALMOST doesn’t sound like the most moronic thing he could’ve ever done. Almost.’

‘I am not trying to defend his actions,’ said Axiolis. ‘I am merely recounting what I have been told.’

‘I get that,’ said Voreese. ‘But jilting one of the most powerful individuals in the entire world? That is some top tier stupidity. I mean, what did he think would happen?’

Axiolis only bobbed his head.

Lorios, however, decided to chime in now. 'Okay, well, if nobody else is going to do it, then I guess I'll play devil's advocate here and try to defend Eric's behavior--at least a little.'

'Ha,' said Voreese. 'Go on, then. I can't wait to hear this.'

The usually quiet reaper had everyone's attention but Zeff's now. 'I will not pretend that it was a wise thing to do. It certainly was not. And the consequences of it have been terrible beyond measure. However, I'm sure you all remember Sai-hee's reputation from those days. She was widely regarded as the gentlest and most peaceful of the four emperors. The compassionate "Peacemaker" was very well-loved all over the world. Many even mentioned her in the same breath as the Goddess of the Light herself--that was how saintly some people viewed this woman. And even today, some seventy years later, that reputation is not completely gone.

'However, she also had a reputation as a bit of a "pushover" as well. As in, people thought she was SO nice that she would never raise a hand in anger or do anything unreasonable--certainly not to anyone who hadn't committed some sort of crime against humanity. She was the "pragmatic one" among the emperors. Many people even believed that she was virtually a higher being. The purest and most perfect type of human. I know, because I was one such person. I genuinely thought that about her for a while. So I don't think it's outside the realm of possibility that Eric Olmos may have viewed her that way as well.'

'This is why hero worship is dangerous,' said Voreese. 'You can never really know what evil any given person is capable of until it's too late.'

'I would agree with you,' said Lorios. 'But my point is, Eric probably thought that, ultimately, she would forgive him. Because that was her reputation. Pure and gentle and forgiving.'

'This is why I don't trust saints,' said Garovel.

'It is as Arkos once said,' said Yangéra. "'The brighter the light, the harsher the shadow it casts.'"

'Egh, that's why I never liked that guy as a philosopher,' said Voreese. 'You could interpret that any number of ways to make it fit. Hell, someone could be the bright light, and the harsh shadow could be someone else who resents them. Or it could just refer to a single person hiding their true nature. Therefore, that "wisdom," although it sure sounds nice, is fucking useless.'"

"1692

'Not a fan of Arkos, huh?' said Garovel.

'He built some cool shit,' said Voreese. 'And I never met him, but I always got the impression that he thought he was a lot smarter than he really was.'

"I feel like we're drifting from the subject of Sai-hee," said Diego, again with his eyes closed.

'Oh yeah,' said Voreese. She looked back at Lorios. 'I guess I can kinda see your point about this Eric Olmos being only MOSTLY stupid. She did have the kind of reputation you described. And also, I forgot to mention: it definitely seems incredibly unreasonable on Sai-hee's part to hold a grudge against ALL of you guys, just because of the actions of one dumbass who broke her heart. You sure there's not more to this story that you've neglected to mention?'

'Oh, the story is not done,' said Axiolis. 'Eric Olmos was simply the lightning bolt that struck the forest, so to speak.'

'Ah, okay. So some serious blood was eventually spilled, then?'

'Yes,' said Axiolis. 'When Sai-hee confronted Eric, matters escalated beyond anyone's control, and in a single night, her forces slaughtered every male member of House Olmos.'

'What the fuck?' said Garovel.

'Holy shit,' said Voreese. 'I never heard about that. Even the young boys, too?'

'Yes,' said Axiolis. 'And it did not end there, either. Several other Houses were caught up in the mayhem, some of which were from Sair. The Sebolts, Zabats, Blackburns, and Merlos all suffered severe losses that day.'

'Goddamn,' said Voreese. 'What'd you do next?'

'We gathered our forces and responded in kind,' said Axiolis. 'We killed one of her "generals"--or whatever she calls them. A woman named

Ariana. She had been present during the initial attack and was responsible for at least thirty of the fatalities, five of whom had been mere boys. It was Rayen Merlo and Melchor Blackburn who ended her life, working in tandem. I witnessed that myself. It was quite the battle.'

'I can't imagine Sai-hee was too pleased about that,' said Garovel.

'No, but she seemed to at least acknowledge that Ariana had wronged us and that our battle was justified,' said Axiolis. 'We were able to negotiate a fragile peace, but the Intarians didn't maintain it. They harassed her forces periodically, which cost many more lives even after the Jungle Wars ended. I think that was when those of us from Sair began to feel a greater degree of separation from our Intarian brethren than ever before.'

'You blamed them for fucking everything up so hard,' said Voreese.

Axiolis made no response.

'Not saying you were wrong,' said Voreese. 'They sound like a bunch of fuck-ups.'

'...Regardless,' Axiolis went on, 'our collective relationship with Sai-hee has remained bad ever since then. Melchor Blackburn has a particular hatred for her--or if not her, then her people, at the very least. House Blackburn suffered the worst from those battles, in addition to clashing with Abolish around that time as well. I believe Darktide went on a veritable crusade sometime thereafter. A largely successful crusade, from what I have heard.'

"1693

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

'Yeah, I'm familiar with some of his exploits,' said Voreese. 'He snuck into an Abolish fortress and killed two dudes who were pretty infamous at the time. Real malevolent bastards, those ones. I was following their careers because of an awful encounter I had with them several years earlier, so it was quite the pleasant surprise for me when I learned that some guy named Darktide had not only crushed them, but made 'em look like utter fools, too.'

That brought up a question that Hector wanted answered. "How do you sneak into a fortress full of reapers? Wouldn't they sense any intruders immediately?"

'Yep,' said Voreese. 'That's one of the reasons why it was so impressive. According to what I learned, Darktide pretended to be a non-servant and allowed himself to be taken prisoner. Now, Abolish is known for not usually taking prisoners, but in this instance, they were kidnapping locals and using them for experimentation. Pretty horrific stuff, from what I heard. But essentially, Darktide was able to use their own shittiness against them. I always liked that thought. Can't wait to meet the guy. What's he like? Is he nice?'

"Uh," said Hector, "y-yeah, I guess. I only talked to him a little bit, but, er, I kinda like him."

'Hector is being modest,' said Garovel. 'They hit it off pretty well. I bet they'll get along famously, if and when they spend more time together.'

'Ooh, you're makin' me jealous,' said Voreese. 'I wonder if Roman'll be able to get along with him, too. Never can tell with that guy. Sometimes, he seems like he can make friends with anyone, but then he'll surprise you and totally ruin everything.'

'Are you sure that it is not YOU who has difficulty getting along with people?' said Axiolis.

'Psh, no. Everyone loves my ability to speak the truth in a straightforward and candid manner.'

'Straightforward and candid are two words that mean the same thing,' said Axiolis.

'Yeah, I know,' said Voreese. 'The redundancy enhances the ease of comprehension for the listener. Don't tell me you're a grammar purist, too.'

'More like a grammar appreciator,' said Axiolis.

'Oh, geez,' said Voreeze. 'You must be a blast at parties.'

'I imagine you must be, as well,' said Axiolis, 'on the rare occasion when someone invites you.'

And there was silence as Voreese merely stared at him for a moment. The only noise was that of Zeff's digging.

Then she gave an approving nod. 'Not bad, you uptight son of a bitch. That one actually kinda stung.'

'...I apologize if I caused offense,' said Axiolis.

Voreese laughed. 'Oh, fuck you! Don't try to take it back now! Just be proud and own it! That's what I'd do!'

'Why would I ever wish to model my behavior after yours?'

'There, you see?! That's more like it!'

A loud and abrupt crack sound intervened in the conversation, and everyone looked toward Zeff and saw the small breakthrough that he had finally made in the wall of black. They were so deep that the entire platform now fit into the greater hole that Zeff have carved out, but only now could they see light pouring through."

"1694

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

It was a breakthrough, but not a large enough one. Voreese immediately volunteered to squeeze through and check on everyone, but Zeff didn't want any of the reapers going in on their own. So the group waited a while longer before the Lord Elroy finally managed to widen the hole enough to peek through, and ultimately, for a person to fit through.

Zeff made an icy staircase extending up from within the warehouse and connected it to Hector's platform. They all descended in single file with Zeff in the lead. Hector was slightly worried that a staircase made of solid ice would be rather perilous to walk on and so added a ribbed layer of iron to it.

The light source from within the warehouse turned out to be a tall lamp with several people clustered around it, all wearing climate suits, though none were donning their helmets.

Hector recognized a couple faces from House Sebolt, one from House Delaguna, two from House Blackburn, and after a moment, two from House Elroy. Marcos and Ramira Elroy stepped out from behind the others.

When they saw their father, their eyes lit up, and they ran to him. The man dropped to his knees and hugged both, a child for each arm.

Hector breathed a sigh of relief. It had only been a few days, but it felt like he hadn't seen them in ages, and it was certainly a load off his mind to finally see that they were okay. Their living conditions didn't look too bad, either. They had some chairs, the lamp, a pile of books to read, a cart full of food, and a bathroom.

There was still much to be done, however. Just this one warehouse was loaded up with pods full of sleeping Rainlords, and getting them all out of here safely was not going to be an easy task. The first task, everyone agreed, was to find all the captive servants and free them so that they could assist in the effort. Certain servants like Dimas or Melchor might have been a priority, but the problem was that no one knew where any individual servant's brain was located. They only knew that they were all stored somewhere up in the rafters or in one of the other warehouses--all of which were currently filled with whatever that black material was.

Hector, Zeff, and Diego set to work trying to find and free the servants while Manuel got started removing the plethora of pods from the warehouse.

Hector didn't much care for the digging. Since they were only looking for servant brains this time, they didn't have to be quite as careful as Zeff had been earlier, but there was still the concern that they would run across a captive reaper and accidentally kill it. Not to mention all the slumbering Rainlords below could get hurt by any falling debris.

So it was an exercise in precision. And damn this black stuff was tough. Hector couldn't even put a dent in it without resorting to his orbiting technique, but he was simultaneously afraid of using that technique with the same level of intensity as he had against the worm. It was tricky, trying to find a happy medium. So tricky, in fact, that he only managed to find one brain by the time Zeff and Diego had each found four."

"1695

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

Of course, none of those brains were going to be particularly helpful until they located the reapers that went with them, but it was a start.

At length, they began to get the impression that there were simply no reapers to be found in this building, so Zeff moved on to the next warehouse over while Hector and Diego continued trying dig out more servant brains.

'Hey, Voreese,' said Garovel after a while.

'Yeah?' she said, floating over to him and Hector.

‘What’s the name of the passage to the Undercrust beneath Warrenhold?’

‘Oh, I always just called it the Warrenhole,’ said Voreese.

‘Ha! I knew it! Hector, you owe me money.’

“No, I don’t.”

‘The proper name for the hole, though, is Do’orach,’ said Voreese.
‘Proper name, as in the original one.’

‘Hmm,’ said Garovel. ‘Is that from the Apeirian language?’

‘Close. It’s Nykeirian, actually.’

‘Ah. Haven’t heard either of those languages spoken in, oh, must be almost two thousand years now.’

‘Yeah. They kinda died out with their empires.’

‘You wouldn’t happen to be Nykeirian yourself, would you?’

‘As a matter of fact, I am,’ said Voreese. ‘I was born toward the end of the empire. Never got to see it during its prime, sadly. Stories I’ve heard make it sound pretty wondrous. Though, they were probably overhyping it, the way legends tend to do.’

That brought a question to Hector’s mind regarding the builder of Warrenhold, so he stopped working for a moment to turn and look at Voreese. “Was Stasya Orlov, uh... was she N-Nykeirian, too?”

‘Ah, haven’t forgotten about her, huh? That makes me happy. But no, not exactly. She was a descendant of the then-displaced Nykeirian people, but she was born during the early Mohssian Empire and was therefore a product of the Mohssian culture. The Nykeirian culture disappeared pretty quickly into the larger melting pot that was the Mohssian one. Which sounds a bit sad, I suppose, but it was kind of ideal, actually. When different cultures are forced together but don’t blend and integrate properly... well, that’s oftentimes how we end up with things like institutionalized racism and generations-spanning wars.’

‘I have to agree,’ said Garovel.

Hector nodded, feeling like he more or less understood, and returned to his digging while the two reapers kept talking.

It sure was dark up here, though. The tall lamp in the middle of the warehouse had been useful for a while, but now it was just too far away to help him see around all these hard angles and crevices. If only he had a way to light things up better.

Wait a minute. He did, didn't he?

He materialized a red hot cube above his hand, using the perpetually falling technique that Zeff and Asad had taught him. It worked pretty well, though it proved difficult to keep it perfectly still while he continued moving independently. Still, it illuminated the small cavern that he'd carved out for himself fairly well."

"1696

'We also wanted to ask you about how Warrenhold affects children,' said Garovel. 'Babies, in particular.'

That made Hector pay attention again.

'Mm,' hummed Voreese. 'You're worried that Stasya's pest control mechanism might negatively impact some of these Rainlord kids?'

'Pretty much.'

'That won't be a problem,' said Voreese. 'In fact, it'll have just the opposite effect. Instead of feeling immense discomfort, kids who grow up in Warrenhold will come to have a strong association between that unnatural sensation and "home." So it might seem a little counter-intuitive, but what ends up happening is that those kids become quite attached to Warrenhold when they're older.'

'Wow, really?'

'That is assuming, of course, that those kids don't have horrible lives at Warrenhold for other reasons. Basically, whatever kind of overall experience the kids have when they're very young will be amplified in their minds after their brains begin to mature.'

'I see. But this doesn't work for animals?'

'Nope.'

‘Any idea why?’

‘I think it has something to do with the human brain being much more capable of adaptation and self-protection. It’s probably a combination of things, I imagine.’

‘Interesting. So then, there must be a cut off point in a child’s age, right?’

‘Yes. It’s around thirteen years old, but it can vary a little. After that, you have to explain the effects to them like everyone else or they’ll start freaking out.’

‘Thirteen? That seems rather late. I assume it has something to do with puberty, then?’

‘Yeah, but I couldn’t tell you the exact reason why it works that way. It’s just what I’ve observed.’

‘So that means that Marcos and Ramira Elroy are still eligible for the little “nostalgia boost,” then,’ said Garovel.

‘That depends,’ said Voreese. ‘Are either of them servants yet?’

‘Oh. Yes. Marcos is.’

‘Then he’s not “eligible,” as you put it, because servants can’t even feel a difference in Warrenhold to begin with.’

‘Right. Okay.’

As he continued digging, Hector thought he glimpsed something in the dark material, and when he slammed a small iron spike into it another time, a chunk of the unknown element broke off, and Hector caught in his hand.

And, yep. In the opening it had left, he could see another brain waiting to be dug out. He eyed the material in his hand another time, though.

“Can either of you tell what this stuff is?” he asked. It was black and had a hard, shiny texture to it.

‘It’s different from the brown powdery material we saw outside the warehouses,’ said Garovel. ‘I suppose that could mean that we’re actually dealing with two materializers, but that’s not likely, is it?’

'No,' said Voreese. 'Roman definitely would've mentioned that. Even he's not so incompetent as to overlook a second opponent.'

'Then this black stuff and that brown stuff must be the same element,' said Garovel.

"How can that be?" said Hector.

'Because of allotropes,' said Garovel."

1697

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Hector looked between the two reapers. "Uh...?"

Voreese took the initiative. 'Allotropes are basically alternate versions of the same element. The most famous examples would probably be something like diamond and charcoal. Both of those things are just pure carbon, and yet they don't exactly look identical, do they? Those are carbon allotropes.'

Hector blinked at that. "Huh..." Now that he was thinking about it, he seemed to recall reading about something like this during the research he did a while back. He hadn't really looked into much further, though, perhaps because it hadn't immediately clicked for him like some other ideas had. "So, uh... how can a materialization user make different allotropes, then?"

'That IS the question, isn't it?' said Voreese, turning to Garovel. 'Do you know?'

'My understanding is that it takes an absolutely ridiculous level of precision. Which would make sense, because allotropes are only differentiated from one another by their atomic structure. So I imagine that the materializer would have to first be capable of manipulating their element on the atomic level.'

Hector's eyes widened as he tried to imagine that. "That... sounds kinda hard."

'No kidding,' said Garovel. 'I'm pretty sure it's a technique that only extremely old servants would be able to pull off. Otherwise, I would've had you trying to do it a long time ago.'

“Right...” Hector let the shiny black element fall from his hand and returned to digging.

‘Asad and Zeff may know more about it, of course. We can try asking them at the next opportunity, but I wouldn’t get my hopes up, if I were you. I know you’ve been improving by leaps and bounds lately, but let’s not get too full of ourselves just yet, eh?’

‘Speaking of,’ said Voreese. ‘What the hell is with all this orbiting stuff, huh? I’ve never seen shit like this before.’

‘Heh, well, perhaps I’ll explain that later,’ said Garovel.

‘Oh? Why not now?’

‘Eh. Don’t feel like it.’

‘What? Bullshit.’

‘No, it’s true. I really don’t feel like it.’

‘Pfft. You tryin’ to keep this shit a secret or something?’

‘I’m sure we have no idea what you’re talking about. Right, Hector?’

Hector just glanced at the two reapers and shrugged before going back his digging. With just a little more oomph, he was pretty sure he’d be able to pull the brain out.

He was a little amazed at how much it didn’t bother him, the sight of a human brain just sitting there in front of his face. It wasn’t pulsating or anything like that, but it was pretty squishy and slimy to the touch. Not to mention the smell.

He supposed he had just gotten used to seeing this kind of thing, though he couldn’t really recall a time when it did disturb him, either.

Hmm.

And abruptly, Hector found himself having one of those moments where he simply wondered how the hell he had ended up in this situation. Trying to dig brains out of a ceiling? That was definitely a new one. Certainly not something he’d ever imagined himself doing."

"1698

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

At length, a familiar reaper came flying into the warehouse and went straight for one of the brains on the ground. It was Iziol, Hector realized, reaper to the Lord Dimas Sebolt. As soon as the reaper touched the brain, the regeneration began. Veins and tissue and bone all gradually began to appear around the brain.

Hector lowered himself down. Knowing the process as well as he did from personal experience, Hector knew that Dimas was going to be butt naked by the time it was done and so decided to remove his own shirt in preparation for it. Just the shirt alone certainly wouldn't be enough, given how much taller the man was, but maybe bundled with some iron armor, it would suffice.

Before Dimas could even finish regenerating, however, more reapers began to arrive and resurrect their respective servants. Mevox, reaper to the Lord Salvador Delaguna. Ezura, reaper to the Lady Evangelina Stroud. Olijas, reaper to Carlos Sebolt. And more. The one Hector was really waiting on was Orric, for Melchor Blackburn, but by the time several of the servants were getting up, Orric had still not arrived.

On his feet again, Dimas looked down at the suit of armor that Hector had made for him. It wasn't a set of full plate like what Hector himself was wearing, but it didn't look too bad, Hector thought.

"Good to see you again, Lord Goffe," said Dimas.

Hector had already moved on to the next servant in need of concealment, that being the hulking figure of Lord Salvador. He threw a glance back toward Dimas and couldn't help smiling a little behind his faceguard. "Would you like a helmet like mine?" he asked.

Dimas seemed to think about it, then looked toward Iziol, who was busy talking to Garovel and Voreese. The man turned back to Hector and shrugged. "Sure."

Hector was happy to make one for him. It was a little weird, materializing a helmet onto another person, but he didn't struggle with it. He even decided to try something slightly different with it, making it more angular than his own and gave it a T-shaped opening in the faceguard. He momentarily considered giving the man horns, too, but he figured they might be impractical for combat. No sense in giving an enemy something to grab onto.

“Sorry if it’s a little uncomfortable,” said Hector.

“It is fine,” said Dimas, now with the tinge of metal in his voice. “More importantly, where have you been? And what is happening?”

Thankfully, the reapers chose that moment to arrive, so Hector didn’t have to explain. They were more than happy to bring the Lord Sebolt up to speed, and soon, the man was up in the rafters, digging out more servants while Hector continued providing armor for each newly regenerated arrival.

As the crowd of familiar servants grew, so did their progress, and it wasn’t much longer before Hector finally noticed Orric there, already having located Melchor’s brain, apparently.”

"1699

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector made his way over to him and observed the slow regeneration of Darktide. “H-hello...”

‘Ah,’ said Orric. ‘Hello, Lord Goffe.’ The reaper looked around at the warehouse full of armored servants and gave a faint laugh. ‘I see you are building an army of knights.’

“It’s--ah, for, y’know--” He stopped and gathered his thoughts. Slow and deliberate speech, he reminded himself. “...I just figured they didn’t all want to walk around in the nude.”

‘Yes, I thought as much. It is good to see you are well.’

“Ah--same to you.”

Melchor’s torso had just about finished regenerating, so Hector materialized an iron breastplate for him and got a head start on making the crotch-guard so as to help preserve the man’s dignity.

Hector had a question in mind for Orric. “...So you and Melchor fought this Leo guy?”

‘We did,’ said Orric. ‘And by that question, am I to assume he is still at large?’

“Yeah,” said Hector. “What can you tell me about him?”

‘Only that he is frighteningly skillful with materialization, though you might not guess it by looking at him. Not the most physically intimidating of specimens, but not to be underestimated, either. Clearly.’

“Were you able to figure out what his element is?”

‘I believe it may be boron, but I could be mistaken. The battle did not last very long.’

Boron? Hector didn’t know a damn thing about that element. “...Did he attack you guys without warning?”

‘Not exactly. He announced himself first, saying that he wanted us to help him with Sai-hee, but we did not find that very agreeable. THEN he attacked. In the middle of his own sentence. I can only presume that he did not like how negotiations were going, but even though we were mostly on our guard, that tactic still managed to catch us by surprise. Like I said, he did not look intimidating.’

“I see...”

Melchor’s body was mostly complete, as was the armor that Hector made for him. Darktide sat up with a groan and rubbed his forehead.

‘How are you feeling?’ said Orric.

“I’ve been better...” Melchor noticed his iron armor. Then he noticed Hector standing there. “Ah...”

“Hi,” said Hector plainly. He offered the man a hand to help him to his feet.

“That is alright,” said Melchor and stood up on his own. “What have I missed?”

Hector struggled his way through an explanation, until again, Garovel and Voreese arrived to help him. At that point, Hector considered returning to the ceiling to help dig out more brains, but from the looks of things, the others had it covered. There wasn’t much ceiling left to dig through, anymore.

‘So you’re the famous Darktide, eh?’ said Voreese. ‘It’s an honor to make your acquaintance.'

"Ah. Likewise." The man sounded tired. Hector couldn't blame him. The guy had been through just as many fights recently as Hector had, and he'd been right at the heart of them all, too.

Phew. Thinking about all that made Hector remember how exhausted he was, too."

"1700

'Oh, I doubt you consider it as much of an honor as I do,' said Voreese. 'If I'm being completely honest here, I'm a bit of a fangirl of yours.'

Melchor just raised a thick eyebrow at that.

'I'm an admirer of a lot of the ass kicking you've done, especially against Abolish. I remember hearing news of your exploits a few times over the years, and they were usually pretty damn cathartic. If I still had tits, I'd totally ask you sign them for me, right now.'

The man looked briefly at the young Lord Darksteel, but Hector didn't have anything for him. "Ah... um... I see," said Melchor. "Thank you for those... kind words."

'Yeah, no problem,' said Voreese.

The pleasantries didn't last much longer, and Melchor soon joined the rest of the servants in trying to free everyone. For a second, Hector thought the guy and his reaper might use pan-rozum to aid in the process, but they didn't. No doubt, they didn't want to deal with the exhaustive consequences of it, in case they ended up needing to fight soon.

The last few weeks must have been especially crazy and confusing from that guy's perspective, Hector figured. Melchor Blackburn had probably spent the majority of it unconscious and been continuously woken up just before another fight broke out.

Hector hoped everyone would be getting some well-deserved rest once they finally made it back to Warrenhold. There would still be plenty of things to be concerned about, of course--not the least of which was the other large group of Rainlords who'd been captured by the Gargoyle of Korgum at Rheinhal--but at least they wouldn't have to worry about being attacked at Warrenhold.

Probably.

The notion of Warrenhold coming under siege, too, had not really crossed his mind before. But it was definitely something that he should've been giving some thought to, he now figured.

Lord of Warrenhold, huh? Protecting it was on him. No doubt about that. And with the kind of enemies that could end up knocking on his door, combat strength alone probably wasn't going to be enough.

At least, not their current level of combat strength.

Hmm.

And of course, there was still the matter of what the hell he was going to tell the Queen. This probably wasn't something he should try to keep her in the dark about. Hell, she'd been looking for strong allies to help her protect Atreya in the future. Maybe he and Garovel would be able to convince her that this was a positive development in that regard.

There was also the restoration of Warrenhold itself to consider. The glimpse he'd gotten of its repairs had been nice, but he knew there were still quite a few places in total shambles.

Ugh. So much to take care of. He was pretty sure he was forgetting a few things at the moment, too.

Whatever. For now, it was nice to be able to just assist the Rainlords in extricating all these climate pods from the warehouses. The pods were still covered in the myriad of shields he'd made when he had arrived in the Undercrust. Maybe a few had fallen off here or there, but the pods still looked pretty well-protected, all things considered, and the Rainlords weren't bothering to remove the shields, either, despite how much more unwieldy they made them."

"1701

Soon, everything was moving. The warehouses were bustling with dozens of servants working together, and there was a feeling that they were finally making good progress. The pods were only being removed from the buildings and placed on the other side of the layer of brown dirt, but it was a start.

He eventually spotted Asad and his family moving among the crowd. They were especially noticeable because of their robes, which Hector was surprised to see were still intact, unlike almost everyone else's clothes. He would've liked to say hello, but they already seemed pretty invested in helping with the evacuation effort. The Lord Najir did take notice of him, however, despite how many other servants were wearing armor similar to his; and when the tattooed man offered him an acknowledging wave, Hector was quite pleased to return one of his own.

As the work continued, Hector also thought to ask Garovel about the threat potential of boron, but the reaper just said it wasn't a particularly volatile element, as far as he was aware. Then he asked Garovel if anyone present might have some sort of elemental advantage against it, but the reaper didn't think so.

'Maybe if someone here could materialize pure hydrogen,' said Garovel. 'Though, that might be more of a double-edged sword than an actual advantage.'

The closer they got to completing the evacuation, the more Hector worried that bad news would arrive at any moment. Maybe it was just his natural pessimism, or maybe it was an entirely rational adaptation to his lifestyle, but whatever it was, he kept expecting to hear Voreese suddenly tell everyone that Leo was on his way or that a feldeath was about to rip Capaporo to pieces or something.

But to Hector's immense surprise and relief, that didn't happen.

They finished removing all of the climate pods safely from the warehouse--by which time, Zeff and Axiolis had already begun leading a trail of Rainlords back towards Warrenhold. Manuel and Lorios led another entourage shortly thereafter, followed by Diego and Yangéra, and finally Hector and Garovel.

And since he was bringing up the rear, Hector ended up with perhaps more than his fair share of some of those powerful Rainlords in his group, including Melchor and several of the top Blackburns, Dimas and several of the top Sebolts, and Evangelina Stroud by herself. The rest of her family members were still captives of the Vanguard, after all.

The woman seemed to be in relatively high spirits, however.

"I have never worn armor like this before," she said, clad head to toe in full iron plate like pretty much everyone else in their party. "It is a bit restrictive, but I can see why you appear so fond of it."

Hector wasn't sure what to say. Materializing armor that fit the female form had easily been his most harrowing experience today, but he was glad that she seemed to like it. She was even carrying one of his shields."

"1702

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

'That is not entirely true, now is it?' said Ezura, the woman's reaper. 'I vividly remember you putting on Lord Romero's armor when you were a little girl. Or TRYING to, at least.' The reaper laughed.

"Oh, I had forgotten all about that," said the Lady Stroud. She eyed Hector through her dotted faceguard. "I was quite the tomboy in my youth, you know."

"...Think I'd be more surprised if you hadn't been," said Hector.

"Excuse me?!" the woman tittered.

"Ah--uh... s-sorry, I didn't mean that in a bad way..."

"Hmph! While it may be true that I have not acted in the most ladylike manner of late, I assure you that I have many traditionally feminine qualities."

"...I, ah, o-okay."

"Why do you sound so doubtful?"

"I--er--I don't. This is just how I sound."

'What "traditionally feminine qualities" might you be talking about, I wonder?' said Ezura.

Evangelina held up a gauntleted finger. "Do not even start."

'I am simply curious,' said Ezura.

“Don’t listen to them, Angie,” said Melchor, coming up on Hector’s right as they ascended a staircase that was wider than most others in Capaporo. “I have always thought you to be very feminine.”

“Thank you!” she said.

‘Perhaps YOU can provide examples of such qualities, then,’ said Ezura.

Melchor hesitated visibly.

Evangelina slowed her walking pace a little to put herself in stride with Melchor, looking abruptly even more eager to hear his response than Ezura was.

“Well,” said Melchor. “Obviously. Um. She likes wearing beautiful dresses.”

‘Uh-huh,’ said Ezura. ‘Is that all?’

“Of course not. She also... likes to shop, right?”

“Yes! I go shopping with my friends all the time!”

‘Okay, that’s two things. What else?’

“Ah... She is very... uh... agh, I did not realize this was going to be a quiz.”

“I hate sports! That counts, does it not?!”

‘I don’t know,’ said Ezura. ‘What does the young Lord Goffe think?’

At this point, Hector just wanted to run away. “I... I don’t think anything. At all, really.”

Garovel floated over from a conversation with Dimas and Iziol. ‘Are you guys giving my servant a hard time? I’ll have you know, I don’t appreciate people doing my job for me.’

‘It is mostly Evangelina whom I am trying to give a hard time,’ said Ezura, unable to completely conceal her giggling, ‘but I must admit, your young lord from Atreya is quite the tempting specimen in that regard, as well.’

‘Oh, I know, right?!’ Now it was Voreese’s turn to chime in, apparently. ‘Lemme get in on this action, too! Hey, Hector! If you had to bang any Rainlord right now, who would it be?’

‘Pardon me,’ said Iziol, hovering closer with Dimas behind him, ‘but who is this woman, exactly, and why is she so vulgar?’

‘Didn’t I tell you my name earlier?’ said Voreese. ‘Don’t tell me you forgot already. The fuck kinda reaper are you?’

‘The polite and civilized kind,’ said Iziol.

‘Oho! Well, la-dee-fucking-da!’

"1703

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

‘I find you very unpleasant,’ said Iziol.

‘Been called a lot worse than that, honey,’ said Voreese. ‘Why, even just today. A couple hours ago, my servant called me a moldy bitch.’

‘It sounds like the two of you are made for one another, then.’

‘Heh. Maybe. He can be a big ol’ shithead, sometimes.’

‘Hmph,’ said Iziol. ‘Have you met Mevox yet? I imagine you and he would either get along famously or try to tear each other to pieces.’

‘Is that so? Mevox, huh? I’ve not yet had the pleasure, but with an endorsement like that, I gotta admit, you’re makin’ me curious. Where is this guy? He isn’t here with us right now, is he?’

‘No, he is not. He is the reaper of Lord Salvador Delaguna, so naturally, he went with the rest of House Delaguna.’

‘Pity,’ said Voreese. ‘I’m always happy to meet a fellow shit talker.’

‘I am sure you will get your chance,’ said Iziol.

As Hector might have expected with so many reapers in such close proximity to one another, the servants ended up not getting much opportunity to chime in. No one seemed to mind, however. The reapers made for pretty good entertainment during the rather long and winding trek back up the great pit of Capaporo.

The group's progress was a bit on the slow side, due to the many climate pods they were bringing along. Dimas took care of the most impressive portion on his own. His alteration ability to manipulate gravity was pretty much perfect for the task, allowing the man to have a veritable fleet of pods following the group in midair.

Everyone else was carrying at least one pod as well. There were no non-servants walking with the group, as those had all departed earlier with Zeff.

They drew many a strange look from the inhabitants of Capaporo, and fellow pedestrians were quick to make way for them.

One thing that Hector had yet to see in the Undercrust was a car. Aside from trains, he hadn't noticed vehicles of any sort. He supposed it made sense for Capaporo, given how narrow the streets were here, but what was Babbadelo's reason? He wanted to ask Garovel about it, but the reaper was already occupied with another conversation.

He did eventually notice a large set of elevators, however--not large enough for the group to comfortably board with all of their climate pods, unfortunately, but it was something, at least. Hector wondered how he hadn't seen them on the way down earlier, and perhaps the immense crowd in the area was the explanation. He must have missed it because of all the bodies blocking his view.

He was still convinced that this city was in desperate need of some good bridges, though. No amount of elevators would change his mind about that.

Eventually, they reached the top of the giant pit again, and gingerly navigated their way through the even narrower side streets that led back up to the long path toward Warrenhold. There was still a ways to go yet, but they'd finally made it out of Capaporo, at least."

"1704

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

They managed to quicken their pace now that they had left the city behind. The lighting was much poorer here, but with so much more open space, Hector was able to carry the whole party forward on a growing platform. It was similar to the technique that Zeff had used to carry the group TO Capaporo earlier that day, though Hector wasn't trying to make his move at the same breakneck speed that Zeff's had.

At this pace, it would probably be a few more hours before they reached that same big cavern with all the branching pathways, Hector figured. If they were able to make it that far, though, then it would be a straight shot the rest of the way to Warrenhold.

From the corner of his helmet's opening, Hector could see Voreese staring at him. She wasn't saying anything, though, which was certainly unlike her.

He wanted to ask her if something was wrong, but the noise of the rushing wind would have made it impractical, so he asked Garovel to do it for him.

'You're awfully quiet all of a sudden,' the reaper told her.

She finally moved her empty eye sockets away from Hector. 'Hmm? Oh. Yeah. Just thinkin' about stuff. Why? You got something you want to talk about?'

'More like, I was wondering if YOU did,' said Garovel.

'Not as of yet,' said Voreese.

Garovel pushed a little more after that, but she would say nothing else.

Hector had a dreadful feeling that he knew what could be bothering her, and as the hours passed, he became increasingly convinced of it. By the time they reached the cavern of split paths, he could hold his tongue no longer and brought the group to a stop.

Everyone was looking at him now, but he was prepared for it.

"Voreese," he said softly. "Where's Roman?"

'He's with Leo,' she said.

"...He still hasn't managed to sneak away?" said Hector. "It's been hours since we left Capaporo."

'Well, he can't just run, now can he? Leo would obviously notice that. So he's waiting for Leo to go to sleep.'

Hector found that strange. "...Will it really be that easy? What if Leo checks on the warehouses and sees that everyone's gone? He'll probably suspect Roman immediately.”

‘...That is a possibility,’ said Voreese.

‘Why doesn’t he just destroy his own brain?’ said Iziol. ‘It is a grisly tactic, I know, but quite useful for these types of situations.’

‘He’s never done that before,’ said Voreese. ‘He’s worried he’ll screw it up and accidentally let Leo capture him.’

‘I see,’ said Iziol, glancing at his own servant. ‘I suppose it CAN be a little tricky.’

“Okay,” said Hector, raising up an iron chair for himself to sit down in. “I’ll wait for him here. Garovel can show you guys the rest of the way. It’s not that far now.””

"1705

‘What?’ said Voreese. ‘There’s no need for that. I’m sure Roman will manage. He’s a resourceful guy.’

“I know,” said Hector, folding his arms. “I’m just... eager to see him again, I guess.” He didn’t remove his eyes from Voreese, however.

“If you are waiting, then I will wait with you,” said Evangelina.

Hector held up a hand. “No, please--I want you all to go get some rest. And some food. Please.”

Melchor stepped toward him now. “It hardly seems appropriate that we should return without our host. You are not concerned we will make a mess of things?”

‘Yeah, we’re pretty good at making messes,’ said Orric.

‘No need to worry about that,’ said Garovel, though he was staring at Hector. ‘Warrenhold is a bit of a mess already. We’re in the middle of trying to restore it. That being said, though, we’d prefer it if you didn’t make more work for us.’

“Ah--yeah,” added Hector. “Just promise me you’ll behave yourselves.” He meant that as a joke and so tried to force out a meager laugh to make that more apparent, but the sound didn’t quite manifest from his throat properly. Somehow, it ended up sounding more like a sigh.

And for a few moments thereafter, none of the Rainlords responded.

Aw, shit. Had he just pissed them off?

Agh. He should've known better than to try and force a joke out in an otherwise serious conversation. That was something he should just leave to the reapers, he decided.

Iziol was the first one to speak up again. 'Is there some reason to be concerned about the well-being of Voreese's servant?'

Everyone looked at Voreese.

Her head reared back a little at all the sudden attention. 'I'm telling you, he's fine. He's just biding his time.'

Everyone looked back at Hector.

"Okay," said the Lord Goffe. "Then ask him something for me."

Voreese stared back at him steadily.

"...What did he say to me just before the Battle at Rathmore's Gate?" said Hector.

Everyone looked back to Voreese again.

Her skeletal face twisted with irritation. 'Agh! Fuck you, Hector! Why do you gotta call me out like this, huh?!'

Hector wasn't having any of it, though. "Why were you lying?" he said firmly.

'Ugh! Why do you think?! For your own good, obviously!'

"If Roman needs help, then--"

'Then, what?! What, huh?! You're gonna go help him?! How, exactly?! This Leo guy is one of Sai-hee's strongest people! One of the strongest people in the whole world, in other words! How do you plan to deal with that?!'

Hector didn't say anything.

'I mean, would I like you guys to go and rescue him for me?' said

Voreese. 'Of course I would! But Leo already made you all his bitches once before!' After a beat, she added, 'No offense.'

"1706 -- CLXXXII.

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

Orric hovered closer to Hector. 'If we did decide to mount a counterattack, we would have the element of surprise this time. It would not be like it was before.'

'Oh, don't give me that shit!' said Voreese. 'You also don't have nearly as many fighters as you did before! Or do you plan to go to Warrenhold and get everyone to rejoin us first? All so you can rescue a single servant you know nothing about? A servant whose reaper isn't even in danger? Get real.'

Izior chimed in now. 'Are you truly saying that you do not mind leaving your servant behind?'

'Of course I'm not saying that! But putting yourselves in danger for him makes no goddamn sense! So don't try and pretend that it does just so you can feel all noble and shit!'

"She is right," said Melchor. "We have no reason to rescue this man, and it would be incredibly dangerous. We have our own people to think of."

"I agree," said Evangelina, eyeing Hector now. "Harsh as it may be, I do not think we should get involved. Facing Leo again would be ill-advised, especially so soon after our previous encounter."

'I have to concur as well,' added Ezura. 'The risk far outweighs the benefit, and we have already lost far too much in recent days.'

At that, no one said anything for a while, not even Voreese.

"...That's fine," said Hector, drawing everyone's gaze one more time. "You guys don't have a reason to go after him. But I do."

'Hector,' said Garovel privately. 'What are you--?'

"Honestly, I didn't want to bring you guys back to Capaporo with me, anyway," said Hector. "Just head to Warrenhold and get some rest. I'll take care of this.”

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Two: ‘O, resolute Iron...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘You’ll “take care” of it?!’ said Voreese. ‘Are you fucking kidding me?! I already asked before, didn’t I?! How the fuck do you plan on pulling that off, huh?!’

That was a very good question. And since Hector wasn’t entirely sure of the answer, he instead decided to say, “Don’t worry. I have experience with this sort of thing.”

‘What the fuck?! You have experience with--?! Are you--?! Wh--?!’

Amazingly enough, she seemed to be lost for words. Perhaps she was suddenly remembering what Garovel had told her about their recent adventures.

Hector was more concerned about how the Rainlords would react, however. He genuinely had no idea what they were going to do.

Currently, they were simply looking at him, not moving or saying anything.

‘Hector,’ came Garovel’s private voice again, ‘what the fuck are you doing?’

Again, another very good question. He answered it with the only thing that came to mind. ‘I’m not leaving Roman behind, Garovel. It’s my fault he even came here in the first place.’

‘Agh--that’s true, but--’

Now Garovel seemed lost for words as well.

Hmm.

Two for two. Hector felt pretty good about that."
"1706 -- CLXXXII.

Orric hovered closer to Hector. 'If we did decide to mount a counterattack, we would have the element of surprise this time. It would not be like it was before.'

'Oh, don't give me that shit!' said Voreese. 'You also don't have nearly as many fighters as you did before! Or do you plan to go to Warrenhold and get everyone to rejoin us first? All so you can rescue a single servant you know nothing about? A servant whose reaper isn't even in danger? Get real.'

Izli chimed in now. 'Are you truly saying that you do not mind leaving your servant behind?'

'Of course I'm not saying that! But putting yourselves in danger for him makes no goddamn sense! So don't try and pretend that it does just so you can feel all noble and shit!'

"She is right," said Melchor. "We have no reason to rescue this man, and it would be incredibly dangerous. We have our own people to think of."

"I agree," said Evangelina, eyeing Hector now. "Harsh as it may be, I do not think we should get involved. Facing Leo again would be ill-advised, especially so soon after our previous encounter."

'I have to concur as well,' added Ezura. 'The risk far outweighs the benefit, and we have already lost far too much in recent days.'

At that, no one said anything for a while, not even Voreese.

"...That's fine," said Hector, drawing everyone's gaze one more time. "You guys don't have a reason to go after him. But I do."

'Hector,' said Garovel privately. 'What are you--?'

"Honestly, I didn't want to bring you guys back to Capaporo with me, anyway," said Hector. "Just head to Warrenhold and get some rest. I'll take care of this."

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Two: 'O, resolute Iron...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'You'll "take care" of it?!' said Voreese. 'Are you fucking kidding me?! I already asked before, didn't I?! How the fuck do you plan on pulling that off, huh?!'

That was a very good question. And since Hector wasn't entirely sure of the answer, he instead decided to say, "Don't worry. I have experience with this sort of thing."

'What the fuck?! You have experience with--?! Are you--?! Wh--?!'

Amazingly enough, she seemed to be lost for words. Perhaps she was suddenly remembering what Garovel had told her about their recent adventures.

Hector was more concerned about how the Rainlords would react, however. He genuinely had no idea what they were going to do.

Currently, they were simply looking at him, not moving or saying anything.

'Hector,' came Garovel's private voice again, 'what the fuck are you doing?'

Again, another very good question. He answered it with the only thing that came to mind. 'I'm not leaving Roman behind, Garovel. It's my fault he even came here in the first place.'

'Agh--that's true, but--'

Now Garovel seemed lost for words as well.

Hmm.

Two for two. Hector felt pretty good about that."
"1707

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Melchor was the one to break the silence. "...Do you truly believe that you can defeat Leo on your own?"

Absolutely fucking not. But admitting that so bluntly was probably a bad idea, Hector felt. He had the feeling that they wouldn't let him go if he didn't act like he knew what he was doing.

So the lie here would have to be convincing. And acting overly confident in his own power would not be convincing, Hector felt. Strong people like Evangelina, Dimas, and Melchor wouldn't be swayed by boasting. No doubt, they'd seen plenty of people talk a big game in the past and then not be able to deliver.

No, in that moment, Hector felt like he had to strike a particular balance between self-certainty and pragmatism. That was what he had to project, if he was to have any hope of being allowed to go after Roman on his own.

Which meant the question of whether or not he believed he could defeat Leo by himself was a crucial one.

"Maybe," Hector decided to say, "but I probably won't bother fighting him. My goal isn't to test my strength. It's to get Roman back. And fighting isn't the only way to accomplish that."

Darktide just stared at him, not saying anything.

Was that good? Did he buy it? Hector couldn't tell. Agh. It seemed like every old servant had an incredible poker face.

Evangelina chose to say something now. "If not by fighting, then what do you intend to do?"

Oof. He hadn't fully figured that out yet, but again, admitting as much seemed like a bad idea.

"I... can't tell you," said Hector.

"Excuse me?" said Evangelina, sounding irritated. "Why can you not tell us?"

He decided to borrow a tactic from Asad and Qorvass again. "Trade secret," he said.

"Ridiculous," she said. "Tell us your plan now."

"...No."

It was a bit hard to tell through her faceguard, but she did not look happy.

Okay, maybe saying all of that was a stupid thing to do, but Hector couldn't help feeling that, of the two options available to him, it was better to come across as cagey than as lacking a concrete plan.

Everyone was being quiet again.

Hmm. Maybe they needed some reassurance.

"I won't do anything stupid," Hector lied, knowing that he was already doing that. "You don't need to worry. And besides, er, it'll be easier if I go by myself, because Leo won't know who I am. If I bring you guys along, he'll recognize you immediately and probably just attack us." Huh. That seemed like a surprisingly good point, Hector felt. He had kind of been thinking that all along, he supposed, but it sure would have been nice if he could have articulated it earlier.

'Does that mean you intend to negotiate with him?' said Orric.

Aw, shit. Why did they have to read so much into it?

"Ah... maybe," said Hector again. "If I have to. Look, uh, that's not important. Just let me handle this, okay?" And one more lie to top it all off. "I know what I'm doing."

He was starting to feel like a really bad person with all this lying. And also maybe a dumbass."

"1708

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

One of the several other servants who had been watching but not saying anything up to now decided to speak up. "Well, if Lord Goffe believes he can do it, then..." It was one of the Blackburn women. Silvia, Hector was pretty sure.

He was surprised to hear her say that, as well, considering she'd actually seen him fight, all the way back in Luzo. She couldn't have been very impressed by his prowess back then, either, considering Asad had done all the heavy lifting in that battle.

Strange. Hector wondered what had changed her view of him.

Though, perhaps it would make more sense if nothing had. Maybe her view of him hadn't changed at all, and she was simply saying that because she didn't give two shits about the current situation and just wanted to move things along so that her family could get to safety.

Yeah, Hector found that much more believable. Aside from Melchor and occasionally Horatio, the Blackburns were noticeably different from the other Rainlords. More withdrawn. Even now, Hector could see it in the way they were standing so close together, especially around the Lady Nere. She was wearing full iron armor like everyone else, but Hector could still easily pick her out of the crowd from her body language alone. That slumped posture, the frequently downcast gaze. From what he'd heard, she'd been that way ever since leaving Dunehall.

Dunehall, where her husband Ismael had been killed, and her son Ibai had gone missing, in addition to all of the other casualties her House had suffered.

Hector certainly couldn't blame the Blackburns for seeming that much more protective of her now.

A few other voices arose in agreement with Silvia, more Blackburns and a few Sebolts as well, until at length, Evangelina Stroud spoke up again.

"Fine." She tapped Hector on the pate of his helmet with the iron knuckle of her own gauntlet. "We will go. But do not tarry long. Else you give us reason to come looking for you." She turned and started walking away.

Hector was too busy blinking to come up with a response. She'd actually agreed? He'd expected her to be the most difficult to convince.

The other Rainlords began following her, reapers included, but Dimas and Melchor lingered a bit longer, as did Voreese, Garovel, Iziol, and Orric.

'This is moronic,' said Voreese. 'You can't possibly... agh, I mean, I'm grateful, but... Hector, what the fuck?'

"I'll need you to point me toward Roman," said Hector. "I hope you won't mind coming with me part of the way, at least."

'Of course I won't mind, you piece of shit! But--! Argh!'

Melchor stepped closer to him. "What if you do not return?"

Hector didn't know how to answer that.

"If you are captured," said Melchor, "and if we are unable to locate or otherwise retrieve your brain... in such a circumstance, is there something you would like us to do for you? As a final request?"

Oh. Hmm."

"1709

Hector thought about it a moment. "If that happens, then... please look after Warrenhold for me. There are, uh... only three people living there, right now. My mother, a woman named Amelia Carthrace, and a man named Jamal Easton. But... ah..."

"I understand," said Melchor.

'It would be our honor to protect them,' said Orric.

"But not our preference," said Dimas, which was perhaps the first thing that Hector had heard him say since Capaporo. "Please do not get captured."

Hector just gave him a nod.

After that, Melchor and Dimas turned to leave, and Orric and Izio followed suit.

Mr. Easton was probably going to be quite overwhelmed with all of these guests. Hector had never actually told the man directly they would be arriving, but he was fairly certain Mr. Easton already knew. Asad's wife and son should have conveyed that message when they first arrived.

Probably.

One more thing to worry about later, he supposed.

Only Garovel and Voreese now remained.

'Huh,' said Garovel aloud. 'Shall we head back to Capaporo, then?'

Hector eyed him. "Garovel..."

‘They don’t need me to guide them. They know the correct direction now, and from here, it’s a straight shot back to Warrenhold.’

“That doesn’t change the fact that it’s too dangerous to bring you.”

‘I’ll keep my distance and observe from afar,’ said Garovel. ‘It’s like you said. Leo doesn’t know who you are. He won’t know who I am, either, or that you’re my servant. Or that you even ARE a servant.’

Hector frowned.

‘And considering how apparently reluctant you were to share your plan with everyone, I have a feeling that you don’t actually HAVE a plan. Or, at least not one that doesn’t sound completely insane. Am I close?’

Hector didn’t say anything and just glanced at Voreese.

Voreese was already looking at Garovel, though. ‘You’re not exactly filling me with confidence over here, sayin’ shit like that.’

‘All I’m saying is, it wouldn’t hurt to come up with a sound plan.’

“Do you have some suggestions?” said Hector.

‘Let’s move while we talk,’ said Garovel. ‘It’ll take a few hours to get back there.’

That was a good point, Hector supposed. He still didn’t really want to bring Garovel along, but as long as the reaper intended to keep his distance when the time came, there wasn’t much actual justification for leaving him behind.

This time, he pushed himself for a faster pace. Without all the climate pods in tow, he no longer had to worry about having a delicate touch. He simply let the two reapers attach themselves to him beneath his cooling variant armor, and then they blasted off toward Capaporo again, as fast as his iron could carry him.

‘So the fact that Leo doesn’t know who you are may be our greatest advantage,’ said Garovel.

‘Are you thinking Hector can just sneak up and yoink Roman away from him?’ said Voreese.”

"1710

'That is exactly what I am thinking, yes,' said Garovel. 'If Hector can find a good opening, he might not even have to get very close to Leo in the first place. Assuming that Roman is just a frozen head or brain at the moment, then Hector could use materialization to punt Roman over to himself like a kickball.'

'And then we all escape without ever being noticed?' said Voreese.

'Ideally.'

'Yeah, sure, sounds great. In theory.'

'Yes. In theory.'

Hector might have said the same thing, if not for the howl of the wind rushing past.

The reapers continued to strategize for the length of the journey, and Hector mostly just listened while occasionally sharing his thoughts with Garovel. The consensus seemed to be that it would be best if Leo never even noticed they were there in the first place, but that was also where the main concern lay. If, for whatever reason, Leo did notice Hector, what the hell was he going to do?

They came up with a few different plans for that, though neither of the reapers sounded terrifically confident in them. Part of the reason for that was probably because of how little they actually knew about Leo. None of them had ever even met the guy, so it was hard to guess how he would react to any hypothetical situation.

They did know that he hadn't permanently harmed any of the Rainlords, however. And that was important, Hector felt. Leo had gone through a fair amount of trouble to make sure that the non-servants were taken care of during their captivity. Even some who were servants, like Marcos Elroy, had not been harmed. Though, perhaps Leo simply couldn't tell that Marcos was a servant just by looking at him. The boy was extremely young and probably hadn't participated in the fighting, after all.

All in all, that spoke quite a bit about Leo's character, Hector thought, when it probably would've been so much easier to just kill them.

Unless, of course, Leo knew that Sai-hee would want them all alive for some reason.

Bah.

Best not to assume too much, Hector supposed. If nothing else, though, at least he could take mild comfort in the fact that he wasn't dealing with another one of those maniacs from Abolish.

When they finally made it back to Capaporo again, Hector eased to a stop near the narrow staircase that led down into the city and looked over the enormous pit again. "Can either of you sense Roman's location yet?"

'If he's really just a brain right now, then it'll be tougher to sense his soul,' said Voreese. 'But he should be closer to the bottom of the pit, at least.'

Hector took the staircase, trying to keep a brisk pace as he looked for the same path downward that they'd used earlier. "Why would his soul be more difficult to sense? Is there, like, less of it or something?"
"1711

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

'Sort of, but not exactly,' said Garovel. 'It's tough to explain in physical terms, but you can kind of imagine the soul as being like water, and the body being like a vessel that it conforms to the shape of. Or in other words, as reapers, we "see" souls in the shape of the body they reside within. So the smaller that body is, the more difficult it becomes to notice, especially in a crowd.'

"Huh..."

'Also, that's not a perfect analogy, by the way, because water still has physical volume, and souls do not. At least, not as far as I know. So a smaller vessel would be able to contain less water, but it's not the same with souls. Your soul doesn't start leaking out of your arm if you get it chopped off. It just conforms to the new shape of your body.'

"Oh. Right..."

Hector navigated his way downward again. There seemed to be more

Hun'Kui on these upper levels than there were the last time, and they didn't all look like they were in the middle of going somewhere this time, either. Many of them were simply loitering and chatting. Maybe they'd all been at work earlier. Or school. He couldn't really tell if any of the Hun'Kui were teenagers or adults.

Regardless, it was a bit of an inconvenience for him, because it meant more eyes on him. It seemed like he was drawing much more attention than he had before, despite the fact that he'd been part of a rather large party the last time. He would've thought it would be easier to keep a low profile, not harder.

Maybe that was just a feeling, though, and not the actual truth. Maybe there'd been plenty of people noticing them last time, but they'd just been too afraid to stare, and now that he was alone, he was much less intimidating.

Hmm.

It only got more crowded as he descended. The elevators were even more jam-packed than before, so he avoided them. He briefly considered leaping over the edge of the pit and catching himself with his iron, but he didn't think that would help him keep a low profile, which he was having a hard enough time with already.

'Ah,' said Voreese at length, 'I can sense Leo.'

"Leo?" said Hector, trying to whisper so as not to draw the attention of a big Hun'Kui family walking by. It didn't work. "Not Roman?"

'Hmm. Ah, yeah, I can sense Roman, too. He's with him.'

Hector was still confused, though. "But how can you sense Leo? I thought you never met him."

'Those warehouses that he used to imprison everybody,' said Voreese. 'He soul-strengthened his material there. I memorized his soul based on that.'

"Oh..." Hector wouldn't have even thought of that.

'Follow me,' said Voreese, taking a path to the right that wasn't even visible because of the crowd.

Hector gently pushed his way through and went after her."

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Another long staircase awaited, and Hector descended toward another of the climate-controlled zones. Garovel hovered by his side, and Hector tried to keep him in his peripheral vision, right at the edge of the eye slit in his helmet.

‘By the way,’ said Voreese, slowing her pace to match Hector’s, ‘there’s something I forgot to tell you.’

Garovel answered for the both of them. ‘What’s that?’

‘Um. Well. Okay. First, you have to promise not to get upset.’

‘Voreese... What did you do?’

‘Excuse me, but that doesn’t sound like a promise.’

‘And you’re not gonna get one. What did you do?’

‘Agh. Well. It’s nothing, really. It’s just. You see. I may have. Um. Told Roman to. Tell Leo. A few things.’

‘Uh-huh. What things?’

‘Things about Hector.’

Garovel stopped. ‘What?! Why?!’

Voreese and Hector both stopped as well.

‘It was supposed to be part of a backup plan,’ she said, ‘in case Leo caught us in the middle of trying to free your Rainlord pals. I figured fighting in that situation would’ve been less than ideal, so it might’ve been worth a shot to just bluff our way out. If we got him to believe that Hector was some sort of super badass, then maybe Leo would back down. Or join us.’

‘Join us?!’ said Garovel.

‘Yeah, Roman tried to hire him earlier. Did I not mention that?’

‘No, you didn’t!’

‘Ah. My bad.’

‘Voreese!’

‘Leo said he didn’t want to work for someone who was weaker than him, so I figured, maybe, y’know, with all that crazy shit you were tellin’ me earlier, we could preemptively build Hector up as someone who Leo might think was strong enough to work for.’

Garovel groaned but steadied his voice. ‘Why didn’t you tell us this earlier?’

‘I’m telling you now.’

‘This might’ve been nice to know while we were brainstorming on the way here.’

‘Oh, I doubt it would’ve helped. You’d have just gotten mad at me like you are right now, which would’ve made it harder for you to think rationally.’

‘What a load of horseshit.’

‘Look, I’m sorry, okay?! It seemed like a good plan at the time!’

‘How much did Roman tell him, exactly?’

‘Not that much. Just, y’know, about those things you told me. Meeting Ivan. Killing worms ‘n stuff. Also, Leo might be thinking that the Rainlords are, um... following Hector as their new leader.’

Hector’s eyes widened, and he stared at her.

‘Voreese, are you fucking kidding me, right now?’ said Garovel.

‘Well, Leo had already fought the Rainlords! So obviously, I had to make Hector more powerful than them! Wouldn’t have been believable otherwise!’

‘Ugh...’ Garovel paused for another sigh and perhaps also just to think. ‘Did Roman tell him what Hector looks like?’

She hesitated. ‘...A little bit.’”

"1713

‘Elaborate,’ said Garovel flatly.

‘I just had Roman mention that Hector looks super young for his level of strength, and... that he’s black.’

Garovel lost his composure again. ‘That’s NOT a little bit, Voreese! Hector’s probably the only black person in Capaporo, right now!’

‘Eh, I mean, that’s debatable, isn’t it? The Hun’Kui sort of count as black, right? Ashy gray tones ‘n whatnot.’

‘I can’t believe you.’

‘Hey, it’s not like Leo knows we’re coming. Or what you and I look like. As long as Hector stays out of sight, we can still get the jump on him.’

‘This means that if he DOES spot Hector, then Hector can no longer pretend to be someone else. Someone who, for example, is NOT connected to the Rainlords whom Leo is probably very upset about losing track of.’

‘Yeah, that would be a problem,’ said Voreese. ‘But on the bright side, Leo could be too scared to fight Hector now.’

‘Oh, sure, and he might also decide to give us a trillion fucking troas for no reason.’

In spite of everything, the party of three soon continued onward and entered the climate-controlled zone. Hector removed his cooling variant armor and decided not to remake it in its normal form. It would be too noisy, he felt, and considering everything that they had just learned, stealth seemed more important than ever. He did remake a few pieces of the armor, though, for modesty’s sake. Walking around half-naked wouldn’t have been very stealthy, either.

After a few more flights of stairs and several white-and-silver corridors, Voreese finally began to slow down.

‘Leo’s just up here to the left,’ she said.

Hector reached the apparent corner in question and took a breath to gather himself. He poked his head around for a peek.

Thankfully, the crowd wasn’t nearly as dense in this area, so it was easy to discern who Leo must have been. There was no one else around the man with dreadlocks as he sat on a bench in front of a glassy wall.

No. Not just a wall, Hector realized after a moment. A water tank. So big that it spanned that entire side of the chamber. Hector could just barely make out tall shadows in the water. Some type of plant, he was pretty sure.

He searched for Roman but couldn't see him anywhere. Unless... that pitch black lump under Leo's hand...

'Is that Roman's head?' said Hector.

'Yep,' the reaper said privately.

Great.

This was also a very bad location for a fight, Hector thought. He'd been wondering where all the normal people down here were getting their water, and now he had his answer. No doubt, water was an extremely difficult commodity to come by in the Undercrust. The Hun'Sho and the Hun'Kui hadn't seemed to need it much, if at all, but everyone in these climate-controlled zones obviously did.

So if that tank ended up damaged, somehow...

Hector didn't even want to imagine how bad the collateral damage might be."

"1714

At least Leo wasn't looking in this direction. He was just staring at the tank. Perhaps he was thinking about something. Or sleeping, maybe. Hector couldn't see his face.

Hector considered his options. He had the element of surprise, still. Therefore, the plan to get Roman and escape without being noticed was at least possible. The problem was that hand on Roman's encapsulated head. As long as that hand was there, Leo would immediately notice if Hector tried to use materialization to move Roman.

So, then... a distraction. How could he distract Leo without revealing himself?

Hector looked around another time. He needed more information.

The Scarf of Amordiin revealed the geometry of the room to him, as well as that of the corridor from which Hector was looking in. The room had a half-circle shape but was mostly featureless beyond that. It seemed to be a gallery of some sort. Paintings hung on all the walls, save the one that was the water tank. A few people dotted the area, apparently admiring said paintings.

Ugh. Not much to go on.

Hector concentrated. Maybe the Scarf could tell him more about Leo himself. He tried to sense the movement of the air around the man, wanting to discern the shape of not just his overall figure but his clothes, too. Was he carrying anything on him? In his coat?

Yes, he was. Something in the inner pocket. A pen. A small key. And some coins. Hmm. What about the other pockets? All empty, as far as Hector could tell. Hard to be sure, though, since the man's pants seemed to fit him pretty tightly.

Wow. Such useful intel.

Hector wasn't sure what he'd been expecting. What could the man possibly have been carrying that would help Hector rescue Roman?

Agh. Getting distracted. And discouraged. Not the time for that.

He tried to think. To concentrate. To try again. He just needed a distraction. Something that would make Leo move his hand away from Roman.

As much as Hector thought about it, though, he couldn't think of anything that could guarantee that.

Except maybe attacking Leo. Cutting the hand off. Or decapitating the guy.

Probably a horrible idea. Probably the literal worst idea, in fact.

Part of Hector felt like he might actually be able to pull that off, though. With the element of surprise on his side like this? Maybe. Hector still recalled Lord Abbas' fight with Ivan. More specifically, he recalled how quickly it had ended and how Abbas had attributed the victory to catching Ivan off guard.

Oftentimes, with the kind of power that Hector had borne witness to, he felt like defeating a significantly older servant was simply impossible, no matter the circumstances. But perhaps that wasn't truly so. Abbas had overcome an incredible power gap, thanks almost entirely to favorable conditions. To strategy.

It was an encouraging thought.

And a dangerous one.

Hector didn't want to attack the guy unless he had no other choice. But that was also a problem, wasn't it? If it truly reached a point where he had no other choice, then it would probably be too late. In a straight fight, Leo would obviously obliterate him.

Agh..."

"1715

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

The reapers were being noticeably quiet all of a sudden, Hector thought. When he turned to look at them, he realized they weren't there anymore.

Oh, right. They'd said they would keep their distance.

'Where'd you guys go?' thought Hector.

'We're about a hundred meters to your right,' came Garovel's private answer.

Well, at least they were keeping themselves safe. He still didn't really like them wandering around on their own when the Undercrust was known for having ardor-fueled weaponry, but Capaporo seemed peaceful enough, he supposed. And they were probably even more wary of such things than he was.

'Any idea what you're gonna do?' said Garovel.

'Not really,' said Hector. 'Open to suggestions.'

‘Voreese and I recommend patience. Take your time and wait for an opening to present itself. And stay out of his line of sight.’

Not the most compelling plan but probably most reasonable, Hector figured. Certainly more so than attacking Leo in a location where one of the city’s most valuable resources would be put in jeopardy. And that wasn’t even considering what would happen if the attack failed, and Leo counterattacked. Which seemed incredibly likely.

So Hector waited. He waited, and he watched. People came and went from the gallery, often staring at him as they passed. Eventually, Hector resorted to leaning with his back to the wall. He shut his eyes and relied entirely on the Scarf for information instead of staring at Leo around the corner like an idiot.

He wasn’t sure why he’d ever been doing that in the first place. He was just accustomed to relying on his eyes for everything.

Then again, there was certainly still utility in using his eyes. He couldn’t see color with the Scarf, obviously. If he concentrated, though, he could vaguely discern the shape of Leo’s face. The guy seemed to have a pretty big nose. And a trimmed beard.

Most importantly and obviously, however, the Scarf didn’t let him see reapers. Air would simply flow right through them. Definitely still needed eyes for that.

After a while, Hector began to wonder what the hell this guy was doing here. Why was he just sitting there like that? His eyes weren’t closed, according to the Scarf, so he probably wasn’t meditating. He was just staring at the water tank.

Was he waiting for something?

Hold on a second.

...Wasn’t Sai-hee supposed to show up? Or, maybe not her, but at least someone who represented her? That had been Leo’s plan, hadn’t it? To turn the Rainlords over to her and earn her forgiveness?

But Leo didn’t HAVE the Rainlords anymore, so what the hell was his plan now?

Or...?

Hector blinked, remembering Rasalased’s words.

"A lost sheep," the Dry God had said.

Leo was the lost sheep, clearly. Which meant...

Had Leo simply given up? Was he just waiting for Sai-hee to show up and either kill or capture him?"

"1716

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

It made almost too much sense, Hector felt. And worse, whether he was killed or captured hardly even mattered at this point, didn't it? Voreese had of course informed Hector and everyone else of Leo's troubled relationship with his reaper. So if Leo was captured as a brain, like Roman currently was, then the man's reaper probably wasn't going to bother reviving him. Unless Sai-hee ordered it, perhaps.

Regardless, Leo's circumstances were looking more than a little grim. To Hector's mind, Leo should have been running for his life right about now, and yet he wasn't. He was just sitting there, instead. Waiting for judgment and whatever came after.

Hector didn't know anything about the guy, but he still felt a little bad for him.

And in a strange way, he related to him.

Hector was no stranger to that feeling of giving up. Of utter hopelessness. He hadn't been letting it win lately, but he certainly remembered a time when he did. In fact, that was probably part of the reason why he hadn't wanted to let it win. Not again.

Ah, but here Hector was, probably reading way too much into the situation. Leo was way older than him, and his problems were probably way more complicated.

Maybe.

Rasalased had definitely called him a lost sheep, though. And the Dry God hadn't told Hector to stay away from him, either.

But Hector had also come to learn Rasalased was far from omniscient. So...

There was no telling what the correct course of action here was.

Shit.

Hector was tempted to just walk over and talk to the guy. Try to console him, maybe. Try to reason with him. And perhaps even try to help him.

He was tempted, but... was that actually a good idea?

Leo would doubtless figure out who he was almost immediately. And then he might just try to force Hector to give up the Rainlords so that he could resume his previous plan.

But... so what if he did that? Hector wasn't going to give up the Rainlords. There was zero chance that Leo would be able to get that information out of him. And if Hector could somehow make Leo realize that, too...

Then...

Hmm.

Oh, and there was also Sai-hee's people to worry about. There was no telling when they would show up. And if they arrived while Hector was just twiddling his thumbs here, then it would probably become even more difficult to get Roman back--if not straight up impossible.

But wait. That wasn't even the worst-case scenario, was it?

No, the worst-case scenario would be if Sai-hee showed up, and then Leo told her... that the Rainlords... were now following... someone named Hector...

That was just Voreese's bullshit, of course, but if Sai-hee actually believed it and then ended up coming to Warrenhold in search of them, then it would still be catastrophic just the same. And if she really did hate the Rainlords, then it would make plenty of sense to go after them now, while they were weakened and no longer had their affiliation with the Vanguard for protection.

Oh. Fuck.

Hector rubbed his forehead and took a deep breath. Waiting for an opening wasn't looking like such an attractive option, all of sudden."

"1717 -- CLXXXIII.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

He had to take action, Hector felt. He couldn't just wait around and hope for the best, not when he was responsible for protecting so many people. If nothing else, he had to ensure that the worst-case scenario didn't come to pass.

That really only left two options, then. Either attack preemptively or try to talk to the guy.

Both of those seemed like they could go horribly.

But... Hector didn't really want to attack him. Maybe it was just because he felt bad for Leo. Maybe it was softness on Hector's part. He didn't want to make an emotional decision here, but at the same time, there didn't seem to be a rationally best option.

Except, maybe... well, if talking went awry, then Leo would probably capture him. But if fighting went awry, then the water tank would likely get damaged, AND Leo would probably capture him.

Hmm.

Hector supposed that was about as rational as he could hope for, given the circumstances.

He took a deep breath and tried to prepare himself, thinking over the situation one last time.

A thought occurred him.

'...Does Leo know what my ability is?' said Hector.

'I'll ask,' said Garovel. And there was a pause. 'He shouldn't. Voreese didn't have Roman tell him that.'

Interesting.

Okay.

He stepped away from the corner and into the room with Leo.

‘Hector, what are you doing?’ said Garovel.

Hector tried to explain his reasoning as best he could. It took a little while, and he was mindful of Leo turning around the whole time, but Hector managed to impart the gist of it.

‘This is a really bad idea,’ said Garovel at length.

‘Yeah, I know,’ said Hector. ‘But it’s like you said. Sometimes there won’t be a good option left to choose.’

‘Goddammit, don’t throw my own words back at me.’

‘I’m doing this, Garovel. Wish me luck.’

‘Ugh. Good luck.’

Hector took a deep breath and then walked up behind the man. When he was close enough, he decided to armor up fully again. It might conceal his identity somewhat, though he suspected that Leo would be able to guess who he was anyway.

Mainly, he wanted the armor for himself. Heavy as it was, he was somehow more comfortable in it. It didn’t make him feel safer, precisely, but maybe just a little more powerful. He could almost pretend to be someone else while he was wearing it. Someone who actually knew what they were doing.

And he was going to need that feeling, he thought.

Then, finally, Hector dared to speak up.

“...Are you alright?” he asked.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Three: ‘Thine addled hearts...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector saw Leo twitch a little at the sound of his voice. He walked around the bench as his armor clinked noisily with each step, feeling Leo’s gaze on him now. When he reached the other side, however, he noticed that the man’s eyes were wide.

What was he so surprised about, Hector wondered?

Maybe he just hadn't been expecting to see someone in full plate armor all of a sudden.

Yeah, okay, maybe that made sense."
"1717 -- CLXXXIII.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

He had to take action, Hector felt. He couldn't just wait around and hope for the best, not when he was responsible for protecting so many people. If nothing else, he had to ensure that the worst-case scenario didn't come to pass.

That really only left two options, then. Either attack preemptively or try to talk to the guy.

Both of those seemed like they could go horribly.

But... Hector didn't really want to attack him. Maybe it was just because he felt bad for Leo. Maybe it was softness on Hector's part. He didn't want to make an emotional decision here, but at the same time, there didn't seem to be a rationally best option.

Except, maybe... well, if talking went awry, then Leo would probably capture him. But if fighting went awry, then the water tank would likely get damaged, AND Leo would probably capture him.

Hmm.

Hector supposed that was about as rational as he could hope for, given the circumstances.

He took a deep breath and tried to prepare himself, thinking over the situation one last time.

A thought occurred him.

'...Does Leo know what my ability is?' said Hector.

'I'll ask,' said Garovel. And there was a pause. 'He shouldn't. Voreese didn't have Roman tell him that.'

Interesting.

Okay.

He stepped away from the corner and into the room with Leo.

‘Hector, what are you doing?’ said Garovel.

Hector tried to explain his reasoning as best he could. It took a little while, and he was mindful of Leo turning around the whole time, but Hector managed to impart the gist of it.

‘This is a really bad idea,’ said Garovel at length.

‘Yeah, I know,’ said Hector. ‘But it’s like you said. Sometimes there won’t be a good option left to choose.’

‘Goddammit, don’t throw my own words back at me.’

‘I’m doing this, Garovel. Wish me luck.’

‘Ugh. Good luck.’

Hector took a deep breath and then walked up behind the man. When he was close enough, he decided to armor up fully again. It might conceal his identity somewhat, though he suspected that Leo would be able to guess who he was anyway.

Mainly, he wanted the armor for himself. Heavy as it was, he was somehow more comfortable in it. It didn’t make him feel safer, precisely, but maybe just a little more powerful. He could almost pretend to be someone else while he was wearing it. Someone who actually knew what they were doing.

And he was going to need that feeling, he thought.

Then, finally, Hector dared to speak up.

“...Are you alright?” he asked.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Three: ‘Thine addled hearts...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector saw Leo twitch a little at the sound of his voice. He walked around the bench as his armor clinked noisily with each step, feeling Leo's gaze on him now. When he reached the other side, however, he noticed that the man's eyes were wide.

What was he so surprised about, Hector wondered?

Maybe he just hadn't been expecting to see someone in full plate armor all of a sudden.

Yeah, okay, maybe that made sense."

"1718

Hector waited, matching the man's gaze evenly, but when Leo didn't respond, Hector decided to materialize an iron seat for himself instead of just sitting next to Leo on the bench. He added significantly more detail into the seat than was probably necessary, making it less like a chair and more like a throne.

He felt like he had to project power, lest this conversation would end before it even began.

Hector sat down and folded his arms. "...Hello, by the way."

"Who are you?" asked Leo, still wide-eyed and attentive.

That was a dangerous question to answer, Hector felt. It was a big risk to reveal the truth right now. Leo could react very poorly to it. But on the other hand, lying could prove just as awful, if not more so. Hector didn't know if he should try to bullshit his way to victory again.

So he decided to choose a third option.

"...Do you really not know already?" said Hector. It seemed like the best way to gauge Leo's potential reaction.

"Impossible..." Leo's expression seemed to tremble for a moment, then he blinked a couple times. His gaze went down to Roman's captive head. "Ah..." He looked up again. "You must be Hector."

Hmm. What was all that about, Hector wondered?

"...Yeah," said Hector. "And you're Leo, aren't you?"

"Guess his reaper told you all about me, huh?"

"That's right."

"Surprised you didn't attack me while my guard was down."

Hector had certainly thought about it. "...You never answered my question."

"Hmm?"

"...Are you alright?"

Leo let his eyes drift to the side. "This the part where you try to get on my good side? To recruit me? Manipulate me, like everyone else?"

"...Actually, I'm just here for my friend. I'd like it if you gave him back to me."

"Why should I? He's my friend, too."

"Do you normally keep your friends prisoner?"

Leo's gaze returned to Hector, but he just stared, not saying anything.

Hector felt the air grow abruptly heavier. A familiar sensation.

Yeah, this dude was definitely powerful.

Hector needed to be very careful with his words. Slow and deliberate, he reminded himself. And maybe cool it with the sarcasm, too.

"...Was I wrong?" said Hector. "When I saw you sitting here, I thought you looked... rather... distraught." That was the right word, wasn't it? He hoped so.

"Why? You lookin' to take all my worries away and earn my trust?"

Wow, this guy was pretty blatantly cynical. Hector didn't think this would go on for much longer unless he did something to change the direction of the conversation. "...I don't see any reason why I would need to earn your trust," he said. "If anything, you would need to earn mine."

Leo's eyes narrowed a little. "Say what?"

"You attacked and imprisoned my friends. What, you think that makes you trustworthy in my eyes?"

"1719

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

Leo bobbed his head to the side. "S'pose you have a point."

Not knowing how to respond to that, Hector resorted to silence.

Leo exhaled heavily through his nose. "...Whaddya want from me, man?"

"...Just my friend back, like I said."

"Well, I don't wanna give him to you. So what're ya gonna do about it?"

"...Mm. Tell me. Are you one of those people who... prefers to solve their problems with their fists?"

"Sometimes. When the mood strikes me."

"...Even when it would put innocent people in danger?"

Leo didn't answer. Instead, his eyes went briefly to the enormous water tank.

"...Is that why you chose this location?" said Hector. "I assume you're waiting for Sai-hee to show up. Are you hoping they won't attack you in a place like this?"

Leo looked around, and so did Hector. There were still a few civilians in the chamber with them, observing the paintings. Two or three of them were glancing in this direction, probably curious about the armored weirdo sitting here.

"If you'd rather fight somewhere else," said Leo, "I'd be happy to oblige."

"...That doesn't answer my question," said Hector.

"Is that s'posed to bother me?"

Agh. This guy was kind of a prick. Time to change tactics again.

“...Why aren't you running?” said Hector. “By now, you could've been long gone from Capaporo.”

“Oh, is that your game, then?” said Leo. “Get me to run and leave your buddy here behind?”

Hector groaned. “Could you stop trying to read the worst into my motivations and just answer me? I know you may find it hard to believe, but I'm actually interested to hear what you'll say.”

“I bet you are.”

Agh. Yep. Definitely a prick.

Fine. Time to try yet another approach.

“...Obviously, you don't have to talk to me,” said Hector. “But... I don't have to talk to you, either. In fact, I don't have to do anything. I could just wait for Sai-hee's people to carry you off. I doubt they'd mind giving me... my friend back.” He'd almost said Roman's name just then. But given Roman's tendency to disguise himself, Hector didn't know if Roman had ever actually told Leo his name. Better to avoid that potential confusion, Hector felt.

“Think they'd be so receptive after I told 'em about your ties to the Rainlords?” said Leo.

Shit. Hector had been hoping that Leo wouldn't realize that. What a stupid mistake.

But backing off now wouldn't project much power. It might even convince Leo of his weakness.

Nothing for it, then. He had to double down.

“...I'm not worried about that,” Hector lied.

“Oh?” said Leo. “And why would that be?”

“...There's a reason that they came to me for protection, you know.”

Ugh. On a list of things that he might one day regret saying, Hector felt like that would be near the top.

This was Voreese's fault.”

"1720

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Leo just stared back at him, not saying anything.

Was that... good? Hector couldn't really tell.

It was probably best to move the conversation along while he had the chance, Hector figured. The fewer lies he was forced to tell, the better. "...Why are you holding my friend captive, by the way? Did he do something wrong?"

Leo took his time answering. His expression seemed different than it was before. Sharper, maybe. Not quite angry, but close. "...He betrayed me. Followin' your orders, I'm guessin'."

"Ah..." Hector understood. Leo must have gone back to the warehouses, seen that the Rainlords were missing, and immediately blamed Roman. "That's a bit hypocritical, don't you think?"

"... 'Scuse me?"

"I mean... you betrayed him first, didn't you? He was coming to meet me here in Capaporo, and... then you betrayed his trust in order to capture my Rainlords."

Again, Leo didn't say anything.

Oh, man, this was ridiculous. Hector couldn't help feeling like Zeff would kick him in the teeth if he'd heard what he just said.

Hector knew that he couldn't let any such feelings show, though. He had to keep it together. Composure might've been the only thing preventing Leo from attacking him, right now.

"...Also," Hector went on, "I'd argue that he wasn't so much betraying you, as he was just being loyal to me."

Leo snorted loud enough to draw a couple looks from the other people in the gallery. "The hell difference does that make?!"

"It makes a big difference," said Hector. "A proper betrayal would be more... malicious. Or selfish, at least. But what he did was the complete opposite of selfish. And... it definitely wasn't malicious, either."

I'm sure he didn't want to hurt you."

"Hmph." Leo did not look convinced, but he didn't offer a counterargument.

Agh. Was that really it? More silent treatment? Hector racked his brain for another angle of attack. He was having trouble, though. If the guy was just gonna keep shutting down and not responding, then how the hell were they supposed to discuss anything?

At length, however, he did think of something else.

"...Did you really consider him your friend?" said Hector.

Leo's glare only seemed to be growing more intense with each new question. "Why do you care?"

"Just curious, I guess." And when it seemed like Leo might not answer him again, Hector decided to add, "I know how difficult it can be to make friends."

Leo's expression flickered for a second, though in what way, Hector couldn't tell. "You offerin' to be my friend, after all?"

Oh shit, back to this? "Ah... maybe."

"Maybe? The hell does that mean, man? You wanna be my friend 'r not?"

Hector allowed himself a small sigh. "You're kinda pushy, you know that?"

"And you're kinda annoying."

"Mm... Too annoying to be friends with?"

"...I didn't say that." Somehow, Leo looked a lot angrier than those words or even his tone implied."

"1721

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector tilted his head to the side a little as he considered his next words. He kept his arms folded, because he wanted to be sure that he didn't give off a false sense of aggression. A servant's hands were arguably the most dangerous part of their body, after all.

"Do you wanna know why I didn't attack you while your guard was down?" said Hector.

"Sure," said Leo.

"It was because you kept all of my Rainlords alive." That definitely hadn't been the reason, but it sure sounded good, Hector thought. "You didn't have to do that."

Leo's gaze turned to the floor, and he fell silent one more time.

"I thought... maybe you don't have to be my enemy. And seeing you sitting there, looking kind of... lost... I thought maybe you needed some help."

"...Hence why you asked if I was alright," said Leo.

"Yeah."

"Well..." Leo bit the inside of his bottom lip for a second. "You weren't wrong, I s'pose. I have been feeling kinda... lost."

Chalk another one up for Rasalased, Hector thought.

"More than kinda, actually," Leo continued. "I'm pretty much at the end of my rope, if I'm bein' totally honest." He looked up at Hector again. "Did the big cat's reaper tell you that about me, too?"

"...Big cat?"

"Roman," said Leo.

Oh, so he did know Roman's name. "Ah..." Hector couldn't actually remember if Voreese had mentioned anything about Leo's state of mind. He didn't think so, though. He only recalled Rasalased's words about it. "No, but... his reaper did mention that he was worried about you."

"...Really?"

No. It was an easy way to score some brownie points for Roman, though. "Really."

Leo eyed Roman's encased head.

Hector saw the opening and took it. "...Now, why don't you give him back to me?"

Leo was quiet again, and Hector could practically see the gears turning in his head. At length, Leo finally said, "What'll ya give me in return?"

Agh, of course. "What do you want?" said Hector.

"...I'd like your protection as well," said Leo.

"My...?" The word was left stranded.

"Your protection," reiterated Leo. "From Sai-hee, specifically. Y'know. The same protection you're giving to your Rainlords."

Was this fucking guy serious? Was he being sarcastic? What the fuck was happening, right now?

Silence was all Hector could conjure as a response.

"...Is that a no?" said Leo.

Okay, seriously, what the fuck? It didn't sound like sarcasm.

Did this guy actually believe everything that Hector had just said? He'd expected considerably more skepticism. Had Roman and Voreese just been that good at talking him up?

"Why so quiet all of a sudden, bro?" said Leo. "You just said you could protect all the Rainlords from her, so why not me, too?"

Ah, wait a minute... This was a test.

Okay.

That made more sense.

Kind of."

"1722 -- CLXXXIV.

Regardless, this was still an enormous problem. Hector couldn't very well accept Leo's proposal, because that would mean bringing the guy back to Warrenhold with him. And Hector could immediately think of about a dozen ways that could blow up in his and everyone's faces.

But he couldn't just outright refuse him, either. That wouldn't project much power, and it would also completely go against what Hector had said earlier, asking if Leo was alright.

He had to strike a delicate balance here, Hector decided.

"...I'm afraid I don't grant my protection quite that easily," said Hector. He had to keep himself steady. Leo's strategy had nearly thrown him off, just now.

"That so?" said Leo. "Why do the Rainlords qualify, while I don't?"

"...Because they have my trust," said Hector.

"Ah. And I don't."

"That's right."

Leo scratched his brow with his free hand. "Well, how do I gain your trust, then?"

Oh, geez. "Well... you could start by giving Roman back to me."

Leo snorted. "Isn't that the same deal I just offered you?"

"...No," said Hector. "Give me Roman, and I'll give you a chance to earn my trust."

Leo pursed his lips together briefly. "Just a chance? Seems like kind of a raw deal from where I'm sittin', daddy-o."

Daddy-o? Who the hell says--? Whatever. "...It's the best you're gonna get," said Hector. "I'm not gonna trust you until you prove yourself trustworthy."

"Dude, you're askin' me to give up my only bargaining chip for just a promise. Less than a promise, even."

"...Roman isn't a bargaining chip," said Hector. "I already told you... I can just wait this out and get Roman back from Sai-hee. You don't actually have anything I want."

Leo stared again, though his black eyes were much more hollow this time, as if he were looking past Hector instead of at him.

Slowly, Hector unfolded his arms. He held out a gauntleted hand, palm upward. "...Give me my friend back," he said.

Leo took a breath through gritted teeth. He shut his eyes, rubbed his forehead hard enough to leave a fleeting red mark, and finally exhaled a long sigh. He lifted Roman's head and placed it in Hector's waiting hand.

It required all of Hector's composure not to go wide-eyed and stare at what had just happened.

"Okay, now what?" said Leo.

That was a very good question, Hector thought.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Four: 'Submit unto thee or begone...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"...Earning my trust won't be easy," said Hector. He paused to let Leo say something, but the man just waited. "...Firstly, I will need assurance that... you won't harm anyone else who is under my protection."

Leo held out his fist and extended the little finger. "I pinky promise that I will not hurt anyone unless you say it's okay."

Hector couldn't quite tell if the man was joking, but he exhaled half a laugh, anyway, and said, "That's not enough."

Leo smacked his lips. "Never is."

"1722 -- CLXXXIV.

Regardless, this was still an enormous problem. Hector couldn't very well accept Leo's proposal, because that would mean bringing the guy back to Warrenhold with him. And Hector could immediately think of about a dozen ways that could blow up in his and everyone's faces.

But he couldn't just outright refuse him, either. That wouldn't project much power, and it would also completely go against what Hector had said earlier, asking if Leo was alright.

He had to strike a delicate balance here, Hector decided.

“...I’m afraid I don’t grant my protection quite that easily,” said Hector. He had to keep himself steady. Leo’s strategy had nearly thrown him off, just now.

“That so?” said Leo. “Why do the Rainlords qualify, while I don’t?”

“...Because they have my trust,” said Hector.

“Ah. And I don’t.”

“That’s right.”

Leo scratched his brow with his free hand. “Well, how do I gain your trust, then?”

Oh, geez. “Well... you could start by giving Roman back to me.”

Leo snorted. “Isn’t that the same deal I just offered you?”

“...No,” said Hector. “Give me Roman, and I’ll give you a chance to earn my trust.”

Leo pursed his lips together briefly. “Just a chance? Seems like kind of a raw deal from where I’m sittin’, daddy-o.”

Daddy-o? Who the hell says--? Whatever. “...It’s the best you’re gonna get,” said Hector. “I’m not gonna trust you until you prove yourself trustworthy.”

“Dude, you’re askin’ me to give up my only bargaining chip for just a promise. Less than a promise, even.”

“...Roman isn’t a bargaining chip,” said Hector. “I already told you... I can just wait this out and get Roman back from Sai-hee. You don’t actually have anything I want.”

Leo stared again, though his black eyes were much more hollow this time, as if he were looking past Hector instead of at him.

Slowly, Hector unfolded his arms. He held out a gauntleted hand, palm upward. “...Give me my friend back,” he said.

Leo took a breath through gritted teeth. He shut his eyes, rubbed his forehead hard enough to leave a fleeting red mark, and finally exhaled a long sigh. He lifted Roman's head and placed it in Hector's waiting hand.

It required all of Hector's composure not to go wide-eyed and stare at what had just happened.

"Okay, now what?" said Leo.

That was a very good question, Hector thought.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Four: 'Submit unto thee or begone...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"...Earning my trust won't be easy," said Hector. He paused to let Leo say something, but the man just waited. "...Firstly, I will need assurance that... you won't harm anyone else who is under my protection."

Leo held out his fist and extended the little finger. "I pinky promise that I will not hurt anyone unless you say it's okay."

Hector couldn't quite tell if the man was joking, but he exhaled half a laugh, anyway, and said, "That's not enough."

Leo smacked his lips. "Never is."

"1723

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Hector very much wanted to stand up and start moving toward the exit, but he refrained. Now that he had Roman in hand, his only real objective had been achieved, but the danger was still far from passed, Hector knew. If Leo got it into his head that Hector was scared or lying or anything other than everything he'd thus far claimed to be, then this could all come crumbling down in a matter of seconds.

"...In order to be sure that you won't hurt anyone," said Hector, "I'll need you to bring your reaper to me."

Leo opened his mouth, then shut it again and looked down at the floor.

It was a big ask. Would he refuse? Hector kind of hoped he would. If Leo decided that it was too much of a risk and they simply parted ways here on amicable terms with maybe the potential for a future working relationship... well, Hector couldn't imagine a more ideal outcome to the current circumstances.

"...Is that really necessary, man?" said Leo.

"Yes," said Hector firmly. C'mon. Refuse. Refuse, dammit.

"But how do I know you won't just kill him?" said Leo.

"Well... You don't. That's what makes it a demonstration of trust."

Leo sighed. "...Okay, I'll bring him to you."

Fuck, really?! Man, this guy must have been even more desperate than Hector thought. He'd thought that with all the initial hostility that Leo had shown, the guy would've been much less agreeable now.

But, okay. This was fine. He could still make this work.

Probably.

Shit.

"Will you at least give me your word that you won't kill him?" said Leo.

Hector had to stop himself from sighing. "Of course."

"What'll you do with him? Besides, y'know, keep him prisoner."

"Ah... I will... get to know him."

"That it?"

"...Is that not enough?"

"No, it's just--well, I thought you might try to persuade him to forgive me 'r somethin', y'know?"

Ah. Hmm. "I might do that. If it seems possible."

"Don't think it will be, just so you know. Ericoros is beyond stubborn. And to be honest, I dunno if I'll ever be able to trust him again, either."

Reapers tend to tell you what you wanna hear.”

“...Yeah, I know,” said Hector.

“Ah--course ya do. My bad. Didn’t mean any offense.”

An apology now? Geez, this guy was all over the place. “It’s fine.”

“So, uh... I, um... I got another question, if ya don’t mind answerin’.”

Hector wasn’t sure why he was bothering to preface it. “Then ask.”

“What sort of, um... aha... er... how do I put this...? Ah...”

Hector cocked an eyebrow inside his helmet as he waited.

“Y’see, I was just wondering what kind of... work you do. And, y’know, whether or not you might have any... for me to do.”

Hector blinked. Work? This guy wanted to work? “I... thought you just wanted my protection.”

“Yeah, I mean, I do, but, it’s just--I mean, you seem like you--ah--kinda know what you’re, uh--like, you’ve got your stuff ‘n whatnot--and, er, y’know what I’m sayin’?”

“...I don’t, actually. I don’t think that was a complete sentence, either.””
"1724

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

Leo took a breath. “Well, I just figured, y’know, ah--what better way to prove myself trustworthy than through honest work? ‘Cuz you... you do have that type of work, right? I mean, I just kinda got the impression that you did.”

Hector had to stop and think about that. “...I might.”

“Yeah! Right!” Leo gave a laugh that sounded a little nervous. “‘Cuz you’re not like a, heh... a super drug lord ‘r anything... are you?”

“...No, I’m not.”

“I mean, don’t get me wrong--I’m ultra-supportive of recreational drug use, but only in a safe, controlled, and well-educated environment, know what I'm sayin'?"

Hector didn't, really, but decided to just nod anyway.

"People who prey on and help propagate the misery of the less fortunate--I ain't got much forgiveness in me for folks like that, man."

This guy sure was chatty all of a sudden. "...What sort of 'honest work' are you looking for, exactly?" said Hector.

"Oh, ah, hmm, that's, uh... that's a good question, man. Just... ah... a-anything you need done, I s'pose. I mean, it's been kind of a long time since I've had a proper job, y'know? Like a job-job. If I'm bein' totally honest, I'm kinda blankin' on examples at the moment... I guess it's just been that long... egh..." Leo scratched his cheek. "Fact, maybe I never had a proper job... I musta, though, right?" He was looking at Hector as if it were somehow possible for Hector to know the answer to that question. "Be kinda embarrassing if I didn't, man..."

Hmm. This was actually beginning to make a surprising amount of sense, Hector thought. Leo was a lost sheep, after all. He needed direction. He seemed to be craving it, even.

A sheep in need of a shepherd.

It sure would've been nice if Hector had any fucking idea how he was supposed be a goddamn shepherd or whatever. Because apparently, he'd managed to convince this guy that he was.

He only hoped that Garovel would be able to bail him out of this situation later, somehow. He'd have to survive it first, though.

"...Ah, well, I'll figure something out for you," said Hector, trying not to worry about the fact that he was tossing yet another log onto the roaring bonfire of problems and promises that were already waiting to be dealt with.

"Cool. It's just, y'know, I've been feelin' kinda worthless lately, so I'd really like to, uh, contribute. To a good cause, I mean." Leo shook his head. "E'erbody makes that seem so easy, man. I dunno how they do it. Especially when we start gettin' older, know what I mean? All the things we've seen? All the betrayals and broken promises?"

Hector didn't like where this conversation was going.

"I 'member, this one time, I was workin' for a charity out in Steccat. Big business stuff. Real famous, very well-known and respected. I forget the name 'cuz it folded up after the scandal, but yeah. Seemed totally legit and trustworthy at the time, man." He clicked his tongue. "But nope. Embezzlin' funds. Stealin' from the poor. Buncha bastards.""

"1725

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

"...Mm," was all Hector could think to say. He'd tried to give it an agreeing inflection.

"How 'bout you?" said Leo. "You must have tons of stories like that one, too."

Aw, shit. "...Of course," said Hector.

"Oh, then, uh--c'mon, dude, ya gotta gimme some juicy deets."

"Ah... maybe some other time." Hector seized the initiative and stood up. He needed to start moving things along before he tripped over one of these conversational landmines. "For now, we should leave before Sai-hee shows up looking for you."

"Eh, she prolly won't be here for a couple more days, at least. We still got time." Leo did decide to stand up as well, however.

"...Is she actually coming in person?" said Hector, starting toward the corridor from which he'd entered earlier.

Leo followed. "No idea. Hell, I barely ever knew her whereabouts back when I was in regular contact with her. She likes to keep her movements unpredictable. Security 'n whatnot."

"...If you don't know her whereabouts, then why are you so confident that she won't show up here for another couple days?"

"She's always super slow to take action, dude. Always tryin' to 'play the game,' y'know? Scared to make a wrong move, I think."

That seemed to contradict the story that Axiolis had told everyone earlier. 'We're leaving together,' warned Hector. 'Keep your distance.'

'Yeah, we can tell,' came Garovel's echoing voice. 'What's your plan?'

'Uh. Still working that out. Hold on.'

"So c'mon," said Leo, "tell me a story."

Hector wasn't sure he could bullshit up an entire story on the spot.

"...Before that, we need to talk about where we're going."

"Oh. Yeah?"

"Yeah." Hector supposed he should address the issue directly. "I can't bring you with me, right now. The Rainlords are already waiting for me, and... if I show up with you, they might just attack you first and ask questions later."

"What, you don't think you can keep them under control?"

That was a problematic question. One which could not be ignored. Hector stopped walking in order to look the man in the eye. "...Well, there's also the possibility that you're lying to me and still intend to recapture them."

"Ah. Right..."

Hector watched the man's face for a moment more, trying to read his expression. It seemed regretful, but Hector didn't know if he believed that or not. He started walking again. "Anyway... you need to lay low for a while. Do you have a... safe house or something that you can use?"

Leo flicked at one of his dreadlocks. "Uh... not one that the old biddy wouldn't know about."

That was unfortunate.

'Garovel?' said Hector.

'Yeah?'

'Do you know of a place where we can hide Leo?'

'...Why?'

'He, uh... he wants to work for me, apparently.'

'...He wants to WHAT?!'

‘Well, he wants protection from Sai-hee. And also a job.’”

"1726

Silence arrived, and Hector was left to observe the curving hallway and the throngs of people walking past him, all bathed in the silvery white light from the long, rectangular lamps that were embedded in the ceiling. It was still a ways to the edge of the climate-controlled zone, but Hector was already thinking about what would happen when they reached it. He would need to remake his armor into the cooling variant, but if Leo noticed him do so... that might be a little difficult to explain.

‘Garovel, c’mon,’ he said. ‘Kind of a pressing situation here.’

‘Ah--yeah, I’m talking to Voreese. Roman has tons of safe houses we can use.’

‘You really think we should bring him back to Atreya?’

‘Roman has some in other countries, too, but I don’t know. What do you make of the guy?’

‘He’s... all over the place. But I think he mainly just needs... a sense of purpose, I guess. I mean, that’s why he wants a job, I’m pretty sure.’

‘Hmm.’

Hector tried to keep an eye on Leo. The guy seemed to be keeping a fairly close eye on him as well.

‘It should be a good job, too. Like, good for the soul, I mean. I don’t think he cares too much about money.’ That seemed like a safe bet, considering how simple the guy’s wardrobe appeared to be, as well as how he’d apparently turned down a job offer from Roman, according to what Voreese told them earlier.

Which, if actually true, was particularly baffling to Hector. Roman must’ve been able to offer this guy absurd amounts of money and probably all sorts of other shit. And yet here he was, asking Hector for work instead.

‘How do you intend to get away from him?’ said Garovel.

‘Uh... I think he’ll listen if I tell him to go somewhere,’ said Hector.

‘Are you serious?’

‘Yeah. You got an address for me?’

‘Hold on.’

Hector waited. He noticed that Leo wasn’t looking back at him now. Instead, the man’s attention was on a narrow side street to their right. A man and a woman were standing in an open doorway and having a rather loud conversation with one another.

Leo slowed and stopped to watch, and Hector couldn’t help doing the same. They weren’t the only onlookers, either. Nobody else was stopping, but there were certainly a few turned heads and craned necks.

The audience didn’t seem to deter the couple at all, however.

‘Okay, I got one,’ said Garovel. ‘You ready?’

‘One sec.’ Hector couldn’t tell what language the couple was speaking--possibly Hunese even though they weren’t Hun’Kui--but it seemed obvious enough that they were in disagreement. Judging from the elaborate black-and-white attire, Hector figured they were either wealthy or dressed up for a special occasion. From what Hector had seen during his brief time in Capaporo, those colors seemed to be popular among the upper class."

"1727

‘Something wrong?’ said Garovel.

‘No, just a... domestic disturbance, I guess,’ said Hector.

The woman began screeching to the point that she was spitting, and then she slapped the man. After a recoiling moment of apparent shock and visible anger, he slapped her back. Hard. She dropped to the ground like a bag of rocks.

Immediately, the man was encased in a shiny black material that Hector recognized as Leo’s element. Even the man’s head was fully encased, and Leo was stomping toward him.

“Leo,” said Hector while checking on the woman. She was clutching her cheek and slowly getting up.

Leo stopped in his tracks. He half-turned toward Hector. “What? You don’t mind, do you?”

“...Yes, I do mind, actually.”

Leo’s face scrunched up. “Why? This dude’s obviously a waste of oxygen.”

“...Let him breathe, Leo.”

Leo paused for a curt sigh, and then he flicked his wrist. The material around the man’s head vanished, and he gasped for breath.

Now the onlookers weren’t paying much attention to the couple and were instead more interested in Hector and Leo. Interested and frightened.

Leo didn’t seem to mind the attention, though. “Whaddya wanna do with this guy, then, hmm?”

The woman wasn’t yelling anymore. She was staring at Hector and backing away.

“...I’m sure the local authorities can handle it,” said Hector.

“Ya sure about that?” said Leo. “Figured you’d be more interventionist ‘r somethin’.”

“These people aren’t servants,” said Hector, mindful of all the eyes on them. He wondered if any of them understood Mohssian. “Our job is to protect them.”

“I am,” said Leo. “Protectin’ ‘em from each other.”

“...Yeah, that’s fine,” said Hector. “I’ve done that, too. But killing them in the process is not fine.”

“Oh, c’mon. Dude had it coming.”

“...You don’t know anything about him.”

“I know he hit a woman.”

Hector wanted to sigh. "...Yeah. But executing him for it is a little extreme, don't you think?"

"Ugh. Man, are you all about tryin' to keep neutrality above all else, too? Was kinda hopin' you were different from the old biddy, y'know?"

"Leo." He had to be firm here, Hector felt. If he wasn't, then this could become a very big problem later. Not that it wasn't one already, of course. "If you intend to kill people without... extremely good justification, then... this relationship is not going to work out at all, and you should probably just leave before you find out exactly how not neutral I can be."

Leo blinked at him. "Alright, man. Simmer down. I didn't eighty-six the guy. And I already said I wouldn't kill anyone without your approval, didn't I?"

Hector just stared at him.

Leo put a hand over his heart. "I promise not to kill anybody without your permission. There. Said it again. This time all formal-like. Ya happy?"

Hector looked around another time. People were still watching, though several had scurried away. He thought he heard some sort of siren in the distance. It was different from the sound he was familiar with, but it was probably law enforcement. "...Release him and let's go," said Hector."

"1728

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

With another flick of his wrist, Leo removed the rest of the encasing, and the man dropped to his hands and knees and started scurrying off.

"I guess you are pretty different from her, actually," said Leo as he rejoined Hector in walking away from the scene.

Hector could only assume that he was still referring to Sai-hee.

"She prolly wouldn'ta let that guy live. She definitely wouldn'ta let him go."

"I didn't let him go." Hector threw a glance back at the man in question, and Leo turned to look as well.

The guy hadn't made it far. Iron shackles bound his ankles and wrists.

"The locals can figure out what to do with him," said Hector.

Leo furrowed his brow. "If you were just gonna do that, then why'd you make me release him?"

"Because I didn't soul-strengthen those shackles. But your coating would've been... unreasonably difficult for non-servants to remove him from."

"...I woulda put him in shackles, if you'd asked."

Hector knew that, but he still wouldn't have been able to tell if such shackles would be soul-strengthened or not. He was on the verge of admitting as much until he thought that perhaps it would betray his age, somehow. Maybe old enough servants could tell if something was soul-strengthened just by looking at it. Hector had only assumed that Leo's coating was soul-strengthened because of how laborious it had been to dig through at the warehouses, but he supposed now that that could've been a mistaken assumption.

Oh man.

He had to be careful. The more time he spent around this guy, the more likely it was that some small thing might make him realize that Hector was lying. After all, Hector didn't know what he didn't know. There was no telling how long this charade could be maintained.

Maybe a more lighthearted response was warranted here, then-- something to ease the tension and hopefully not make Leo question him too much more.

"...Maybe I just wanted the credit for capturing him," said Hector.

Leo seemed more uncertain than amused. "Was that... was that a joke 'r somethin'?"

"...Yes, it was," said Hector.

"Oh. Oh! Hah! Good one!"

Not the most satisfying reception, but Hector wasn't about to complain, given the awful timing and context.

“Huh,” said Leo. “Somehow, I didn’t think you even had a sense of humor, man.”

“...Well, I do,” said Hector.

“In that case, I look forward to hearin’ more of it.”

Hector didn’t find that thought very comforting. He put it out of his mind, though. He had other things to worry about now. ‘I’m ready for that address now,’ he told Garovel.

The reaper relayed it to him. It was south of Gray Rock in a little town called Loxeville.”

"1729

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

Hector supposed that would do. It would put Leo near enough to Warrenhold to be checked up on relatively easily--but not so near Warrenhold as to clash with the Rainlords.

Hector still had no clue how he was going to explain all of this to them yet--or for that matter, what the hell he was going to do with Leo in the long-term. It didn’t seem like a good idea to try to keep up this lie indefinitely, but he also wasn’t seeing much other choice than to do precisely that.

Ugh...

Soon enough, Hector saw the edge of the climate-controlled zone in the distance and decided to stop walking. “Alright,” he said, “we’ll part ways here.” He materialized a small iron plate with the numbers and letters of the address imprinted into it. After checking to make sure he’d gotten it right, he handed the plate off to Leo.

Leo squinted at it. “This is a little hard to read, dude.”

“Well, I don’t have pen and paper on me,” said Hector.

Leo just looked at him, not saying anything.

Hector almost preferred the more chatty Leo. These silences were unsettling. He figured he should just push on. "Get your reaper, and take him to that address," said Hector. "I'll meet you there in a couple weeks."

"A couple weeks?" said Leo. "That long?"

Hector would've liked to have said a couple months. Or years. Or centuries. "...I want to give you plenty of time to get there. In case you... run into any trouble getting back to the surface on your own."

"Ah... yeah, that could be tough, huh? A'ight, man. Couple weeks. And then you'll gimme a proper job?"

"...If that's what you want."

Leo gave a nod. "Oh, it is, daddy-o. Felt like an unproductive lump o' dooky, lately, so it'd be real nice to feel like I'm contributin' to a good cause, y'know?"

"...Alright. I'll see you in two weeks, then." And Hector waited, but when Leo didn't move, he added, "You head out first."

Leo smirked. "Heh. Wantin' to make sure I don't try 'n follow you, huh?"

"...Yes," said Hector flatly. "But also... Sai-hee's looking for you, not me. You should get out of the city as soon as possible."

"Mighty thoughtful of ya." Leo's smirk grew into a full smile. "Got a good feelin' about you. Somethin' tells me you'll make a good boss."

Hector very much doubted that, but he hoped to the goddess Cocora that it would somehow be true.

He watched Leo go, ambling into a wall of people and then disappearing from view.

At length, Hector finally allowed himself a sigh of utter exhaustion. He found the nearest wall and leaned against it for support. His body was trembling all over. His stomach was so empty that each breath was a reminder of how long it had been since he'd eaten, and his muscles were so tired that he was considering just flopping onto the ground and not getting back up again.

And now, both of those feelings were accompanied by a lovely dose of existential dread. Somehow, the future looked simultaneously full of potential and also horrifying beyond words.

'...How ya doin' there, pal?' came Garovel's public voice.

Hector looked up to see Garovel and Voreese hovering there in front of him. "...I've been better.""

"1730 -- CLXXXV.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Five: 'O, quondam desire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...167 years ago...

Parson's heel tapped rapidly against the floor of the wagon as it clattered over the dirt road. He wanted to meditate, but his mind was racing as he thought about their destination. It was somehow even more nerve-wracking than heading into battle. He tried to focus on his breathing and calm down a little.

"Nervous?" said the man sitting across from him. His icy blue eyes had a piercing quality to them, and the sharp features of his deceptively young face only added to the effect.

Parson managed a nod.

'There's no need to be,' said Overra, who was attached to the boy's shoulder. 'I assure you, he's quite nice. I'm sure you'll like him.'

"That's not it," said Parson. "I'm just... I'm not sure I deserve to be here with you..."

"Nonsense," said the man. "You were instrumental."

Parson gave him a dubious look. "You killed all of them."

The man smiled, and Parson knew what a rare sight that was. "You were a valuable distraction."

"...I also hid for most of the fight."

That made the man snicker. "Sometimes, focusing on your own survival is the best strategy.”

‘Don’t be so quick to compare yourself to us,’ said the man’s reaper, who was similarly attached to the man’s shoulder. ‘Down that road, lies only jealousy and a profound inadequacy.’

‘It’s your humility that we really admire,’ said Overra dryly.

‘Humility isn’t what creates men of action,’ said the other reaper. ‘If you ask me, this world could use more bold and brazen men like Monty here.’

‘Bold, maybe,’ said Overra. ‘Brazen? I think that’s just you, Hovess.’

‘Psh. C’mon, Monty. Tell her how wrong she is.’

“I would. If she was.”

‘How dare you.’

The journey lasted quite a while longer and was so bumpy that Parson almost would’ve preferred to walk. When they finally arrived, he was quick to leap out the back and stretch his legs.

Monty tipped the wagoner with a golden tremol, at which the wagoner’s eyes bulged before the man began spouting gratitude. Monty handled it with his typical grace, then he and Parson bid the man farewell and began the last leg of their trek up a steep and winding path of stone steps. Rocks and verdant grass flanked the staircase on both sides, and the early afternoon air held the scent of recent rain.

When they reached the top, Parson’s nervousness and excitement died a little. The cobblestone watchtower standing before him was not at all what he had been expecting. Humble was one word to describe it. Small and ruined were two others.

There were, however, many more Vanguardians patrolling the premises. Too many, Parson thought, which suggested to him that this was not their usual or permanent residence. Several unfamiliar people greeted Monty or Overra as they made their way around to the far side of the building.”

"1730 -- CLXXXV.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Five: 'O, quondam desire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...167 years ago...

Parson's heel tapped rapidly against the floor of the wagon as it clattered over the dirt road. He wanted to meditate, but his mind was racing as he thought about their destination. It was somehow even more nerve-wracking than heading into battle. He tried to focus on his breathing and calm down a little.

"Nervous?" said the man sitting across from him. His icy blue eyes had a piercing quality to them, and the sharp features of his deceptively young face only added to the effect.

Parson managed a nod.

'There's no need to be,' said Overra, who was attached to the boy's shoulder. 'I assure you, he's quite nice. I'm sure you'll like him.'

"That's not it," said Parson. "I'm just... I'm not sure I deserve to be here with you..."

"Nonsense," said the man. "You were instrumental."

Parson gave him a dubious look. "You killed all of them."

The man smiled, and Parson knew what a rare sight that was. "You were a valuable distraction."

"...I also hid for most of the fight."

That made the man snicker. "Sometimes, focusing on your own survival is the best strategy."

'Don't be so quick to compare yourself to us,' said the man's reaper, who was similarly attached to the man's shoulder. 'Down that road, lies only jealousy and a profound inadequacy.'

'It's your humility that we really admire,' said Overra dryly.

‘Humility isn’t what creates men of action,’ said the other reaper. ‘If you ask me, this world could use more bold and brazen men like Monty here.’

‘Bold, maybe,’ said Overra. ‘Brazen? I think that’s just you, Hovess.’

‘Psh. C’mon, Monty. Tell her how wrong she is.’

“I would. If she was.”

‘How dare you.’

The journey lasted quite a while longer and was so bumpy that Parson almost would’ve preferred to walk. When they finally arrived, he was quick to leap out the back and stretch his legs.

Monty tipped the wagoner with a golden tremol, at which the wagoner’s eyes bulged before the man began spouting gratitude. Monty handled it with his typical grace, then he and Parson bid the man farewell and began the last leg of their trek up a steep and winding path of stone steps. Rocks and verdant grass flanked the staircase on both sides, and the early afternoon air held the scent of recent rain.

When they reached the top, Parson’s nervousness and excitement died a little. The cobblestone watchtower standing before him was not at all what he had been expecting. Humble was one word to describe it. Small and ruined were two others.

There were, however, many more Vanguardians patrolling the premises. Too many, Parson thought, which suggested to him that this was not their usual or permanent residence. Several unfamiliar people greeted Monty or Overra as they made their way around to the far side of the building."

"1731

Parson could certainly feel the immense presence of the person they were looking for. He’d been feeling it for a while, actually, and it hadn’t been doing much to help calm his nerves.

Monty stopped in front of a tall wooden door and knocked.

“Enter,” came a heavy voice from the other side.

They did so.

The man therein was seated at a desk that was probably too large for the chamber. It wasn't lacking for paperwork, however. Stacks upon stacks littered the desk, as well the floor and chairs by the tall window. "Ah, there you are. I've been expecting you."

Parson was at once confused and starstruck. This was him? He looked like a regular guy. Brown eyes, brown hair, average height, plain face. Parson didn't think he could imagine a more ordinary looking man if he tried. The only distinguishing thing about him might've been that famed overcoat of white, gold, and black--but the man wasn't even wearing it. Instead, it was simply draped over the chair behind his desk.

Monty gave a salute. "You honor us, High Commander."

Parson followed suit but kept his mouth shut.

The man tried to go around his desk but found that there wasn't enough space between it and either wall to squeeze through. After a chin-scratching moment, he decided to simply leap over the desk instead, but his shoe caught one of the stacks thereon, and he kicked a splattering of books and paperwork across the room.

The man looked at what he'd just done with wide eyes and a frown. "...It took me two hours to organize all those..."

'Nice going,' said his accompanying reaper, which was a small tornado to Parson's eyes.

"...You think Jackson'll yell at me again if I mail it to him out of order?"

'Yes.'

"...I'm gonna do it, anyway."

'I'd be more surprised if you didn't.'

Parson was now much much more confused than starstruck. This was really Sermung? The Crystal Titan?

The man spun around to look at them again. "Anyway. You guys just pretend you didn't see that, okay? That's an order."

"Yes, sir," said Monty, still maintaining his salute.

“At ease, Captain Lamont. Or rather, Lieutenant General Lamont.”

Monty blinked as he lowered his hand. “I... I did not realize I would be receiving a promotion today, sir.”

“Yeah, I sorta just decided it a few hours ago. Congratulations.”

“Ah--er--thank you, High Commander.”

“No sweat.”

An intermission of silence arrived suddenly, and Sermung’s gaze turned to his reaper for a moment while he scratched his nose.

“Oh!” said Sermung, snapping his fingers a couple times. “Uh! Right! Your medals. I’ve got those... um... somewhere around here...” He looked around the chamber hurriedly.

His reaper grew a windy appendage out of its airy body in order to point.

Sermung rushed over to the directed spot and dug through a pile of papers to retrieve a pair of small boxes. “Here we are.””

"1732

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

Monty bowed his head as the man stepped closer, and Parson did the same.

“Ah!” said Sermung with the sound of sudden recognition. “Overra! I didn’t even realize that was you there!”

‘Hello, Sermung,’ she said. ‘And Tenebrach.’

“It is wonderful to see you again,” said Sermung. “How many years has it been?”

‘Eighty-three,’ said Tenebrach. ‘I only realized you had rejoined the Vanguard after reading your servant’s file the other day. Why did you not send word of your return earlier? We would have welcomed you personally.’

‘I knew how busy you would be,’ said Overra. ‘I wanted to earn an audience with you on my own merits. Or rather, those of my chosen servant. Though, I must admit, I did not expect it to happen this soon.’

Sermung laughed mildly. “Does that mean that this strapping young lad here is the ‘hope of the future’ that you once promised to find?”

At that, Parson couldn’t help raising his head. The Crystal Titan’s smile was as warm as any Parson had ever seen.

‘Hmph,’ said Overra. ‘I know you are being sarcastic, but as a matter of fact, yes, he is. He has a long way to go yet, but I believe he has the aptitude for the task, burdensome though it may be.’

Sermung’s smile only seemed to widen, and he offered the boy a handshake. “What is your name?”

Tenebrach answered for him, however. ‘It’s Parson Miles. Didn’t you read his file? Oh, nevermind, of course you didn’t. Otherwise, you wouldn’t have been surprised to see Overra here.’

Sermung’s smile flattened somewhat, and he looked at his reaper. “I would appreciate it if you didn’t attempt to undermine my authority in front of my men. I doubt it does much for their morale.”

‘Yes, well, I would appreciate it if you didn’t say such obviously stupid things in front of your men, but I guess we’re both destined to live in disappointment.’

Sermung returned to Parson with a taut grin. “In any case, I shan’t forget your name again.”

‘You shouldn’t make promises you can’t keep,’ said Tenebrach.

“I’ll keep it,” said Sermung. “Just you wait and see.”

‘More likely, I’ll have to keep it for you in secret.’

“As if I could trust you not to rat me out at every opportunity.” Sermung kept Parson’s gaze and shook his head. “Learn well, young one. A reaper is only trustworthy when it matters most. Which is good, of course, but be wary that all other times, they will gleefully betray you.”

‘Please do not teach Parson any of your strange lessons,’ said Overra, though she was tittering.

‘Yes,’ said Tenebrach. ‘Do not be fooled, young Parson. Though he is quite old, this man is severely lacking in the wisdom that would normally come with age.'

Sermung turned to Monty for help. "I speak nothing but the truth, no?"

Monty held up both hands and said nothing.

"Tch. Suddenly, I'm not so sure you deserve a medal for your bravery.""

"1733

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Parson knew the man was only teasing, but a rather strong part of him agreed with that sentiment, at least with regard to himself. The battle at Luminal City had been the most terrifying event of his young life. There were several moments where he'd felt somehow even more powerless than he had during that fateful night in Trintol four years ago.

And yet, here he was. Still alive. Thanks entirely to Monty here. Now people were starting to call him things like the Lawman and the Judge, because Monty had brought order to Luminal City in a single night. Five separate gangs of superpowered outlaws, all of which had been quietly ruling the region for decades--each one had been routed or crushed.

It made Parson proud to have him as a mentor.

'By the way,' said Tenebrach as Sermung pinned the round, blue medal on Parson's little coat, 'have you figured out how you are going to save the world, yet?'

'Hah,' said Overra. 'If I did, I would not tell you. I know you would only laugh at me.'

'Oh, come now. We are all friends here. If you truly have a plan, I would love to hear it.'

'Then perhaps you will hear of it. One day.'

Tenebrach did not look impressed. 'You don't have a plan at all, do you?'

'I'm afraid I don't. At least, not one that I could explain to a simpleton like yourself.'

'Hoho! She bites! I don't recall you being so vicious. The Overra that I remember was a sweet-hearted idealist to her very core. I hope you haven't let this miserable world turn you into a misanthrope after all these years.'

'Never. I will always believe in the innate goodness of humanity. How that goodness might be best realized and harnessed, however--well, let's just say, on those points, I'm still making up my mind.'

--++--++--

...165 years ago...

Germal rubbed his head and tried not to think about the pain. It was all over his body, as usual, but today's headache was especially bad. The small nub in the center of his forehead throbbed in a way that was horrifically familiar.

After six years as a servant, this feeling was what he dreaded most. The feeling that told him another change was imminent. Try as he might, there was no suppressing it. The most that he'd managed to do so far was to internalize it, to direct the change inward.

To wreak utter havoc on his body.

Such was the source of his chronic pain. Stomach, liver, kidneys, pancreas, diaphragm, rib cage, hip bones, abdominal muscles, large intestines, small intestines--what would be next? There was no telling. Maybe it would just be another one of those. Instead of adding to the pain, maybe it would just multiply.

Nerovoy had been little help, despite the early optimism that the reaper had expressed.

Most days, Germal wished he hadn't been revived. He didn't know how much longer he would be able to go on like this."

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

'I think we are getting close,' said Nerovoy.

Germal could barely make out the reaper's words between the pounding in his head and the howling noise outside of it. His patchwork cloak whipped all around him in the swirling wind and punishing hail, threatening to throw him off balance with each new step that he dared to take up the rocky mountain path.

He wished now that he could've found a cloak that wasn't three sizes too big for him, but this was the best one in the town full of dead men that he'd passed through on his way here.

Lightning crashed overhead, carving out a chunk of the mountain. It triggered a rockslide that was no more than five meters away from the path that Germal was using.

He watched the boulders fall and then glared at his reaper. To his eyes, the reaper was a kind of winged demon--small, devious-looking, and carrying a spear made of both fire and wind.

'Don't look at me like that,' said Nerovoy. 'It is not my fault that the information pointed us in this direction.'

As a child, Germal had frequently been told not to come anywhere near this place, and now he fully understood why. The Storm Mountains were every bit as terrifying as he'd been led to believe.

Now that he was a servant, at least he didn't have to worry about being swept off the side of the mountain and falling to his death.

Though, at this point, such an ending didn't look so bad.

He continued the climb, and as he did, he noticed Nerovoy moving gradually closer to him.

'What's got you spooked?' said Germal.

'This place might be more dangerous than I thought,' said Nerovoy.

A suddenly stronger burst of wind hit him, and Germal braced himself. His leather cap nearly flew off his head, but the hood of his cloak caught it for him. He nestled it back over the nub of his horn. 'If you wanna turn back, that's fine with me.'

'Absolutely not,' said Nerovoy. 'We stick with the plan. And besides, you obviously need help, and he may be one of the few people who can provide it.'

'That is assuming he's even here.'

'Well, that town back there bodes well for our chances.'

'The town full of dead people, you mean?'

'That's the one.'

'How does that bode well for us at all?'

'The Living Void isn't known for his mercy--at least, not in that sense.'

Germal's eyes widened, and he stopped climbing. 'What?!'

'Yeah, I know. You're upset I didn't tell you that was who we were going to see earlier, but it's alright--'

'You're taking me to meet an emperor of Abolish?!'

The reaper allowed a beat to pass. 'Yeah.'

'Why?!'

'Hey, it'll be alright. He's not as bad as everyone says.'

Germal had no words."

"1735

'And his reaper, Engomat, is an old friend of mine,' said Nerovoy.

'Why didn't you tell me any of this sooner?!'

'See? I knew you were upset about that.'

'Tell me!'

‘I didn’t want you panicking on me. But now that we’re so close, I felt I should allow you to prepare yourself. And you seemed like you were panicking a bit already. So now you can panic over two things at once! It’ll save us some time!’

Germal closed his eyes and rubbed his aching head another time.
‘Nero...’

‘Yeah, buddy?’

‘I hate everything about you...’

‘I’m sorry.’

‘No, you’re not. At all.’

‘You’re right. But I’m telling you, everything will be okay. You should be happy! You’re finally going to get the help that you need!’

Germal wanted to yell, but he knew it would be fruitless. Infiltrating Abolish had been Nerovoy’s plan from day one. And yes, while it was true that that plan had gone horrendously awry at just about every conceivable opportunity over the last six years, that was probably also why the reaper was trying to take him straight to the source this time.

There was little doubt in Germal’s mind that this, too, would go terribly wrong in some new and unexpected way, but what the hell did it matter anymore? He decided to just focus on climbing. Maybe if he went high enough, lightning would strike him down and give him a few minutes of respite before Nerovoy revived him.

When he reached the first crest in the path, a new gale arrived from the south and nearly sent him tumbling back down. He pressed onward, this time fighting the wind head on.

The view was nice from here, he supposed. Forested valleys and snowy peaks filled the horizon, and the path forward was at least clear, if still long and winding. Visible sheets of rain and hail flexed with the shifting winds. And of course, the frequent lightning was the icing on the cake.

At length, after his feet had begun to hurt nearly as much as the rest of him, the only thing on Germal’s mind was why Nerovoy was putting him through all of this, making him walk all this way.

'...Can't you just kill me and go search the area on your own?' he finally asked.

'No,' the reaper said, having attached himself to Germal's chest and hidden beneath the cloak.

'Why not? The only thing in danger here is my sanity...'

'You're wrong. This whole place is full of ardor and soul power. If lightning strikes me, I'm toast. Even the hail could kill me, if I just sit out in the open and let it shred me.'

That information made him look around another time. The path crossed above a river full of rapids, and he could see a group of bears hanging around the water's edge."

"1736

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

'Don't go anywhere near those, by the way,' said Nerovoy.

He hadn't been planning to. 'Are they dangerous?'

'Anything that can live in this place is dangerous.'

They continued on, but they didn't get much farther before the ground began to rumble. Instinctively, Germal stopped and crouched down low as he surveyed their surroundings one more time.

In the distance, a crashing boom arrived along with an enormous cloud of rock and dust.

'Go!' said Nero. 'That must be him!'

Germal leapt up to his feet and bolted onward. The prospect of finally being done with this wretched journey was more than enough motivation to keep him in full sprint, despite his body's protests. After he rounded the next bend in the path and overcame another crest, he finally caught sight of someone standing on the edge of a crater.

Two someones, actually.

'Slow down,' said Nero privately.

Germal did so, and when the two figures both turned and saw him there, he stopped entirely.

One was an elderly man, but the other? Was that thing even human? It was as tall as a man, perhaps, but it looked more like a black lizard with its reptilian face and tail.

Nero wasted no time. 'Hello there!' he called out. 'Engomat, is that you?'

After a tense moment, a reaper that Germal hadn't even noticed floated out into the open.

'Nerovoy?' said the presumable Engomat. 'What in the world are you doing here?'

'Looking for you, as it so happens! What are YOU doing in this godforsaken place?'

The two figures were coming closer now, and Germal couldn't take his eyes off of them.

'Oh, nothing too exciting, I am afraid,' said Engomat. 'Searching for ancient treasure and not finding it, sadly. I was certain that a place like this would have more than its fair share of secrets, but alas, I have found no such evidence.'

Nerovoy laughed. 'You say that isn't exciting, and yet it sounds pretty adventurous to me! Here, allow me to introduce my new servant. This is Germal.'

'Hello, young man.'

He nodded. "H-hello... my name isn't Germal, though. You should--"

'Yes, it is,' said Nerovoy. 'That's just an annoying game he likes to play with people whenever he meets them for the first time. Don't be difficult, Germal. And stand up straight, for god's sake. You're in honorable company.'

That was easier said than done when his back felt like it was twisted into knots.

'My, my,' said Engomat. 'You do not look so good, my boy. Are you unwell?'

Germal opened his mouth, unsure of what manner of lie might come out, but Nero wasn't having it.

'He has been cursed with mutation,' the reaper said quickly. 'I have heard that, these days, it is now possible to do something about it, but I know not what.'

'Ah.'

'I was hoping that you, with all of the influence that you have apparently accumulated in my absence, would be able to help.'

"1737

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

'I see,' said Engomat. 'You were right to seek me out, old friend. It would be my pleasure to help your--'

As the old man and the lizard man approached, Germal expected them to come to a stop behind Engomat and listen to the two reapers conversing, but that was not what happened. Instead, only the old man stopped, while the lizard walked right up to Germal and crouched down to look the young man in the eye.

'Gohvis?' said Engomat. 'What are you doing?'

The lizard man ignored him. His eyes were those of a reptile, as well, with slitted pupils and bright yellow-green irises. He grabbed Germal's chin and turned the boy's head for him.

"E-excuse me--" tried Germal.

Gohvis pulled the boy's hood back and removed his leather cap to inspect the horn on his forehead. "One horn?" he said in two voices, though they sounded a bit odd to Germal's ears. "How long have you been a servant, boy?"

"Ah, oh, uh, fifty-nine--"

'It's been six years,' said Nero.

Germal gave the reaper an annoyed look, but he didn't get a chance to complain beyond that.

Gohvis lifted him off his feet as if he weighed no more than a carton of milk. The lizard man lifted up the boy's tunic and pressed his ear hole up against Germal's bare stomach.

Germal just kind of wagged his limbs uncomfortably and helplessly in midair, afraid to say anything--and also not even sure what he would say if he did have the courage. His whole body tensed up, and he looked around awkwardly with wide eyes.

"Gohvis," said the old man, who Germal could only assume to be the infamous Dozer now. Under normal circumstances, that person would undoubtedly be the one Germal feared most, but right now, that prize went to the lizard man treating him like some kind of seashell. "Gohvis, answer Engomat's question."

After another moment, Gohvis let Germal down. "I was checking to see if it was already too late for the boy," he said.

'Ah,' said Engomat. 'And what was your conclusion?'

"...I will take the boy into my care," said Gohvis. "He will be safest with me."

'That is not your decision to make,' said Engomat. 'And you did not quite answer my question, either.'

Gohvis looked to Dozer. "...Do you have a problem with it?"

For a time, the old man didn't answer him. The wrinkles of his face seemed to intensify his stare, somehow, and all the rain falling and lightning crashing in the distance seemed almost in accordance with the man's will. Germal could certainly feel the abrupt change in air pressure.

"...I suppose not," Dozer finally said. "You are our only authority on mutation now, after all."

'Hmph,' said Engomat. 'Try not to kill this one.'

Gohvis merely returned a flat stare, and the reaper hovered more closely to Dozer."

"1738

‘...Are you certain you can help him?’ said Nerovoy.

“No,” said Gohvis flatly. “He has internalized his mutations, which will make them almost impossible to counteract properly until he is significantly more experienced.” He eyed Germal again. “I imagine you are in constant pain, no?”

Even Germal didn’t want to lie about that. He gave a meek nod.

“Our first objective will be to heighten your pain tolerance, then. This will likely fail and make matters far worse for you, but it will also serve as an invaluable learning experience. If you can endure that, then there may be hope for you yet.”

That wasn’t exactly what Germal wanted to hear, but he supposed it provided him with more hope than he’d had five minutes ago. “O-okay...”

Gohvis lifted the boy up and again placed him on his shoulder. “Come. I shall teach you of the nervous system.”

“The what?” said Germal.

Gohvis began walking and explaining.

But they didn’t make it far before Engomat interrupted.

‘Our work here is not yet done,’ the reaper said. ‘You have not been excused.’

Gohvis just looked at him again, then at Dozer.

“There are two more areas I wish to check,” the old man said. “After that, you are free to take your leave.”

“I am sure you can handle it without me,” said Gohvis.

“I am sure I can as well,” said Dozer, “but your senses will expedite matters.”

“Fine. Lead on, then.”

The wind and rain seemed only to worsen as they headed deeper into the mountains. They deviated from the path entirely and descended into a narrow valley.

Germal remained on Gohvis' shoulder, even as they ran briefly along the side of a cliff and bounded over a twenty meter gap.

'...This has gone a lot better than I thought it would,' said Germal.

'You think so?' said Nero in the echo of privacy.

'Yeah. Engomat already trusts you and everything.'

The reaper kept his laugh private as well. 'No, he doesn't.'

Germal didn't understand. 'What? But he--'

'It's been almost a hundred years since he last saw me. We parted on good terms, so he doesn't have an excuse to distrust me yet, but you can bet your last meal that he is looking for any reason at all to believe that I might betray him, right now.'

'...How do you know?'

'Because he is a reaper. Our loyalties and motivations change all the time. Your most trusted friend a century ago could be your worst enemy today. We all know this.'

'Huh...'

'It is something of a game, really. Or dance, perhaps. He suspects me. I know he suspects me. He knows that I know he suspects me. To say that we should be careful with our words right now would be an understatement. Even the mere perception of betrayal could doom us.'

"1739

'So in other words,' said Germal, 'I shouldn't lie to them?'

'Yes,' said Nero. 'It would be helpful if you did not make things even more difficult for me than they already are.'

'...I'll try.'

'Thank you. But if you fail, rest assured that I will call you out on it publicly every time. In theory, it should be fine for you to get caught in a lie, so long as I make sure everyone knows that you are a compulsive liar and that you cannot help yourself.'

Germal couldn't say that he liked this plan very much. But then, he rarely ever did. Nero had a habit of making him do things he didn't want to do.

He wondered when he would be able to see Parson and Damian again. It had already been years, and he had a feeling that it would be many more yet.

They would probably give him all sorts of crap if he didn't do a good job. They were probably doing way better than he was. They were probably way stronger. They were always so good at everything, while he just followed their lead, did whatever they said.

He couldn't let it be that way again. He had to keep up with them, make them acknowledge him. He had to be their equal.

There was nothing he wanted more in this world than that.

Germal's headache worsened. Gohvis continued trying to explain various things to him, but Germal began to feel disoriented and found it difficult to listen. Combined with all the noise of the storm and bumpy ride on the lizard man's shoulder, Germal completely lost track of what was happening.

'...tohah.'

He winced and opened his eyes. Had they been closed? Agh, his head was still throbbing, though now it seemed to be focused mostly around the horn.

'...argobadah.'

What was that? Who was whispering?

'Nero?' said Germal.

'Yes?' the reaper said privately.

He looked around for the reaper. Oh, there he was, attached his arm. 'What were you saying just now?'

'Hmm? I wasn't saying anything.'

What? Had he imagined it? Germal didn't understand. Why was everything so confusing, all of a sudden?

Agh, this headache. It felt like someone was taking a dagger to his forehead.

But it also felt like it had a direction to it, somehow. Like it was coming from somewhere. Yeah. Less like a dagger, then, and more like a fishing hook still attached to the line. In fact, he could almost see the line. It was invisible, but he sensed it nonetheless, going all the way through the mountain to the north and beyond. Where did the line end? He couldn't tell. It was too far. And the pain made it difficult.

--want to do now, then?" Gohvis was saying, standing over a crater the size of a house.

"We shall return," said Dozer, standing in the middle of the crater."
"1740

Had that crater been there the whole time? Germal wasn't sure. It was so difficult to pay attention--or even concentrate, for that matter--but he did his best.

"You are sure?" said Gohvis. "It is not like you to give up."

"I have exhausted all of our current leads," said Dozer. "This region is too large, and it could be buried in the earth for all we know."

'You don't have to answer this if you wish,' said Nero, 'but what are you hoping to find in this place?'

'A most ancient power,' said Engomat.

'Ah,' said Nero. 'Can you not be more specific?'

'I am afraid not, no.'

'I see.'

Huh.

Germal suddenly had to wonder if the invisible fishing line might be related to whatever it was they were looking for. That might make a degree of sense. Maybe he should tell them about it. Yeah, that might be a good idea, he decided.

He passed out, instead, and toppled backwards off Gohvis' shoulder.

-+--+--+-

...162 years ago...

The stench of human waste and rotting flesh was difficult to get used to, but somehow, Damian had managed it. Not that he'd had much choice. Being stuck in this cell with Feromas for the last month had made it something of a priority.

He scratched his nose, then his chin.

Oh, hey. Facial hair. He'd finally started growing some. He stood and checked himself out in a cracked mirror over a black-stained sink. Yeah. It wasn't very noticeable yet, but it was there.

'You look pleased with yourself,' said Feromas.

"I am," said Damian, admiring the little hairs.

'I doubt you'll be that way when you have to cut it every morning just so you won't look like a slovenly drunkard. Lofar men are exceptionally hairy.'

Damian wasn't going to let the reaper spoil his good mood, though. It was a rare enough occurrence for him, already.

'I'm sure today will be the day,' said Feromas.

Damian just gave the reaper a look. He knew that Feromas was talking about when they would be released from this horrific place, because the reaper had said the exact same thing every day for the last three weeks. Or close to it, anyway. Without any sunlight to go by, the days had started to blur together.

'I'm telling you,' the reaper said privately, 'the plan will work. It is only a matter of time until Bool gets word of our presence here.'

Bool was the reaper of Morgunov, according to Feromas, though Damian was beginning to have his doubts about even that information now. 'Maybe he already knows we're here and doesn't care,' said Damian.

'Nonsense. Abolish doesn't keep prisoners for no reason. If Bool knew we were here, we would either be released or killed.'

'That's not comforting.'

'The truth often isn't. The only reason they took us prisoner in the first place was because they were worried our story might not be complete twaddle.'

'...And it's NOT complete twaddle, right?'

'Of course it isn't! I'm telling you, I know Bool!'

'This past month would seem to suggest otherwise...''

"1741

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

It was useless to argue with Feromas, Damian knew. The only thing to do was wait, it seemed.

So he did. He might've liked to bust his way out of here, but he had learned early on that the bars and walls of his cell were far too strong for him to break through. Feromas could squeeze through the bars, of course, but the greater prison beyond those bars was filled with guards who had already demonstrated their joy in killing.

Still, it might've been possible for Feromas to leave Damian alone and escape on his own--not advisable, perhaps, but possible.

And yet the reaper didn't.

Damian supposed Feromas deserved some credit for that. Maybe the reaper's claim of being Damian's great grandfather was actually true. Damian's parents had never told him his great grandfather's name, so he'd been rather doubtful about the whole thing ever since Feromas told it to him all those years ago. Damian had never actually voiced that doubt, simply because of how much power the reaper had over him, but now the last of his doubts were finally abating. It would have been a rather strange thing to lie about, he figured.

And of course, Feromas knew things. About Damian's father and grandfather. The reaper claimed to have been following Damian's father throughout the Machas War--the war of which Trintol had been a casualty. Feromas said that he had wanted to revive Damian's father as his servant instead, but when news arrived of the enemy advancing toward Trintol, the reaper decided to rush back there in order to check up on the rest of the Lofar family. Overra and Nerovoy had agreed to help.

But they arrived too late, apparently. There was a strict time limit on when a soul could be resurrected, the reaper said. So his mother and grandmother were gone.

Naturally, after being told all these things, the first thing that Damian had wanted to do was go find his father. And Feromas and the others had obliged. It had taken nearly a year, but they found him.

Dead and buried. The man had been given a respectable tombstone with the words "Our Heroic Brother-In-Arms" carved into it.

Damian had cried that night, and for once, he hadn't cared that the other boys saw. That year of searching had been driven entirely by hope, and yet that was how it ended?

It was simply too cruel. Life. This world. All of it. So little of it was fair or good.

Damian had been utterly numb by the time he parted ways with Parson and Germal. This plan that the reapers had... to use their connections in order to infiltrate the Vanguard and Abolish... to play a very long and dangerous game...

Damian couldn't have cared less about it. And even now, his feelings on the matter hadn't changed much. But they had changed on another matter."

"1742

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

Perhaps it was just time healing all wounds. Perhaps it was the slow realization that his family wasn't completely gone since Feromas was still here. But whatever it was, he had begun to look forward to the future again--to seeing Parson and Germal again, especially.

And he was starting to think even beyond that, as well. Maybe one day, he would be able to start a new family. If he could live that long. If he could find a good woman. If he could find a nice place. Somewhere peaceful. Somewhere he could raise children safely and quietly, away from all this blood and chaos and undead business.

He was still barely even a teenager, but he couldn't imagine anything that he would have liked more than that.

He focused on his meditation for most of the day. Perhaps if he could develop his power more, he could break them out of here, but he wasn't particularly hopeful. He still didn't even understand what his ability was, really.

Feromas, Overra, and Nerovoy had of course explained all about servant powers, but even they had been at a loss for what Damian's ability was, exactly. The only apparent thing was that he could use it to disintegrate things. At first, they'd all told him that it was the destruction type, but as time passed, it became clear that that was not the case.

Damian had met several destruction users since then. They created a path whenever they used their power, and there was a particular sound associated with it, too. But Damian's ability didn't work that way. He simply turned things to dust at will--often accidentally, back when he was first acclimating himself to it.

So, really, he didn't know for sure if his ability couldn't overcome these walls. He'd already tried and failed several times, but there was no telling what it would be able to do for him with more development.

Probably not much, though, he figured. It seemed to be an all-or-nothing kind of power.

Three meals of yellow-brown slop arrived, as usual, and he was hungry enough to choke down two of them but not the third.

He was preparing for another night of uncomfortable sleep in a flea-ridden, rat-eaten bedroll when he suddenly felt it.

An oppressive presence unlike any he had felt before.

'It's him,' said Feromas. 'He's here.'

Damian could hear the other prisoners stirring in their cells and guards whispering to one another. There soon came a commotion of keys jangling and metal doors creaking and clanking--and finally, footsteps.

Drawing steadily nearer.

Damian only sat and waited with attentive eyes.

When a group of men appeared on the other side of the bars, Damian didn't have much trouble discerning which among them was the Mad Demon of Abolish. The others were all familiar-looking guards, of course, but even if they weren't, it probably still would have been obvious from just the eyes and smile."

"1743

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

The Mad Demon's raven hair was so wild that it almost looked alive. He wore a blazingly red frock coat with gold-lined squares all over it, and a white cravat protruded farther out from his neck than was probably proper.

"Feromas, you old so-and-so!" Morgunov threw up his hands and placed them against the bars but didn't open the cell. "How in the heck are ya?!"

'I... have been better. But it is good to see you, Nibas.'

"Nibas?!" Morgunov snorted. "Why, nobody's called me that in... three hundred years! It's Morgunov now! Obviously! What kind of stoop would want to be called Nibas, huh?"

"...Stoop?"

"Yes. It's an abbreviation of 'stupid person.'"

'I don't think that's a real word.'

"It is, if I say it is. I have that kind of power now. I'm a real trend-setter, you know."

'...I suppose you are, aren't you? Where is Bool, by the way? I was hoping to speak with him.'

Morgunov's smile seemed to widen, though Damian wouldn't have thought that possible, and the man snickered. "Oh, I'm sure you would like to talk to him, wouldn't you? And I have no doubt that he would like to talk to you.”

Damian wasn't liking the Mad Demon's tone all of a sudden--not that he'd liked it all that much before.

“But ya see,” Morgunov went on, “I dunno if I should actually trust you. As I recall, you were quite the persuasive little rascal, weren'tcha? You talked Bool into doing all sorts of stuff with you, didn't you? Of course, this was all back when I was still just a teeny-weeny baby servant who barely knew up from down, but I remember you and your mischievous ways! Don't think I don't!”

‘I am glad you have not forgotten me,’ said Feromas. ‘But what, precisely, are you afraid that I will convince Bool to do?’

“Oh, who knows?” said Morgunov, gesturing wildly with his hands. “But therein lies the rub, eh? What. Do. Ya plan. To do? Hmm? I know how sneaky you reapers can be. Got all sorts of things going on inside those extra-dimensional brains of yours, don'tcha?”

Feromas sighed. ‘I assure you, I have no such devious plans for Bool.’

“Eheh, well, we'll see about that.” The Mad Demon's wide, gray eyes fell upon Damian. “And who is your little friend here? Your servant, I presume?”

‘Yes,’ said Feromas. ‘His name is Damian Lofar. He is my great grandson, as it so happens.’

“Ya don't say! Well, how about that! Lovely to make your acquaintance, my young friend!” Morgunov reached a hand through the bars.

Damian didn't see much choice and decided to shake it.

Morgunov took the opportunity to yank the boy over to him, and his other hand found Damian's face. “Hmm. Hmmm...!”

“Agh--! W-what are you doing?” said Damian.

“Oh, nothing. Just checking something. Don't mind me. Hmm. Yes. This skin certainly looks like your own. I suppose you're not a jabberwock or a tomokooni, then. Hmm. Good. Yes, quite good.”

"1744

"What the hell is a jabberwock or a tomokooni?" said Damian, still struggling.

Morgunov let him go, and Damian staggered a few steps back toward the rear of the cell. "You are probably better off not knowing. It could be the knowing that attracts them!"

Damian stayed near the far corner and rubbed the sore spot on his arm where the man had grabbed him. What a monstrous grip Morgunov had.

'Does Bool know you are here?' said Feromas.

"He sure doesn't!" said Morgunov. "And how you answer my next questions will determine whether or not you ever get to see him again! So think carefully, now! Eheh!"

Feromas' next words were private. 'Let me do the talking.'

Damian hadn't been planning otherwise.

Morgunov pointed at Feromas. "First thing first. I'll start us off with an easy one. Are you planning to betray me?"

'No, of course we aren't,' said Feromas, apparently unable to conceal his exasperation.

"Yes, that is what I expected you to say," said Morgunov. "But you see, I'm not sure I believe you, so I'm going to ask that same question one more time. And I want you to be honest now! No lying! Understood?"

'...Understood.'

"Okay, here we go. You ready?"

'...Yes. What are you waiting for?'

"Eheh! What, indeed!" Morgunov gestured broadly with his hands again, though this time spent more time on it, as if performing a dance or casting a spell. "And beeeee... truthful!" He slammed his hands against the bars of the cell.

Damian felt an immediate difference. The air was suddenly thicker, more oppressive. Breathing became simultaneously easier and more difficult. It was as if he couldn't even control his own breath, yet at the same, the air itself seemed more resistant as well.

'W-what...?' said Feromas, apparently able to feel a difference also. 'What is this?! What are you doing to us?'

"Ya like it? It's one of my latest tricks!"

'I don't--!'

"Shh-shh, no talky unless I say so. Which I do, by the way! I do say so! But not about that. Whatever you were about to say, I'm sure it can wait. The important thing is that you answer my question again. Are you planning to betray me?"

'Wha--?! I--! Argh--!'

"C'mon, now! Don't be bashful! Just tell Papa Morgunov the truth! You'll feel better! I promise!"

Damian could only watch in horror. Words weren't even forming in his mind, much less from his mouth.

'I--! Argh--! Yes!'

"Oh? Yes, what?"

'Yes... yes, I plan on betraying you...'

"Yeah-huh. See? Doesn't it feel good to come clean?"

'I... you... how...?'

"Eheh, how, indeed? I'd love to explain, but, well, ya know--you did just admit to being a traitor, so. Don't have much reason to share my secrets with you, now do I?"

"1745

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 2 of 12))

'Nibas, wait--' tried Feromas.

"I told you, my name is Morgunov, now."

‘Fine, I--’

“It’s funny. I didn’t think you would break on the first question. I’m quite disappointed, honestly. I thought we could do a whole little dance with this, have a bit of back-and-forth, make a pleasant evening out of it! But no! You already gave me all the reason I need to kill you!”

Feromas was looking around frantically now, eyes lingering briefly on Damian. ‘Morgunov, wait! I can tell you where the Mask of Amordiin is! You’re interested in that, aren’t you?! But you’ll never find out where it is if you kill me!’

Morgunov’s expression went briefly flat, and when the man’s smile returned, it seemed pitying this time. He banged the bar cells another time. “Do you really know where the Mask is? ‘Cuz I have a funny feeling you’re lying again.”

‘I--! Agh--!’

“Hmm? What’s that?”

‘I... I don’t...’

“You don’t what?”

‘I don’t know where the Mask is.’

Morgunov let loose a throaty cackle. “You really didn’t understand what I was doing, did you? Well, that’s okay. Reapers are always a bit slow on the uptake with things like this, eh? So stuck in the past that you have trouble realizing when the future is staring you right in the face! It’s not your fault, though. It’s just your nature. I won’t hold it against you.”

Damian didn’t know what to do. Clearly, this was not going how Feromas had wanted, and his reaper’s panic had quickly become his own.

“Oh well,” said Morgunov. “Maybe you’ll get lucky and be reincarnated as a beautiful emu. Majestic creatures, those. I got myself one as a pet, recently. I don’t think he likes me much, but that just makes me yearn for his affection even more, somehow. But anyway, I suppose I’m just rambling now. And you know what? Since you’ve been such good listeners, and since you’ve also been so patiently waiting for me here, I’m going to give you a choice! How would you like to die?”

Oh no.

‘Morgunov, wait--’

“No. Waiting isn’t one of the choices, silly. Well, maybe it is. In a sense. I’ll just explain them, shall I? Okay, so first, I could kill ya slowly and painfully. Now, of course, the benefit to this option is that you get to live slightly longer, but I won’t sugarcoat it--it’s going to be quite miserable. Wouldn’t be my choice, necessarily. Though, maybe it would depend on my mood. Anyway, the second option is, as you can probably guess, quick and painless. Now, this one’s quite popular, but I don’t--”

As he listened, Damian became increasingly convinced there was no sense in any of this. He certainly didn’t want to die without a fight.

--which brings us to the third option. And maybe you’re thinking, ‘Papa Morgunov, how could there be a third option when the first two seem to cover everything so thoroughly?’ Well, that’s the thing! The third option is a surprise! Might be even quicker! Might be even slower! Might be a mixture! Who knows?! Could involve some fun gadgets I’ve been working on! Now, what do you--?!”

Damian raised his hand and concentrated with everything he had, trying to disintegrate Morgunov’s head."

"1746 -- CLXXXVI.

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 3 of 12))

Morgunov’s head twitched, and he blinked a couple times, staring at Damian. “What are you doing there, boy? Eheh, that tickles a bit!”

Damian just grit his teeth and pushed harder, demanding still more from himself. He thought he felt a response, even.

Morgunov began to giggle. “Ooh! Now it really tickles! You’re a funny boy! What’s that ability of yours, hmm?”

‘...We don’t know,’ said Feromas. ‘We haven’t been able to figure it out, either.’

“Ya don’t say! Well, I do love me a good mystery! Maybe I won’t be killing you, after all!"

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Six: 'Take repose and steady thyself...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector almost couldn't believe it when he finally, truly, actually made it back to Warrenhold in one piece. The journey had taken several more hours, of course, but there was no further interruptions or delays, which he considered a miracle enough on its own.

He ended up waiting to have Voreese revive Roman, however. The heat of the Undercrust would have made the regeneration more difficult and caused Roman needless extra pain later, so Hector didn't get a chance to catch up with Roman just yet.

Even after he made it back, there wasn't much opportunity for pleasantries. Now that everyone was safe--for the time being, at least--all Hector really wanted to do was sleep. And he wasn't the only one, either. The exhaustion among the Rainlords was plain as day. He supposed being held captive as brains for the past few days hadn't qualified as proper rest.

As he dragged himself toward the Tower of Night, to the master bedroom therein, he couldn't help thinking about all of the things that he would have to take care of after he woke up.

Garovel and Voreese were going to bring the Rainlords up to speed for him, regarding everything that had transpired with Leo, and a part of Hector was glad that he wouldn't be conscious for their reactions. Somehow, he didn't think that they would want to play along with the fiction that Voreese had concocted about him being their new leader.

And of course, he would have to inform the Queen of the situation as well. He had no idea how he was going to explain all of this to her. Harboring a bunch of fugitives from the Vanguard was bad enough, but now he had to tell her about Leo, too? A likely fugitive from Sai-hee?

She probably wasn't going to be very pleased about that.

Still. At least they were here. They'd made it to Warrenhold.

There sure were a lot of people around now, too. Most, if not all, of the non-servant Rainlords were up and about, it seemed. Many of them were staring at him as he passed, and a few even came up to him and tried to strike up a conversation. He tried his best to politely decline, citing exhaustion, and they all seemed to understand.

When he opened the door to his room and saw the bed there, he couldn't imagine a more relieving sight in the entire world."

"1746 -- CLXXXVI.

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 3 of 12))

Morgunov's head twitched, and he blinked a couple times, staring at Damian. "What are you doing there, boy? Eheh, that tickles a bit!"

Damian just grit his teeth and pushed harder, demanding still more from himself. He thought he felt a response, even.

Morgunov began to giggle. "Ooh! Now it really tickles! You're a funny boy! What's that ability of yours, hmm?"

'...We don't know,' said Feromas. 'We haven't been able to figure it out, either.'

"Ya don't say! Well, I do love me a good mystery! Maybe I won't be killing you, after all!"

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Six: 'Take repose and steady thyself...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector almost couldn't believe it when he finally, truly, actually made it back to Warrenhold in one piece. The journey had taken several more hours, of course, but there was no further interruptions or delays, which he considered a miracle enough on its own.

He ended up waiting to have Voreese revive Roman, however. The heat of the Undercrust would have made the regeneration more difficult and caused Roman needless extra pain later, so Hector didn't get a chance to catch up with Roman just yet.

Even after he made it back, there wasn't much opportunity for pleasantries. Now that everyone was safe--for the time being, at least--all Hector really wanted to do was sleep. And he wasn't the only one, either. The exhaustion among the Rainlords was plain as day. He supposed being held captive as brains for the past few days hadn't qualified as proper rest.

As he dragged himself toward the Tower of Night, to the master bedroom therein, he couldn't help thinking about all of the things that he would have to take care of after he woke up.

Garovel and Voreese were going to bring the Rainlords up to speed for him, regarding everything that had transpired with Leo, and a part of Hector was glad that he wouldn't be conscious for their reactions. Somehow, he didn't think that they would want to play along with the fiction that Voreese had concocted about him being their new leader.

And of course, he would have to inform the Queen of the situation as well. He had no idea how he was going to explain all of this to her. Harboring a bunch of fugitives from the Vanguard was bad enough, but now he had to tell her about Leo, too? A likely fugitive from Sai-hee?

She probably wasn't going to be very pleased about that.

Still. At least they were here. They'd made it to Warrenhold.

There sure were a lot of people around now, too. Most, if not all, of the non-servant Rainlords were up and about, it seemed. Many of them were staring at him as he passed, and a few even came up to him and tried to strike up a conversation. He tried his best to politely decline, citing exhaustion, and they all seemed to understand.

When he opened the door to his room and saw the bed there, he couldn't imagine a more relieving sight in the entire world."

"1747

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 4 of 12))

He knew that he couldn't plop down on the mattress just yet, though. He was still holding Roman's encased head in one arm--the same arm that was also carrying his shield. He hadn't wanted to dematerialize the shield, because if he did, he knew that he wouldn't be able to rematerialize it later. With all the other identical shields currently residing in Warrenhold, the volume limit for the shield's unique materialization had certainly been reached.

Before he could enter the room, however, his mother's voice acquired his attention.

"Hector?" she said, stepping closer.

He hadn't even noticed her there at the end of the hall. Why hadn't Garovel warned him of her presence? Oh, right, he was off talking to the Rainlords, already. Why hadn't the Scarf of Amordiin warned him, then? Oh, it had, Hector realized. He just hadn't been paying attention.

Man, he needed some sleep.

"...Hi, mom." His voice was still ringing with metal, he realized. Because he was still wearing armor.

"What are you--?"

He dematerialized most of his armor so she could see his face.

She recoiled a little.

Oh, right, she hadn't actually seen him use his power all that much, had she?

"Ah, sorry," he said. "I didn't mean to scare you."

She didn't say anything.

And neither did he.

Ugh. Was he supposed to be telling her something? He couldn't remember. He was way too tired for this, right now, but at the same time, just ignoring her seemed like the wrong thing to do.

"...You look like crap," she eventually said.

"Yeah," he said with a sigh, "it's been a long... uh..."

"Month?" she finished.

Holy shit, had it really been that long since he'd last seen her? "Er, yeah," was all he could think to say. He noticed Voreese hovering there next to him. She was still waiting to revive Roman. He supposed he shouldn't keep her waiting.

He entered the room and set Roman's head down on a table by the balcony window. "Ah... h-how have you been?" he decided to ask.

His mother followed him as far as the open doorway. "Fine," was all she said.

"That's... good." He sat down at the table and started trying to chip away at the encasement. Then, thinking better of it, he stopped. It might be more than a little surprising for his mother if she saw that there was a human head inside it.

Shit.

Now he didn't know what to do with his hands, so he just kind of sat there awkwardly, looking between her and the window. He knew there was a nice view of the underground courtyard there, but he'd have to go out onto the balcony to see it.

"...Have you eaten anything recently?" his mother asked.

Had he? Why was it so hard to remember all of sudden? "Er, no, I haven't..." Truth be told, he was fucking starving. He was only marginally more exhausted than he was hungry.

"I'll make you something, then. What do you want?"

At that, he genuinely did not know what to say."

"1748

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 5 of 12))

She seemed to grow impatient with him. "Do you want something or not?"

"Ah--er, sure. W-whatever's fine. I don't care. I mean, eh, I could eat just about anything..."

"...Okay." And she left.

His brown eyes lingered on the empty doorway.

Hmm.

‘She seems... nice,’ said Voreese.

Hector just spared the reaper a look and elected not to comment on that. Instead, he returned to his work, trying to free Roman. He supposed he didn’t have to be gentle. He could just destroy the brain, and the end result would be the same. It might be faster, too.

Though, it would probably also get brain matter all over the table. And possibly the rest of the room, depending on how violent he tried to get with it.

He decided to try to avoid that type of mess. He didn’t think it would be good to spill cerebral juices or whatever in the same place where he wanted to go to sleep.

It was slow going but still not quite as slow as it had been before, and within a few minutes, he managed to free enough of Roman’s neck-stump for Voreese to begin the regeneration.

He worked on trying to free the man’s face and cranium while Roman’s torso began to form.

Voreese seemed to grow anxious while she waited. ‘So how do you like it here, by the way? Warrenhold’s pretty great, right? I bet you’re glad you listened to me now, eh?’

“Yeah, I am,” he said with small laugh.

‘Heh.’

An iron spike cracked off another black chunk, revealing Roman’s mouth. Well, at least he’d be able to breathe now.

‘Hector, listen, um...’

He spared another glance as he worked. “What?”

‘I know I kinda said this, already... or at least implied it, I’m pretty sure, but, uh... it’s just, ah, I really do mean it, you know?’

Hector didn’t follow. “Mean what?”

‘Oh, c’mon, you know what I’m saying, don’t you?’

He just cocked an eyebrow at her.

‘Wow, are you really gonna make me repeat myself? It’s not very gentlemanly to embarrass a lady like this, you know.'

Now he was just confused. "...Voreese, what the hell are you talking about?"

'Ugh! I'm saying I'm grateful, okay! There! Ya happy, ya little punk?!'

"Oh..." That was all she was trying to say? Shit. He could feel himself starting to blush. "Uh... it's, ah... I mean, you guys've helped me a bunch, too, so it's not really, like, I, er--"

'Hector, what the fuck? Quit that. I can't deal with it. You're gonna give me diabetes.'

"Ah--what?"

'Just shut up and listen, okay? What you did--going back for Roman like that... when, frankly, you probably shouldn't have... It's just. Look, that's a really big deal, okay?'

He didn't know what to say. Roman's torso was almost done, so he started giving the man some armor."

"1749

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 6 of 12))

Voreese was apparently unsatisfied by that reaction, however. 'Hector, do you...? Do you actually not understand how big of a deal that was? I could've EASILY ended up separated from Roman for the next twenty years. Or longer, even. If he ended up falling into Sai-hee's hands, then there really would've been no telling when I could've gotten him back.'

Hector scratched his cheek, not really sure what her point was. "I mean... yeah, of course I understand that. That's why I went back for him."

'Then why are you so fucking nonchalant about it, huh? Do you know how ridiculously difficult it's gonna be to repay you for this shit?'

He breathed a laugh. "You don't have to repay me for anything. You guys are... like I was trying to say, you've already done so much. It's not like--"

‘Okay, enough of that. We don’t need your fucking charity, alright? We will definitely--’

“Charity?” interrupted Hector. He was getting a little pissed off now. “What the hell are you talking about? That wasn’t charity. That was just--it was--agh...” What were the right words here, dammit?

‘Fine, not charity, whatever. I’m just saying that Roman and I don’t like being indebted to people, so--’

“Agh, yeah, and I’m saying you’re not indebted to me.”

‘The fuck’re you talking about? Of course we are, you little prick!’

Hector didn’t intend to budge on this, though. “No. You’re not.”

‘I don’t think you--’ But she stopped herself for some reason. Then she tilted her head at him, seemingly more confused than irritated now. ‘Why’re you being so stubborn about this?’

“Why are you?” he said right back.

‘Because I--agh...!’ She gave an exasperated groan and pointed a skeletal finger at him. ‘Now, you listen here, young man. I am two thousand years old or some shit like that. You don’t get to win arguments against me, understand?’

Hector all but threw up his hands. “Now what are you saying?! What is this argument even about?!”

‘I don’t know, okay?! I just know that you’re annoying me with all this backtalk! You’re supposed to be this adorable little boy who never argues with me, goddammit!’

Hector just squinted at her.

‘The fuck kinda look is that?!’ said Voreese. ‘Alright, y’know what? I’ve been thinkin’ this for a while now, but I just have to come right out and say it! You are NOT the same Hector that I remember! Are you a body snatcher or something?! What did you do with him, huh?!’

At that, Hector couldn’t help laughing a little. Roman was just about finished regenerating, he realized, so Hector completed the man’s armor set for him. Roman was already beginning to move again, and Hector helped him onto his feet.

The man's head was still half-encased, so Voreese touched his shoulder, and then Roman was able to yank the rest of it off himself-- though not without ripping off some of his face and scalp."

"1750

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 7 of 12))

'How ya feelin', dumbass?' said Voreese.

Roman touched the regenerating chunk of his face and eyed the blood on his fingertips. "Numb, thankfully." When he saw Hector there, he smiled ghoulishly. "Well, look who it is."

Hector couldn't help smiling, too. "Finally. Sorry for all the trouble I've caused you."

"Heh. Same here." Roman took the opportunity to stretch his arms and legs, though his iron armor didn't lend itself particularly well to that purpose.

Hector plopped back down in the chair, feeling like he could fall asleep right then and there, if he wanted. It seemed like he'd been wanting to talk to Roman for ages, but now that he actually had the opportunity, he was having trouble thinking of anything to say.

Fortunately, that didn't prove too much of a problem with Voreese there. She brought Roman up to speed. Apparently, he'd been at least semi-conscious for a while now, and Voreese had already been trying to explain things to him privately.

Hector supposed that made sense. Leo's encasing hadn't felt very cold at all, even though Roman's actual head had. Perhaps Leo had frozen Roman's head initially and then given it a normal coating. Perhaps to make it easier to carry? Hector wasn't sure, and he was too tired to give it much more thought.

Roman and Voreese were already shouting at one another for some reason, but it didn't seem like something to be worried about, considering their body language. And considering that it was them.

Pretty soon, Hector just gave up and drifted off.

Agh. It was so nice not to think about anything. Just an ocean of comfortable darkness and nothing at all concerning him.

It was gone all too quickly, however.

‘Hector, wake up,’ came Garovel’s voice.

And Hector did, though not because he wanted to. His eyes still felt heavy. Hell, his whole body did. “Ugh... no...”

‘I know you’re tired,’ said Garovel, ‘but it’s already been eight hours, and I can’t just let you sleep for the next week--not with all the things we need to take care of.’

He rolled over in his bed. “Just... five more... hours...”

‘Sorry, buddy.’

Hector felt the reaper’s touch against the back of his skull, and instantly, his fatigue was gone. All bodily desire to sleep vanished, though a part of him wanted to stay in bed out of spite.

He sighed and sat up. He knew only too well that putting off his exhaustion like this meant that it was just going to hit him even harder later.

He got out of bed. When had he even gotten into bed, he wondered? Last thing he remembered was falling asleep in the chair by the table.

He noticed a bowl and a glass on the table now.

Shit.

He walked over to it. Some type of soup. Ice cold now and possibly no longer safe to eat. The drink, on the other hand, was lukewarm tea.

Hmm.

He materialized a red hot ball of iron into the soup and a freezing one into the tea.

‘Are you really gonna eat that?’ said Garovel, observing from over his shoulder. ‘Just throw it out. Go downstairs and get something fresh from the kitchen.’

“It’s alright,” said Hector. “I’ll do that, too. I’m hungry enough.”

‘If you say so.’”

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 8 of 12))

He turned to Garovel while he waited. "So what should we deal with first?"

'You need to meet with Madame Carthrace.'

"Oh, yeah. I haven't seen her at all yet. How's she doing?"

'She seems to be handling things fairly well, considering two days ago, she only had to worry about a handful of people. Now she's suddenly got hundreds in need of accommodations. I heard her mention that she didn't want to disturb you while you were resting, but I imagine she must be quite eager to have a conversation with you by now.'

"Ah... right." He decided to just blurt out one of the questions that he'd been dreading. "Do we even have enough money to take care of everyone here?"

'For a little while, sure,' said Garovel. 'Combined with the cost of renovations, we could probably last a few months just on what we have. Before we go completely bankrupt, that is.'

Hector sighed and sat down to eat. "That's... not very encouraging."

'Wasn't supposed to be. Madame Carthrace would probably have a more accurate estimate for you, but I think it's safe to say that if we don't come up with a reliable source of income soon, we are gonna have some big problems on our hands.'

"Agh, and with this... economic crisis or whatever going on..." The soup didn't have much flavor, but he liked how chunky it was. He'd definitely have to get more to eat after this, though.

'Yeah. Making money might prove somewhat challenging at the moment, but on the bright side, we've got plenty of rich allies who are probably willing to help us out.'

That piqued Hector's curiosity. "Do the Rainlords still have access to their money, by the way?"

‘Yes and no. I was wondering the same thing, so I asked the various head reapers about it, and apparently, many of the Rainlords have had their assets completely frozen, but there’s also a pretty strong contingent of them who were prepared for this sort of thing.’

“For fleeing their own country as fugitives?”

‘Yep. They say they’ve got hidden funds stored in banks all over the world. Some even have actual secret store houses that they plan on making a trip to at their first opportunity. It’s obviously not as much money as they normally have access to, but they’re still far from broke.’

“Huh... I’m a little surprised that the Vanguard is able to freeze any of their assets at all.”

‘My understanding is that the Vanguard isn’t doing it directly. Rather, they’re applying pressure in the government of western Sair--which, by all accounts, is in total fucking chaos, by the way.’

Hector bobbed his head at that news. “I can imagine... The Rainlords made up, uh, most of the leadership there, didn’t they?”

‘They sure did. Now they’re all missing, and their civilian subjects are left feeling scared and unprotected.’

“Geez...”

"1752

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 9 of 12))

‘From what I’ve heard and been seeing on television, it looks like the Sandlords are intervening in the Rainlords’ territory now.’

Hector stopped eating for a moment to look at Garovel. “Seriously?”

‘Yep.’

“But isn’t that, like... overreach or something?”

‘Quite possibly. The Rainlords don’t seem too pleased about it, but they also seem to understand that it’s a difficult situation, and the Sandlords probably shouldn’t just sit back and watch half of their own country fall into disorder and lawlessness.'

"Hmm." Hector returned to his meal and discovered that he was already almost finished with it.

'It's a difficult situation for everyone, but the Sandlords deciding to take action here is pretty damn justified, I'd say. What that means for Sair's future, though--that's another matter. I'm sure the Rainlords aren't loving the thought of their thousand-year-old rivals taking over their territory permanently.'

"Yeah..."

'But hey! With their new Lord Darksteel taking them under his protection, maybe the Rainlords are only thinking about how bright their future is!'

Hector groaned. "Why'd you have to remind me about that shit...?"

The reaper chortled. 'What, you don't like being the new leader of the Rainlords?'

Hector just groaned again.

'Voreese and I did tell them about that, by the way. Or we STARTED to tell them, at least. Word seems to be getting around pretty well on its own now.'

Hector groaned again, even louder this time. "How are they reacting to it?"

'Hard to say. Mainly they just seemed confused. Though, I think some of them are under the impression that it's a conspiracy.'

"Wha? A conspiracy?"

'As in, they think that it might actually be true--that it's not just a ruse to fool Leo and that you might genuinely be their new de facto leader.'

Hector stared at Garovel, trying to discern something--anything--from the reaper's skeletal expression. "Tell me you're lying, Garovel."

'Sorry, buddy. I'm not.'

He buried his face in his hands. "Argh..."

'Hey, on the plus side, some of those conspiracy believers seemed...

fairly receptive to the idea.'

Hector didn't remove his face from his hands.

'Admittedly, though, some others seemed a bit less so... Anyway, we won't know what the Rainlords are really thinking about everything until the heads have another meeting. They're mostly just trying to let everyone get some rest, still.'

That last part, Hector was actually glad to hear. After everything those people had been through, they definitely deserved a break.

He slurped up the rest of his soup, chugged the rest of his tea, and then hopped in the shower. The master bathroom was certainly spacious, though a bit odd. The whole thing was made out of the pitch black nightrock, just like the rest of the Tower of Night, but certain key pieces of it were very recently added, such as the porcelain toilet and sinks, the steel faucets, and the big, glassy shower."

"1753

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 10 of 12))

It was strange to imagine how long ago this bathroom must have been built. Due to those few additions, it looked fairly modern, apart from perhaps the bathtub, which was embedded in the floor and could've doubled as a small pool.

'Is there any other news about the Sandlords?' said Hector as he scrubbed his back. He quite appreciated the scent of soap. It was a welcome change from all the awful stench that he was getting used to smelling. 'Like, er, how they're dealing with the Vanguard or whatever?'

'No,' said Garovel from the other room, 'but it's a safe bet that the Vanguard is working closely with them, regardless. Lamont had just arrived in Sair when we left, and that guy doesn't have a reputation for leaving things half done. With the Salesman's frozen head in the Sandlords' possession, I'm sure the Vanguard will be wanting to keep a very close eye on everything that's going on in Sair, right now.'

'Hmm. Do you think the Vanguard is pressuring the Sandlords into taking over the Rainlords' territory?'

‘It’s possible, but I’m not sure how much extra motivation the Sandlords would need. I mean, they’re already gaining land while simultaneously preventing a humanitarian crisis. It’s kind of a win-win, y’know? On paper, at least. Who the hell knows how it’ll all shake out in the long-term?’

That was a good question, Hector thought. He didn’t imagine that the Rainlords would be content to stay here in Atreya forever. Eventually, they would want to go take their home back, and if the Sandlords didn’t want to give it up, then how were they going to avoid bloodshed?

‘There’s also some other other big news,’ said Garovel. ‘Big and significantly worse news, that is.’

‘Great. What is it?’

‘Well, it’s not relevant to us at all, but it’s pretty awful just the same.’

‘Tell me.’

‘Remember the civil war going on in Kavia?’

‘Uh... kinda?’

‘It’s over now--which, I guess is good--but the problem is, the side that won was supported by Abolish.’

‘Oh. The Vanguard lost there?’

‘Yeah. A few of their rising stars were killed, apparently. None of the marshals, at least, but it’s still a pretty big defeat.’

‘Hmm. Who’s the, uh... I mean, who from Abolish is the victory being, er, attributed to?’

‘That would be Jercash, the Devil’s Knife.’

‘Ugh. What a nice nickname...’

‘It wasn’t just him, though. There’s also word going around of someone else from Abolish who made a big impact there. Someone new. Someone who’s now being called the Bolt of Kavia.’

That made Hector pause. ‘Bolt? As in... lightning bolt?’

‘Dunno. Details are scarce. I thought it was interesting, though.’

‘...You really think Karkash is making a name for himself out there?’

‘Wouldn’t surprise me,’ said Garovel. ‘Power like that is pretty damn versatile. Not to mention deadly. And we witnessed him achieve emergence, you may recall.’”

"1754

((Mother's Day Special -- Page 11 of 12))

‘You think he might’ve achieved it again since then?’ said Hector.

‘It’s definitely possible,’ said Garovel. ‘You’re not the only one in the world going through crazy shit, you know. And you’re definitely not the only one growing, either.’

Hector certainly knew that. He eyed the Scarf of Amordiin that he’d set on the counter by the shower. ‘He could’ve gotten his hands on some kind of magical artifact.’

‘Yeah. Or hell, he could’ve met a “god,” too, and received a blessing.’

‘Agh, don’t even joke about that...’

‘What, you don’t like the idea of other “gods” existing out there in the world?’

‘Not really, no.’

‘Heh. Can’t say I’m in love with the idea, either. But weren’t you giving me shit about not wanting gods to exist?’

‘Yeah, that was before we met Malast,’ said Hector.

‘You’re afraid the other gods might be like him?’

‘I don’t know. I mean, it’s not like he was the worst god ever ‘r anything, but shit...’

‘Well, okay, I don’t think you’ll have to worry about gods being all that prevalent in the world. If they were, then I definitely would’ve heard about them a long time ago.’

‘Hmm...’

‘It makes sense that I wouldn’t know about Malast being real, since his whole deal is apparently just sitting there and doing jack shit all day long, but if the others were real? They would’ve been having a pretty damn big impact on the world.’

‘Yeah, but isn’t that because the Void “rended” them from existence or whatever?’

‘Supposedly.’

‘That’s what Malast said, isn’t it? You think he was lying?’

‘I honestly have no fucking clue. A part of me would like to pretend half of that shit we went through in Himmekel never even happened.’

‘It’s not good to ignore reality, Garovel.’

‘Oh, shut up,’ the reaper laughed. ‘I’m not ignoring anything. I’m just expressing my displeasure, okay? I’m still allowed to do that, aren’t I?’

‘As if anything could stop you.’

Hector finished up his shower, wrapped himself in a towel, and then went to the dresser by his bed in order to pick out some clothes. There were more garments inside it than he remembered there being, and he found himself faced with a harder decision in choosing what to wear than he expected.

He’d never been much for fashion, but he supposed walking around Warrenhold in full iron armor wouldn’t be a good idea. He deferred to Garovel’s judgment and went with black trousers and a black waistcoat over a silky gray-and-white undershirt. There were a few ties there as well, and Garovel even tried to show him how to tie one, but after a while of fiddling with it, he grew frustrated and gave up.

‘You’ll probably wanna figure that out sooner or later,’ said Garovel.

‘Later’s fine with me,’ said Hector as he pulled on brown work boots and began tying them.”

"1755

‘I’m not sure those go with the rest of your outfit,’ said Garovel.

He stopped. ‘Wha? You told me to wear all this shit.’

‘Yeah, but I didn’t know you were gonna choose work boots. And brown? There are some wingtips in your closet, I think. Try those.’

Hector didn’t want to stand up yet. ‘What’s a wingtip?’

‘It’s a--look, just go to the closet and I’ll point ‘em out, okay?’

Reluctantly, Hector did as he was bid. In the end, he preferred the work boots. They were more comfortable, perhaps because they were already broken in.

‘Yeah, see, isn’t that better?’ said Garovel as Hector was grabbing the Scarf of Amordiin and wrapping it around his neck. ‘Now you’re starting to look a little more lordly. You sure do like the color black, don’t you?’

Hector finally left the room. ‘Again, you told me to wear all this.’

‘You’re kinda blending into the nightrock now. Maybe you should go back and change.’

‘Go fuck yourself.’

Garovel chortled. ‘That foul mouth isn’t very becoming of a lord, you know.’

‘You swear just as much as I do. If not more.’

‘Hmm, are you saying you want to be like me?’

Hector stopped at the top of the stairs and gave the reaper a look. ‘Okay, good point.’

Garovel just laughed as they descended together. The kitchen was on the bottom floor, and all the floors along the way were filled with Rainlords, many of whom were sleeping. It seemed like all the heads of the Houses and their immediate families were here in the Tower of Night with him.

Strange. Maybe he’d just been too tired to notice, but he was pretty sure that they hadn’t been here before he’d gone to sleep.

He gained considerable attention as he made his way down the tower. Many of the non-servants decided to come greet and subsequently join him. By the time he made it down to the fourth floor, he'd acquired an entourage that was at least a dozen strong, mostly consisting of people his own age or younger.

They weren't shy with their questions, either.

"Lord Darksteel, ensir, could you show us some of your moves?"

"What was the Salesman like? Was he scary?"

"I heard he was super yellow."

"What?"

"Hey, could you make Seth's head explode?"

"Don't ask him that! I like my head!"

"Lord Darksteel, ensir, is it true that you made everyone bend the knee?"

"Did you really meet a god?"

"Lord Darksteel, ensir, how long have you been a servant for?"

Hector wanted to just run away, but he was still hungry. 'Garovel, please help...'

'Ask them if they need something to do.'

'What?'

'Tell them there's plenty of work around here that needs tending to, and since they've apparently got all this time to spare, it would be useful if they pitched in.'

'Seems a little rude, Garovel...'

'Yeah, they're being rude, too. And we DO have a shitload of work that needs taking care of.'

"1756

‘They’re kids,’ said Hector. ‘I can’t just put them to work like employees or whatever. That’s probably against the law or something, isn’t it?’

‘Bah. If you ask me, child labor laws are mostly a pile of nonsense. Sure, kids need freedom to grow up, but actually growing up means having discipline and a sense of responsibility, and what better place to get those things than at a job, huh?’

‘Garovel...’

‘Alright, fine, here’s something else you can do.’

Hector listened, and by the time they reached the bottom floor, he had a plan. He stopped and turned around to face everyone, and they all stopped as well, going abruptly silent.

Oh geez. That was a lot of eyes staring at him.

“...I’d like to answer your questions,” said Hector, “but I can’t when you ask them all at once like that. So instead, what we’ll do is--”

“Hey, I was here first, so--” tried a short kid with a bowl cut.

“No, you weren’t!” said a stocky boy with glasses.

“Yeah, I was first!” said a young girl with long bangs.

“What?! No, I--!”

“Quiet,” came a stern and familiar voice from behind Hector. It belonged to the Lord Dimas Sebolt, approaching with his reaper Iziol. “You are being rude.”

That seemed to silence them all again. The way the man towered over everyone had a commanding effect, Hector thought.

Dimas looked to Hector, as if prompting him to continue.

With all eyes on him again, Hector tried to keep his composure. Momentarily, he wondered if he would ever stop feeling so uncomfortable in front of groups of people like this. “...We’ll make a game of it,” he said slowly. He held his hand out, palm up, and shut his eyes while he gathered his concentration. He focused on what the Scarf was telling him of Warrenhold, of its layout.

Whoa.

The Scarf wasn't enough to reveal all eight of the castle's towers to him in their entirety, but he could sense most of the Tower of Night and much of its surroundings as well, including parts of the Bell Tower and the Entry Tower.

It was so much information. The Tower of Night alone had such a complex structure to it that he probably could've lost himself in trying to examine every little nook and cranny that he could find, and if he wasn't standing in front of a bunch of people who were waiting on his next words, he might've done exactly that.

Instead, though, he picked an empty table in one of the middle floors of the Entry Tower and concentrated on it. He wanted to materialize something there. But what? Something benign. He didn't want to give the kids anything dangerous to look for.

A little figurine, he decided. An armored knight. Seemed appropriate.

He materialized a second one in the palm of his hand, making it identical to the first--or at least, as close to identical as he could get it."
"1757

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Hector opened his eyes again, and everyone was staring at the figurine now. "There," he said. "I've just placed a knight that looks like this somewhere in Warrenhold. The first one who brings it back to me... I'll answer your question."

His audience remained entirely silent and started looking at one another.

Uh-oh. Had he upset them? "...Does that sound good?" said Hector, trying not to sound as uncertain as he felt.

The kid with the bowl cut darted past Hector and out the front door of the tower. Within seconds, everyone else was running after him, and the clamor of stomping feet filled the air. Only Dimas and Iziol remained behind, watching the mayhem unfold.

Hector scratched his cheek as the last of them scrambled out the door. He'd been intending to give them a hint, thinking that it might be unfair if they thought they had to search every room--and maybe a little obnoxious for everyone who was still trying to rest.

“...I didn’t think they would all just shoot off like that,” said Hector.

‘Rainlord youth can be a terrifying thing,’ said IzioI with a sigh. ‘I suppose I will go keep an eye on them.’ And he phased through the wall leading out into Warrenhold’s main cavern.

“...Maybe we should’ve put more thought into this,” said Hector.

‘Eh, I’m sure it’ll be fine,’ said Garovel. ‘This place could do with a bit of livening up.’

Hector just gave the reaper a dubious look.

‘Don’t you remember what that pediatrician told us about child development?’ said Garovel. ‘Kids need engagement. They need to have their minds stimulated, and games are a great way to achieve that.’

“...Wasn’t he talking about toddlers?” said Hector.

‘Yeah, but I’d argue that the basic principle holds true for young people, too. Hell, if you think about it, it even holds true for adults. It’s really just the sophistication of the game that changes. It’s the instinct that pushes us to grow. We always want something that we find challenging, right? But not SO challenging that it makes us feel discouraged and incompetent.’

That was a little more psychological than Hector cared to think about, right now. He really just wanted something to eat. “If you say so...”

‘C’mon, I’m right, aren’t I? Back me up here, Dimas.’

The Lord Sebolt was just standing there, observing. He looked a bit more rested than the last time Hector had seen him, but that wasn’t saying a whole lot. He was cleanly shaven with combed hair and a fresh suit, but he still had bags under his eyes.

Perhaps that wasn’t so strange, though. Hector seemed to recall the man mentioning something about being an insomniac.

“...I am afraid I do not know much about children,” said Dimas. “I have never been very good with them, myself.”

‘Well, I’m not talking about just kids,’ said Garovel. ‘And hey, is that really true? Marcos Elroy sure seems to like you.’

The reaper certainly had a point there, Hector felt.

“...You may be right,” said Dimas, “but I would not call him a good example of my rapport with children. Marcos is... a strange boy.””
"1758

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

‘Whatever,’ said Garovel. ‘My point still stands. Young people need things to keep them busy. All the better if it involves physical activity. I have little doubt in my mind that they will go absolutely stir crazy in this place if we don’t find things for them to do. Their parents have taken all their phones away from them, you know.’

That was news to Hector. “They have?”

‘Oh yeah. Can’t have the kids accidentally giving away their location. The Vanguard has quite a strong online presence, apparently.’

Suddenly, Hector felt significantly more sympathy for those children.

“They will adapt,” said Dimas. “They might even be better off.”

‘Amen to that,’ said Garovel.

Hector wasn’t so sure he agreed. That might’ve been the age difference here rearing its head, though. As his hunger compelled him toward the kitchen again, he found himself wanting to ask Dimas about something else. “By the way, uh, h-how are the Elroys doing? Do you know? I just woke up, so I haven’t seen them yet.”

Dimas followed. “Considering the circumstances, I would say they are doing well, if a bit restless.”

“Restless?” said Hector, frowning a little. “They just got here. Can’t they just take it easy for a while?”

“They are trying,” said Dimas. “As are we all.”

There was a square-faced man and a bespectacled woman in the kitchen, apparently in the middle of cooking something. They were both non-servants, Hector was fairly sure, though he was struggling to put names to their faces.

When they noticed Hector and Dimas there, they each stopped to wipe their hands on their aprons.

“Lords,” said the man with a nod. “Are you hungry? Can we prepare something for you?”

“Ah--we hope you don’t mind our imposition,” said the woman, sounding somewhat nervous.

“The Lady Carthrace gave us permission to use the facilities here,” said the man hastily. “And not just us. There are probably three or four cooks from every family she granted access to, so I hope--” He kept talking, but Garovel’s private words echoed over him in Hector’s head.

‘Ask them their names. And shake their hands.’

Ah. Hector appreciated the instructions, honestly. “...What are your names?” he said, extending a hand.

“Oh.” The man took the hand and shook it. “I am Lluís Delaguna, and this lovely creature is my wife, Margot.”

“We cannot thank you enough for all you are doing for us,” said Margot.

Hector was a bit reluctant to shake the woman’s hand, but he didn’t let it show, figuring it would only lead to a misunderstanding. “It’s... a pleasure to meet you both,” he said.

They were a middle-aged couple, by the look of them, and judging from all the stains on their aprons, they must have been at this for a while now.”

"1759

“So what would you like?” said Lluís.

“Ah--are you sure you don’t need a break?” said Hector. “I’d rather you rest, if you’re tired.”

“Oh, nonsense,” said Margot. “It would be our honor to cook for you.”

“Do you have any calamari?” said Dimas.

At that, the pair hesitated. “Er--no, I’m sorry, Lord Dimas,” said Lluís.

“Mm,” said Dimas. “Lobster?”

“I’m afraid there isn’t any seafood in stock at the moment,” said Lluís.

“I thought a new food shipment arrived a few hours ago,” said Dimas.

“It did, lord, but there was no seafood in it,” said Lluís.

And Dimas’ normally expressionless face let slip a frown. “What do you have in stock, then?”

“Bread, beef, and cheese, mainly,” said Margot. “We could whip up some fantastic burgers for you, if you like.”

“That sounds great,” said Hector. “Make mine a double, please.”

The married couple smiled. “As you wish, lord,” said Lluís.

When they looked at Dimas, however, their mirth diminished somewhat. The man’s face was far from enthusiastic.

“Would you like something else, Lord Dimas?” said Lluís.

Dimas waited a moment, glancing between them and Hector briefly. “...No, that sounds fine,” he said, though it sounded rather like a sigh.

“V-very well,” said Lluís, and the couple ventured off together to the store room on the other side of the kitchen.

Hector and Dimas returned to the dining chamber immediately outside. It wasn’t as spacious as the enormous banquet hall that made up the entirety of the second floor, but the two of them didn’t have need of such room.

“...Do you not like burgers?” said Hector as they sat down at a long table across from one another.

“...Yes,” said Dimas.

Hector’s brow lowered. “Yes, you do? Or yes, you don’t?”

“...I find them perfectly edible,” said Dimas.

Hector almost snorted a laugh. "If you wanted something else, you could've just said so."

"...I did not want you to think I am a picky eater," said Dimas.

"...Are you a picky eater?"

"...No."

"Why did that "no" sound more like a "yes?"" said Garovel.

Dimas didn't say anything and averted his gaze.

"Hey, uh, it's okay," said Hector. "I'm kinda picky, too. I don't really like mushrooms."

Dimas' eyes fell upon him again. "...Only mushrooms?"

"I... er..." It was suddenly difficult to think. "Maybe... oh, I don't like horseradish. That stuff's gross."

"...Anything else?" said Dimas.

"Ah... p-probably. What about you?"

A beat passed, and the Lord Sebolt shook his head. "...It doesn't matter."

Hector stifled a laugh, and for a few long seconds, they just sat there in complete silence.

As was perhaps both expected and appropriate, it was up to the reaper to revive things. 'Welp, uh, anywho... Hector and I could really use your input on a few things, if you wouldn't mind hearing us out.'

Dimas straightened in his seat. "Yes, of course."

"1760

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

'Appreciated.' Garovel broke for a pause. 'Now, okay, I should preface this by saying that you are absolutely welcome to stay here at Warrenhold as long as you need or want. However, I am curious as to what plans you or your family might have going forward.'

Dimas' eyes fell to the table.

Hector waited. This man sitting in front of him was the very recently recognized new head of House Sebolt. No doubt, the tragic losses to his family at Dunehall were even fresher in his mind than they were in Hector's. It was certainly an important question that Garovel had just asked, and Hector wanted to know the answer, but he might've asked the reaper to wait a bit longer before posing it, if he'd known Garovel was going to.

At length, Hector felt compelled to add, "You don't have to answer that right now, if you don't want to. There's no rush."

'Indeed,' said Garovel. 'If anything, we're more worried about you leaving. I can say with confidence that Hector and I would both prefer that you all stay here. Indefinitely, if need be.'

Dimas looked up. "Indefinitely?"

'If need be,' Garovel reiterated.

Dimas took a breath and rubbed his brow. "I know virtually beyond doubt that my kin will wish to locate and free the others from the Vanguard's captivity."

'Yeah, that's what we're worried about,' said Garovel. 'I don't think that's a very good idea--not with everything you've been through recently--with everything we've ALL been through recently.'

Dimas just clenched his jaw and said nothing.

Hector could see the man's dilemma. From everything that Hector had come to learn of the Rainlords, the idea seemed embedded into their very identity that they should take enormous risks for the sake of their blood and loved ones.

Maybe that was historically what kept getting them into trouble, but Hector also got the feeling that that was why they seemed to be so fiercely loyal to one another, too. And that loyalty, by extension, was probably how they had survived all that trouble that they got into.

A double-edged sword, if ever Hector had seen one.

"...I have to agree," said Dimas. "Pursuing our captive brethren now would obviously be a fool's errand. We hardly even know where to begin looking for them. Korgum, perhaps, considering that is where the Gargoyle is most likely stationed, but that is not enough information on which to base a rescue attempt.”

‘I’m glad to hear you say that,’ said Garovel. ‘Personally, I think you and your people need time--and perhaps a lot of it.’

“...You may be right,” said Dimas. “But I worry what will happen if and when a supposed ‘opportunity’ appears before us. I fear that the others will jump at any chance as soon as they see it.”

‘So don’t let them,’ said Garovel.

Hector gave the reaper a look. That was a stronger stance to take than Hector had been expecting.

He couldn’t say he disagreed, though.

‘You’re the presiding Lord of House Sebolt now,’ Garovel went on. ‘Your opinion will have considerable weight behind it.’”

"1761

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

“Sitting on our thumbs and abusing your hospitality is hardly an admirable counterposition,” said Dimas.

‘Well, I’m sure we can come up with something a bit more appealing than that,’ said Garovel. ‘And you certainly wouldn’t be abusing our hospitality while you help us restore Warrenhold--as you have already begun doing, that is. You see, Hector and I have big plans for this castle. We would like it to eventually become one of the safest places on the planet.’

Dimas merely returned a rigid expression.

‘Perhaps you think that sounds a bit overly optimistic,’ said Garovel, ‘but I don’t believe it is. Not after that trip through the Undercrust we just took.’

“...What do you mean?” said Dimas.

The reaper glanced at Hector. ‘Well, I don’t want to get ahead of myself here, but obviously, this group of ours, formidable though it may be, still lacks the power it requires to achieve its ultimate objectives. I simply think that, together, we may be able to discover a good path forward, one which would benefit us all. Beyond that, though, I'm not yet prepared to say.'

Dimas made no response.

Hector wanted to ask Garovel something, though he wasn't quite sure what. It sounded like the reaper already had some sort of plan, but if that was the case, then why not just say so right now? Dimas was obviously trustworthy, Hector felt.

Hmm.

Soon, their food arrived, and Hector hardly even tasted it as he wolfed it down. Dimas was noticeably more reserved and even seemed to be reluctant to continue eating it. Hector didn't give him any crap about it, but Garovel did.

After that, it was finally time to go meet Amelia Carthrace. Garovel offered Dimas the opportunity to join them, but the Lord Sebolt politely declined, saying that he should get back to his family. They said their goodbyes and parted ways.

Along the way to the Book Tower, in the middle of the rocky courtyard in the main cavern, the group of children from earlier ran up to him, and one of them presented the knight figurine to him.

Hector stepped closer to one of the pathway lamps so that he could examine the object. It wasn't quite identical to the one he'd made earlier, but it it was pretty decent, he felt. More importantly, it gave him a clear idea of how much his precision was lost when he materialized something over a large distance and without being able to see it.

'Give them some encouragement,' said Garovel privately.

"Ah... well done," said Hector. Agh. He needed to stop being so self-absorbed. "So... what's your question, then?"

The boy with the bowl cut looked around at his peers triumphantly before settling back on Hector. "I wanna know if you're the new leader of the Rainlords or not!"

A chorus of murmurs ran through the small crowd."

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

'Be careful how you answer that,' said Garovel.

Hector understood why the reaper was saying that, but he honestly didn't think it was that difficult of a question. Sure, these kids were young, but not that young. He was fairly confident that they would understand, as long as he didn't treat them like they were babies.

That was something that he knew a thing or two about from personal experience. Even teachers often seemed not to realize just how much kids could comprehend. He remembered an instance in middle school when one of the girls in his class had asked the elderly teacher about why her parents weren't living together anymore. The teacher didn't even know how to approach that question, much less answer it, but during recess, a group of kids had gotten together and explained it to the girl. She hadn't been happy about it, and maybe the kids lacked a bit of tact, but the girl ultimately understood the situation just fine.

And so, looking at these kids now, Hector didn't want to lie to them or tell them any half-truths.

"No, I'm not the new leader of the Rainlords," said Hector plainly.

There came a second chorus of murmurs, but Hector wasn't done.

"It's a trick we're playing," said Hector. "And you're all in on it. You guys know that you're staying here in secret, right?"

"Yeah," a couple kids said, while several others nodded.

"Well," Hector went on, "we want certain other people to believe that I... well, that I'm a really dangerous guy. That way, they'll be less inclined to come after you. So it's important that you guys are in on the trick, too. It's something we all have to do together."

There was a brief intermission of silence, and then the kid with the bowl cut asked, "What if they come after us, anyway?"

Okay. Maybe now was a moment to lie--or at least, a moment to feign confidence. "If that happens... then we'll fight them. And they'll realize what a mistake they made."

There was briefly more silence.

"But still," added Hector, "it's always better to avoid unnecessary fights. We're talking about the lives of you and your parents, your siblings and cousins. That's important. You guys understand that, right?"

"Y-yeah..."

"Of course we do..."

"Good," said Hector firmly. "Because the goal of this trick is to make sure... that what happened at Dunehall doesn't happen here. Understand?"

"Yeah," said a few kids in unison.

"Good," repeated Hector. "It's important that you guys take this stuff seriously. But I bet you knew that already, huh? Because you're Rainlords, right?"

"Duh!"

"Yeah!"

"That's right!"

"I'm still confused, though," said a girl with a ponytail. "So are you a really dangerous guy or not?"

Eesh. Now there was a difficult question, Hector felt.

'Ask her her name first,' said Garovel.

"Ah... what's your name?" said Hector.

"Maria..."

"Maria what?" said Hector.

"Maria Blackburn," she said."

"1763 -- CLXXXVII.

'Tell her you're not dangerous to any of them,' said Garovel. 'And use her name.'

Aw, shit, that was a pretty tall order. "Ah... well... Maria... as far as you guys are concerned, I'm not dangerous at all..."

"Yeah, but how many bad guys could you beat up at once?"

"I heard Lord Dimas beat up like fifty, one time!"

"Could you beat up Lord Dimas?!"

Oh shit. Hector held his hands up but also couldn't help laughing a little. "Alright, that's enough. I already answered enough of your questions. If you want to ask a bunch of new ones, you'll have to find the knight again."

"Aw, c'mon! Don't be so stingy!"

Hector considered hiding the next figurine so well that they would never be able to find it. He also wondered if this game was getting a little too intense.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Seven: 'Temper thine ambition...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Her office in the Book Tower was more spacious than she needed, quite frankly, but with all these new guests running around and knowing what she did of her young Lord Goffe, Amelia Carthrace had a dreadful and exciting feeling that she might actually have need of all this space, someday.

When the Queen had offered her this position, Amelia had not been able to tell if it had been offered out of pity or punishment or something else entirely. Working for the most infamous teenager in the nation? It was hardly a job that anyone was pining for.

But now, with the economy the way it was, she could think of several, very high profile financiers who would have killed to be in her shoes--especially because some of those people were currently out of a job.

With so many banks folding up so suddenly, there was a profound surplus of financial talent out there, just waiting to be scooped up. The problem was, of course, that there was almost no one in Atreya who could scoop them up. Which meant they would not be staying in Atreya for much longer. They would have to act soon, lest the cream of their nation's crop would head off to Intar or Steccat or Vantalay, maybe. And if they really did leave, then, well...

Then Atreya would see a real financial crisis.

To say that she was antsy about this meeting with Hector today would have been an understatement. Truthfully, she had wanted to talk to him the very second he had gotten back, but for something like this, she knew she couldn't come off as too eager or pushy. In all likelihood, the young lord wouldn't understand what an incredible opportunity this was and would therefore probably be rather off-put by too much enthusiasm for the situation. Millions of people were going bankrupt, after all.

And besides, such behavior was unbecoming of a woman her age. She had to maintain her dignity, if nothing else."

"1763 -- CLXXXVII.

'Tell her you're not dangerous to any of them,' said Garovel. 'And use her name.'

Aw, shit, that was a pretty tall order. "Ah... well... Maria... as far as you guys are concerned, I'm not dangerous at all..."

"Yeah, but how many bad guys could you beat up at once?"

"I heard Lord Dimas beat up like fifty, one time!"

"Could you beat up Lord Dimas?!"

Oh shit. Hector held his hands up but also couldn't help laughing a little. "Alright, that's enough. I already answered enough of your questions. If you want to ask a bunch of new ones, you'll have to find the knight again."

"Aw, c'mon! Don't be so stingy!"

Hector considered hiding the next figurine so well that they would never be able to find it. He also wondered if this game was getting a little too intense.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Her office in the Book Tower was more spacious than she needed, quite frankly, but with all these new guests running around and knowing what she did of her young Lord Goffe, Amelia Carthrace had a dreadful and exciting feeling that she might actually have need of all this space, someday.

When the Queen had offered her this position, Amelia had not been able to tell if it had been offered out of pity or punishment or something else entirely. Working for the most infamous teenager in the nation? It was hardly a job that anyone was pining for.

But now, with the economy the way it was, she could think of several, very high profile financiers who would have killed to be in her shoes-- especially because some of those people were currently out of a job.

With so many banks folding up so suddenly, there was a profound surplus of financial talent out there, just waiting to be scooped up. The problem was, of course, that there was almost no one in Atreya who could scoop them up. Which meant they would not be staying in Atreya for much longer. They would have to act soon, lest the cream of their nation's crop would head off to Intar or Steccat or Vantalay, maybe. And if they really did leave, then, well...

Then Atreya would see a real financial crisis.

To say that she was antsy about this meeting with Hector today would have been an understatement. Truthfully, she had wanted to talk to him the very second he had gotten back, but for something like this, she knew she couldn't come off as too eager or pushy. In all likelihood, the young lord wouldn't understand what an incredible opportunity this was and would therefore probably be rather off-put by too much enthusiasm for the situation. Millions of people were going bankrupt, after all.

And besides, such behavior was unbecoming of a woman her age. She had to maintain her dignity, if nothing else."

Still, never would she have expected to feel so excited about working with money again. After thirty grueling years in the business, working for banks, an insurance agency, an accounting firm, a hedge fund, and even the Lord High Treasurer himself, she'd thought that she had lost all taste for this sort of thing. And this job wasn't even supposed to be like any of those. She had only been supposed to help the young lord manage his assets and hopefully grow them.

What a curious world it was, that all of this would fall into her lap now, seven years after her supposed retirement.

No doubt, if things went even remotely as she expected them to, her family would come knocking on her door in the very near future. There may have been no love lost between her and them, but money? They weren't ones to abide losses like that.

She planned to have insulation in place for the young lord by then, though. Hell, she would be insulation, if he needed her to. There was absolutely no way that she was going to sit by and let them sink their claws into him.

Ah, but she was getting ahead of herself. The present problems were still far from dealt with, she knew, and her hand stopped in the middle of signing a document as she realized that she'd allowed her mind to wander so much that she'd hardly even bothered to read the damn thing first.

True, it was just a simple shipment order for white Lysten marble, but still, it was a bad habit to get into--and one that had cost her dearly in the past.

"Anything you put your name to, you read," her mentor had once told her. "If you don't have time to read it, you shouldn't be signing it. You should be hiring someone else to read it, sign it, and take the blame if it goes badly, instead."

A shrewd bastard--that had been Henry Vollier in a nutshell, though she certainly knew that there had been more to him than what most people ever got to see. Even to this day, she had never met anyone who could be so heartless in one breath and yet so generous in the next.

Her affair with him may have been what caused so much strife between the Carthraces and the Volliers, but she'd long since stopped regretting it. He may have been almost thirty years older than her, but she'd loved him more deeply and truly than anyone else in her life, and he deserved better than that bitter shell-of-a-woman he'd been forced to marry. That callous witch hadn't even been there on his deathbed.

For a while after that, she truly would not have minded if both of their families had ended up in ruins. If not for some of those wonderful nieces and nephews, the brightness and hope of the future, she might never have returned from that place of resentment in her heart."

"1765

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

It was a shame that that brightness had not lasted. Instead, it had merely transferred to the next generation of children. As it probably would again, she'd often thought.

When the knock on her door arrived, she stopped reading. "Come in."

Hector entered, and Amelia set her pen down.

Wow. What a difference one month made. Had he gotten taller? Probably. The vitality of young people still amazed her, sometimes. Those clothes certainly made an impact, too. He hadn't been wearing things like that very much before, probably because the boy had so frequently been assisting with the reconstruction effort. No sense in dressing up for manual labor.

It must have been the effect of these Rainlords on him, she figured. Either he was imitating their behavior, or he simply wanted to look dignified in their presence. Or both, perhaps.

She certainly knew what that was like.

"It is good to finally see you again," said Amelia.

"Thanks," said Hector as he took a seat on the other side of her desk. "It's, uh, it's good to see you, too."

A part of her wanted to just launch into her proposal straight away, but again, she controlled herself. It wouldn't do to overwhelm the young man. She had to work up to it slowly and clearly if she wanted to get his approval.

He may have been young, but that didn't mean he was going to do whatever she told him. Meek and mild as he may act, she did not think that he had earned his reputation as the Darksteel Soldier by accident. And she'd spoken to Prince David about this boy, too. This was not someone she should treat like a child, she felt.

"Are you sure you have rested enough?" she made herself say. "I heard that you looked rather exhausted upon your arrival."

"I'm still pretty tired, but I'll catch up on sleep later," said Hector. "I wanted to ask... ah... how have things been going while I was gone?"

"Here at Warrenhold? Fairly well, I suppose. The reconstruction has been progressing, albeit slowly. If you are asking about the country as a whole, however, well..."

"I heard about the, er, economic crisis or whatever..."

"Y-yes." Amelia straightened in her chair. Was it too soon to go into it? She wasn't quite sure. "Truthfully... I was hoping to talk to you about that."

Hector tilted his head at her. "Why's that? Do you think there's something we can do to help?"

Oh, sweet Cocora.

Calm. She had to look calm.

"Yes," she said slowly, "I believe there is. However... perhaps you would like to table that discussion for the moment and talk about your Rainlord friends or... some such thing?"

"...Why?" said Hector. "Does the order matter?"

"Ah... w-well..." Agh. This wasn't going how she expected. It was too fast. She dared not hope that it might actually be going better than she expected."

"1766

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

"Is something wrong?" said Hector.

"N-no," she said, taking a breath. If she kept this up, he was going to get the completely wrong impression. "Very well. Allow me to speak quite plainly with you. The current economic crisis, terrible though it may be, presents us--presents you, I should say--with an opportunity. And a rather remarkable one, at that."

"...Okay," said Hector slowly, keeping his eyes fixed upon her. "I'm listening."

"With both Atreya National and Longrun collapsing, virtually everyone who worked for them is now out of a job."

"You're... talking about banks?" said Hector.

"Yes. Atreya National Bank and Longrun Banking. With them suddenly out of the picture, you could say that there is quite a large gap in the market. People need their funds protected. And now that there is an absolutely ungodly amount of insoluble debt floating around this country, what will happen now is--"

"Ah, uh, sorry, you're kinda losing me here," said Hector. "In... insoluble debt? What does that mean, exactly?"

"Debt that cannot be repaid. More than a million people have just declared bankruptcy in this country, because they no longer have access to any of their funds due to the banks collapsing, because the banks are the very institutions which are supposed to secure these things for them. This means that any debt that these people previously owed is now insoluble. There is essentially no hope of it ever being paid back. Understand?"

"I think so, yeah..."

"So what will probably happen now," Amelia went on, "is that someone with a LOT of money will come in and buy up all of that insoluble debt at a fraction of the cost, because it is functionally worthless now. And then, since they now 'own' the debt, they can 'forgive' it or otherwise shrink it down to a 'soluble' level--and then try to collect it. Or they could simply resell the debt elsewhere, but the fact of the matter is that because they didn't spend very much money to acquire it, that debt has the potential to earn them an absolute killing. Financially speaking, of course."

"Hmm..."

Amelia placed her hands on the table. "Now, this may all sound horrible, and... well... in a way, it is, but it is also mostly good. In the end, it will probably prevent Atreya's economy from collapsing completely. Almost everyone who declared bankruptcy will have a way to move forward without having their entire lives ruined. For the most part."

"But?" said the young lord, apparently sensing where she was going with this.

"But... a very large problem could arise, based on who it is that buys up all of that debt. Atreya is quite a small country, so in all likelihood, it is going to be a foreign bank. Domestic banks are no doubt attempting to get in on the action as we speak, but they simply won't have the funds to spare. Tens of thousands of people--if not hundreds of thousands of people--have already been flocking to them simply to avoid bankruptcy, and in order to accommodate all of those new customers, most of their reserve funds--assuming they even had that much to begin with--will likely now be in active circulation."

"Uh... huh."

"1767

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

"Of course," Amelia continued, "the domestic banks could use money which they do not technically own in order to start buying up the debt, but that would be incredibly ill-advised--and indeed, illegal. For good reason, might I add. Such practices are extremely dangerous and could potentially make matters significantly worse than they already are.

"However, I am digressing. The point is that domestic banks will, in all likelihood, simply be unable to 'pick up the slack,' so to speak, which means that foreign banks will. Either them, or foreign companies which specialize in this sort of thing. Regardless, the reason this is bad is because it presents an extreme threat to the economic independence of the nation. Foreign powers would likely be able to develop more influence over our country than even the Queen herself possesses."

"Ah..."

"She understands this as well, because I--and no doubt others--have advised her on it. But the Queen is also in a very difficult position right now. In order to prevent this from coming to pass, she has to hold back the tide of foreign influence with very little support from the people. As I said before, this debt buyout can be considered mostly good. All of the currently bankrupt citizens of Atreya will want that foreign influence. And justifiably so."

"O-okay," said Hector, holding up a hand. "This is all... really complicated, and I think I understand, but, uh... I mean... what do you want me to do about it? Are you seriously suggesting that I buy up all the debt? Because, er...?"

"Well... yes and no," said Amelia. "Frankly speaking, you don't have enough money for that. Even your billionaire friend, Roman Fullister, doesn't have enough money--though, that is mostly because his assets are tied up in about a million different ways."

“Whoa, how do you know that?”

She couldn't help smiling a little. “Money is my life, Lord Goffe. And I have made many like-minded friends over the course of it.”

Hector didn't look entirely satisfied by that answer, but he didn't press her further on it. Instead, he returned to his previous question. “So... if I can't buy the debt, then what are you asking of me?”

It was time to lay all her cards on the table, she supposed. “I feel that there is still considerably more that I should explain, but... if you would like to cut right to the heart of the matter first, then, well... put simply, I would like to open a bank in your name.”

Hector just sat there for a moment, blinking at her. He opened his mouth but no words came out. Then he leaned back in his chair, folded his arms, and took a long, deep breath.

Huh.

That was not quite the reaction that she had been expecting. Though, if she thought about it, she wasn't entirely sure what a more appropriate response would have been.”

"1768

Hector's gaze went to the empty space to his right. Talking to his invisible companion, Amelia supposed. She couldn't say that she fully understood this business about reapers, and if she was being completely honest, a small part of her still worried that it might just be some form of psychosis that the boy was suffering from. That explanation might've even made sense, as a terrible side effect of his supernatural powers.

But of course, she'd never dared say any of that aloud. Strange as it was, this “Garovel” being real or not was almost a moot point, as far as Amelia was concerned. The reaper was obviously real to Hector.

And that was the main reason why she had been so concerned about this meeting. If she couldn't get this Garovel's approval, then she doubted she would be able to get Hector's.

“So let me make sure I've got this right,” Hector finally said. “You want to open a bank in my name. Not a bank account. A bank.”

“Yes,” said Amelia.

Hector just gave her a look like she was crazy.

"I understand that is... a highly unconventional proposition," said Amelia, "and probably not one that you expected to hear when you walked into this office, but I assure you, I am not recommending it impulsively. I have given the matter considerable thought."

"Then... I assume you've thought about how we're going to fund this? The Queen only gave us three million to work with, and you're talking about starting a bank that would be big enough to rescue the whole country. Garovel doesn't think that three million will be nearly enough for that."

"Indeed, it is true that this would be a very costly endeavor. Currently, you have around 1.2 million troa at your disposal, and to get the ball rolling on this--"

"Whoa, whoa." Hector held up a hand. "We've already burned through 1.8 million troa? In like, what, four months?"

She nodded. "I am afraid so. However, the vast majority of those expenses fell upon the hydroelectric generator. That alone cost us 1.4 million."

"Holy sh--" Hector stopped himself, perhaps out of consideration for her, which Amelia appreciated. "I... knew it was expensive, but I didn't think it was that much."

"Believe it or not, that was actually quite a good deal," said Amelia. "The amount of power that it generates is rather impressive given that cost." She might've expected the boy to sigh, but he didn't. "We could have negotiated a staggered payment plan over several years, but it would have cost us nearly three times as much in the long run. I thought it would be better to pay it all off at once, since we actually could. The manufacturer's representative was quite surprised by that decision."

"I see..."

"And of course, we also required furniture to even begin living here, so much of that lost capital was due to one-time purchases, if that makes you feel any better. Renovations moving forward should be a considerably slower drain on your funds."

"1769

"That's... good to hear," said Hector, "but the renovations aren't even halfway through the Entry Tower yet."

"Yes, and that is another reason why I believe this bank is a good idea. With our current resources, renovating all eight towers properly is impossible, much less building new ones on the surface and attending to the sunken structures in the lake. A bank, however, would provide us with a valuable source of income."

Hector fell quiet for a moment again, obviously thinking. Then he looked at her. "I interrupted you. What were you going to say about getting the ball rolling?"

"Ah. Yes. In order to get started on this bank, we will require considerably more capital than we currently possess. I could go into excruciating detail, but the short of it is that we will need a loan."

"A loan?" said Hector. "You mean, like, from another bank? Wouldn't they be opposed to the idea of, uh, funding their rivals or something?"

"Indeed. Which is why the loan would have to come from somewhere else."

"You have somewhere in mind?"

"I would recommend multiple sources, actually," she said. "In the event that one of them turns us down or ends up having difficulties of their own in the future, it would be best if we did not have all of our eggs in one basket, as they say."

"Okay... but what sources are you thinking of?"

She almost didn't want to say. "The government would be one."

"...You want me to ask the Queen for even more money?" said Hector.

"Well... yes. It could not hurt to ask at least, no?"

Hector rubbed his face with both hands. Amelia was beginning to see that tiredness he mentioned earlier.

"I admit, it may be a bad idea to take more money from the government. No doubt, they have dire need of it, at the moment. Assuming they even have any left to lend. However, the point remains that you would be working to help them resolve the current economic crisis, and I imagine the Queen would be interested in helping you to speed your work along.”

Hector put his hands down again. “...Hold on. You just said, ‘assuming they even have any money left?’ Why wouldn’t they have any money left?”

“Ah, well... because there are some rather unsavory rumors about, regarding the true cause of this crisis. Some are saying that the government’s coffers are empty, and so the entire reason Atreya National and Longrun collapsed first was because they were so deeply connected with the state treasury.”

Hector’s brow lowered. “You’re saying the Queen’s broke?”

“I am only saying what I have heard. But such rumors, even if they are untrue, are terrible for business.”

“Wouldn’t something like that already be all over the news if it were true?”

“Perhaps. Or perhaps the Queen believes that such news would be so damaging to the nation that she has been suppressing it.””

”1770

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

“Hmm,” said Hector. “But you’re, like, an insider or something, right? Do you really think she’d be able to keep that kind of gigantic news from even people like you?”

Amelia bobbed her head to the side a little. “No, I do not. Eventually, we will find out, but for the time being, there remains quite a bit of chatter regarding the subject, and different people are offering conflicting information. I imagine for the next month or two, it will continue to be difficult to discern the genuine truth of the matter.”

Her young lord’s gaze went to the floor, then back to the empty air beside him.

Amelia just waited, and when Hector looked at her again, she braced herself for his next question.

“...How much money do we need to get from this loan, exactly?” he said.

Now there was a question that he would probably not like the answer to, Amelia felt. She tried to give him a smile, though it probably came across as more pitying than encouraging. “There are various methods for starting, but if we are to begin here, on domestic soil, then we will require seven million troa as the barest minimum.”

Hector’s mouth hung open as he looked at her.

Unfortunately, she was still far from done. “And when I say ‘barest minimum,’ I do mean that. Barring some sort of royal decree or other government action, proof that we possess seven million troa is required before we may even be legally recognized as a bank. There are several other qualifying factors, of course, but that is the big one, you might say.”

“So... you’re saying seven million isn’t even enough. Because we need more than just the barest minimum, right?”

“Indeed. Seven million would allow us to get started, so if that is all we are able to acquire, then at least we would be able to do something, but the difficult truth, in my estimation, is that we would require a loan in the neighborhood of... one hundred million troa.”

Hector’s hand slowly found his forehead, and he stared blankly at Amelia’s rosewood desk. “A hundred million...”

Amelia had no words of comfort for him. “And even that would only make for a good start. It would still be far from enough to resolve the economic crisis overnight, in case that was what you were thinking.”

Hector took some more time to gather his thoughts and perhaps consult his imaginary friend another time. “Somehow,” he eventually said with a sigh, “I don’t think the Queen is going to lend me a hundred million troa.”

“Yes, I do not think she will, either,” said Amelia. “However, we do not necessarily need her to. There are many other members of the aristocracy whom we could call upon. And there is your friend Mr. Fullister, of course. I have high hopes for his assistance. And... the Rainlords, perhaps. I would caution you against accepting too much help from them, however.”

Hector looked at her again. "Why?"

"Our entire purpose in opening this bank is to prevent foreign powers from taking over our country, and, well... to be blunt, the Rainlords are exactly that. A foreign power."

"Hmm."

"1771

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

"I do not mean to say that you should refuse any and all help they may offer," said Amelia, "and I am sure that you understand these people better than I do, but all the same, I am advising caution. If you do decide to enter into any kind of financial negotiations with them, I hope you will include me. Truthfully, I would like to be present for such negotiations with anyone, but them in particular, should the need arise."

Hector just looked at her for a moment longer, perhaps thinking on her words, and then he said, "...Of course."

The tone of that response was a bit more reserved than Amelia might have preferred, but such was the nature of her young lord, she'd come to realize. Bright-eyed reassurance and enthusiasm was not something she should ever expect from him, she supposed.

"...There's something else I'm wondering about," said Hector. "With all this... stuff about needing a loan... I mean... why me?"

Amelia tilted her head at him. "I am sorry. I am not certain I understand. Why you?"

Hector stood up and walked over to the side of the room while rubbing his neck. "It's just... if I don't even have the money to pull this off in the first place, then why don't we just let someone else do it?"

"You do not wish to save the country?" said Amelia.

Hector gave her a flat look. "Obviously, I do. I'm just saying, wouldn't it be better to leave it to someone more suited to the task? Someone like... my friend you already mentioned? Mr. Fullister? Just as one example."

Amelia frowned. "And the potential here to make an enormous amount of money and restore Warrenhold to its former glory? You do not find that motivating?"

"...Would it really be like that?" said Hector. "Because this bank sounds like a lot of responsibility and headaches. And I have enough of those, already. Besides, there are other ways we can make money, aren't there?"

Amelia took a breath and leaned back in her chair. She'd thought that she had already convinced him that this was a good idea. It seemed fairly self-evident, but now it appeared as though he wasn't going to be swayed by appeals to future prosperity or self-interest.

Which was very strange.

No doubt, he had many other things on his mind. She supposed it was understandable that he wouldn't want yet another. But there was something he wasn't seeing, and it seemed as though she would have to be the one to explain it to him.

"It has to be you," she said, interlocking her fingers and resting them on her lap. "I can tell you now that, yes, several other people in this country will likely attempt this very same tactic. However, I earnestly believe that you are the only one who might be able to pull it off before foreign intervention squirms its way around the Queen's regulations."

"Why?"

"Because you are a national hero. Most of Atreya adores the Darksteel Soldier. And yes, some still do not, but everyone at least knows who you are. Aside from perhaps the Queen herself, you have better brand recognition than anyone else in this country."

"I have better what?"

"1772

"Brand recognition," she reiterated. "People know who you are. They trust you. If we put the word Darksteel in the name of your bank, people will instantly associate it with you and everything that you have done. And that is very good. That is why I think this will work."

Hector made no response. His gaze went to the floor again, and he paced toward the other side of the room now.

“It is safe to say that the Atreyan people have very little faith in banks, at the moment, so the trust that the public has in you will be absolutely crucial for this plan to succeed. Your friend Mr. Fullister, who I am sure is a wonderful man, would simply not be able to make up for that difference in public trust, regardless of how much money he may possess.”

Hector stopped pacing and just looked at her again.

“It has to be you, Lord Goffe,” she said.

Hector did not look pleased to hear that, but if he had any complaints, he kept them to himself. He returned to his chair and sat down.

Amelia didn’t know what else she could say to convince him, however, so she merely waited.

“...Alright,” he finally said. “Let’s just... let’s suppose all of this works out. Hypothetically. Everything goes smoothly or whatever.” He leveled a stare at her. “If that were to happen, and this bank were to become as big and important as you’re suggesting, then... you would have a lot more power and influence, wouldn’t you?”

Amelia’s head reared back a little, and she blinked.

Hector’s gaze didn’t budge, though. He was watching her carefully, probably wanting to gauge her reaction.

Amelia fidgeted in her seat, abruptly uncomfortable. “Yes... I suppose I would...”

“Convince me you wouldn’t abuse that power,” he said plainly.

Oh, goodness. She hadn’t felt like this since she was a schoolgirl on the verge of being given detention, some fifty years ago.

How was he doing that?

No time to think about it. She just maintained her composure. “How would you suggest I go about doing that?”

“I don’t know,” said Hector. “You seem to be pretty persuasive, though.”

She managed a weak smile. "I appreciate the compliment, assuming it was one."

"It was," said Hector. "And... look, I'm grateful for everything you've been doing here. For me. And I think... it's fairly obvious at this point that I... value your opinion. And I definitely want to trust you. But the simple truth is that you and I still barely know each other."

"You are not wrong," she said. "But I do not know how I can convince you to trust me. I doubt words alone will suffice for an undertaking of this magnitude, no? Trusting me with your own money isn't quite the same as trusting me with everyone's money, is it?"

"No, it is not," was all Hector said."

"1773

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Amelia tried to think. Honestly, she hadn't given much thought to the issue of how to earn the young lord's trust. Mostly because she'd thought that she'd already had it.

And perhaps that was strange. Why had she thought that? She was having difficulty thinking of the reason, but there must have been one. She couldn't have been so naive as to overlook something like that, right?

What an odd thing to be asking herself. Where was her head, right now?

Ah. There was a reason, she realized.

"The Queen," said Amelia. "If you are finding yourself uncertain with regard to trusting me, then perhaps you should ask those who know me better for a character reference. And I can think of none more appropriate than the Queen, considering she was the one who offered me this position in the first place. Have you spoken to her yet?"

"Not since getting back, no," said Hector.

"Perfect, then. I imagine she will be wanting to hear from you, if for no other reason than to know that you have returned safely. Perhaps you can take that opportunity to ask about me."

Hector was quiet again.

Hmm. Perhaps her young lord had already been planning to do that.

“...I’d like to meet your family,” said Hector.

Amelia pressed her lips together flatly as she thought about that. “If we move forward with the bank, then I am sure that they will like to meet you, too.”

“I mean before that.”

“Yes, I thought you did. And perhaps that would be for the best. Meeting them before we give them every reason in the world to ingratiate themselves toward you might give you a clearer picture of their true characters.”

The young lord looked abruptly remorseful. “...I don’t mean to reopen old wounds or anything like that. I just need to know more about you before we commit to... all of this.”

“I understand,” said Amelia. “Caution is an admirable quality in a lord. And I have nothing to hide, though you should be forewarned that my family is not likely to speak very fondly of me.”

“Yeah, I figured they wouldn’t,” said Hector. “I remember you calling yourself a black sheep.”

“Ah. Well, I shall attempt to arrange a meeting, but in the meantime, might I have your permission to begin preliminary hiring proceedings?”

“...What does that mean, exactly?”

“With the banks collapsing, there are a number of highly skilled individuals who are now looking for a new job--so skilled, in fact, that I imagine some of them have already found one. The rest will likely not remain unemployed for long, so I would like to, at the very least, send them... an expression of our interest, let’s say. Hopefully, that will give them a reason to stay in the country while you and I... figure things out.””

"1774 -- CLXXXVIII.

"You think they'll leave Atreya?" said Hector.

"They will go wherever opportunity leads them," said Amelia. "And Atreya is rather short on opportunity at the moment, so yes, I think they will have their pick of the many foreign companies that are no doubt observing the economic situation here."

"...Who are these 'skilled individuals' you're talking about?"

"Various people whom I have come to know and respect over the years. Some of them, I do not know personally, but I do know of their work and of their professionalism. I could go over each and every one of them with you right now, but there are quite a few, and I imagine you probably have more important things to do."

"...Alright. I'll leave it to your, ah... discretion." He looked like he had more to say, however.

Amelia waited.

"...I'd like to meet these people, too," said Hector. "Before you hire them."

She smiled, then nodded. "Of course."

Perhaps she didn't have to worry so much about her family sinking their claws into this boy, after all.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Eight: 'O, convalescing companions...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The meeting lasted a while longer after that. They discussed the restoration of Warrenhold in a bit more detail, and Madame Carthrace also told him about some of the local happenings around Gray Rock. Apparently, there had been a spike in crime during his absence--perhaps even because of his absence--and a number of prominent figures around the city had been trying to get in touch with him, the mayor of Gray Rock being among them.

Hector had no idea why the mayor would want to talk to him, and he almost didn't want to find out. Madame Carthrace and Garovel both seemed to think it was probably just a formal greeting-type-thing, but Hector didn't know if he believed that.

There was also the matter of the Rainlords. Hector asked her about how she had been handling all of them, and she rather bluntly told him that she hadn't been. For the most part, they were taking care of and keeping to themselves. Each time she'd talked to them, they had apparently been both extremely polite and very reluctant to accept aid without reimbursement.

After he heard that, Hector figured he should probably go talk to each of the families himself and concluded his meeting with Madame Carthrace. It wasn't a long walk to the outside of the Book Tower, since the office had been on the bottom floor.

'That is one sharp woman,' said Garovel privately as they made their way back toward the Tower of Night. 'If she's as trustworthy as she seems, then we're lucky to have her.'

Hector couldn't help but agree.

The gaggle of children from earlier caught up to him before he could reach the Tower of Night, and when they presented the knight figurine to him again, he was forced to answer more impossible questions like how strong he was or if he thought he could beat Dimas in a fight."
"1774 -- CLXXXVIII.

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

"You think they'll leave Atreya?" said Hector.

"They will go wherever opportunity leads them," said Amelia. "And Atreya is rather short on opportunity at the moment, so yes, I think they will have their pick of the many foreign companies that are no doubt observing the economic situation here."

"...Who are these 'skilled individuals' you're talking about?"

"Various people whom I have come to know and respect over the years. Some of them, I do not know personally, but I do know of their work and of their professionalism. I could go over each and every one of them with you right now, but there are quite a few, and I imagine you probably have more important things to do."

“...Alright. I’ll leave it to your, ah... discretion.” He looked like he had more to say, however.

Amelia waited.

“...I’d like to meet these people, too,” said Hector. “Before you hire them.”

She smiled, then nodded. “Of course.”

Perhaps she didn’t have to worry so much about her family sinking their claws into this boy, after all.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Eight: ‘O, convalescing companions...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The meeting lasted a while longer after that. They discussed the restoration of Warrenhold in a bit more detail, and Madame Carthrace also told him about some of the local happenings around Gray Rock. Apparently, there had been a spike in crime during his absence--perhaps even because of his absence--and a number of prominent figures around the city had been trying to get in touch with him, the mayor of Gray Rock being among them.

Hector had no idea why the mayor would want to talk to him, and he almost didn’t want to find out. Madame Carthrace and Garovel both seemed to think it was probably just a formal greeting-type-thing, but Hector didn’t know if he believed that.

There was also the matter of the Rainlords. Hector asked her about how she had been handling all of them, and she rather bluntly told him that she hadn’t been. For the most part, they were taking care of and keeping to themselves. Each time she’d talked to them, they had apparently been both extremely polite and very reluctant to accept aid without reimbursement.

After he heard that, Hector figured he should probably go talk to each of the families himself and concluded his meeting with Madame Carthrace. It wasn’t a long walk to the outside of the Book Tower, since the office had been on the bottom floor.

‘That is one sharp woman,’ said Garovel privately as they made their way back toward the Tower of Night. ‘If she’s as trustworthy as she seems, then we're lucky to have her.'

Hector couldn't help but agree.

The gaggle of children from earlier caught up to him before he could reach the Tower of Night, and when they presented the knight figurine to him again, he was forced to answer more impossible questions like how strong he was or if he thought he could beat Dimas in a fight."

"1775

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Garovel advised him to play coy, so he did. He told them that questions about strength were important secrets that he couldn't divulge.

Half the kids lost interest when he told them that and wandered off, but the other half stayed and asked him other, more innocuous questions, like about his favorite food or color or animal.

Somehow, those proved even more difficult to answer.

He lost the interest of the rest of the kids soon thereafter. It felt like most of his confidence and self-worth left with them, as well.

However, his mood improved again after he entered the Tower of Night and found the Najirs there, having breakfast. It was the first time he'd seen them all together. Asad, his wife, sister, daughter, and son. Hector remembered Imas and Jada, but the wife's and son's names were escaping him.

Wait a minute. They were having breakfast?

'Garovel, what time is it?' asked Hector.

The reaper shrugged.

Hector supposed it didn't matter much. Not having any daylight to go by was just one of the challenges of living in a giant hole in the ground.

He made his way over to the Sandlord family, who'd already taken notice of him.

They looked a bit tense, however. Perhaps because he and Garovel were watching them?

Asad spoke up first after finishing whatever he was chewing. "Hector. It is good to see you. Allow me to introduce my wife, Samira, and my son, Midhat."

"We have already met," said Samira. "Briefly."

"Yeah," said Hector with a nod. "Hello again."

'No introductions for us?' said the reaper hovering behind Midhat.

"That is Ekkos," said Asad, "my son's reaper. Samira's is Lemirat."

'Good to meet you both. I'm Garovel.'

'Yes, we have been hearing quite a bit about you and your servant,' said Lemirat. 'This is an interesting home you have here.'

'Yeah, it's a work-in-progress,' said Garovel. 'You're welcome to stay as long as you like, though we won't be offended if you find the place a bit uncomfortable.'

'More fortress than resort,' said Lemirat. 'I cannot say it bothers me, personally. I generally find the sturdiness of fortresses more pleasant.'

"I do not," said Samira with an obvious tinge of irritation. "And it would appear we have made the trip here for no reason, as well."

Asad gave his wife a look. "Samira."

She saw his face, looked toward Hector and Garovel, then turned away.

Uncomfortable silence arrived.

Garovel was the one to break it. 'You're right, Lady Najir. I must apologize. I was the one who requested that Asad send someone here ahead of us. I didn't foresee how strange our travels in the Undercrust would become. It's not everyday you get teleported back to your home country, you know. It was quite the surprise.'

The woman looked between Hector and Garovel again. "Yes, well... it is good that you returned safely. I have never been, but I have heard many tales of the perils in the Undercrust."

‘Oh, indeed,’ said Garovel. ‘And I’m afraid it was also my idea to venture down there. I must apologize again for putting your family in harm’s way.’

“Nonsense,” said Asad. “We chose to go with you of our own volition. Why, I even said--”

‘Yes, but you chose to do that because you are so fiercely kind,’ said Garovel. ‘I fear that perhaps Hector and I have taken advantage of that kindness, in some ways.’

Asad merely frowned and exchanged glances with his wife.

‘If you are ever in need of our help, I hope you will allow us the opportunity to repay you for that kindness,’ said Garovel. ‘For the moment, however, we’ll leave you in peace. Hector and I have several pressing matters we must attend to. Good day, all.’

Hector followed the reaper’s lead, and they left the robed family alone. Hector had hoped to talk to Asad more about various things like Rasalased and materialization training, but he supposed there was no rush.

Hector also wanted to ask Garovel if he knew something about the Najirs that he hadn’t mentioned yet, but there wasn’t time. Before Hector even finished climbing the stairs up to the second floor, he encountered Horatio Blackburn.

‘Ah,’ said Garovel. ‘Just the man we were hoping to see. Do you have a few minutes to talk?’

The flat-faced man had been descending the staircase and now began going back up it without turning around. “Is something wrong?” he asked.

‘No, no,’ said Garovel. ‘But we would like to take stock of things. We’re checking up on everyone.’

The man stopped. “You needn’t worry about us.”

‘Well, we do anyway,’ said Garovel. ‘Come on. Let’s find somewhere we can talk in private.’

Horatio looked reluctant, but he acquiesced nonetheless. They found a vacant room near the stairs. It was small and lacking furniture, but it would do. Hector materialized a couple chairs for them while they waited for Horatio's reaper to join them.

When she did, Hector encased the room in iron and empowered it with his soul. Apparently, this would prevent any outside reapers from overhearing what the two reapers in here were saying.

Of course, it also created a vacuum seal in the chamber, limiting the amount of breathable air left in it. That wouldn't be a big problem, but Hector was made to wonder if he would still be able to speak if there was nothing but carbon dioxide left in the room.

Garovel started things off. 'So. How are things?'

Horatio seemed almost reluctant to answer. "Things are... difficult but adequate."

Garovel's next words were private. 'Ask him something.'

'Like what?' said Hector.

'Whatever you want to know.'

Hector had expected a more direct, instructive answer. Maybe Garovel wanted him to think for himself on this. The way a lord probably should.

"...How is the Lady Nere doing?" asked Hector.

Horatio's frown deepened."

"1777

'She has not spoken in several days,' said Horatio's reaper. Her name was Yovess, as Hector recalled.

'Is there anything we can do?' said Garovel. 'Anything you need?'

'Thank you, but I do not think so,' said Yovess.

'Does she need a doctor?'

‘We have one tending to her.’

‘I see.’

“There’s... something you should know,” said Hector. In truth, it was something that he probably should have told the Blackburns a while ago now, but with everything going on, it had somehow slipped his mind. “Ibai is alive.”

Horatio and Yovess both stared at him.

“How do you know that?” said Horatio.

Hmm. How to explain? The only ones he’d told about the Shards and Emiliana were the Najirs and the Elroys. Both of those families were directly involved, so it only made sense that they should know, but he supposed now that the Blackburns had just as much right to know.

So he told Horatio everything. About the Shards. About Rasalased. About being able to communicate with Emiliana. About her telling him that Ibai was with her. And about Gohvis.

Horatio and Yovess didn’t seem so surprised about that last part. They’d already known that Gohvis had chased after them at Dunehall, so it wasn’t much of a stretch to imagine that Gohvis hadn’t allowed them to escape.

The expected question of Ibai’s current location came up, and Hector had to give the disappointing answer that he didn’t know, that Emiliana seemed to be refusing to tell him--likely for everyone’s safety.

Horatio and Yovess fell quiet again.

Hector wondered if that news would help the Lady Nere at all. He hoped so. And he felt bad for not telling the Blackburns about this earlier. He didn’t see much point in telling them that he could have told them earlier, though. That only seemed like it would piss them off.

And justifiably so.

He wondered how he’d forgotten about it all this time. Maybe it was because he barely ever interacted with the Blackburns. They were always sequestered away from the others, never really mingling much. That was no excuse, of course, but Hector supposed it made a degree of sense, at least.

He had to be more attentive in the future, he felt. These people were hurting. Any support he could provide would be well worth the effort, but it seemed like they didn't want to ask for help at all.

It seemed that way with all the Rainlords, really. Maybe it was a pride thing.

'We spoke to Madame Carthrace about you and the other Rainlords,' said Garovel. 'She mentioned that you insisted on reimbursing us for everything while you're here.'

"That's right," said Horatio.

'While we appreciate that, it isn't necessary in the slightest,' said Garovel.

"Yes, it is," said Horatio, more strongly now. "We do not intend to be a burden."

'If we were concerned about things like that, we never would've invited you back to Warrenhold in the first place,' said Garovel.

"All the same," said Horatio, "it is a matter of honor. And we take such things very seriously."

'So we've noticed,' said Garovel."
"1778

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

"If it's just about not wanting to be in our debt," said Hector, "then there are other ways you could pay us back. I mean, money is nice and all, but, er..."

'It would be kind of a hassle to exchange all of your Sairi escaltos for our Atreyan troas,' said Garovel, 'especially because we'd have to come up with an official excuse for why we suddenly have a steady influx of foreign currency.'

"I... see," said Horatio.

'Plus, Hector here made a fairly large impression on the locals in Moaban, so it probably wouldn't be too difficult for someone to find out that he was in Sair while the country was in turmoil. We really shouldn't be giving anyone more dots to connect beyond that.'

'Your reasoning is sound,' said Yovess, 'but are you really suggesting that we simply stay for free? That is not something that we as Rainlords can abide, and I know that all of our kin will feel similarly.'

"Ah--like I said, if it's just about not wanting to be in our debt, then there are other ways you could help us."

'Such as?'

"Well, er--you're kinda doing it already, aren't you? It seems like a few of you guys have, uh... have taken a bit of... initiative with helping restore Warrenhold."

'Ah, yes,' said Yovess. 'However, I believe that has more to do with some among us feeling restless, not wanting to remain idle.'

"Even while you're supposed to be resting?" said Hector.

'Yes,' she said plainly.

Horatio looked briefly amused. "And perhaps you are overestimating how much rest we require. Not all of us have had to push ourselves beyond the point of absurdity."

Hector just kind of scratched his chin.

'Still,' said Garovel, 'the point remains that it would be of immense help to have a bunch of superhuman construction workers on the job. If you're willing to accept food, shelter, and our winning smiles as payment, then I think we can agree that you won't be in our debt.'

Horatio and Yovess looked at one another for a time, perhaps deliberating privately.

'Oh, and also,' added Garovel, 'this arrangement might prove useful in keeping up appearances with Leo.'

'You intend to bring him back here?' said Yovess.

"Not anytime soon," said Hector with some confidence, "but... eventually, maybe."

'But it also may not be up to us,' said Garovel. 'There's always a chance that Leo could decide to just drop in on us unannounced. It's not like Warrenhold's location is some great secret.'

Horatio and Yovess looked displeased.

'In such an event, it would be good if it looked like the Rainlords really were working for us.'

"...Some might argue that this is more than merely looking like it," said Horatio, though his expression remained neutral.

Hector met the man's gaze evenly. Somehow, it seemed like it would be disrespectful to look away. Or cowardly, perhaps."

"1779

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

Garovel, however, simply laughed. 'Well, if you'd like to make this a permanent solution, I can't say that Hector and I would mind. And it would certainly make the deception easier if it actually WASN'T a deception, eh?'

Horatio and Yovess did not seem to share his amusement.

But Garovel was not deterred. 'So serious. Fine. If you want to actually hear us say it, then no, we are not trying to trick all of you into working for us--or something. How would that even work, precisely?'

"...I was merely mentioning what I think some will believe," said Horatio. "I did not say that I believed it, myself."

'You must understand,' said Yovess. 'Lord Goffe's recent... accomplishments have left quite an impression on our people, particularly the younger ones. And though we know you are our allies, it is also in our nature to be... cautious.' Her hollow gaze fell upon Garovel. 'Especially when it comes to reapers. We know all too well about how manipulative our kind can be.'

Holy shit, Hector thought. Was this gonna be yet another problem he had to worry about?

Agh...

‘I understand completely,’ said Garovel, sounding less jovial now. ‘And I most definitely do not want there to be any ill feelings between us. I hope that if you are ever beginning to get the impression that Hector and I are trying to manipulate you, then you will give us the benefit of the doubt first and communicate your concerns to us. There are many out there who would like to do us harm, and if we allow a rift to form between us, I fear that will only make it easier for them to succeed.’

‘Heh. You know just what to say, don’t you?’

‘Well, I’ve had lots of practice,’ said Garovel.

Yovess shook her skull and chortled. ‘Very well. We will continue to place our trust in you, for the time being.’

‘Thank you. We’ll do the same.’

‘And in this spirit of trust,’ said Yovess, ‘there is something that we should tell you.’

‘Oh?’

‘We have heard rumblings on this matter already. That is why Horatio said that, just now.’

‘What kind of rumblings?’

“There is a concern that you may have lied to us,” said Horatio.

Hector couldn’t help blinking. “Lied? About what?” Oh shit. Had he lied to them? He didn’t think so, but...

“Regarding your age, specifically,” said the Lord Blackburn.

Hector couldn’t help blinking even more.

“Given your recent track record, some have been worried that you might be... shall we say, significantly older than you claimed to be,” said Horatio.

Wait, what the fuck? They thought he might’ve lied about how young he was? Shouldn’t it have been the opposite?

Yovess continued where her servant left off. ‘A few have expressed concern that you might have been pretending to be weaker than you really are. Acting like you needed a climate suit, for instance. And now, your mother appearing to be relatively young and a non-servant.'

Oh shit, they'd met his mother already? He hadn't even thought about how she must be handling all of these foreign visitors."

"1780 -- CLXXXIX.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

'Now, of course, if you ARE older than you say, you have every reason to keep that information private,' said Yovess, 'so it would not be terribly surprising that you would want to put on an act in front of us, and I don't think any of our kin would hold it against you.'

'This sounds like more than rumblings,' said Garovel. 'It sounds like you believe these things yourself.'

'I don't know if I do,' said Yovess. 'But it would make a degree of sense, I suppose.'

Hector wanted to intervene with a question that he doubted Garovel would ask. "Have you met my mother?"

"Briefly," said Horatio. "She seemed a curt woman."

That was one way of putting it. "But... lemme get this straight. You're saying that you think she might not actually be my mother?"

"Or that she is secretly a servant as well and far older than she appears," said Horatio.

Hector took a breath, unsure of what to make of all this new information.

'I admit,' said Yovess, 'it does seem a bit unlikely that you would go so far as to use your own mother to throw us off, but at the same time, it seems similarly unlikely that you would have fended off Melchor at Marshrock, Ivan at Dunehall, and Leo in Capaporo.'

Hector didn't know where to begin explaining--or if he even could, for that matter. "Uh..."

'Your confusion is understandable,' said Garovel, making Hector wonder what the hell the reaper was about to say. 'The simple truth of the matter, however, is that Hector is significantly more powerful than his age would suggest. And you're right to be thinking that his age is a difficult issue for us. If word were to get out about how young he is in spite of his prowess, unwanted guests would likely come knocking on our door.'

'You are saying he is an astero?' said Yovess.

'An astero?' said Garovel. 'I'm unfamiliar with that term.'

'Ah. Forgive me. It's a old Arman term for exactly what you just described.'

'I see. In that case, yes, I suppose that is what I am saying.'

'Then there is no need to explain further,' said Yovess. 'I understand your dilemma very well. Thank you for trusting us with that information. I imagine you must have been hesitant to do so.'

Hmm.

Hector wasn't sure he followed all of that, but it sounded like it went surprisingly well.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Nine: 'O, ravenous flower...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There were certainly a lot of people around. Surely, there had to be a good man here somewhere. It had been months since her last real relationship. Frankly, she was getting a bit desperate, and she knew it. Going this long without a boyfriend was just ridiculous. At this point, she was prepared to lower her standards quite a bit.

But wow. Maybe she wouldn't have to."
"1780 -- CLXXXIX.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

'Now, of course, if you ARE older than you say, you have every reason to keep that information private,' said Yovess, 'so it would not be terribly surprising that you would want to put on an act in front of us, and I don't think any of our kin would hold it against you.'

'This sounds like more than rumblings,' said Garovel. 'It sounds like you believe these things yourself.'

'I don't know if I do,' said Yovess. 'But it would make a degree of sense, I suppose.'

Hector wanted to intervene with a question that he doubted Garovel would ask. "Have you met my mother?"

"Briefly," said Horatio. "She seemed a curt woman."

That was one way of putting it. "But... lemme get this straight. You're saying that you think she might not actually be my mother?"

"Or that she is secretly a servant as well and far older than she appears," said Horatio.

Hector took a breath, unsure of what to make of all this new information.

'I admit,' said Yovess, 'it does seem a bit unlikely that you would go so far as to use your own mother to throw us off, but at the same time, it seems similarly unlikely that you would have fended off Melchor at Marshrock, Ivan at Dunehall, and Leo in Capaporo.'

Hector didn't know where to begin explaining--or if he even could, for that matter. "Uh..."

'Your confusion is understandable,' said Garovel, making Hector wonder what the hell the reaper was about to say. 'The simple truth of the matter, however, is that Hector is significantly more powerful than his age would suggest. And you're right to be thinking that his age is a difficult issue for us. If word were to get out about how young he is in spite of his prowess, unwanted guests would likely come knocking on our door.'

'You are saying he is an astero?' said Yovess.

'An astero?' said Garovel. 'I'm unfamiliar with that term.'

'Ah. Forgive me. It's a old Arman term for exactly what you just described.'

'I see. In that case, yes, I suppose that is what I am saying.'

‘Then there is no need to explain further,’ said Yovess. ‘I understand your dilemma very well. Thank you for trusting us with that information. I imagine you must have been hesitant to do so.’

Hmm.

Hector wasn’t sure he followed all of that, but it sounded like it went surprisingly well.

Chapter One Hundred Eighty-Nine: ‘O, ravenous flower...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There were certainly a lot of people around. Surely, there had to be a good man here somewhere. It had been months since her last real relationship. Frankly, she was getting a bit desperate, and she knew it. Going this long without a boyfriend was just ridiculous. At this point, she was prepared to lower her standards quite a bit.

But wow. Maybe she wouldn’t have to."
"1781

Just wandering around this underground castle for half an hour or so, she’d already seen scores of men. And not the pampered-looking types that she’d grown accustomed to seeing in Steccat. Sure, they didn’t exactly look like movie stars, but there was a certain... something to them that she had rarely ever seen before, something she was having trouble articulating to herself.

A realness, perhaps? A heaviness in their presence. A sense of importance in the way that they carried themselves. Not self-importance, no. Not smugness. She’d seen that plenty of times before. This was like... an importance of intent.

Men at work.

Yeah. That’s what it was. These were men with missions in mind, with tasks that needed doing.

And, damn, was that hot. She could feel herself getting flustered just being here.

She needed to calm herself down. Madison Reach had never been in this type of environment before, and it was a bit overwhelming to say the least, but it certainly wouldn't be good for her if her potential beau saw her like this, drooling over every eligible bachelor in sight. While she wouldn't necessarily mind a jealous man in the right context, this was not that context--not before a relationship had even begun.

She'd come here with Gina in order to see Roman, but knowing what she now did of Gina's feelings for him, Madison decided not to intrude on their bonding time. Hopefully, Gina would be able to take advantage of the circumstances, but Madison wasn't getting her hopes up. The poor girl seemed a bit repressed when it came to these things.

Warrenhold was a strange place, though. She'd of course been preemptively informed of the "uneasiness" that the castle could cause, but it was still taking some getting used to. But then, maybe she'd be able to find herself a dashing gentleman to help her feel safe again.

She'd taken notice of several candidates already and had been attempting to stealthily learn their names. Eager though she was, she didn't want to overplay her hand. She was still alone in a crowd of strangers, after all.

To that end, however, things were unfortunately not going so well. When she went to the banquet hall in the big dark tower where everyone was conglomerating, not a single one of the hunky guys there bothered to approach. She could see them looking her way, but none of them made any moves.

So what the hell?!

This always worked back in Steccat. She could just go to a night club, sit at the bar, and wait to be approached. Granted, it had led to meeting a lot sleazeballs, but there'd been some nice ones in there, too.

What were they waiting for? Were they intimidated? They didn't look intimidated. If anything, they were kind of glaring at her. Like they were suspicious of her or something. But that couldn't be the case, right? What sense would that make?

What the hell was wrong with these Rainlords?! Argh!"
"1782

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 1 of 12))

She'd heard about them in passing before, but she didn't really know much about their lifestyle or culture. She'd hoped to change that over the course of a conversation with an interesting gentleman, but that was looking less likely by the minute.

Maybe there was something wrong with her, she wondered. Maybe she was dressed inappropriately in their eyes. She wasn't showing any cleavage and barely any thigh, but maybe that didn't matter to them. She seemed to recall hearing something about the Sandlords having an ultra conservative culture, so maybe the Rainlords were the same way?

Dammit. She hadn't been prepared to take the initiative here, and seeing some of the disapproving looks she was getting, now she was no longer sure that she even wanted to.

Maybe it was a bad idea to go off on her own. Maybe it was just the artificial "uneasiness" getting to her. Whatever it was, she was beginning to feel uncomfortable. And undesirable. And depressed.

It wasn't like she was perfect. Maybe they could just see right through her. Maybe they could tell what a phony she was, how insecure she was.

Ugh, and now she was starting to think about her ex, about all those terrible things he'd said about her, about how much truth had been in them.

She'd been trying to quit drinking, but now she really wished this place had some damn alcohol. Why didn't it have any, anyway? Did the Rainlords have something against that, too? Or was it the local lord's fault? Whoever was to blame, she would've liked to give them a piece of her mind, right about now.

"Excuse me," came a distinctly masculine voice from behind her.

That alone was enough to make her perk up and turn. Her breath caught at the sight of the chiseled jawline on the incredibly tall man standing there. She tried to say something, but her words couldn't find her mouth--or even her mind, for that matter.

“What are you doing here?” the towering man said. His expression was noticeably flat and not at all welcoming, but Madison was still too stunned to be bothered by such things.

He was exactly her type. It was like he’d walked right out of her imagination and into reality in order to sweep her off her feet. That was what he was here to do, right? Oh, dear sweet Cocora, please let that be the case.

The man seemed to become mildly impatient, however. “Do you have some business here? Are you a guest?”

“Oh!” she said, finally regaining herself. “Yes! I’m a guest!”

“Of whom?” he asked.

“Ah... G-Gina and Roman? My name is, er--” She caught herself. She was supposed to be in hiding, after all. A part of her wanted this prime specimen of a man to recognize her--maybe even tell her that he was a fan--but it was probably for the best if that didn’t happen. There was still a chance that he would recognize her name, though, so she should take steps to avoid that, she felt.”

"1783

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 2 of 12))

“Your name is...?”

“My name is Madison,” she decided to say. It was a common enough name, she supposed, so long as she omitted the latter part of it. Something about this guy’s face told her that he wouldn’t have any idea who she was even if she did tell him her last name, but it was better to be safe than sorry. She forced herself to smile and held out her hand daintily. “And what is your name, Mr. Giant?”

For a moment, the man just stared at her.

Madison just maintained her smile and her composure. It was best to confront uncomfortable situations with as much charisma as could be mustered, she’d always found.

But maybe that only worked in Steccat. This gentleman here wasn’t looking too impressed with her, at the moment.

At length, however, he did eventually say, "...My name is Dimas. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance."

Huh. Those words were significantly more courteous than his expression implied.

Madison allowed her smile to turn a little mischievous--a trick she'd perfected in one of her earlier films. "Is it a pleasure?" she said teasingly. "Is it, really?"

Dimas made no response.

Oh crap, time to clarify. "Ah--it's just, well--I've noticed the looks everyone has been giving me. It doesn't quite seem like I'm the most desirable girl at the ball, if you take my meaning."

Dimas threw that same flat expression around the banquet hall before returning it to her again. "They are concerned that you might attempt to kill someone," he said.

Madison laughed and touched Dimas' arm. It was a strange joke, to be sure, but Madison had heard worse. She could easily 'magnify' how funny she found it--for the man's sake, of course. Men always seemed to love that. Hell, so did she, honestly.

Dimas' face did not change in the slightest, however.

Madison's mirth died rather abruptly. "Wait, are you being serious?"

"Yes."

She looked around the room another time, suddenly even more conscious of all the people observing her now. "What?!" she said, lowering her voice while still heightening its urgency. "Why would they think that?! I'm completely harmless! I'm less than harmless, even! I'm harm-negative! Like, mathematically or something!"

Dimas just cocked an eyebrow at her.

Well, that was a slightly different response, at least. She tried a frown--hopefully a cute one. "...You don't think I'm dangerous, do you?"

"I have not decided yet."

"Seriously? What about me could possibly hurt anyone? I mean, I know I have eyes that are to die for, but that doesn't count, right?"

And again, Dimas made no response.

Madison's expression tightened. What was with this guy? Couldn't he tell that was a joke? Oh shit, had it not sounded like one? Did he think she was an arrogant bitch, already?

"I-I was just joking," she felt compelled to say. "I'm not that full of myself, just so it's clear."

"Mm," was all Dimas had to say, apparently.

Agh, this was going terribly."

"1784

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 3 of 12))

She had to try something different. Maybe he would want to talk about himself. "So, uh, what brings you here, Dimas? How'd you end up in a spooky place like this?"

"...It doesn't matter," said Dimas.

Well, crumb. She should've known better. Men hated talking about themselves.

Well.

Most men.

She'd known many exceptions, certainly, but Dimas here didn't appear to be one of them.

She liked that, though. Damn, did she like that. A boyfriend who wasn't in love with the sound of his own voice? That was basically her ideal man, after the repeated dumpster fires that were her last few relationships. Peace and quiet without all the loneliness that usually came with it? Where did she have to sign?

And sure, maybe Dimas seemed a little scary, but that was just a preliminary thing. She didn't know anything about him yet, really. And... if she was being entirely, horrifically honest with herself... she found that scariness kinda hot, too--so help her. She'd never dated anyone who seemed genuinely "mysterious" or "dangerous" before.

Not from the beginning of the relationship, anyway.

Dimas also seemed like a gentleman, though, curiously enough. So she wondered if she could attack him from that angle.

"Well, ah... would it be too much trouble to ask you to show me around?" said Madison.

"...I am not very familiar with Warrenhold, myself."

A meek woman might've gotten discouraged by that response. Not Madison, though. "Perfect!" she said, grabbing Dimas' arm. "We can explore it together, then. That's even better, right?"

Dimas just kind of stood there, looking down at her on his arm as if he were assessing a rash and trying to decide if he needed to take medication for it.

At least, that was what it seemed like to Madison. Honestly, she wasn't accustomed to seeing expressions like that--certainly not from men. She'd seen a lot of other things from them. Eagerness, confidence, anger, even timidity and desperation--but this?

This was pretty new to her.

She was becoming more determined by the second to not let this one get away.

But she couldn't be too aggressive, either, she knew. A hunk like this probably liked to do most of the work himself. And she still didn't know much about him, of course. There were still a lot of deal-breaking obstacles that could crop up any moment now.

She decided to release his arm and take a step back toward the empty bar behind her. "Oh, I'm sorry," she said. "I'm just very excitable, sometimes."

"...It's fine," said Dimas, as gorgeous and expressionless as ever.

Madison gathered her courage and went straight for the first big thing that she needed to know. "Yeah, well, I'm sure your wife wouldn't appreciate some strange woman hanging all over you, right?"

"...I'm not married."

She resisted the urge to leap into his enormous arms. "Oh," she said with forced calmness. "Then... does that mean you wouldn't mind exploring this castle with me?"

"...Sure."

"1785

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 4 of 12))

She contained herself with just another smile. Bubbly and cheerful was one thing. Psychotically happy and clingy was another.

"Oh, you're just terribly sweet, aren't you?" said Madison. "Thank you for humoring me. I'll try not to be too annoying--I promise!" She knew that fishing for compliments was an old and very well-known tactic, but that didn't mean it couldn't still be effective, especially against strangers. People who knew her well would doubtlessly show no mercy in calling her out on that, but she was betting that the mysterious gentleman in front of her wouldn't mind.

"Not at all," said Dimas. "It will be my pleasure."

Madison didn't even have to force her smile, this time. Sure, maybe Dimas didn't have the most receptive tone or expression, but somehow, she still felt like he meant those words.

Ah, but that could've just been her wanting him to mean them, she knew. She'd certainly made that mistake before. She wanted to be smarter than her past self.

They exited the banquet hall together, with Madison having to take the lead. She had no idea where she was going, of course, and the two of them were now drawing even more attention than she'd been getting on her own, but none of that could remove the grin from her face.

A date. This was totally a date. Not an official one, of course, but it was basically the same thing, just not as formal. And there was plenty of potential there, she knew.

Now she just had to not fuck everything up.

In spite of herself, she was getting nervous. She was only twenty-eight years old, but truthfully, she was already beginning to feel a little bit like she was over the hill. She experienced heartburn for the first time in her entire life last year, and every time she thought about all the newer, younger actresses making waves now in Steccat... Not to mention, she hadn't actually landed a movie role in several months now... Oh, and how many of her girlfriends had gotten married over the last few years?

And that wasn't even broaching the subject of that old drug problem...

Agh. The more she allowed herself to think about it, the more reason she found to justify each and every one of her insecurities.

If Dimas knew everything she was thinking, right now, he would ditch her in a heartbeat. Hell, maybe he was already planning to and really was just being polite.

Hmm? Where he'd go? She looked around. Oh, goddess, please--

Wait, no, there he was, following a few meters behind her. Phew.

Someone was walking with him and talking quietly. A fellow Rainlord, presumably. Of course, she hadn't actually gotten confirmation that Dimas himself was a Rainlord, but it seemed a safe gamble.

Madison slowed her pace to match theirs, but they stopped talking before she was close enough to overhear what they were saying.

Huh."

"1786

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 5 of 12))

Madison tried not to read too much into that. She didn't need any other excuses to feel insecure. "Is something the matter?" she dared to ask.

"No," said Dimas, and he waved at the other man as if shoos him away.

The shorter man merely nodded and excused himself.

Wait a minute. Was Dimas some sort of big shot, on top of everything else?

Oh, hell.

Was she getting herself into trouble again? Because she was starting to feel like she was.

And she didn't know what to do about it, either.

"I apologize for not engaging with you more," said Dimas. "You must be bored."

"Oh, no, I'm fine. And besides, it's a little early for us to be getting engaged, don't you think?"

That just made him raise an eyebrow at her again.

"That was another joke," she clarified.

"...I know," said Dimas. "It was very funny."

Her face scrunched up a little. "Are you...? Are you being sarcastic?"

"No."

Her face scrunched up a little more. "Are you sure? Because it sounded like you were."

"I promise that I was not being sarcastic."

"Well, if you thought it was funny, then why didn't you laugh?"

A beat passed, and the man gave a hulking shrug. "I don't know."

Not sure what to say to that, she pouted.

Surprisingly enough, that seemed to get a reaction out of the man. Not a big one, of course, but something at least. She couldn't tell what that expression meant, partly because it was gone as quickly as it appeared, but immediately thereafter, Dimas took the lead in walking. "Perhaps I can show you something," he said.

Madison's eyes lit up, and she skipped a bit closer to him. "Oh? What kind of something would that be?"

"A certain room," said Dimas, taking them through the main courtyard where Warrenhold's eight great towers all surrounded them.

"What kind of room?" she said with a slight grin. That room wouldn't happen to have a hot tub or a bed, would it? She had to stop herself from saying that out loud.

"A shrine," said Dimas.

Oh. Well, that was a little disappointing, but she was curious, at least. She'd never been taken to a shrine on a date before. She didn't think she'd ever been taken to a shrine, period.

"From what I understand," Dimas went on, "there are several shrines in Warrenhold, but I only know where two of them are. I'll take you to the one that is probably quieter."

"Alrighty," said Madison with a nod. She followed him toward the tallest and skinniest building, the one she'd heard people calling the Entry Tower.

As they neared it, another man approached Dimas and spoke quietly into his ear. He held up a finger in her direction before excusing himself and asking her to wait a moment."

"1787

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 6 of 12))

She agreed with as courteous a smile as she could muster, of course, and observed the two men step away from her for a minute.

Okay, yeah, Dimas was definitely some sort of big shot around here, she figured. What to do with that information, she wasn't quite sure. It wouldn't have really mattered to her if he was flat broke and utterly unremarkable in everyone else's eyes--in fact, she might have even preferred that, because then she would've had him all to herself. And she certainly didn't need any more money. Sure, she didn't currently have very good access to that money, but that problem would likely change soon.

Hopefully.

She gave the men their space, nonetheless, putting her hands together behind her back and turning around to take in the view of the enormous underground courtyard another time.

It was quite something, she supposed, though it maybe wasn't as romantic as she would have personally preferred. The amber lamps were a nice touch, though if it was up to her, there would be about two dozen more of them scattered up and down each tower--perhaps even hanging from that distant ceiling. There was obviously a ton of open space here, but so much of it remained in darkness that it didn't look nearly as spacious as it could have, she thought.

An interior decorator on the payroll would not be a waste of money, she felt; but at the same time, wow, such a person would definitely have their work cut out for them. More light would be a good first step, but it would take a lot more than that to make this place not look like a haunted ruin. Some greenery would probably be a big improvement, too, but she wondered if anything would even be able to grow down here. Maybe some artificial plants would fit the bill, instead. They could practically fit a whole fake forest down here, if they wanted, though that would obviously be pretty weird.

She was far from an expert on these things, however. While decorating had been a passion of hers ever since she was a little girl, she had never actually owned her own place for long enough to really get invested in it. Her acting career had taken over her life for the last several years, so her love for interior design had mostly been relegated to watching home makeover shows on television and ogling pictures of pretty houses on the internet.

Maybe Valerie Reinbach would be able to do something with this place. On her show, Reinbach Renovations, she made it look like she could beautify just about any location in the world. In fact, now that she was thinking about it, Madison was pretty sure there was an episode where Valerie restored an old, ruined castle for an Ardoran prince or something.

Madison wouldn't mind meeting her, one day--assuming she ever managed to make it back out into the world, that was."

"1788

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 7 of 12))

She still had no idea what she was going to do about that whole mess. She'd been trying not to think about it too much, if only because it felt like there was nothing that she really could do.

The Andalero group wanted her dead, and they tended to get what they wanted, especially in Steccat. They were a pretty mysterious bunch, and truth be told, Madison hadn't previously known all that much about them, really--aside from the rumors, that was. The rumors about them being a cult. About them controlling half of all the money in the world from the shadows. About them being malevolent puppeteers in matters on an international level. And about them disemboweling farm animals and wearing their still-bloody skins as meat suits during all manner of depraved rituals.

She didn't think that last one was true--mainly because of how stupid it sounded--but unfortunately, she had already gotten tentative confirmation on those other ones. Maybe they didn't actually control half the money in the world, but they definitely had a terrifying degree of influence. A hotel receptionist, a burger shop employee, a bus driver, even a damn kid with a lemonade stand--they'd all tried to pull a gun on her and blow her brains out without any warning whatsoever. And those were just all the ones she could remember. She genuinely wasn't sure how many assassination attempts Roman had foiled while getting her out of Steccat.

She was alright now, but that had definitely been the most terrifying experience of her life. Knowing that literally any random stranger might just walk up and try to kill her at any moment? That hadn't been fun.

And all because she overheard a conversation she wasn't supposed to. She didn't even know what the hell was so scandalous about it. It had just been her ex-boyfriend Darius talking to some old guy about something called "black song." Apparently, it was some kind of super secret meeting or something going down in a place called Ridgemark. She didn't even know where that was or what the meeting was about.

Yet that was enough for them to want her dead. And Roman, too, of course, though they had no idea who he was. After all that craziness, Madison hadn't needed to ask why Roman had originally disguised himself as her new assistant.

She'd been furious with him, at first. Dragging her into all this. But after a while, she realized it wasn't actually his fault that she'd overheard what she did. He'd actually tried to ditch her a couple times before that, which she now realized had been for her own safety. And of course, he had saved her life about a dozen times since then, too. That had earned him more than a few points with her as well.

It felt so strange, thinking about all of that stuff now. It had only been a few weeks ago, but her life had changed so much since then, and she still felt like she was caught up in a whirlwind, like her feet hadn't quite touched the ground again just yet."

"1789

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 8 of 12))

She was in some tiny country she'd never heard of, walking around a creepy castle she didn't much care for, surrounded by a bunch of people she didn't know.

And yet, she wasn't freaking out. For the most part.

Maybe she'd just expended all of her freaking out energy back in Steccat. In retrospect, Roman had been an absolute saint in dealing with her for those first couple days on the run.

Too bad.

Hopefully, he and Gina would figure things out between themselves soon. They had only just reunited, but Madison was already feeling immensely tempted to help them along. She knew better, though. She didn't have enough information about Roman's feelings toward Gina, so trying to force the issue now could easily just make everything worse. Madison knew only too well that these kinds of things required a delicate touch.

At length, her internal musings came to an end when she noticed Dimas had dismissed his apparent associate and was returning to her.

"Thank you for waiting," he said, as calm and flat as before.

"No problem," she said as they started walking again. "It seems like you're in high demand around here."

Dimas didn't have anything to say to that, apparently.

She tried again as they set foot in the Entry Tower. "Are you a... I dunno, a high-ranking Rainlord or something? Do you guys have ranks?"

"No, we do not," said Dimas. "However, yes, I am the current head of House Sebolt.”

“Ooh, the head, huh? That sounds important.”

“...Yes.”

They took a left and ascended a curving staircase, then Dimas guided her down a corridor and into the room in question.

It was empty, and there were giant cracks in all the walls, but she supposed it had a certain charm to it. Rainbow tiles were an interesting choice. Not something she would have chosen, certainly, but she couldn't deny that it made an impact.

“Are all of your shrines this colorful?” she asked.

“This is not a Rainlord shrine,” said Dimas. “This is not our castle, either.”

“Oh. Right. I knew that, I think. It belongs to, uh... ah...?”

“Lord Goffe. He is not a Rainlord.”

“Ah. Gotcha.” It didn't make much difference to her, but she figured it would be rude if she didn't at least try to keep track of these things.

Dimas walked toward the far corner of the room and sat by the lamp there. There was no chair or bench to sit on, though. Instead, it was a long, blocky protrusion from the wall, seemingly designed to be sat on, given the row of concave indentations where butts were presumably supposed to go.

“The Lord Goffe's associate mentioned that he wished for these shrines to be places where people of all different faiths could come to observe peace.”

Madison sat down next to him. “That sounds nice.”

“Indeed.”

That was it, huh? Of course it was. “So... you like this place, then?”

“...Yes.””

"1790

Oi. Madison was beginning to see a few potential hiccups in her grand plan to get herself a boyfriend who was the strong, silent type. Why had he even brought her here, anyway? She wanted to ask him that directly, but she was struggling to think of a way to make it not sound terribly rude.

Seriously, though, what a weird place to bring a date. Well, maybe he didn't think it was a date. In fact, he probably didn't. It was her hopeful delusions that had put that idea in her head, she knew.

Dammit. How was she supposed to save the situation? The silence was already so long and awkward. She could do it, couldn't she? Being a social butterfly was practically her job--no, her life.

That had mostly come from attending tons of ritzy parties, though. And this was not that.

She didn't have much experience dealing with people like this. Hell, did anyone have much experience with it?

"Do you know of Lhutwë?" said Dimas, stirring Madison from her thoughts.

Agh, she had to pay better attention. That was key to any good social interaction, she knew. Paying attention to whoever you're talking to--and not paying so much attention to yourself. When you paid too much attention to yourself, you became self-conscious, and when you became self-conscious, you became uncertain and awkward. Avoiding that pitfall was usually easy, but it got a lot harder when the person you were talking to didn't actually talk.

Regardless, it was a rookie mistake. She did her best to recover, though. "Oh. Um. Ah... Lhutwë? Is that... some kind of Rainlord cuisine?"

Dimas' expression flashed with the faintest hint of what looked like a smile. Or irritation, perhaps. Madison couldn't really tell.

"No," the tall man said. "Lhutwë is the name of the old water god whom our ancestors worshiped."

"Ooh..." Yikes. That one had been a genuine airhead moment. She hoped he didn't think she was a complete idiot now. "I, ah... I guess I'm not all that knowledgeable when it comes to religion. I only know a little bit about Cocora, and that's it."

"I see."

Crap. She needed to step her game up and try to ask an intelligent question or something. "But, um... I'm curious about them." Okay, maybe that would've been a lie two minutes ago, but it was totally true now. "Is there a reason why you only said that your ancestors worshiped him? Or, wait, is Lhutwë a woman?"

"No, Lhutwë is described as male."

"Ah, okay. I love it when I assume things that turn out to be true. It sure is better than the opposite thing."

"I am not sure I understood your first question. A reason why I said only my ancestors?"

"Oh, I meant, like, did you mean that you don't worship him anymore? And if so, why?"

"1791

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 10 of 12))

"Ah," said Dimas. "Yes, we have mostly ceased all such religious practices regarding him. However, he still remains an important aspect of our history, in my opinion. And... there are some among us who do still truly believe in him."

She nodded attentively, not wanting to miss a single word. "I see. And does that include you?"

"I... honestly do not know," said Dimas.

Huh. Madison was a bit surprised by that. He didn't strike her as the indecisive type, and now she had to know more. "Why not?"

"One of my family members is quite religious," said Dimas, "and he frequently tries to convince me that the old ways were correct. I do not yet know if I believe him or not. And there is also..." He seemed to think better of whatever he was going to say, and the sentence went unfinished.

That was okay, though. Madison could relate. "I've had friends like that, too," she said. "Lemme guess. Is he super nice and friendly but also kinda guilt-trippy?"

"...That describes him exactly, yes."

"Knew it," she said with a nod. "Friends like that can be tough to deal with. It's usually best to just be straight with them, though, and tell them when they're making you uncomfortable with their proselytizing." Man, that word-a-day app was the best thing she ever downloaded.

"I don't think that will work with him," said Dimas.

"Really? Well, you might be surprised. But even if it doesn't, you could just tell him to cut it out."

"But what if he is right?"

"Oh. Uh. Then... listen to what he says?"

"And what if he is wrong?"

"Alright, hey, I don't have all the answers. I know I look like I do, but gimme a break."

That finally pulled a smile out of him. Not a big one, maybe, but she could at least be sure that she'd seen it this time.

Her heart swelled up a little, and she couldn't help smiling as well. She hated when that happened, though. Her most natural smile was goofy and stupid, she'd always felt. It was too mouthy, if that made any sense, and it had been that way ever since her awkward teenage years. The smile that she'd perfected for her movie career was the one that she wanted Dimas to see, but it was so damn difficult to control, sometimes.

She averted her gaze and pretended to observe the rainbow room another time while she recomposed herself.

"...Would you like to hear an old fable of Lhutwë?" said Dimas.

"Perhaps then you will be able to tell me what you think of my friend's beliefs."

"Oh, ah, sure! Though, I'm not sure I should pass judgment on an entire religion after hearing only one story from it."

“...That is true and wise,” said Dimas. “But I want you to do it, anyway.”

She actually snorted a laugh that time.”

"1792

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 11 of 12))

Aw, crap. That hadn't been very dainty or graceful. Maybe he didn't notice.

“That was a cute laugh,” said Dimas, looking right at her.

Wait, what?! Did she hear that right?! “Ah--uh! No, it wasn't!”

Dimas was silent again, however.

She didn't know what to say. Thank you? Should she blush? Wait, was she already doing that? What had she just said, again? No, it wasn't? Why the fuck had she said that?! Taking compliments was easy as shit! She'd done it a million times!

She averted her gaze again, trying to think, to refocus. Calm down. It was just a game. A game she was good at. There was no reason to panic. Dimas was just a man. A tall, strong, and beautiful man who might even have a great personality, too. Jury was still out on that one, but it was looking good so far.

Looking damn good.

Oh, boy...

“...So did you want to hear a fable of Lhutwë?” said Dimas. “Or was that a polite way of saying no?”

“No! I mean, yes! I'd love to hear it!” At the moment, she could listen to him talk about paint drying or his car or just about anything, really.

“Are you certain?” he asked. “I promise I will not be offended.”

“Of course! Tell me!”

“Very well...” The man took a moment to observe his hands, as if to find his words there. “There are many stories of Lhutwë to choose from, but the one I have in mind is the story of how he came to choose my ancestors as his most beloved people.”

“The Armans, right?” said Madison.

“You know of them,” Dimas observed.

“Only a little. The common knowledge stuff. Peace-loving people of the rain, until a great war came along, and they kicked everyone’s butts.”

“A flattering summation.”

“Was I wrong?”

“I suppose not. But there are many important details being left out.”

She nudged herself ever so slightly closer. “Well, tell them to me, then.”

He eyed her briefly before nodding. “If the tale is to be believed, then my ancestors were not born into the rain.”

“Oh? Uh... what does that mean?”

“Our land. It was not always flooded as it is now. Nor did the Wares Mountains exist. Lhutwē was the one who bestowed them both upon us.”

“Ah... but, uh... haven’t mountains existed for, like, ever? Like, a lot longer than humans have?”

“Yes. And radiometric tests have confirmed as much for us, as well.”

“So I guess that’s why this is just a fable, then?”

“Indeed.”

“Right. Okay. Please continue.”

“The story tells of a time of immense strife and poverty for our people. However, the story also says that we had such nobility of spirit that these tribulations did not break us, which was why Lhutwē chose to grant us his protection. Again, a rather flattering portrayal, no?”

“I’m not judging. Yet.””

”1793

((Memorial Day Special -- Page 12 of 12))

“According to the tale,” Dimas went on, “Lhutwë ‘claimed us as his very own kin.’ Supposedly, he began treating us like his children. It is said that this was a long-held desire of his, to have children. And soon after this kinship began, Lhutwë spoke thus: ‘I shall bring to you the sea, for it will make you strong, and strength will bring you peace. And all those who believeth in me shall partake of my fountain; and all others, should war exist in their hearts, shall know my wrath.’”

“Whoa,” said Madison. “That sounds pretty serious.”

“Yes. The fable goes on to say that, by Lhutwë’s command, a great fountain arose out of the earth, and the land was overcome with all manner of water. Lakes and seas flowed forth from the bottom of the fountain, and clouds full of rain billowed from its peak. The story even claims that this fountain was the source of all water in the world--not just the water in our territory. Our water was considered the most sacred, of course, being closest to the fountain, but all water in the world was kindred to us and to the fountain.

“However, the waters were far from a blessing. At first. The land changed so dramatically that our people struggled to adapt. Many despaired and even cursed Lhutwë for what he had done. But in time, we did adapt, and just as he said, we grew strong, and we grew peaceful. For a time.

“Disputes broke out over who should lead us, over whether we should even have a leader. And our people fought. Blood was shed. And Lhutwë grew angry with us. He had protected us from outsiders for many years, but now he was troubled, because he did not know how to protect us from one another.”

Madison figured she should say something to demonstrate she was actually listening. “That sounds rough. What did he do?”

“He took his fountain away from us,” said Dimas. “According to the story, he raised the Wareess Mountains in order to seal the fountain’s power so that we could never use it against one another again. That is also where the name ‘Wareess’ comes from. In the tongue of my ancestors, it means ‘war’s end.’”

“I see.” Madison wasn’t sure what she was supposed to take away from any of this, but she didn’t care all that much. She just didn’t want him to stop talking, really.

“Unfortunately,” Dimas went on, “that is where the fable begins to break down.”

“Oh?”

“How it ends depends on whom you ask. As some tell it, Lhutwë abandoned us because of our foolishness. They say he could not abide war among his children and so simply disowned us, leaving us to our fates.”

“Pretty harsh.”

“1794

“As others tell it, however, Lhutwë chose a divine successor to lead us in his absence. The Water Dragon. They say that Lhutwë, though he can no longer intervene in our lives directly due to our own profound imperfection, still continues to work through the Water Dragon to guide and protect us.”

“Wow. I’m guessing you don’t believe that?”

“No, I do not. Few among us do, anymore.”

“It does seem a little far-fetched.”

“But there is evidence to support it.”

Madison blinked. “Really?”

“For all of the fable’s faults, there is certainly a degree of truth in it.”

“How so?”

“The fountain,” said Dimas. “The Fountain of Lhutwë is real. Or was, at the very least. In the story, its power seems exaggerated, but in reality, there are many historical accounts of the Fountain being used by the Water Dragon of a given generation to acquire unparalleled strength.”

Madison didn’t quite follow. “But in the story, Lhutwë took the fountain away, didn't he?"

"Yes."

"So then...?"

"It does not make sense, yes."

"Oh. Okay. Just checking."

"However, due to recent... events, I have been thinking about this story quite a bit."

"Why?"

"A friend of mine put forth a new theory. He said that, rather than choosing to abandon us of his own accord, perhaps Lhutwë was forced to leave for some other reason."

"What other reason?"

"...That is difficult to say," said Dimas.

"You seem awfully interested in it for someone who said you don't believe any of this stuff."

"I also said that I did not know what I believed."

"Well, if you're looking for answers, then I'm afraid you've come to the wrong person, because I don't know what I believe, either." At Dimas' blank expression, Madison nudged herself closer again. "If you're looking for a girlfriend, though... I might be able to help you out."

He cocked an eyebrow at her another time. "Is that right?"

Rather than answering, she just returned a big smile.

"Even after hearing that story, you would be interested in a relationship with me?"

Madison was confused. "Why would that have deterred me? And, hey, wait a minute. Did you know I was interested all along?"

"...That story paints a rather bleak picture of my kin, I feel. Are you sure you wish to get involved with people like us? Because make no mistake, I am inexorably bound to my brethren. I have a duty to them which goes beyond anything else in this life or the next."

"Excuse me, but you didn't answer the question."

"I answered a question."

"Honey, if you're trying to make me stop finding you attractive, you're doing a terrible job of it. I happen to love being teased."

At that, Dimas' eyes widened a little."

"1795 -- CXC.

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Ninety: 'O, respectable reunion...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The meetings with the Rainlords ended up taking most of the day. He mainly just told them exactly what he had told Horatio about there being no need for financial reimbursement, and as expected, each family required a similar degree of convincing.

House Elroy was the worst in that regard. Hector wasn't exactly surprised about that, though. By the end of it, Zeff ended up making Hector promise to train with him everyday from now on. Hector didn't know if he would actually have the time for that, but he was more than happy to try, at least. Training was important, after all.

Perhaps more than ever, now.

If nothing else, however, Hector was at least glad to see that Zeff had finally managed to get some proper rest. Everyone was still looking pretty battered and worn out, but for the first time in what felt like a very long time, Hector had hope that that might actually begin to change soon.

He had less hope for himself, however. With so much to do, so many things to worry about, he wondered if he would ever be able to find time to sleep again.

At the moment, odds weren't looking too good.

Around dinner time, he was finally able to sit down and talk to Roman, Gina, and Voreese.

Thankfully, this meeting didn't feel quite so redundant or formal. It was arguably the most important one of the day, though, Hector knew.

He wasn't at all sure how to broach the subject of a loan. He certainly would've preferred to not broach it at all.

'Okay, boys, it's time to fess up,' said Voreese. 'How in the name of all that is sacred did you two manage to get yourselves mixed up with a bunch of fucking Rainlords? Not that I don't absolutely adore them all, of course, in case any of them happen to be overhearing our conversation, right now.'

"That's an easy question," said Hector. "Garovel's sister got mixed up with them first."

'What?! Garovel, you've got yourself a living sister?!'

'Yup.'

'Well, where the hell is she, then, huh? You know I've gotta meet her, right?!'

'Sadly, she and her servant ended up separated from us.'

'Aww.'

'We're not sure of her whereabouts, at the moment.'

'Well, that seriously bites. You got my hopes up, dammit.'

'Her name's Chergoa, in case you somehow happen to cross paths with her before we do.'

'Oh, I doubt that'll happen. Roman and I intend to never leave you guys alone again. Isn't that right, Roman?'

Roman seemed more interested in his ricotta-filled lasagna than anything else.

Hector didn't blame him. It was damn good. But of course, everything Gina made seemed to turn out that way.

'Stop ignoring me, you son of a bitch.'

"No."
"1795 -- CXC.

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Ninety: 'O, respectable reunion...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The meetings with the Rainlords ended up taking most of the day. He mainly just told them exactly what he had told Horatio about there being no need for financial reimbursement, and as expected, each family required a similar degree of convincing.

House Elroy was the worst in that regard. Hector wasn't exactly surprised about that, though. By the end of it, Zeff ended up making Hector promise to train with him everyday from now on. Hector didn't know if he would actually have the time for that, but he was more than happy to try, at least. Training was important, after all.

Perhaps more than ever, now.

If nothing else, however, Hector was at least glad to see that Zeff had finally managed to get some proper rest. Everyone was still looking pretty battered and worn out, but for the first time in what felt like a very long time, Hector had hope that that might actually begin to change soon.

He had less hope for himself, however. With so much to do, so many things to worry about, he wondered if he would ever be able to find time to sleep again.

At the moment, odds weren't looking too good.

Around dinner time, he was finally able to sit down and talk to Roman, Gina, and Voreese.

Thankfully, this meeting didn't feel quite so redundant or formal. It was arguably the most important one of the day, though, Hector knew.

He wasn't at all sure how to broach the subject of a loan. He certainly would've preferred to not broach it at all.

‘Okay, boys, it’s time to fess up,’ said Voreese. ‘How in the name of all that is sacred did you two manage to get yourselves mixed up with a bunch of fucking Rainlords? Not that I don’t absolutely adore them all, of course, in case any of them happen to be overhearing our conversation, right now.’

“That’s an easy question,” said Hector. “Garovel’s sister got mixed up with them first.”

‘What?! Garovel, you’ve got yourself a living sister?!’

‘Yup.’

‘Well, where the hell is she, then, huh? You know I’ve gotta meet her, right?!’

‘Sadly, she and her servant ended up separated from us.’

‘Aww.’

‘We’re not sure of her whereabouts, at the moment.’

‘Well, that seriously bites. You got my hopes up, dammit.’

‘Her name’s Chergoa, in case you somehow happen to cross paths with her before we do.’

‘Oh, I doubt that’ll happen. Roman and I intend to never leave you guys alone again. Isn’t that right, Roman?’

Roman seemed more interested in his ricotta-filled lasagna than anything else.

Hector didn’t blame him. It was damn good. But of course, everything Gina made seemed to turn out that way.

‘Stop ignoring me, you son of a bitch.’

“No.””

"1796

‘You can’t just say no like that,’ said Voreese. ‘You’re confusing poor Gina. She can’t hear my end of the conversation.’

“She probably prefers it that way. Right, Gina?”

“Whatever you say, Master Roman.”

‘That’s not funny. Tell Gina that’s not funny.’

“Voreese says she loves you and thinks you’re hilarious.”

“Oh, thank you, Voreese.”

‘You’re both assholes.’

“Tell Voreese I love her, too.”

‘Eh, okay, I guess she’s alright. You’re still a bucktoothed penis, though, Roman.’

Honestly, Hector was content to simply eat his meal and enjoy their conversation with a smile on his face, but he knew that he probably shouldn’t do that. And even if he left all the important talking to Garovel, that would be a little rude to Gina, he felt.

The subjects of killing worms and meeting gods soon came up, and Hector and Garovel struggled through those explanations together.

“...So you’re telling us that there are now a couple of ‘ancient beings’ with untold power roaming around in the Undercrust, doing whatever they want?” said Roman.

Hector bobbed his head. “Well... they wouldn’t be the first. Reapers, servants, worms, feldeaths, Hun’Sho. Those are all ancient beings, too, right?”

“Guess that’s true,” said Roman with a small laugh. “I’m sure a couple of gods will barely even make a splash, then.”

Hector couldn’t really argue with the man’s sarcasm. He had no idea what Royo and Malast would do next, and he almost didn’t want to know.

Roman gave him a look. “You realize this is going to be a gigantic problem, don’t you?”

“Probably, yeah,” said Hector.

"I mean, you've got a direct line to the Undercrust here. They could pop up here any time they want and attack you."

"I don't think they know where the hole to Warrenhold is," said Hector.

'The Warrenhole,' said Voreese.

"If they're really gods, they could know just about anything," said Roman.

'They're NOT really gods,' said Garovel.

"But you said you don't know the extent of their power," said Roman. "If they're strong enough, it doesn't really matter if they're gods or not, does it? We still wouldn't be able to stop them."

"They didn't seem... that hostile toward us," said Hector.

"That's good," said Roman. "Guess you wouldn't be here if they had been, eh?"

'Who knows?' said Garovel. 'I wouldn't bet against Hector, though.'

Hector threw the reaper a look and noticed Roman and Voreese doing the same. He felt like this conversation was going down a strange road and decided to change the subject. "Whatever happens, we'll deal with it when the time comes," said Hector. "For now, I'd rather focus on the problems facing Warrenhold and Atreya."

'Oh yeah, you guys are in some pretty deep shit, aren't you?' said Voreese.

"We're in it, too, you know," said Roman.

'Maybe YOU are,' said Voreese, 'but I'm not. I'm an intangible ghost woman. Your crummy economy isn't gonna affect me.'

"1797

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

"A very helpful way of looking at things, as always," said Roman.

'I'm just jokin', c'mon. Obviously, I care greatly about what happens to this worthless piece of shit you call a homeland.'

"It's not the land we're worried about, Voreese," said Roman. "It's the people."

'You think I don't know that, you fucking dolt? Don't try to argue semantics with me.'

"Why not? Semantics are important. You saying clarity doesn't matter now, you ignorant bint?"

Hector exchanged glances with Gina and wondered how many times she'd heard half of an argument like this. All things considered, she didn't look particularly confused.

Roman and Voreese's arguing didn't seem like it was slowing down, however, so Hector decided to intervene with a question for Gina. "Have you been following the economic crisis?"

"Of course," she said. "There seems to be a lot of confusion about what actually caused it, though. I don't think anyone will know that for a while."

"Madame Carthrace said something similar," said Hector. "Is there anything else you can tell me?"

"Um..." Gina took a moment to think, perhaps noticing that Roman had stopped back sassing his imaginary friend. "Well, I'm not much of a financial person, myself, but I've got a guy for that, and he--"

"I think you mean I've got a guy for that," said Roman.

Gina tilted her brow at him. "Yes, Master Roman. Technically, he works for you, not me, but do you even know what he looks like?"

"That's not important."

"Isn't it?"

"Why would it be? I bet he doesn't know what I look like, either."

"That's not a good counterargument, Master Roman."

"What did your financial guy tell you?" said Hector with a mild laugh.

"Oh, he said that the situation probably isn't as bad as everyone is currently making it out to be," said Gina. "He's mainly an investment guy, so he's really annoyed and thinks that all of this panic is going to upend a lot of the projects he was eyeballing."

Hector didn't know what to make of that. It sounded counter to what Amelia had told him.

Or, wait. Did it?

She had said that a bunch of foreign interests would come in and "save" the economy. Maybe that was why this guy, whoever he was, didn't see the crisis as that big of a deal. Atreya's financial sovereignty probably didn't matter to most people.

Hell, did it even matter to Hector?

A year ago, he would've said absolutely not, but now?

Shit.

'Do you want to bring it up, or shall I?' said Garovel privately.

He knew the reaper was referring to the loan. The specter hanging over this conversation.

'I'll do it,' said Hector. 'There's no reason to exclude Gina.'

'Have at it, then. We can't sit here all night.'

Roman and Voreese were already arguing over one thing or another again."

"1798

He was going to have to interrupt them one more time, Hector knew. No great surprise there. He waited briefly so as not to talk over either of them and then jumped in.

"Mr. Roman," said Hector, drawing the man's attention, "I have to--"

"You can just call me Roman, you know." Roman's head bobbed to the side. "Unless you intend to make me call you Lord Goffe from now on. In which case, yes, you absolutely have to call me Mr. Roman. Or Mr. Fullister. Or Master Fullister. I do like being called Master. Not Master Roman, though. Only Gina can call me that. It'd be weird if you started saying it, too.”

As he listened, Hector found it increasingly hard to believe that this man was a billionaire. It probably didn't help that the guy had, as usual, found something weird to wear again. Instead of the armor that Hector had originally materialized for him, Roman was sporting a billiards visor and a windbreaker coat with the words 'Right On Cue' on the back in sharply styled letters.

“Fine,” said Hector flatly after Roman was done. “Just Roman, then.”

“Good. And I'll just call you Hector. Glad we got that all sorted.”

“I have to ask you something,” said Hector, still trying to find the right words here. “And... it's not... a small something, either.”

“Hmm. I see.” Roman placed his hands on the table. “This not-so-small something wouldn't happen to be money, would it?”

“...It would, yeah.”

“Ah.” Roman spared a glance at Gina before returning to Hector, then scratched cheek absently. “And here I thought you liked me for my personality.”

At that, Hector couldn't help exhaling half a laugh, almost like a sigh, and his eyes fell to the table. “I... ah...”

“C'mon, then,” said Roman. “Out with it. How much do you need?”

Hector's gaze remained on the table as he inhaled through his teeth. He looked up at Roman, then over at Garovel, then at Gina and Voreese, then back at Roman. “...A hundred million?”

Roman's eyes widened.

“To start with,” Hector felt compelled to add.

Roman's mouth hung open for a moment, and he furrowed his brow. “What the fuck do you need that much money for?”

“To start a bank,” said Hector. “One that'll be big enough to... prevent Atreya from being taken over by... foreign interests.”

Roman just kind of kept that same look on his face and didn't say anything.

"I know it's a lot to ask," said Hector.

"Oh, well, that's good," said Roman. "I was worried you didn't know what the fuck you were saying, for a second."

"And I don't necessarily... ah... need you to give me all of that. I mean, if you can't, then--"

"Of course I can't!" said Roman. "Look, Hector. Yes, I'm filthy rich. I'm not gonna pretend I'm not, but--"

"Ah--are you sure about that?" said Hector. "Because you kinda seem like you're pretending. All the time, actually."

"1799

"Yeah, alright, sure, you got me," said Roman, "but that's not what I'm talking about here. Technically, yes, I could give you a hundred million troa--just out of the kindness of my heart, I guess. But in order to actually do that, I would have to liquidate so many of my assets that, well... let's just say, I wouldn't be the only one affected by it. Pretty much of all of my money is being used, right now. That's what I do. In fact, I'd say that's the entire point. To put it back into the community. All my money is in real estate, small businesses, charities, that type of thing. I don't just go home and sit on a big pile of gold coins all day."

'Well, there was that one time--' tried Voreese.

"The point is," Roman continued, "even if I wanted to just give you that much money--which, by the way, Hector, I don't particularly--but even if I did, I would have to financially ruin or otherwise fuck over thousands of people, first. Many of whom are children or elderly, mind you."

Hector gave a slow nod. "I... completely understand."

"Do you?" said Roman, frowning. "You don't really know much about me or my business interests."

Hector had a feeling that he could ask Madame Carthrace and suddenly know a whole lot more about them, but he elected not to say that. "I kinda figured you didn't want me to know much about them," he said instead. "Didn't you say you were a thief?"

"That's just one aspect of what I do," said Roman. "Though, lately, I haven't even been able to do that. Hands've been pretty full, if you hadn't noticed."

'You're preaching to the choir over here,' said Garovel.

"Look," said Hector, taking a breath, "I was just telling you what I... currently know about the situation. I wasn't actually expecting you to just give me a hundred million troa. But that is about how much I need, so any help you would be... willing to offer, ah--that would be appreciated."

Roman was quiet for a time, and his frown didn't leave his face. He rubbed his nose and his chin while he deliberated, perhaps consulting Voreese privately as well.

"Hector," Roman finally said. "I will do whatever I can to help you. Of course I will. I'm grateful beyond words for everything you've done, both for me and for our country. Hell, I'd even go so far as to say that you have my trust--which is not something of mine that many people can claim to have. So, even though I hardly understand what your actual objective is here, that's almost inconsequential to me, when we get down to it. I may not be able to free up a cool hundred mil for you, but how does ten sound? To start things off, at least."

"...Ten million?" Hector could hardly believe what he was hearing.

"No, ten troa. Of course ten million! I'm not that much of a dick."
"1800

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

"That's..." Hector didn't even know what to say.

Roman was just looking at him, waiting for him to finish.

'Say thank you,' said Garovel privately.

"Ah--er--thank you. That's amazing. That's more than I possibly could have hoped for."

"Funny," said Roman with a smile. "Wasn't more than you asked for."

“Y-yeah...”

“And what did you say this money was going to be used for, again?” said Roman.

Hector’s mouth flattened, mostly from disbelief. “Uh... are you seriously asking me that?”

“Yeah, why? Is it that much trouble to repeat yourself or elaborate?”

“No, it’s just... I mean, did you really just decide to give me ten million troa without understanding what it was for?”

“Well, like I said, you have my trust.”

Hector didn’t know whether to smile or frown at that.

“That’s a bit reckless, Master Roman.”

“Yeah, well, that’s why I’m asking for clarification.”

“You should’ve done that before saying you would give him the money,” said Gina.

“Why? It’s not too late to change my mind. I’m not above going back on my word. Even when it’s in writing. Remember that contract with Genuto Motors a few years ago? Never paid those fuckers a thing.”

“I remember them suing you,” said Gina.

“And I remember them dropping it after one of their server rooms mysteriously caught fire,” said Roman.

“Narrowly avoiding bankruptcy is not something you should brag about, Master Roman.”

“Whatever. That’s all water under the bridge now. C’mon, Hector. Tell me what this money is for again. Some kind of bank, right?”

“Oh, ah, yeah.”

“See? I listen.”

“It’s, ah... basically, it’s to prevent foreign banks from taking over the country,” said Hector, “and, er, challenging the Queen’s power.”

Roman folded his arms, nodding. “So you’re gonna use this money to challenge the Queen's power?"

Hector reared back in his chair. "Wait, what? No! It's to stop foreign banks from doing that, not me!"

'Foreign interests,' clarified Garovel. 'Not necessarily banks. We're hoping to help preserve Atreya's financial independence through this economic crisis.'

"Oh, okay," said Roman. "I thought that was a little weird."

"You didn't actually think that, did you?!" said Hector.

"Well, I dunno," said Roman. "I mean, you've got all these Rainlords here... and all this land... and I haven't seen you in a while..."

Hector just lowered his brow at him.

"Heh. You might want to be careful when you tell the Queen about this plan of yours." Roman allowed a beat to pass. "Or, have you told her about it, already?"

"Not yet," said Hector. He rubbed his neck, figuring that he should probably go see her soon. How was he even supposed to do that? Or would just a phone call be enough? He'd have to ask Garovel about that later, he supposed.

"Have fun with that, then," said Roman. "Tell her I said hi."

"Ah, heh, okay..."

"1801

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

Roman returned to his food, shoveling portions into his mouth at a greater pace than before. "Well, now that that's out of the way, there's something else I gotta know. What the hell're you planning to do with all of these Rainlords?"

Hector busied himself with his own lasagna for a moment while he thought about how to answer that. "...I don't plan to do anything with them," he said.

Roman gave him a doubtful look. "Really?"

It didn't seem like a simple yes would suffice here. "Well, ah... for now, they're just going to stay here while they figure out their next move."

"Mm," hummed Roman. "So all this is just temporary, then?"

"...Yeah," said Hector, though with a bit of uncertainty. "Did Voreese not explain that to you, already?"

"She did. I just didn't believe her. And now, I'm not sure I believe you, either."

Hector just cocked an eyebrow at him.

Roman exhaled a sigh. "You're not really planning to just let these people go, are you?"

"Excuse me?"

"Hector. You've got an army here. An army that kinda loves you, from what I've seen. And you're just gonna let it slip through your fingers?" Roman put his fork down and stared him in the eye. "C'mon. Seriously. I don't have to spell this out for you, do I?"

Hector's expression soured a little bit. "I think you've got the wrong impression of these people..."

"And I think you're missing the obvious. Listen. The Queen sent me on a recruitment mission for a reason. She knows we need strong people to protect Atreya. She knows that even if things seem fairly safe now, Abolish could return at any time and try to finish what it started. These Rainlords are perfect for--"

Hector held up a hand. "No, I get it. I mean. I'd be lying if I said I hadn't thought about that, too, but..."

"But, what?"

"They have a lot going on, right now," said Hector. "They're here to rest."

"They seemed pretty rested to me," said Roman.

"Well, they aren't," said Hector, more firmly now. "You don't understand. They've been through so much shit, recently. They've been betrayed. Attacked. Multiple times. They were even forced to fight each other for a while. And tensions between the families still aren't exactly perfect, either."

Roman sat back in his seat a little. "I'm not claiming to know more about their circumstances than you. At this table, you and Garovel are obviously the experts on that. All I'm saying is that there's a golden opportunity here, and you're a fool if you let it pass you by."

"It's not that--"

'How would you suggest we take advantage of it, then?' said Garovel, drawing Hector's glance.

"Simple," said Roman. "Make them dependent on you."

Okay. Hector did not appreciate that advice.

"Oh, don't look at me like that," said Roman. "They're already dependent on you, aren't they? I just mean, use these circumstances to your advantage and try to foster a relationship that continues on like this into the foreseeable future."

Hector just kept staring at him."

"1802

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

"What?" said Roman. "I'm not saying you should try to keep them under your thumb like some kind of dictator. That'd be a good way to make them hate you. For anything like this to work, they would have to consider it a beneficial relationship from their end, too."

Still, Hector merely kept looking at him.

Roman sighed. "Hector. Trust me. If you just let them go, they will."

'That, or they'll try to take Warrenhold from you,' said Voreese. "Bout a fifty-fifty shot either way, I'd say.'

Hector shot her a look, now. "The Rainlords wouldn't do something like that."

'Oh, right, because they're so honorable or whatever?' said Voreese.

‘Please. Lotta pretty words and warm feelings--that’s all that is. Make no mistake, Hector. If they ever come to see you as an obstacle, they’ll turn on you in a heartbeat. Unless you marry into one of the families, maybe. In fact, I bet they’ll try to pressure you into that soon.’

‘Gah, why’d you have to go and warn him?’ said Garovel. ‘I wanted to see his raw reaction when they suddenly spring it on him, dammit.’

‘Oh. Ah. My bad.’

Hector’s face was stuck as he thought about what they’d just said. Marriage? What the fuck? Who the hell was gonna--?

‘There, you see? Look at him. You’ve ruined it.’

‘Sorry. It’s probably for the best that he’s thinking about it, though. Wouldn’t want him to make a poor decision while he’s too surprised to think clearly.’

‘As if I’d let him do that.’

‘Oho. Feeling protective of your prize-winning pony? Don’t want him to breed with any old donkey, eh?’

‘Of course.’

That was enough to bring Hector back into the conversation. “You guys are disgusting.”

“I think they’re kidding,” said Roman.

‘Of course we’re kidding,’ said Vorese. ‘Hector can fuck all the donkeys he wants. We don’t care.’

The conversation lasted until the end of the meal, and as was perhaps to be expected, there was considerably more shit talk than business talk. Roman and Voreese both kept trying to encourage him to do something about the Rainlords--what, exactly, remained unclear. The way they talked about it, they made it sound like they wanted him to trick the Rainlords somehow, but just as before, they kept saying that it would have to be a mutually beneficial relationship. Or something.

Hector didn’t really understand what they were trying to say, and he wasn’t entirely sure that he wanted to, either.

After the meal, they went their separate ways again. Roman said that they would be sticking around Warrenhold for a while and that he also wanted to go with Hector to meet Leo again. Hector didn't know if that last part was such a good idea, but he couldn't think of a very good reason to refuse the man, nor did he particularly want to talk to Leo without any sort of backup again, either. Hector was still reluctant, however, and in the end, he told Roman that he wanted to think about it a bit more. Roman didn't look like he appreciated that answer very much, but the man didn't argue with him."

"1803

Of all the things on his to-do list, Hector knew that figuring out how to handle Leo was pretty much the top priority. Thankfully, he still had time, but that didn't stop him from thinking about how catastrophically horrible things could become if negotiations with Leo broke down. Maybe it had been a mistake to direct him back to Atreya.

Agh. It was too late for regrets. That kind of thinking was useless at this point, he felt.

And it wasn't like the situation was hopeless, either. Far from it. He already had a few ideas about how to approach the Leo problem, and he had a feeling that talking to the Queen would help clarify his thinking. He could hardly imagine what would come out of that conversation. After the mayhem in both Sair and the Undercrust, it now felt like a lifetime had transpired since his last encounter with the Queen.

Not to mention, he had no idea how she was going to react to everything that he had to tell her. He'd previously been concerned that she would simply be angry that he had brought so many fugitives from the Vanguard into her country, but now, a part of him was worried that she would take a stance similar to Roman regarding the Rainlords.

Would she see them as tools to be exploited? Or merely potential allies?

Too many unanswerable questions. He didn't want to get lost in pointless worrying. He didn't have time for that. He barely even had time for sleep.

It had been a long day of meetings, and now that it was over, he felt a different kind of exhausted. Not so much physical--though that was certainly there, too--but mental. He wondered if he'd talked more today than he had in any other day in his life. It seemed quite possible, but he was way too tired to devote any more brain power to the notion.

He was preparing for bed in his own room--properly preparing for it with silky pajamas and everything for the first time in ages--when a knock arrived at his door.

Garovel wasn't immediately around to tell him who it was, and he had also removed the Scarf and lain it on the nightstand by his bed. Momentarily, he considered grabbing it and trying to discern the identity of the knocker thereby, but then he just shook his head and said, "Who is it?"

"Selena Cortes," came a young and feminine voice.

Holy fucking shit, a girl was at the door to his bedroom.

"I don't know if you remember me, Lord Goffe, or if I'm bothering you--ah, er--if I am, just tell me, and I'll leave you alone."

Unsurprisingly, Hector had no idea what to say. Should he even say anything? Should he open the door? Should he tell her to open the door? Should he cry to Garovel for help like a goddamn baby? He was unclear."

"1804

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

He heard Selena clear her throat.

"...Um," she said, "I just wanted to thank you for saving me the way you did. And, um. To apologize for my behavior. And for my... ah... for... er..."

Maybe if he just sat here on the edge of the bed and didn't move, she would forget he'd said anything and think the room was empty.

"...Well, um. Sorry. Again." Her voice was fading a little, as if she were moving away from the door. "And thank you. Again. Uh... hmm..."

Hector waited. Hector listened.

After a while of persistent silence, he was fairly sure that she was gone. He decided to grab the Scarf and check.

Yeah. She was gone.

Phew.

He relaxed.

Then he realized how fucking pathetic that just was.

Aw, dammit. He definitely should've talked to her. That was super rude.

He sighed and laid down. He'd have to find her and try to talk to her tomorrow. Probably not to apologize, though. He felt like that would just make things even weirder, considering she only came here to thank him. But he could at least check in on her. He seemed to recall some weirdness with her reaper. It was all kind of a blur, though. Garovel would probably remember.

So many things to worry about. So many people to worry about. Somehow, he was feeling even more overwhelmed now than he had during any of the battles he'd been in recently.

That probably wasn't normal, he figured.

Soon enough, he let his fatigue take over and fell asleep. Deep and dreamless.

It was not Garovel who awoke him, however.

"Get up, Hector."

He opened his eyes to see the not wholly welcomed face of Zeff Elroy there at the foot of his bed.

"It's time to train," the Lord Elroy said.

What time was it? Ugh, actually, he didn't even care. Garovel was the one in charge of his schedule, not Zeff, so Hector just rolled over and snuggled into his sheets. "No, it isn't. Go away..."

"Hmph. I'll give you this one warning. You can get up. Or I can douse you in ice water. Your choice."

Hector groaned and sat up. "Are you training me to hate you? Because, if so, then..."

“Get dressed.”

“Fine...”

Hector dragged himself out of bed, threw on some light clothes that he didn't mind getting destroyed, and followed Zeff downstairs. “Shouldn't you be with your family, right now?”

“They're resting.”

“You should be, too.”

“I am not tired.”

“Bullshit.”

Zeff paused in the middle of the stairs to throw him a look of disapproval.

Hector merely returned the man's gaze flatly.

They continued on, all the way down into the main courtyard.

A few people lingered about, all familiar Rainlord faces, though Hector couldn't have put names to pretty much any of them. Zeff led him to the edge of the courtyard--and then over the cliff and out onto the lake.”

”1805

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

The Lord Elroy materialized a layer of ice over the lake for them to stand on. It was still clear enough for Hector to make out the sunken buildings below their feet, but it wasn't cracking or feeling unstable at all.

It was pretty slippery, though, which Hector didn't appreciate very much.

“Try adding spikes to your shoes,” Zeff advised him.

Good idea. Hector did so. He was a little worried that the spikes would weaken and destabilize the ice, but Zeff apparently wasn't. And Hector supposed it wouldn't be too big of a deal if they fell into the lake, either.

They ventured out rather far, until Hector nearly couldn't make out the amber lights of Warrenhold's main courtyard anymore.

"I believe I promised you an explanation the other day," said Zeff after they'd come to a stop.

Hector tried to remember what he was referring to. "...For that trapping technique that Leo used."

"Yes. Would you like to hear it now?"

"Ah--sure."

"Very well. First, put one hundred cubes in orbit around yourself."

Uh. One hundred? He'd never done that many, so he--

"Do not look so uncertain," said Zeff. "After witnessing your battle with that worm, I am sure you can do it."

"Er, alright..."

He focused. Orbital cubes. Dozens. He had the Scarf of Amordiin to help him sense all of them, so it was relatively easy to keep track. As the number climbed, though, he did notice it becoming more difficult.

No surprise there.

As instructed, he reached one hundred, and opened his eyes again.

Zeff was staring. "Remarkable... in Babbadelo, you could hardly keep thirty in orbit, and now, you can do this. How many times did you achieve emergence?"

"Uh...? Er, just once."

"Hmm."

Hector wondered if he should tell him about the Scarf. Obviously, emergence had played a role here, but much of this current feat was attributed to the Scarf, too, he knew.

Eh, Garovel had told him to keep it a secret, though. He supposed he shouldn't--

"That scarf is special in some way, no?" said Zeff.

Well, shit.

"You have been wearing it ever since we left Himmekel. Is it somehow factoring into your ability to materialize?"

Hector kept his mouth shut. He wanted to just come clean, but he also wanted to do as Garovel had told him. He ended up just kind of clenching his jaw and waiting.

"...I see," said Zeff, sounding calmer than Hector might have expected. "Yes. You would be wise to keep such information to yourself. Perhaps I would wish to take it from you, hmm?"

For a moment, Hector just stared at him. "...What makes you think one emergence wouldn't be enough?" he said.

Zeff folded his arms. "While it is true that emergences can vary in power, there is generally considered to be a limit to how far one can go in a single leap."

"1806

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

A limit, huh? Hector found that a little strange, considering emergence itself was all about superseding limitations.

"Now," said Zeff, "the explanation of Leo's trapping technique."

Hector paid close attention.

"As I said before, it is extremely advanced, beyond even my own capabilities. This is because it requires a 'reaction state.'"

"Is that what it sounds like?"

"More or less. The principle is essentially the same as that of applying velocity states. The added difficulty comes from the properties being applied. With velocity states, the application is simple. Comparatively. You apply a blanket speed to the materialized object, and that is all."

"I've, uh... I've found that applying velocity states feels like giving my iron a command.”

“Is that so? Hmm. I suppose that makes a degree of sense.”

“It’s not really like covering it in a blanket or whatever...”

“I wasn’t saying that you should cover it in a blanket. That was merely a description of--agh, nevermind. The crux of the matter is applying a reaction state is essentially the same.”

“So... it’s only the ‘reaction’ part that’s different?”

“What?”

“I mean, you’re saying that applying the ‘state’ part is the same, so it’s the ‘reaction’ part that’s the problem.”

Zeff hesitated. “That is... one way of thinking about it, I suppose.”

Hector hoped he wasn’t misunderstanding something here. He also kinda wished Asad was here to help explain some of this. “So what is it about the ‘reaction’ part that makes it so much more difficult than the ‘velocity’ part?”

Zeff just kind of looked at him for a second, and Hector briefly wondered if the man was about to tell him that he was complete fucking moron or something. “...The reaction part, as you say, instigates a change in your material in accordance with a specified stimulus in the environment. In the case of Leo’s trap, that stimulus was pressure. The reason this is more difficult is because it is so much more complex than simply adding velocity.”

“Hmm.”

“And to make matters worse, it has been demonstrated that the scale of the challenge differential in the application of these higher states is exponential instead of linear.”

Hector’s brow lowered. “Ah... uh, w-what?”

Zeff opened his mouth, then closed it again, perhaps rethinking what he was about to say. He unfolded his arms, then refolded them. “In other words... ah... reaction states are unreasonably more difficult to apply than velocity or temperature states are. And the more complex the reaction, the more unreasonably difficult it becomes.”

“Oh. Uh. Okay...” Why hadn’t he just said that?

"I am not going to make you practice it--or even attempt it, for that matter."

Hector nodded. That was fine. He kinda wanted to mess with it on his own, anyway. Assuming, of course, that he would ever be able to find the time to dick around with materialization again."

"1807

"Hmph. It seems these hundred cubes are not pushing you very hard."

Oh, right, the cubes. He'd almost forgotten about them. Almost. They were still orbiting around him, all small enough that they didn't obstruct his normal vision very much. He had relegated them to a background thought process while listening to Zeff's explanation.

"Perhaps we should try increasing the volume," said the Lord Elroy.

A thought occurred to Hector. Truthfully, it had occurred to him a while ago, and he'd been looking for an opportunity to bring it up. Now seemed like a good time, because he didn't want to get lost in training and forget it later. "Ah--before that, there's something I want to ask you. It's about your, uh... your niece, I think? Selena Cortes?"

Zeff's expression hardened. Somehow. "What about her?"

Aw, shit, maybe he was butting in where he shouldn't. It might've been wiser to consult Garovel again before asking Zeff about it.

Well. Too late now.

"...Is she... ah... I mean, is she okay?"

"What are you talking about?"

"Ah... Well, uh. Maybe it's nothing, but I kinda got the impression that she and her reaper weren't getting along."

Zeff turned back toward Warrenhold, thinking.

Hector tried to recall why he'd gotten that impression. Oh yeah. "Garovel and I overheard her reaper yelling at her. Pretty harshly, too, I thought. But, er, I could be mistaken. I don't really, uh..."

Zeff was looking at him like he was contemplating murder.

“...I don’t really know much about them,” Hector finished.

“What was said, exactly?” said Zeff.

“I... don’t remember. It happened during the fight after the train derailed. It was super chaotic. I’m sure the reaper had reason to be stressed out. I mean, we all did...”

“Garovel overheard it as well, you said?”

“Yeah.”

“Please call him over to us, then.”

Oh, boy. Hector did as the man asked, and it wasn’t much longer before Garovel joined them.

‘Ah, yes,’ the reaper said after Zeff asked him about it, ‘I have actually been looking into this matter, myself, though I have been trying to be discreet about it.’ He glanced at Hector.

“Mm,” said Zeff. “And have you learned anything?”

‘Your sister, Joana, mentioned that Selena has been having a rough go of it. I couldn’t get any details out of her without tipping my hand, unfortunately--’

“The girl has been suffering from depression,” said Zeff. “She has also...” He paused. “Well, suffice to say, she has indeed been having a rough go of it, as you said. What were the exact words that Ojarea used when you and Hector overheard her yelling at Selena?”

‘Her exact words to her were, “God, you’re so useless. I can’t believe I ended up with such a--” And that was it. I got the impression that the reaper hadn’t intended for us to hear even that much and so cut herself off before saying anything more. I could have been reading too much into it, though.’

"1808 -- CXCI.

Zeff glowered. "Thank you for informing me of this." He eyed Hector again. "I'm afraid today's training has been canceled. If you are free later in the day, I will make time for you." He turned and started walking back toward the castle.

Hector and Garovel followed. "W-what are you planning to do?"

"Talk to my sister."

'Is that all?' said Garovel.

"For the moment."

'Hmm. Well, if you do end up deciding to do anything drastic, I would advise you to talk to Axiolis about it first.'

"I do not need you to tell me that." After a beat, he added, "However, I appreciate your desire to help. Thank you."

The walk back to Warrenhold was a long and uncomfortable one.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-One: 'In times of peace and revival...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...126 years ago...

The Wall of Montero was a sight to behold. It was taller than any of the buildings in the city itself, and in the evening sun, it had a kind gentle shimmer--a sparkle, even. That was the product of millions of tiny crystals embedded into its otherwise yellow sandstone.

Parson Miles sat at the top of it, inside one of its turreted watchtowers.

He was not alone, however. A plump, raven-haired woman sat with him, enjoying a mostly-melted mixture of chocolate and vanilla ice cream from a big, wooden bowl.

And enjoying it loudly. As she often did.

"...Mmmm!"

"...Darling--" Parson tried.

“Mm-mmm-mmm!”

He just shook his head faintly, though he didn't avert his eyes from his work. A watchman's job was usually a solitary one, but this woman had made such a fuss about being left home alone all day that Parson had eventually been convinced to bring her along. She had a way of wearing him down with cuteness. And occasionally a bit of guilt-tripping, but mostly cuteness.

“Are you sure you do not want any of this?” she asked.

“I'm certain,” he said, still not looking away.

“Are you suuure?”

He could see her pushing a spoonful toward him in his peripheral vision. Then he felt it bump against his cheek. “Erisa.”

She pulled back. “Oookay. Have it your way. However, I sincerely do not understand how anyone could dislike sweets.”

“I don't dislike them. It's just that I'm working, right now.”

“You can eat and watch the horizon at the same time. It's not like it's going anywhere.”

“Darling, you said you wouldn't be a distraction.”

She sighed. “Alright...”

She lasted about ten minutes.

“It's just, you never eat sweets. And it makes me feel self-conscious, because I end up eating them all by myself and feeling like a fat cow.”

“I eat them sometimes.”

“Not enough times!”

“Maybe I want to make sure that there is enough for my lovely wife.”

“Oh, that's sweet. Horseshit, but sweet. You didn't even like our wedding cake.”

“It was coconut.”

“You couldn't even taste the coconut!”

"I could."

"1808 -- CXCI.

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Zeff glowered. "Thank you for informing me of this." He eyed Hector again. "I'm afraid today's training has been canceled. If you are free later in the day, I will make time for you." He turned and started walking back toward the castle.

Hector and Garovel followed. "W-what are you planning to do?"

"Talk to my sister."

'Is that all?' said Garovel.

"For the moment."

'Hmm. Well, if you do end up deciding to do anything drastic, I would advise you to talk to Axiolis about it first.'

"I do not need you to tell me that." After a beat, he added, "However, I appreciate your desire to help. Thank you."

The walk back to Warrenhold was a long and uncomfortable one.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-One: 'In times of peace and revival...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...126 years ago...

The Wall of Montero was a sight to behold. It was taller than any of the buildings in the city itself, and in the evening sun, it had a kind gentle shimmer--a sparkle, even. That was the product of millions of tiny crystals embedded into its otherwise yellow sandstone.

Parson Miles sat at the top of it, inside one of its turreted watchtowers.

He was not alone, however. A plump, raven-haired woman sat with him, enjoying a mostly-melted mixture of chocolate and vanilla ice cream from a big, wooden bowl.

And enjoying it loudly. As she often did.

“...Mmmm!”

“...Darling--” Parson tried.

“Mm-mmm-mmm!”

He just shook his head faintly, though he didn’t avert his eyes from his work. A watchman’s job was usually a solitary one, but this woman had made such a fuss about being left home alone all day that Parson had eventually been convinced to bring her along. She had a way of wearing him down with cuteness. And occasionally a bit of guilt-tripping, but mostly cuteness.

“Are you sure you do not want any of this?” she asked.

“I’m certain,” he said, still not looking away.

“Are you suuure?”

He could see her pushing a spoonful toward him in his peripheral vision. Then he felt it bump against his cheek. “Erisa.”

She pulled back. “Oookay. Have it your way. However, I sincerely do not understand how anyone could dislike sweets.”

“I don’t dislike them. It’s just that I’m working, right now.”

“You can eat and watch the horizon at the same time. It’s not like it’s going anywhere.”

“Darling, you said you wouldn’t be a distraction.”

She sighed. “Alright...”

She lasted about ten minutes.

“It’s just, you never eat sweets. And it makes me feel self-conscious, because I end up eating them all by myself and feeling like a fat cow.”

“I eat them sometimes.”

“Not enough times!”

"Maybe I want to make sure that there is enough for my lovely wife."

"Oh, that's sweet. Horseshit, but sweet. You didn't even like our wedding cake."

"It was coconut."

"You couldn't even taste the coconut!"

"I could."

"1809

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

"Agh, could you at least look at me when you are talking to me?" said Erisa.

"You know I can't," said Parson. "My job is to not take my eyes off the field in front of me."

"Hmph. Honestly, what could possibly happen if you looked away for two seconds?"

Oh, what an innocent creature, she was. That was what he loved about her, though. Not a cynical bone in her body, not a jaded thought in her head. He just smiled to himself and kept watching.

She wasn't entirely unjustified in her annoyance, however. She knew how old he was despite his appearance. She knew how powerful he was. No doubt, she thought this kind of work to be below a regional captain of the Vanguard.

And indeed, it was. But they were short-handed. Abolish had struck a major blow in Korgum two years ago, and Parson had been forced to send most of his men there as reinforcements. Now, he had to either help pick up some of the slack around here himself or let the weaknesses in the city's security get worse.

It didn't help matters that Calthos as a whole was in a state of disarray, either. Montero, being the capital, may have been the safest place in the country, but that was really only due to the Wall.

Parson knew very well that if something were to happen here-- something beyond mere civil unrest and political turmoil--then the task of protecting the city would fall largely upon his shoulders.

His and Overra's.

It had only been four years since he and she had finally become capable of using pan-rozum. With that, had come his promotion to regional captain from a normal captain, but even now, he wasn't entirely confident in his ability to control that power. Pan-forma, though less powerful, was still much more comfortable and useful, he felt. And he and Overra could maintain it for a much longer period of time, as well.

But that was something that they needed to work on, he knew. Pan-rozum, as one might expect of the most difficult and advanced of all the hyper-states, was incredibly flexible and held such potential that even some of the strongest people in the world said that they felt as though they had hardly scratched the surface of what pan-rozum could theoretically make possible.

The problem, they usually said, was practice. Pan-rozum was so much more taxing on both the body and soul than any of the lesser hyper-states that even just maintaining it for long enough to test anything out would leave the servant and reaper unconscious for days.

Until they neared that crucial one hundred year marker, apparently.

From what Overra had been telling him, one hundred years was widely considered the "turning point" for any servant and reaper pairing. The level of soul-synchronization around that time would begin opening many doors.

Which was why it was their goal.

Overra, Nerovoy, and Feromas' goal."
"1810

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Over these last fifty years, Overra had remained somewhat cagey when it came to what she had actually meant by what she'd said to him on that fateful night when she'd first revived him--that Parson,

Damian, and Germal would “change the world.”

She had offered him bits and bobs of the plan, usually just enough to placate him whenever he grew bold enough to broach the subject, but it wasn't until quite recently that she had finally deigned to share more details with him.

The infiltration of the Vanguard and Abolish was only the first step. And the longest step, of course. It was a slow game that they were playing, but it wasn't just about acquiring power and influence. It was also about learning and growing as a servant. As a person, even.

‘That is the most important aspect of this all,’ Overra had told him. ‘And that is why I have not wanted to go into too much detail for so long-- because I wanted you to focus on yourself, honing your abilities and your intellect. You're still not quite there yet, I'd say, but I honestly do think that you have the potential to be a great leader, Parson.’

‘A leader?’

‘Yes. The kind of leader that this world badly needs, in fact.’

‘And what kind of leader is that?’

‘One who will not avert his gaze from the horrors and instead understands the utility of them in the pursuit of greater interest.’

He hadn't needed to ask what “greater interest” she was referring to. She'd told him that much long ago.

True peace. That was what she was after. An end to the eternal war between Vanguard and Abolish.

‘The Vanguard is wonderful and necessary,’ said Overra, ‘but it is also blind, at times. Sermung, as much as I love him and Tenebrach--they simply aren't suited to the role. And I don't blame them for that, either, because almost no one is. Sermung's rise to power was largely an accident. He didn't outwit or outcompete his contemporaries. He simply outlived them. They mostly killed each other or gave up.’

‘You truly think I can do a better job of leading the Vanguard than Sermung?’

‘Not in your current state, no. But in time? Absolutely.’

‘How can you sound so certain of that?’

‘Because. There is one thing that I have never told you, Parson. The darkest secret of the Vanguard.’

Parson had been hoping at that point that she was simply joking, but her tone did not suggest that at all.

‘But now, I think I can tell it to you.’

‘Hmm. Not that I don’t appreciate the thought, but why now? Why have you waited so long?’

‘I needed time to examine your thoughts. To come to know your heart. And I now feel that I do know you. Perhaps even better than you know yourself.’”

"1811

Parson recalled, then, an occasionally odd feeling whenever he and Overra had merged for pan-forma--and more recently pan-rozum. It had been a feeling like someone was present in the back of his mind, digging through him. That someone had been Overra, of course. He’d come to that conclusion rather early on, but now he was thinking on that feeling again. It hadn’t been constant. In fact, it had been rather infrequent. But he remembered it giving him a strange and uncomfortable sensation, like that of entering his home and finding a stranger there.

Overra hadn’t been a stranger, obviously, but the feeling remained the same, nonetheless.

Remembering that made him realize. She had been using their time together in hyper-states all these years for this very purpose. To examine the darkest recesses of his mind and discover who he truly was, beneath it all.

That was not a very comforting realization, to say the least, but he supposed there was nothing to be done about it. He felt as if he had come to know Overra similarly well, himself. Not completely, perhaps, but he had more than merely glimpsed the twisted darkness within her. And not just from sharing minds with her, either. He’d seen it even in her outward behavior and especially in her actions.

She could be almost inhumanly brutal and uncompromising, Parson knew.

But even further down, beneath even that darkness, existed a wondrous light.

He didn't know how else to conceptualize it. Perhaps that was a gross oversimplification. In fact, it almost certainly was. But because of that, there was no one he trusted more in this world than her.

He wondered if that was a consequence of soul-synchronization or simply a product of knowing her for nearly fifty years.

'This secret,' she continued, 'is something that you must never tell anyone else. You understand? Even if you think they might know of it already, do not speak of it.'

'Okay... What is it? Is it honestly that bad?'

She had taken her time answering. It had seemed, even, as if she might decide to change her mind and not tell him after all.

But at length, she finally did.

'Sermung is looking for a way to die.'

Those words had stuck with him. As had the ones that followed them.

'Much of the reason I am doing this is motivated by that knowledge,' said Overra. 'Sermung is one of the greatest heroes in the history of humanity--and a dear friend, besides. He doesn't let it show, for obvious reasons, but I know for a fact that he is at his psychological limit. And has been for some time now. I would like to help him find peace, if I can.'

Parson didn't need her to explain the implications of this information.

If Sermung died, Abolish would run rampant as perhaps never before.

At times, Parson had certainly felt as if the weight of the world were resting upon his own shoulders, but for Sermung?

For Sermung, that was actually true.

And everyone knew it."

"1812

Parson had argued with her. The idea that he could be the one to replace Sermung...

Well, it was absurd, quite frankly. He was far too young, and there were obviously many more people who were better suited to the task.

'No, there really are not,' she'd told him. 'There aren't many Vanguardians with useful ties to anyone in Abolish. When the time comes, you will see. It will be just like I said. You three boys will help us change the world.'

And she rebuffed any attempt Parson made to reason with her. She had a counterargument for everything, praise for every expression of insecurity, and confidence in her plan.

Her goal was set. And it had been so for many long years, it seemed--since before she had even met him.

Even now, sitting next to Erisa like this while trying to focus on his work, he couldn't fully extricate those thoughts from his mind. They were almost always there, in the back, lingering, looming.

A great and terrible shadow of the future.

He didn't know if he would be able to handle it. He didn't know if he would be able to live up to Overra's expectations or be the kind of man that she apparently thought he was.

He wondered how the others were holding up. Parson felt at times as though, of the three of them, he was the one having the easiest time. Germal had undergone such a radical personality transformation over the years that Parson hardly even recognized him. It was almost impossible to believe that he was the same bratty kid who used to follow him around all the time.

And Damian?

Damian had to deal with the Mad Demon. If what he'd told Parson was true, then he was living in a state of almost perpetual fear, never quite knowing if Morgunov would simply snap and decide to torture or kill him.

Everyone had advised Damian and Feromas to give up on their strategy, to come up with some alternate means of infiltrating Abolish, perhaps alongside Germal, but the pair refused every time. Hellish though it was, they said, they were learning a lot from the madman, and they were convinced that they were genuinely earning his trust, as well.

Parson didn't see how any of that knowledge would be useful if they ended up dead.

It had to be said, however, that the greater plan was finally beginning to bear fruit. Only slightly, perhaps, but fruit nonetheless.

Only six years ago, while he was working in Kavia, Parson had managed to successfully evacuate an entire town after receiving word from Damian that the Devil's Knife was on his way to seize it.

And two years ago, Parson had managed to avert disaster here in Montero when Germal sent him word that a platoon of Abolish soldiers planned to enter the country by haphazardly digging an underground network.

Parson had informed Air Marshal Artemis of this "discovery," and together, they had crushed the assault before it even had a chance to attack anyone."

"1813

Those victories had given Parson some much needed encouragement after the Breaking of Korgum, which was what they had begun calling Dozer's first invasion into the once prosperous nation. That was fifteen years ago now, though it hardly seemed like it, Parson thought. And despite the fact that the invasion itself had ultimately failed, the Breaking had not.

Korgum was a perpetual battleground now.

Tensions between the two nations had been high since the beginning--since Dozer had taken over the now defunct nation of Olotes, renamed it after himself, and begun implementing all manner of aggressive foreign policy with regard to the country's neighbors.

Despite the Vanguard's best efforts over the last century, the NRD--the Nualist Republic of Dozer--had steadily been gaining in power, even after its "defeat" at the hands of Korgum and the Vanguard.

Even now, it seemed as though Dozer might decide to launch another full scale invasion at any time. Smaller skirmishes were frequent occurrences, and the Korgumites were constantly struggling to maintain a hold on their resources and supply lines.

Perhaps Dozer preferred it this way. For several years now, he was keeping the Vanguard quite busy without actually investing all that much in the war effort himself. Overra was of the opinion that this left him free to conduct other, stealthier operations elsewhere in the world, unmolested by the notoriously interventionist Vanguard. This would also explain why the NRD's strength appeared to be growing especially quickly in recent years.

Parson bought into Overra's theory as well, but thus far, Germal and Nerovoy had been unable to confirm it for them.

More and more, as he'd grown older, Parson had begun to see his reaper's perspective of things more clearly. She was always concerned first and foremost about the bigger picture. That was something that she had been trying to drill into his thick head for quite a long time now, and he'd often resisted her efforts.

Even now, he was doing so. His marriage to Erisa had not been met with approval from Overra. Instead, the reaper had tried to warn about the dangers of getting attached to non-servants, the weight of the responsibility he would be taking on, and the fleetingness of love.

And yet, Overra hadn't tried to outright forbid him from marrying Erisa, either. Which, quite frankly, Parson had found surprising. The reaper hadn't been shy about forbidding him from doing other things in the past, like drinking and visiting brothels, so he wondered why she hadn't pulled that trigger this time.

Perhaps she'd considered it an unwinnable battle. Perhaps she could tell that he genuinely did love this woman and that no "rule" was going to stand in his way.

Whatever the case, Parson was now just trying to be grateful for the time that he had with Erisa. He'd lived long enough as a servant to know that it wouldn't last forever.

He knew that Overra's warnings were not without their merit. As was frequently the case."

"1814

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

He didn't want to think about it. Erisa was still young. Barely even in her thirties. When the time came...

No. That was not today's concern. Or even tomorrow's. That was a lifetime away.

He just needed to stay focused on the task at hand. It may have been tedious watchman's work, but that was fine. It was similar to meditation, in a way, requiring discipline of the mind. Patience. Attentiveness.

Those were not qualities his wife possessed.

"Ugh! I don't know how you can do this all day, dove!"

"I told you that you would be bored, my dear."

"Oh, don't give me that! Entertain me!"

"No."

"Wah...? How dare you."

"Feel free to return home at any time. It will not be getting any more exciting than this. I promise you." If he'd actually expected there to be any 'excitement' today, he wouldn't have agreed to letting her accompany him.

"You really know how to kill the mood, don't you?"

For a moment, Parson considered telling her that he was accustomed to killing a lot more than just moods, but he thought better of it. A year ago, he might've said that to her, but after the passing of her mother, things had changed. Now he felt as though saying something like that would just make Erisa worry. And for all her talk, Parson knew that his poor wife certainly didn't need any more of that in her life, right now.

"Couldn't you just loosen up a little?" she was saying. "You're so tense all the time. It's not good to go through life like that. You'll drive yourself mad, dove."

Parson recognized that familiar lilt in her voice. A faint hint of sincerity.

Of concern. It was sometimes difficult to parse out from all of her snarky and less serious overtones, but he'd gotten better at picking up on it recently, he felt. "Isn't that what I have you for?"

"Oh? I thought you just kept me around to cook your meals and wash your uniforms."

"Those do come first, yes."

"Hmph. One day, you'll see that I'm right. You'll look up and realize that life is just like this here ice cream. You'll realize that you've let it melt."

"That doesn't seem to have stopped you from finishing it."

"How do you know I've finished it? You haven't so much as glanced at me this whole time."

"I assumed you were done after I stopped hearing you licking the bowl clean."

"...Alright, smart guy. Yeah, I finished my ice cream. Now why don't you go fetch me some more? Like a good husband and provider?"

"Tempting, but I think I shall continue watching for invaders from the south."

"Don't you have peons for that sort of thing?"

"I have you."

"1815

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

"Oh, ha-ha. But I'm being serious. Where are all your men? I've hardly seen any of them around. Not even that handsome one with all the muscles."

In spite of himself, Parson turned and glared at her. Then he remembered his work and returned his eyes to the empty field ahead.

"Hah. Made you look."

He growled. "Woman. Supper had best be ready by the time I get home, tonight."

She laughed. "It will, dove. Which reminds me. I need to go to the market, today. I was hoping you'd come with me, actually."

"Can't."

"Tch. You don't mind Lerotos sprouts, then, do you?"

"Of course I mind Lero--"

'North entrance,' interrupted Overra's silent voice. 'Come quickly.'

'On my way.' He stood immediately and gave his wife a peck on the cheek. "Back soon."

"Where are you--?!"

"No sprouts!" He leapt out of the watchtower and down onto the top of the Wall.

It was a long drop, but his body held fast, and he ran along the Wall at top speed, looking for a safe place to jump down. He wasn't concerned about himself, but rather the crowd of pedestrians there. If he dropped down that far, the impact would doubtless crush several hapless people.

The street below was far too crowded, however, and he couldn't see a safe or quick way down from here. So it was going to be annoying, but he decided that he would use the rooftops.

The nearest roof was a good twenty meters away, much too far to jump normally, but with his ability, it was doable.

Transfiguration was an irritating power, however. Without Overra present, it required him to sacrifice body parts in order to be useful, which could be quite the downside at times like this.

To accommodate, Parson had devoted much of his training over the years toward trying to mitigate the amount of bodily mass required for each use of his ability. Twenty years ago, he might've needed to sacrifice both legs in order to propel himself with enough force to make such a leap, but now, he needed only sacrifice the epidermal layer and blood. It hurt like hell, of course, but that was no new thing. Pain was more common in this life than not for a transfiguration user.

As he soared through the air, his shoes and socks slipped off and flew away from him. That, too, was an annoyingly common occurrence. He was beginning to think that he should simply stop bothering to wear socks and shoes altogether. It was just a shame that he had to be mindful of his appearance as a ranking officer of the Vanguard."

"1816

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

He rushed onward to the northern end of Montero. It was quite a distance, but the rooftop route offered a clear path, at least, and he could boost himself along with extra surges of oxygen from his skinless feet. If he hadn't had so much experience with this technique, he would've had much more trouble keeping his balance, let alone compensating for the uneven footing on the top of all these buildings.

'How urgent is it?' he asked Overra along the the way, wanting to know if he should push himself harder and sacrifice even more of his flesh to transfiguration.

'I can't tell,' said Overra. 'It's just a man outside the city gates. I don't recognize him, and his movements are a bit odd.'

At that information, Parson decided to heighten his pace somewhat. 'Odd in what way?'

'Hunching forward. Clutching his stomach. Taking unsteady steps. The guards aren't sure what to make of him, either. They're talking about going over to him, which I would highly advise against. Please get here before they do something stupid.'

'Very well.' At the edge of the next rooftop, Parson leapt off and then launched himself in mid-air with a pounding explosion of oxygen that replaced both of his legs from the knees down. There was enough force behind it to send him sailing over the entire city, which was why he'd waited until after leaping off the building to invoke it. He knew from experience that a roof such as that one would have caved in completely and perhaps even collapsed the entire structure.

And for a time, he was flying. His long coat and empty pant legs flapped in the rushing wind while he reached the peak of his jump and slowly began arching back down again.

He might've been able to enjoy the far reaching view a bit more if not for the agony of his missing legs.

He was pleased, however, to see to that he had at least managed to estimate the distance correctly, more or less. He only needed to adjust his trajectory with a couple tiny jets of oxygen in order to make it the rest of the way to the northern gate.

Twenty-five years ago, he wouldn't have been able to land safely from a jump of this height. But now he had the control and the power. He sacrificed the rest of his legs in order to create a kind of oxygen cushion for himself to land on and ease his descent and thereby prevent the rest of his body from splatting against the top of the gate.

Overra met him before he even touched down and began invoking the regeneration. While he waited for his legs to return, he held on to the edge of the battlements and looked out in the direction that Overra was pointing.

Indeed, he could see the man she had been talking about in the distance. A fumbling, zigzagging little ant."

"1817

Parson wasn't sure what to make of it. That posture brought to mind the notion of a broken servant, one whose reaper had been killed; but if that were the case here, then this man would have been acting much, much more aggressively instead of merely stumbling around.

Was the man simply ill? If so, he could pose just as much of a threat to the city as an army of ten thousand strong.

The guards along the wall were looking to Parson for direction now.

He wanted to consult with Overra another time, however. 'What do you think?' he asked.

'I'm not happy about it, but I think you're going to have to go talk to him yourself. If he's carrying some sort of plague, we can't risk sending any of the guards.'

Parson had been afraid she was going to say that. She was right, of course, but he knew from personal experience that merely being a servant did not mean that he could wholly disregard all forms of disease and waltz around as he pleased.

That was a common misconceptions among younger servants--and indeed, even among reapers, it seemed. Perhaps it was because reaper themselves were truly immune to disease and therefore did not pay the subject the attention and concern that it was due, but from the servant's end, Parson had found that illness was a hugely complicated and underestimated issue.

Too many young servants seemed to think themselves invincible against the natural world. And yes, while it was true that their reaper could "cure" them of almost any disease by invoking the regeneration or simply resurrecting them from scratch, there was still the very real problem of spreading contagions. Even if servants themselves did not have to worry about a normally fatal illness, they could still spread it to non-servants and annihilate entire cities without even realizing what they had done.

Parson was keenly aware of that issue because it was the pet project of one of his earliest comrades within the Vanguard. Fen Frederick was his name. He hadn't seen him in years, but the man had left such a favorable impression that Parson didn't expect to forget him anytime soon. Moreover, Parson had recently heard about him receiving a promotion to regional captain much like himself, as well as acquiring the nickname of the Surgeon Saint while touring the Ardoran continent.

And so, that was where Parson's mind went as he looked out over the barren stretch of land outside the city and observed the obviously troubled man there. He wondered briefly how Fen would handle this situation. It didn't take him long to realize that he already knew exactly what the man would do.

With his legs under him again, Parson stood and turned to his guards. He pointed at the nearest group. "You three, go fill my position in the Arlick Tower. Watch the border. Don't listen to my wife if she asks you for anything."

There were a few nods and chuckles, and they were off.

"The rest of you, stay here and wait for my order."

"Yes, sir."

"1818

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

Parson made his way down to the ground, taking the stairs this time instead of sacrificing more flesh needlessly. It was slower, but it didn't seem like the stranger was going anywhere. He ordered the heavy gates open, slipped through the crack, then ordered them closed again behind him.

Overra latched onto his shoulder as he made his way over.

The winds were picking up, stirring enormous clouds of dust into the air and obscuring the stranger's silhouette at times as Parson drew nearer.

So bothersome. Such was the weather of Montero, however. It was called the Dusty Jorum for a reason.

"Sir!" yelled Parson over the howling winds. "Sir, are you okay?!"

Only the scratching sound of swirling dirt answered him.

He pressed closer and tried again. "Sir! Do you need help?! Are you unwell?!"

After a flash of passing dust, the man in question was suddenly right there in front of him, close enough to touch.

Parson went rigid as he eyed the man carefully.

Whoever he was, he had the attire of a commoner. Only a ragged tunic and cotton trousers, both caked with dirt. He didn't even have a traveling cloak, though he must have been walking for days to have ended up here, unless he'd gotten separated from a caravan or something.

"Where are you?" the man said in a haggard, desperate tone. "Where are you?"

Parson craned his neck forward a little, trying to examine the stranger's face. "I'm here," he said.

"Where are you? Where are you?" He kept not looking at Parson and instead looking past him--or through him, perhaps.

"Sir, I'm right here," Parson tried. "Can you not--?"

"No. That is wrong. You are wrong. This is wrong. Where is he? Yes, where is he? Where are you? No, where is he? Can you not see me? How far did you go? Did he go?" The man reached a hand out, and Parson recoiled from it.

"Sir, what is your name? Can you tell me?"

The man stopped and looked at his own hand as the wind calmed for a brief moment. Then he looked up at Parson, eyes renewed with light, as if seeing him for the first time. "Yes, it's you."

Parson squinted. "Me? You're looking for me?"

"No. Yes. But no. You are not he. Where is he? Where did he go?"

Parson was growing impatient, and the wind and dust were, too, it seemed. They grew in fury again, making it difficult to hear the confused man over the noise.

Having had just about enough of this windstorm, Parson resorted to pan-forma with Overra.

In an instant, the area burst clear of all dust, and the roaring winds died upon an explosion of transfigured oxygen. He'd expelled it in all directions, save in front, where the poor and confused stranger was standing.

"Sir," he tried again, as Overra melted out of his body again, "can you tell me your name?"

The man was staring at him in rapt attention, now. "...My name is Ettol, cedo."

"1819

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

"Ettol. Okay. Good to meet you, Ettol. I am Parson Miles."

"A pleasure, is it?"

Parson tilted his brow a little. "Y-yes? It is a pleasure to meet you,

yes.”

“Thank you, cedo.”

“You are... welcome. Ettol, do you know where you are, right now?”

“I am searching.”

“Yes, but do you know where you are? Can you tell me what country you are in?”

The man was quiet a moment, perhaps thinking, yet he never removed his gaze from Parson’s face. “Angdolia,” he said.

“Angdolia?” What a confusing answer. Was that even a word? Parson needed to make sure he was understanding what he was hearing. “You think you’re in a country called Angdolia, right now?”

“Yes. This is Angdolia.”

“No,” said Parson slowly. “No, it isn’t. This is Calthos. Do you know where Calthos is?”

Ettol didn’t answer him this time. Instead, he merely looked around, as if examining his surroundings anew.

Parson took a breath. This was going to be an excruciatingly slow and difficult conversation, wasn’t it? “I don’t know what you--”

‘He’s not entirely wrong,’ interrupted Overra privately.

Parson didn’t turn to look at her. ‘What?’

‘Two thousand years ago, this region used to be called Angdolia.’

At that information, he couldn’t help blinking a couple times. ‘What are you saying?’

‘I’m saying exactly what I said. This placed used to be known as Angdolia. Make of that what you will, but ask him something else, first.’

Parson’s expression flickered with sudden doubt mixed among the confusion. “Ettol?”

The man looked at him again. “Yes, Parson?”

That gaze. There was something different in it now, Parson felt. The man's hazel eyes seemed a bit brighter. More open. More alert. More inquisitive, even.

Parson found that strangely unsettling, somehow.

"Why are you wandering around out here by yourself?" asked Parson.

Ettol tilted his head, thinking again. "I am not sure."

"Are you lost?"

"Lost? Perhaps I am. Yes. Lost."

"You said you were searching for someone."

"Did I?"

"...Yes, you did."

"I see. Who am I searching for?"

"I was hoping you would be able to tell me that."

"I see. You are very helpful, aren't you, Parson Miles? Good. That's very good."

Parson's eyes narrowed. "I'm glad you think so. What is your full name, Ettol?"

"Full? Is the name Ettol not full?"

"Assuming Ettol is your first name, then no, it isn't. What is your last name?"

"Ah. You mean like yourself, Parson Miles. I do not think I have one of those. I am only Ettol, I am afraid."

Parson sized the man up another time. His appearance was unremarkable, sure, but there was something about him that he didn't like.

"You seem displeased, Parson Miles."

Parson couldn't really deny that. He didn't wish to admit it, either, however."

"1820

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

"Is there some way that I might be able to improve your dour mood?" said Ettol, smiling now.

Parson took a step back unconsciously. 'Overra...'

'Ask him why his own mood appears to have improved so suddenly.'

It sounded like as good a question as any. "Why do you seem so different from how you were a moment ago?" said Parson. "You were acting very confused before, yet now you're behaving rather cheerfully."

Ettol looked up at the sky as the wind from earlier was beginning to return. "Hmm. You may be right. Perhaps I was lost in more ways than one."

"But now you are not? What changed in so short a time?"

The man gave him another smile. "I met you."

That did little to provide Parson with comfort. "So what? You don't know anything about me."

"That is not true, Parson Miles. I know your name. You told it to me yourself."

"You are beginning to annoy me."

"Am I? Oh dear. I apologize. And here I thought we were getting along quite well. Hmm. I think I will blame the weather. I am not feeling myself with all this fog around."

Parson didn't need to check. "There is no fog here."

"Oh? Curious. That does not bode very well for me, then. I suppose I should get to the point."

"Point? What point would that be?"

"I cannot be quite certain, but I believe that I have come here because of you, Parson Miles."

Somehow, Parson already felt prepared for this conversation to get even stranger. "Is that so?"

"I would have liked to befriend you, but it seems that the best I will be able to manage is an introduction. If I had but more time, perhaps you would not be thinking so poorly of me already. 'Tis a shame."

Parson merely eyed the man dubiously.

Ettol slowly extended a hand, palm up. "I know this may seem odd, but would you mind holding my hand?"

Parson eyed the hand even more dubiously.

'Don't you dare touch that thing,' said Overra privately.

He absolutely agreed, but he would've liked an explanation. 'Why? Do you know who this man is?'

'I haven't the faintest idea, but I do not trust him.'

'That makes two of us, then.'

"Please," said Ettol, extending his hand a little further now. "I will not harm you. And it will only take a moment."

Parson's mind went to his earlier concerns, which had quickly vanished but now would make a suitable justification for this reticence that he was currently feeling. "I mean no offense," said Parson, "but I know nothing about you. You could be contagiously ill."

"Ah..." Ettol frowned. "I see. Would you perhaps change your mind if I told you that touching my hand would allow you a benign glimpse into Chaos itself?"

"1821

"What in the world are you talking about?" said Parson.

"It is a privilege that few have had," said Ettol. "To see beyond what is and into the realm of what could be."

A beat passed, and Parson blinked dully. "Right. Well, I think I'll forego it, just the same. I'm largely content with what is."

"Hmm. Pity. In that case, might I ask you to deliver a message for me?"

"I'm no messenger. I'm sure you can find someone else."

"Not likely. I have little time."

"What do you mean?"

"Please. I am begging you." Ettol's eyes grew abruptly wider, and Parson saw something in them that he had not at all been expecting to see.

Desperation.

"You may be my only hope," said Ettol. "Tell your friend to come find me."

"I have many friends."

"I know not his name. But you and he are bound. You and he and one other." The man smiled again, though it seemed somehow sadder this time. "A trio."

Parson only stared at him.

"You know of whom I speak," said Ettol. "Please, tell him to come find me."

Parson didn't know what was happening here, but he felt abruptly as if this man might not be spouting complete nonsense, after all. And more importantly, he felt as if perhaps there really was a limited amount of time to ask questions. "...Why would I do that?" he decided to say. "Why would I want him to find you?"

"Because I need his help. Your friend is a key unto Chaos, where I am sadly trapped."

Well, that was... somewhat of an explanation. Not a particularly good or believable one, but it was still more than Parson had been expecting, honestly. "Even if that's true, why should he bother helping you?"

"Because, Parson Miles, I can grant your wish."

That was too vague. Parson wasn't buying it. "What wish would that be?"

Ettol looked at him for a long moment. "Why, the wish, of course. To change the world."

Parson was without words. How could he know about that? Who was this man, really? Did Overra--?

"Chaos beckons," said Ettol. "Time is vengeful. Please pass on my message to your friend. Ah, and you may wish to move away from me. This will likely not be pretty. But fear not, for I--" The man's eyes bulged, and he broke for a cough. Then another. And another.

Parson did as he'd been asked and took a few steps back.

Ettol tried to cover his mouth, but upon the next cough, something black and slimy spewed forth, coating his hand and dripping down his arm. He heaved another time, and more blackness appeared, splattering against the dry ground and nearly reaching Parson's feet.

Parson wanted to ask what was happening, but he was too appalled to say anything."

"1822

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Another cough, and the black increased yet again. This time, however, it was different. This time, it didn't splatter anywhere. Instead, it stopped halfway down the length of his arm and retracted.

Then it moved. On its own. Like some sort of tentacle. It stirred and swirled and soon began to coat Ettol's entire body.

Parson could only watch with wide eyes. The way the black goop moved... he'd seen the like before. It was similar to that of those monsters in the Undercrust. Perhaps that was mere coincidence, but he doubted it.

However, as the coating completed, he noticed the blackness begin to shift and change. Where before it had been a liquid-like substance, it now seemed sharper and thinner.

Like a living shadow, perhaps.

That, he had most definitely never seen before, and he had no idea what to make of it, either. It was difficult to tell if the goo itself had transformed into the shadow or if the shadow had simply appeared on its own and encapsulated the goo.

Ettol's pained groans grew quieted, muted behind the coating, and his movements became more rigid and slow, until at length, the man stopped moving altogether.

Parson thought it was done, until the black coating began to change again, this time cracking faintly and turning deeply gray.

Stone, Parson realized, though that did little to alleviate his confusion.

The sludge that had splattered near his feet earlier was still black, he noticed. And it was still moving, too--weakly, perhaps, but moving, nonetheless. It oozed out in all direction, then contracted again into a trembling, uneven lump before repeating the process.

'A pulse, perhaps,' said Overra.

'Hmm?'

'Capture that sludge so that we might have it examined later,' she told him.

Parson knew of a few eager men who would be most interested in doing so. He was not one of them himself, however. 'Capture it, how? I'm not a materializer, and I don't exactly have a glass jar on me.'

'If it is the same material which comprises worms, then such a small amount should be safe enough for you to touch.'

'If.'

'Yes. If.'

'I can also imagine it trying to consume me the way that it consumed him.'

'That is very unlikely.'

'What makes you sound so confident?'

'Look at it. It is hardly moving. It seems to me that it is struggling even to retain its shape.'

'I'm content to let it keep struggling,' said Parson. 'I can't believe you want me to touch it.'

'Where is your courage?'

'Where is your common sense?'

'Hmph. Fine. Do what you will.'

Parson pulled his eyes away from the small sludge pile to look at Ettol--or what remained of him, anyway.

A stone statue.

How strange."

"1823

After a short time, he felt bold enough to step closer to it. Perhaps Overra was right, and he was being overly cautious, but he was in a certain mental state now, in his life as a servant. It was something he'd heard about many times previously but never taken all that seriously. Some called it the Firing Phase or the Goldening Stage.

Put simply, it was the time period in a servant's life when they were beginning to grow powerful enough to witness truly monstrous events, yet not powerful enough to actually take part in them.

The reapers and older servants considered it a kind of rite of passage. All it really did, though, was make Parson see danger around every corner. For all the power he wielded, he was only too aware of how quickly it could be taken from him, either by one of the obscene powerhouses that lived in this world or simply by a stray attack that obliterated Overra in an instant.

Carelessness was all it would take. And fifty years of work, of growth, and of ambition would be snuffed out. Gone.

He'd seen it several times before.

So to say that he was hesitant to get close to the statue of Ettol would be something of an understatement. Of course, he could have told her to go back to the city and wait for him, but separating himself from her had its own dangers, he knew. And she probably wouldn't listen to him, anyway.

The ironic thing was that if he were twenty years younger, twenty years weaker, he would've waltzed right up to that statue without a second's hesitation.

How odd, this kind of strength was.

All the same, he still made the trip over to it, albeit slowly. And once he was near enough, he could hear a noise amid the uneven sound of the varying winds.

Cracking?

Yes. The stone was cracking. He could see it, too. Tiny fissures growing in the otherwise smooth gray surface.

'It's breaking down,' said Overra.

Parson was about to ask why when the statue's left arm fell off. It hit the dirt and clumped apart like ashes.

'Fascinating,' said Overra. 'Try touching it.'

'Be quiet.'

The other arm fell off now and broke apart even more intensely. Parson could see dust trailing off of the statue's head and shoulders in the aggressive wind. It wasn't much longer before the torso gave way, and the whole upper body crumpled to the ground as well.

It was all rather grotesque and more than a little strange, but there was one thing that he was looking for in particular. One thing that was noticeably missing.

The soul.

Parson was more than old enough to see souls that no longer had a body. Obviously, Ettol's body was gone now, but his soul should have remained behind. Yet it was nowhere to be found."

"1824

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Overra noticed the absence of Ettol's soul as well, of course, but she could offer no explanation for it, and after a while longer of observing the statue crumbling to dust, there was nothing left to be done here.

Nothing, that was, except gathering up some of the remains. He'd been afraid of touching the sludge, but this pile of dust seemed safer, somehow. It was just dust, after all. Not some some sort of semi-living abomination of nature.

If he'd known that he would be collecting scientific samples when he came out here, he would have dressed very differently. His overcoat did have an abundance of pockets, but it was hardly an appropriate means of carrying a dead man's ashes.

What a strange day it had turned out to be.

When his pockets were nearly full, his mind returned to the sludge from earlier. He looked over at it, and sure enough, it was still there, still pulsing gently.

He had to admit that he was curious. God help him, he was. After what he'd just witnessed, how could he not be? And he already knew that he had Overra's go ahead...

Maybe just a quick touch.

He started toward it again.

'Oh?' said Overra. 'Are you going to capture it, after all?'

'I'm considering it.'

'Don't let me pressure you into it.'

'What, now you don't want me to?'

'No, I do. Of course I want you to. But I will admit that it may be a bad idea.'

'...Do you have an actual reason for saying that, or is this just a feeling you have?'

'I've just started to recall hearing a few ancient stories where living beings are turned to stone. An hour ago, I would have told you that they were just stories--or, barring that, perhaps the work of servants. But now...?'

'I see. Can you tell me anything more about these stories, then? Specifics?'

'Of course I can. There are several to choose from. Which one would you like to hear?'

'I don't want to hear any of them. I want you to exercise good judgment and inform me of any relevant information that might be contained within them.'

'I am not certain I like your tone.'

'Overra.'

She sighed. 'Oh, very well. If I think about it... then... I suppose there is the Tale of the Stone Prince. In it, a prince who defies the will of heaven is about to become king. But instead, he is turned to stone and watches as his kingdom achieves great prosperity under the tutelage of his blessed younger brother.'

'What part of that story is relevant to our circumstances here?'

'I don't know. I'm still thinking.'

'Overra, please.'

'What? Are you in a rush? The sludge isn't going anywhere, and you want me to get this right, don't you?'

He exhaled. 'Yes. Fine. Take your time. It's not like there's an army in the south that could invade Montero or anything, right?'

'There is that tone again.'

'Just hurry up, would you?'

"1825

'Okay, well, there is also the Tale of the Eternal Mason. In that story, a man strives to become the greatest stonemason who ever lived. Ostensibly, he achieves his goal, but in so doing, he also turns his own body to stone.'

'Not seeing much relevance in that story, either, Overra.'

'I think it is intended to be a cautionary tale about the single-minded pursuit of greatness at the cost of one's own life. Which, while true, is hardly worth its salt as a wise old story, if you ask me. How many people need that kind of advice? Honestly? In general, people are lazy, and much of civilization has been achieved off the labor of a hard working minority. Why, if human beings were naturally hard working, then surely, slavery would never have been invented.'

'Fascinating.'

'Why, thank you. I am glad you genuinely think so and are not being in any way sarcastic.'

'Do you have anything to say that is of actual consequence or use?'

'In that regard, everything I have ever said and will ever say should qualify, I think.'

‘Alright. I give up. I’m just going to dig around it.’

‘Dig around what? Oh, yes, the sludge. I had nearly forgotten it was there.’

‘Overra...’

‘I am only teasing. Lord, I never thought I would be considered the laid-back one in this relationship. Perhaps your wife is right about you being too uptight.’

Parson just sighed and knelt down to get to work. Digging in this harsh ground with his bare hands wasn’t going to be easy--unless he sacrificed some of his flesh to transfiguration, of course. He was reluctant to do so, but he supposed there was no getting around it and decided to start small. He sacrificed only the top layer of skin on his hands in order to create small, pressurized jets of oxygen at the tips of his fingers.

With careful strength, he pressed his hands into the earth and gathered up a pile of dirt around and beneath the pulsing sludge. He lifted it up, and then he had the sludge safely in his left hand.

It was more repulsive close up than he expected. There was a grotesque lumpiness to it that hadn’t been noticeable at a distance.

Surprisingly, it had no smell that he could discern. He’d been expecting a truly horrendous odor.

‘So are you going to touch it or not?’ said Overra.

A good question. The lack of a repulsive smell was making him consider it again. Maybe it was harmless.

A benign glimpse at Chaos itself, huh?

Parson had to wonder what that had meant. He wished now that he would have gotten some manner of clarification.

“Chaos itself” was a particularly interesting choice of words, he felt. Referring to chaos as a single, manifested thing instead of simply a concept--that was something that Parson had heard before.

In one of the doctrines of Abolish. Morgunov’s side, specifically.”
"1826

Every Vanguardian knew the basic tenets of Abolish's various religions. Though they differed in minor ways, they all followed their ancient tripartite mantra of "Pursue Chaos, Sow Destruction, and Reap Death."

He knew that certain sects added in further bits about "Peace at All Costs" or "True Equality for All" or "Salvation in Brimstone"--as if any of that made sense.

It was rare to know details beyond that, however. Parson had been passingly interested in it, at times, if only as a means of better understanding his enemy, but they were such confusing and disorganized bastards that it was difficult to make heads or tails of what most of them actually believed.

If anything at all. Mostly, Parson was of the opinion that all of their religious talk was simply a means of either concealing or excusing their own madness. It was no secret that Abolish attracted the violently insane, after all.

However, Parson had asked Damian and Feromas to explain the Morgunovian religion to him, once. It was called Mawtalla, though it was more widely known as the religion of Chaos.

'There is the Void, and there is Chaos,' Feromas had said. 'While the Void is the ultimate, collective consciousness, Chaos is a specific subset within the Void. It is difficult to explain in a way that makes material or even rational sense, but you can think of Chaos as a "region" within the Void where "dreams" occur. Dreams. And nightmares. A volatile battleground of creativity, if that makes any kind of sense.'

At the time, Parson hadn't thought much of that explanation. It was just one more thing that made Abolish crazy. Not really worth thinking too deeply about.

Now, however... he was feeling less certain.

His right hand wandered up toward the pulsing sludge pile.

This was a terrible idea. He absolutely knew that.

But he wanted to know. He didn't even know what he wanted to know, what sort of answer he was hoping for--or even why he was so curious. But it didn't matter.

He hesitated one last time, right as the freshly regenerated skin of his index finger was about to touch the sludge. He was already resolved to go the rest of the way, but a part of him in the back of his mind was still warning him not to do this, telling him what an idiot he was.

As it turned out, however, his finger didn't have to make the rest of the trip.

The sludge stretched suddenly to meet him.

He didn't even have time to jump or react in any way. His vision flashed to darkness, then to lightness, then back to darkness.

And in an instant, he witnessed more things than his mind was capable of perceiving. A hulking beast with a million faces. A white tower with a million windows. A blue star exploding a million times. A million harps playing in perfect harmony. An army of snakes and an army of angels, all dying a million deaths. A million kings. A million heroes. A million explorers. A million sages, wizards, clowns, virgins, lovers, rebels, mothers. A million. A million? More. Uncountable. Imperceptible. Yet there, in his mind, all the same."

"1827

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

It was all so far beyond him that he didn't even know how to pursue any of it in greater detail. Everywhere he looked was a thread leading into a never-ending hole. And it was all woven together and clashing in a mad kind of tapestry, destroying itself while simultaneously creating new things.

Infinite infinities. All in conflict.

And he felt as if he were part of it as well--or rather, as if it wanted him to be part of it. As if it were trying to suck him in, to send him on an endless journey through unfiltered mayhem.

But that wasn't what was happening. He felt safe somehow, even though that seemed irrational to him. There was a feeling of being on the other side of something. An invisible wall, perhaps. It was like he was watching a lion roar inside its cage, only magnified to an ungodly degree. And he was so close to that cage, practically pressing his face up against it. There was little reason to think that any cage could contain all of that insanity.

And yet it did. The cage that was reality. Preventing the impossible from existing.

No. That wasn't quite right, was it?

Not just the impossible. The possible, as well. That was what it was. Chaos. Both the possible and impossible. He could see it, in places. Things that could exist, hypothetically, but simply didn't. Like that vile tower. Or that crying child. Or that other version of himself, staring back at him like a distorted reflection, screaming in muted agony.

That was about as much as Parson was able to perceive. Chaos merely excluded what was. All else was fair game, it seemed.

But so what?

What utility was there in any of this?

Overwhelming as it all was, as easy as it would have been to lose himself in it, Parson had virtually no trouble in holding himself back. Perhaps the cage of reality played a role in that. Perhaps his own mind. Perhaps both.

Yes.

Yes, that was more likely. Both.

Oddly enough, he felt as if he understood himself a little better now.

Chaos? Dreams and nightmares? Infinity and darkness and monsters and madness?

He was unimpressed.

Reality was what interested him. Could this Chaos affect reality in some way? Because as he stared at it, stared into it, he was getting the feeling that it couldn't.

But perhaps that was strange. Ettol had existed in reality, hadn't he? Perhaps only briefly, but that at least meant that it was possible for Chaos to break through into reality, didn't it?

Or did it?

Ettol mentioned being trapped. Perhaps Ettol himself was real, then? One real thing lost in a ocean of unreal things.

Hmm.

Parson could see why he wanted to leave. What indescribable misery that would be, Parson felt.

So miserable and so indescribable, perhaps, that it would drive a sentient mind to madness. Just perceiving what little of it that he could right now, that was the impression that Parson got. That if not for the cage of reality, that Chaos would be invading his mind and driving him mad.

Yes."

"1828

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

He could practically sense the hunger that dwelt within the Chaos. It was scratching at the cage, trying to reach him, trying to devour him.

Hmm.

So this was what those Abolish fools were always salivating over? He supposed that only made sense. Madmen in love with madness.

Parson, however, had seen his fill and wished to return to reality or to consciousness or wherever his physical body had gone.

And just like that, he did. As suddenly as his vision had changed, it shifted back. He saw the dusty wasteland outside Montero once more, felt the heat of the sun on his skin and the flailing of his coat in the wind.

He looked down at his hands to inspect the sludge again. If such a vision could be induced every time it was touched, then this sample could prove immensely--

The sludge had turned to stone. It, too, was already beginning to crumble. He could hear it cracking and see dust trails escaping from it.

Had he already used up its power?

Damn.

He would keep these ashes, too, but he had a feeling that they wouldn't prove very useful. He wondered if anyone would even believe him after telling them what he had seen just now.

Bah. He could already see the stain to his reputation that such nonsense would have if he went around blabbering about it like a tactless moron. He'd have to be very careful who he mentioned any of this to, he felt.

At length, he started back toward Montero. As confused as he was, his men were probably even more so right about now, though for different reasons.

En route, he remembered that Overra was still there on his back. Maybe she would be able to tell him something. 'Did you manage to see any of that?'

There was no response.

'...Overra?'

Still nothing.

He stopped walking. She was definitely there. He could feel her clinging to him. 'Overra.' He reached over his shoulder and grabbed her with a soul-empowered hand. 'Overra, wake up.'

She did not answer him.

He peeled her off of his back and held her in his hands.

Her ethereal body was shriveled to the point that it was hardly recognizable. She should have been a swirling and perpetually silent tornado, but instead, she was scarcely even a shrunken cloud--and not so much swirling now as just slowly turning. It looked like her body might even cease spinning entirely, what with the way it was struggling.

His eyes widened with urgency. He'd seen this before, when she had been gravely wounded in battle. 'Overra. Overra! Please...!'

And then he realized that he felt somewhat weak, himself. His body was a bit stiff. His muscles felt somehow farther from his brain, as if his orders were taking longer to reach them, as if they might not even be his.

His soul's grip on his body was loosening, he knew. His mind was becoming foggy. Overra must have been even closer to death than he'd thought."

"1829 -- CXCII.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

He sat down on the dry earth. He'd experience this a handful of times before. It was never pleasant. The first time it had happened, he'd just about lost his mind from worry alone. Now, though, it was strangely easy not to panic. Perhaps the dulling of his thoughts was factoring in there. Or perhaps it was just going to be the end, this time.

Well. If it was, it was.

He closed his eyes and meditated, tried to focus his murky mind. He knew that there was essentially nothing he could do at this point.

This was any servant's greatest fear. Any person's, really. This feeling of utter powerlessness and uncertainty. Whether it was the end or not.

Difficult though it was, he knew there was naught he could do now but wait. Either Overra would recover, or she wouldn't. Either he would die along with her, or he wouldn't.

So he waited. And he waited. And he waited.

For the end. Or whatever came next.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Two: 'Dalliance with fortune...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The next few days were a constant mash of maintenance and activity for Hector. He never had any downtime, and indeed, he was beginning to feel like he never would again.

Mornings were usually devoted to training with Zeff, though Asad and a few others frequently joined in. Afternoons were spent checking up on affairs around Warrenhold, meeting with the top Rainlords and Madame Carthrace, and helping out with the restoration project. Evenings, if he had any time left by then, went toward the city of Gray Rock.

It had felt like ages since he'd actually been able to go out and just patrol the city for crime. Which was strange. This was his whole reason for becoming a servant, after all. To help normal people.

Now, though, it felt like a very different activity. Much less stressful. Almost relaxing, even.

No less rewarding, however. He didn't think that helping people in mortal danger would ever stop being that, no matter how much easier it became.

Plus, it made for the best kind of practice, he thought. Field experience, is what Zeff had called it. And it certainly gave him plenty of opportunity to try out various techniques, even just when navigating the city--which was smoother than ever before. With the Scarf of Amordiin and his improving control over materialization, Hector was able to slingshot himself into the air haphazardly and catch himself without having to worry about causing any collateral damage. And of course, honing his flying technique was a priority as well.

Still, it did feel supremely strange that he considered this to be practice, now. This used to be the end goal. The aim. Yet now... it was more like a hobby or something.

The only thing that stopped it from feeling quite like that was the sense of urgency in it, the panicked people he ran into, ones in the midst of being victimized. He could only relax so much when hearing a man screaming for his life inside a burning building or witnessing a terrified shopkeeper being held at gunpoint."

"1829 -- CXCII.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

He sat down on the dry earth. He'd experience this a handful of times before. It was never pleasant. The first time it had happened, he'd just about lost his mind from worry alone. Now, though, it was strangely easy not to panic. Perhaps the dulling of his thoughts was factoring in there. Or perhaps it was just going to be the end, this time.

Well. If it was, it was.

He closed his eyes and meditated, tried to focus his murky mind. He knew that there was essentially nothing he could do at this point.

This was any servant's greatest fear. Any person's, really. This feeling of utter powerlessness and uncertainty. Whether it was the end or not.

Difficult though it was, he knew there was naught he could do now but wait. Either Overra would recover, or she wouldn't. Either he would die along with her, or he wouldn't.

So he waited. And he waited. And he waited.

For the end. Or whatever came next.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Two: 'Dalliance with fortune...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The next few days were a constant mash of maintenance and activity for Hector. He never had any downtime, and indeed, he was beginning to feel like he never would again.

Mornings were usually devoted to training with Zeff, though Asad and a few others frequently joined in. Afternoons were spent checking up on affairs around Warrenhold, meeting with the top Rainlords and Madame Carthrace, and helping out with the restoration project. Evenings, if he had any time left by then, went toward the city of Gray Rock.

It had felt like ages since he'd actually been able to go out and just patrol the city for crime. Which was strange. This was his whole reason for becoming a servant, after all. To help normal people.

Now, though, it felt like a very different activity. Much less stressful. Almost relaxing, even.

No less rewarding, however. He didn't think that helping people in mortal danger would ever stop being that, no matter how much easier it became.

Plus, it made for the best kind of practice, he thought. Field experience, is what Zeff had called it. And it certainly gave him plenty of opportunity to try out various techniques, even just when navigating the city--which was smoother than ever before. With the Scarf of Amordiin and his improving control over materialization, Hector was able to slingshot himself into the air haphazardly and catch himself without having to worry about causing any collateral damage. And of course, honing his flying technique was a priority as well.

Still, it did feel supremely strange that he considered this to be practice, now. This used to be the end goal. The aim. Yet now... it was more like a hobby or something.

The only thing that stopped it from feeling quite like that was the sense of urgency in it, the panicked people he ran into, ones in the midst of being victimized. He could only relax so much when hearing a man screaming for his life inside a burning building or witnessing a terrified shopkeeper being held at gunpoint."

"1830

Madame Carthrace certainly hadn't been exaggerating when she mentioned there being a spike in criminal activity during his absence. Hector could hardly believe how easy it was for Garovel to find people in trouble.

It was worrisome, actually. After the first night, things settled down a little bit but still not to the same extent that they were before he'd left for Sair.

At first, he'd thought it was his fault for leaving. News outlets were explaining it that way, at least. Without the Darksteel Soldier around, the criminal element in the city had felt suddenly emboldened.

But if that were truly the case, then Hector was having trouble understanding why the crime rate wasn't going back down all that quickly now that he'd returned. And it wasn't like those same news outlets were shy about reporting his return, either. It seemed like he saw some news anchor talking about him every time he passed a television.

With all this attention, he'd been rather worried that they would find out that he had been in Sair with the Rainlords, but so far, the news didn't seem to know about that.

According to Asad, he had the Sandlords to thank for that, apparently. He'd been especially worried about his activities in Moaban making the news, but the Hahls Najir, Saqqaf, Duxan, and Shihab had all had a hand in keeping Hector's time in that city quiet.

Hector was grateful, though he knew they hadn't done it for his benefit. The Sandlords had as much stake in preventing the Vanguard from finding out where the Rainlords were as he did. Invariably, if the Vanguard discovered that the Sandlords had facilitated the Rainlords' escape from the country, it would cause the lords of the desert all sorts of problems.

'You shouldn't be too surprised if the news is getting it wrong,' said Garovel. 'Journalists are only human, after all. And with all this newfangled technology of yours, they're lazier than ever.'

In full armor, Hector crouched on the edge of a rooftop. Even just a couple months ago, he probably wouldn't have been able to crouch in armor as heavy as this, but he'd tweaked it enough and gotten so comfortable wearing it that it hardly felt like a hindrance anymore, even without the undead vigor enhancing his strength. 'Uh... are you defending journalists or insulting them?'

'Bit a both, I guess.'

He was watching a man on the far end of the street below. Apparently, the guy had the aura of doom around him, but it wasn't yet clear what the cause was.

Hector hoped the guy wasn't planning to kill himself. Apart from not even knowing how to handle that kind of situation, Hector knew that it would also mean that the aura could persist for months without any other apparent cause.

And that would be something that no amount of skill in materialization would be able to resolve.

'But it makes sense that the crime wave wouldn't be your fault,' Garovel was saying. 'Or at least, not JUST your fault.'

'Why's that?'

'Because of the economic crisis, of course.'

‘Oh yeah. Hmm.’”

"1831

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

‘So unless you plan on taking the blame for the economy, too, then I don’t think this spike in crime can be fully attributed to you,’ said Garovel.

‘That’s... comforting, I guess.’

‘Good. I’m glad you think so. I was worried you were gonna start acting all guilt-ridden and annoying.’

‘Well, uh... I mean, maybe I was working up to it.’

The reaper just snorted.

Hector breathed half a laugh, too. ‘It’s just, I mean... I dunno. I know they were saying it was my fault ‘n everything, but... like, what the fuck was I supposed to have done differently? Just never leave Gray Rock, no matter what? That’s kinda...’

‘Unreasonable?’

‘Y-yeah.’

‘Mm. You make a good point. I’m happy that you’re thinking clearly about this. Blaming yourself for things you can’t control could really end up biting you in the ass, in the long run.’

‘How do you mean?’

‘Well, speaking hypothetically here, if you become overly concerned about messing things up, then you’ll likewise become hesitant to take action when you might otherwise need to. When you might otherwise be able to save someone’s life, for instance. Maintaining a healthy psychological state is important for keeping yourself focused.’

Hmm.

Hector supposed that was true, though he wasn’t so sure that his current psychological state could be considered "healthy." He wasn't sure of a whole lot when it came to his own mind, right now. The issue of Domain was still lingering in the back of head, making him second guess himself every now and then.

It was a discomforting feeling, knowing that his mind had been messed with in some unspecified way. The first time with Rasalased had been bad enough, but he'd more or less worked out what the blessing of Focus was.

At least, he hoped he had. He was getting a little sick of surprises, even theoretically good ones.

But judging by what he knew of Focus, Hector had been wondering if the benefits of Domain would similarly be constrained entirely within his mind. Going by the name--Domain--he'd thought, at first, that it might have something to do with his ability to materialize his iron in the environment. However, he had thus far been unable to discern any changes in his abilities in that regard.

With Zeff's help, Hector had also managed to test out the strength of his soul. But there, too, no noticeable difference had been observed. Neither his field density nor his passive soul defense seemed improved or changed at all.

Of course, it was possible that it was still too early for any changes to be observable, but the effects of Focus hadn't taken all that long to manifest, so Hector wondered what the hold up might be. Or if there was just something else that he was missing.

'Someone's coming,' said Garovel.

'Where?' said Hector.

The reaper pointed in the opposite direction that Hector had been looking, and sure enough, Hector saw a silhouette through a side street."

"1832

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

It was too dark to tell much about the newcomer with just his eyes alone, but Hector was near enough for the Scarf to help him discern some of the details.

Short. Long hair. Long skirt. Slim, feminine figure. And he could sense the shape of her high heels, as well as hear them clicking against the sidewalk's pavement.

Hmm. Hector focused harder and checked inside the purse she was carrying.

Wow, it was full of stuff. And not knowing much about the kinds of things that women carried in their purses, Hector found it a bit difficult to pick out any object in particular, except maybe--

Was that a gun?

He couldn't be sure, but that shape definitely seemed like it could be the barrel of a small pistol. And considering that it was illegal for average citizens to carry firearms in Atreya, that didn't bode especially well.

He'd have to pay close attention. In a place like this, at this time of night, there was a fair chance she was just carrying it for her own protection, even if it was unlawful. Hector wasn't about to judge someone who didn't have the luxury of superpowers on their side for prioritizing their own safety over following the law.

Or hell, maybe she wasn't an average citizen. She could've been an undercover cop or something.

Sticking to the rooftops, Hector tried to stay close to her as she approached the man at the other end of the street. If nothing else, he wanted to stay in range of the Scarf so that he could react in time in case she went for that weapon.

Judging from the man's body language, he had been expecting her.

'Seems like they're going to talk,' said Garovel privately. 'I'll go eavesdrop. Make sure they don't kill me, eh?'

Hector clenched his jaw, wanting to tell the reaper not to, but he held his tongue. In all likelihood, neither of them were servants, and he was paying extra close attention to where their heads were pointing. If either of them turned to look at Garovel, Hector would know it immediately.

Hector waited and observed, ready to move on a moment's notice. The man and woman met below a street lamp and exchanged a few words. Pleasantries, according to Garovel. Neither one seemed to notice the reaper's presence a couple meters away from them.

That was good, of course, but Hector did not allow himself to relax.

Whatever they were talking about, it didn't take very long. The woman handed the man a piece of paper and a small bag, and then walked away, in the opposite direction that she had come from.

'...What was that about?' he had to ask.

'Dunno,' said Garovel. 'They didn't say much. Guess they didn't need to.'

The man was still there, reading the paper that he had been given. Garovel hovered up behind him, no doubt trying to read it as well.

'It's some kind of report,' the reaper said. 'Financial in nature, looks like.'

"1833

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

The man slipped the paper into his coat, and then exhaled noticeably. The night air was cold enough that Hector could see breath, though only faintly.

'Bah,' said Garovel. 'Couldn't tell anything else about it.'

After a short time, the man pulled out a cigarette and a small drink and began partaking of both.

Hector relaxed a little, feeling mildly irritated. 'Back to waiting, I guess...'

'Hmm. Well, I suppose you could just walk up and talk to him, ask him if anything's wrong.

'You really think that'd work?'

'No. Just saying it's an option.'

'I feel like he'd just run away if I did that.'

'I'm sure you'd be able to catch him and make him talk.'

'Uh... he's not a bad guy, Garovel.'

'We don't know that. We don't know anything about him, other than he's in danger. He could be the biggest son of a bitch in the world, for all we know.'

'I'm not sure that justifies torturing him.'

'I never said anything about torturing him. I said you could "make him talk." That doesn't mean torture.'

'...It kinda does, though, doesn't it?'

'No, Hector. It could mean scaring the information out of him, for instance.'

'By threatening to torture him.'

'Hey, threatening to torture someone is not the same as torturing someone.'

'Garovel.'

'Look, I'm just spitballin' ideas here. Not saying you have to do anything you don't feel comfortable doing.'

'I don't feel comfortable threatening to torture some random dude on the street, no.'

'Alright, fine. Geez. It's not like I was--' The reaper cut himself off, which drew Hector's attention anew.

There was something different about the man now, Hector suddenly realized. The way he was standing had changed. He seemed unsteady. Weaker. After a moment, he leaned against the street lamp for support but struggled even to hold himself up and began sliding against it toward the ground.

'Hector!'

He was already leaping off the roof. He summoned a descending platform to soften his landing, and then he was in full sprint toward the man, no longer caring how noisy the iron armor might be.

Hector slid up beside him as the man was just about flat on the pavement. 'What's wrong with him?! He didn't hurt himself, did he?!'

'No, I was watching for that. He might just be sick. Let's take him to the hospital. And don't carry him. Use your iron. You want to keep his body from flailing around and worsening his condition while you're transporting him.'

'Okay!' Hector did exactly as the reaper instructed and materialized a kind of small, stabilization chamber. A pod, basically--not so dissimilar to the ones that had been used to transport the non-servant Rainlords through the Undercrust. This one was just purely iron, of course, but it seemed to do the job well enough as Hector brought it along with him on its own, accompanying platform."

"1834

He followed Garovel's directions, pushing the pace while focusing on making the ride smooth. It didn't take long to reach the nearest hospital. "UGR Health" was the logo on the side of the main building, though there were many accompanying it. Hector was glad that Garovel seemed to know where he was going, because there were about a half-dozen entrances that Hector could see from the air.

There were plenty of cars around, but thankfully, the place didn't seem especially busy at the moment. Hector had no trouble walking right through the front entrance, even with all iron that he was materializing behind him.

A few shrieks rang out in the main lobby, but Hector didn't have to be concerned about that. He went straight up to the reception desk and addressed the pair of wide-eyed women who were sitting behind it.

"Excuse me," he said, keeping his voice calm so as not to startle anyone. He brought the iron pod forward so that they could see the person lying therein. "I think this man may be in need of medical attention..."

It took a moment for the nearer woman to blink and then respond. "Ah! O-okay! Um! One moment please!" Her hands fumbled for the phone on her desk.

Hector hoped she was calling a doctor and not security.

Garovel was busy observing the man's condition. 'When you get a chance, search his pockets. There are probably some clues on him.'

'Okay.'

Hector noticed a couple of men in white coats walking through a small, indoor plaza that was off to the side. Or rather, he noticed them stop walking. They had noticed the commotion in the lobby. They had noticed Hector.

Hector might've liked to wave them down or something, but he figured there was probably a procedure to these types of things. And more importantly, he didn't want to scare them.

Maybe he wasn't doing such a good job of that, though. He wondered if they were going to just turn around and walk away. Judging from the looks on their faces, they wanted to.

The one on the right, a balding and bespectacled man, just kind of took a deep breath, bobbed his head forward a little, and then walked over. His companion soon followed.

"Hello, I'm Dr. Carlyle," said the balding man. "Is there some way I can be of assistance?"

The receptionist from before almost leapt out of her chair. "Ah! Yes, this, um--this man here said--" She cut herself off when Hector looked at her.

Wait. Why had she done that? Aw, shit. He hadn't meant for her to stop explaining.

Hector brought the pod closer to Dr. Carlyle and his colleague.

They both took a few steps back as the hulking iron contraption materialized its way toward them.

Dammit! Why was it so hard not to frighten people?!

Was it the armor? It was probably the armor. Argh.

He dematerialized it and tried again. "Sorry... I, uh... I'm just trying to get this guy some help."

Thankfully, that actually did seem to ease the tension a little."

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Dr. Carlyle was the one to step forward again. "W-well, uh, I'll just take a look then, shall I?"

"Please." Hector obliterated the top half of the pod so that the doctor would have plenty of space to work. "And, ah, thank you..."

The whole room was watching now as Dr. Carlyle checked the man's pulse.

Scarcely ten seconds passed before he turned to his colleague. "Get a cart ready now." The other man nodded, and he turned to Hector. "Quickly, follow me." He was already jogging away.

Oh shit.

Hector pursued the doctor down a hallway and corner, bringing the unconscious man along as well, of course. They entered a small room with an elevated bed and all manner of medical supplies on the counters.

"Place him there, if you would," said Dr. Carlyle as he pulled on a pair of blue rubber gloves.

The doctor hadn't actually pointed anywhere, but it was apparent enough that he meant the bed, so that was where Hector put him, using iron to lift him up and then ease him down again.

Hector wanted to ask some questions, like if Dr. Carlyle knew what was wrong, but he didn't want to interrupt. The doctor's facial expression and body language were both warning of urgency and the need for concentration.

The other doctor arrived with a wheeled cart full of equipment, and Hector made way for him. Then more people began flowing into the room, and a nurse ushered Hector away.

He wasn't about to argue.

The nurse led him into another room. Not a waiting a room, per se, just an empty one. She told him that someone would be in to talk to him soon.

He waited.

Garovel had stayed with the doctors, however.

'How's it going in there?' Hector asked.

'Too early to tell,' the reaper said. 'Not super great, though.'

Hector supposed it would be a while for he learned anything. He noticed a chair in the corner of the room and sat down.

Soon, someone new did arrive, as promised. It was an older woman. Maybe a doctor, though she only had purple scrubs on. She began asking him questions. How was he related to the patient? What prompted the hospital visit? How was the patient's condition previously?

Those were somewhat difficult to answer. When he told her that he just found the guy on the street, she seemed a little surprised but kept going. When he told her his name, she actually stopped for a second and stared at him.

Only for a second, though. Professionalism soon won out, and she kept going with her questions.

It was only when he started asking questions of his own that she became visibly uncomfortable.

"Would you mind getting his clothes for me?" said Hector.

"I... ah... that's not really, um--I'm not really supposed to--"

"I know," he said, "but this is important. I didn't have time to examine his belongings before bringing him here. There might be, uh, some sort of clue about what brought this on, so..."

"1836

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

"I'll--I'll, er, I'll let the doctors know," she said. "They'll figure it out. You don't need to do anything else. Believe me. It's good enough that you got him here as quickly as you did."

Hector just frowned at her, but he supposed she had a point. The doctors would probably have a better idea of what clues to look for, as well.

He wasn't ready to give up, though. "Well, uh... when the doctors are done with his clothes, I'd still like to examine them, myself. If you don't mind."

"Ah, uh, o-okay. Very well. Erm. M'lord."

Oi, that looked awkward for her. She seemed like she wanted to be just about anywhere but here, right about now.

He wondered if there was anything he could do help put her at ease. That was the kind of thing a lord was supposed to be able to do, right?

"Ah--by the way," said Hector, "I never caught your name."

"Oh. Um. It's Jenna. Jenna Brandt."

His body resisted, but he forced himself to extend a hand toward her. "It's... a pleasure to meet you."

She looked about as reluctant as he felt, but she took the hand nonetheless and shook it. "Th-thank you, m'lord."

He tried to give her a smile but only managed to press his lips together flatly. Eh, maybe that was more appropriate, anyway, considering the circumstances.

After that, she excused herself, and Hector was alone again.

He breathed a sigh of relief and sat back down. He didn't know if asking her name and shaking her hand had actually made her feel better or not, but it was pretty much all he had been able to think of.

Why, he wondered?

Hmm, maybe because that was what Garovel had instructed him to do back at Warrenhold with those two Rainlord cooks. The husband and wife. What were their names? Agh, so many names to keep track of.

But yeah, that was probably the reason.

Oh well. Whatever.

The wait continued for a while longer, and Hector ended up meditating to pass the time. He wasn't sure how much time had passed when Dr. Carlyle entered the room, looking more disheveled than before.

Garovel followed him in.

"I understand that you bear no relation to the patient?" said the doctor. It wasn't actually a question, but he posed it like one.

Hector sat up straighter. "That's right..."

The doctor nodded. "In that case, I'm not supposed to share information regarding his treatment with you."

Hector merely returned a blank expression. Then what he hell had he been waiting here for?

"However," the doctor said slowly, "these are... extenuating circumstances, I suppose."

"What do you mean?" said Hector.

"Well... would I be correct in thinking that you are investigating this man in some way?"

"...Yes."

"Then... normally, this information would only be shared with the police, but you're... well, you're you, aren't you?"

"1837

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector wasn't sure what to say to that. Being famous sure was fucking weird.

The doctor reached into his lab coat and pulled out a folded up paper. "Here's a copy of my preliminary assessment."

Hector took it and looked it over, though he wasn't quite sure what to make of it.

"It's still too early to say for sure," said Dr. Carlyle, "but... there is unfortunately a very real possibility that the patient will never wake up."

Hector blinked. "Why?"

"The damage done to his brain and nervous system may not have been fatal, but it would not be strange if he remains comatose. As I said, it's still too early to tell. He may wake up. He may not."

"...Do you know what caused this?" said Hector.

"We do," said the doctor. "We identified the alcoholic drink in his possession as containing a lethal dose of potassium cyanide."

Hector's head reared back a little. "Cyanide...?" Now there was a scary word.

"It is safe to say that if you had not gotten him here as quickly as you did, he would be dead."

Holy shit.

So someone really did try to kill the guy.

He needed information. Hector asked the doctor for details regarding the man's identity, and the doctor obliged, producing a folder from his lab coat with everything the hospital knew about the man.

Jeremy Lang. Thirty-seven years old. Employed as an Administrative Assistant in the Human Resources Department at Lindhold & Barter.

That was one hell of a job title, Hector thought.

"I hope you find your culprit," said Dr. Carlyle. "Now, if you'll excuse me." He turned to leave.

"Will you call me if he wakes up?" said Hector, pulling out his phone. "Or if there are any other developments?"

The doctor's expression became strained. "I... suppose I could. It wouldn't really be proper, since you're not with the police or listed as one of his emergency contacts, but... you are a lord. And a national hero. Conventional rules don't really apply to you, I guess."

Hector was speechless and embarrassed.

Dr. Carlyle smirked. "You'll use your status to protect me if I get in trouble for this, won't you?"

"Er. Sure."

"That answer does not fill me with confidence, milord." Dr. Carlyle adjusted his glasses and smiled. "Stressful as it sometimes is, I do like this job and would prefer not to lose it. It pays very well, and my wife loves spending money."

Hector couldn't help but breathe half a laugh. The man wanted confidence from him, huh?

Alright.

"...I promise you will have my protection," said Hector.

"That's better. Thank you." The doctor pulled out his phone as well.

They exchanged numbers.

Dr. Carlyle smirked another time as he eyed his phone. "I imagine there are plenty of journalists who would love to get their hands on this, eh? How much do you think I could get for it?"

"Do that and you're dead to me," said Hector flatly.

The man just laughed."

"1838

Hector was glad to see that the man could laugh in these circumstances. Then again, doctors were probably pretty accustomed to stress, he figured.

'I like this guy,' said Garovel. 'Ask him if he wants to come work for you.'

Hector had to consciously keep his face still. 'What?!'

'What, you can ask Leo to work for you, but this doctor is a bridge too far?'

'He JUST said that he likes his current job.'

'You could still ASK.'

‘No, Garovel.’

‘Bah.’

“Ah, well, I suppose I should be going now,” said Dr. Carlyle. “Is there anything else I can do for you before I go? Questions? Concerns?”

“Oh. Um. I’d like to take a look at Mr. Lang’s belongings, if you wouldn’t mind.”

“Mm. Given everything else that I’m not supposed to be doing for you, I guess one more thing wouldn’t hurt. This way.”

The doctor led Hector to Mr. Lang’s room, which was different from the one that they had originally taken the man to. This one looked a bit more comfortable, and they had him hooked up to all sorts of different machines.

Mr. Lang’s clothes were in a folded pile on the chair in the corner. Before sorting through them, Hector materialized some coatings for his fingertips so as not to contaminate any potential evidence with his fingerprints. The last thing he needed was the police making him a suspect.

Dr. Carlyle just watched. The doctor didn’t have to stay, Hector thought, but maybe he was still a little worried about leaving Hector alone with the guy.

It didn’t matter.

Hector found the financial note that Garovel had mentioned earlier, though he couldn’t really make heads or tails of it. He knew someone who might be able to, though, and decided to take a picture of it with his phone. Then he took pictures of everything else, including the unconscious Mr. Lang.

“Where’s the drink?” asked Hector at length, noticing its absence.

“It was a hazardous material, so we had to contain it,” said Dr. Carlyle. “We haven’t disposed of it yet, however, since it is evidence. I can take you to it, if you want.”

Hector took him up on that offer, but it didn’t prove particularly illuminating. He made sure to get a picture of the poisoned drink just in case, but there wasn’t much to see. It was just a simple metal canteen, featureless and pretty nondescript. Dr. Carlyle didn't think that they would be able to trace the poison back to either the distributor or manufacturer, either.

From there, Hector's hospital visit drew to a close, and he left. It felt a bit strange, just leaving like that, but he didn't actually know Mr. Lang, and the hospital had placed security on his room, so Hector didn't see much point in sticking around. According to Dr. Carlyle, Mr. Lang's family was currently out of the country and so wouldn't be here until tomorrow.

Hector was still trying to decide if it was worth coming back in order to talk to them. If they'd been out of the country, they made for pretty poor suspects, and he didn't want to make things even more difficult for them, either."

"1839

'So,' said Garovel after a while of silence. Instead of attaching himself to Hector, he was flying on his own and keeping pace with him as they soared through the night sky together. 'Got any idea why someone tried to kill that guy?'

'You're asking ME?' said Hector.

'I'm just curious about where your mind's at. I'm trying to keep track of how your critical thinking skills are developing. This is our second mysterious case we're working on, after all.'

'Second? What was the first?'

'The mystery at Dunehall. You remember. When it looked like Ibai Blackburn had killed Fuad Saqqaf.'

'Oh, yeah.'

'Shame, too. I was getting really invested in trying to crack that case wide open. Then everything started exploding, and nobody really cared, anymore. I never got a chance to show everyone my unfathomable intellect.'

'...Unfathomable even to yourself, you mean?'

'Heh. Yes. Even I don't fully grasp the enormity of my brain.'

‘Your brain which technically doesn’t exist.’

‘Oh, don’t start down that road. We’ll be busy for hours.’

‘Hey, why does Dunehall count as the first case? Why not the, uh... all that shit with Colt and Rofal? That was a case, wasn’t it?’

‘Eh, not REALLY. I mean, where was the mystery, huh?’

‘YOU were the mystery, I think.’

‘Hmm. I’m not sure whether to be flattered or offended. Anyway, it doesn’t matter. This is our official second case. I’m calling it now. Everything else was just build up to this.’

Hector snorted a laugh. ‘Everything, huh? Even though we have no reason to believe that Mr. Lang is in any way related to anything we’ve seen or been through so far?’

‘That doesn’t matter. Chronologically, everything has been building to this.’

‘Oh, okay. Then I guess everything has been building toward breakfast tomorrow morning, too.’

‘Heh. Well, maybe not breakfast but definitely dinner.’

Hector knew what the reaper was referring to. He would be having dinner tomorrow in Sescoria. With the Queen and about a hundred other lords and ladies of Atreya.

The invitation had been delivered to him two days ago--in person, no less, by a sharply dressed officer of the royal court.

The Atreyan Gala of Royal Associates was an annual occurrence--one that Hector had heard about since he was a kid and had certainly never expected to be invited to. It was being held a month early this year, possibly because of the economic crisis, though Hector didn’t really know what the Queen was thinking in that regard. The news certainly wasn’t making light of the timing. With so much concern over money in the public consciousness, it seemed to him like a bad idea to have all of the wealthiest people in Atreya show off in front of a bunch of cameras.

According to Madame Carthrace, though, the Gala was more than just a fancy gathering for the nobility. It was an unparalleled opportunity for the nation's most influential people to discuss policy and make decisions that could affect their own communities for many years to come."

"1840

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

"Once upon a time, I, too, harbored such thoughts," Madame Carthrace had told him. "That it was just a chance for my peers to flaunt their wealth and indulge in all manner of debauched excess, but I've long since changed my mind about that, and I think you will, too."

Hector was trying to keep an open mind.

He still wasn't exactly looking forward to it, though. With as much as he'd been in the news recently, he was a little afraid of how much attention he would be getting--both from the other lords and from the camera crews.

Ugh.

It was gonna be an absolute shit show.

He really would've liked to just not go, but that would probably make matters even worse. Plus, he did need to talk to the Queen.

And of course, there was also Lynn to be worried about. Garovel had been trying to get him to call her for some inexplicable reason, and with so much on his plate, Hector had been able to ignore him relatively easily. But not tomorrow. She was almost definitely going to be there. She was the White Sword of Atreya, after all. The Queen's personal bodyguard.

Hector knew he was being irrational, though. This was such a strange feeling. He was dreading seeing her. Obviously. And yet, just as much as he was dreading it, he was looking forward to it, too.

What sense did that make? What sense did he make?

It would've been a lot easier if he was just scared of her. Crazy as that seemed. He could deal with fear. He knew he could. But there was so much more to it.

Wanting to be liked. Not wanting to be humiliated. Or hated. Or pitied.

It reminded him so much of his school days. The endless anxiety.

However, between worrying about all of that again and simply discussing Mr. Lang's "case" with Garovel, Hector knew which one he wanted to do, right now. He'd already gotten his fill of agonizing over tomorrow night's dinner and didn't feel like getting into it again.

'Why don't you just save us both some time and tell me what YOU think of the case?' said Hector.

'No, no. You first. Like I said, I've gotta evaluate your critical thinking progress, my dear boy.'

He thought about arguing, but... oh, whatever. 'Okay, well, uh... I don't really know what to make of it yet, I guess.'

'Stunning. You've floored me with your observational brilliance.'

'Are you telling me you've already got it all figured out?'

'Well. Obviously, no case is too mysterious for my ferociously sharp mind. But y'know. For purely academic reasons, I think you should put a little more thought into it before asking me for help.'

'Right...'

'So? C'mon. Put some brain mass into it, Detective Goffe.'

He sighed and tried to think. 'Alright, uh... I guess... there's a chance that he just...' He hesitated, but this was the only thing coming to mind. 'Er... is it possible that he tried to kill himself?'

'Mm. Not likely.'

'Why do you say that?'

"1841

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

'Well, firstly, the time and place are incredibly strange for someone trying to commit suicide,' said Garovel. 'Out in the middle of the street?'

And after a vaguely clandestine meeting with someone?’

‘Yeah, I guess that would be a hell of a coincidence...’

‘And secondly, the method. Cyanide? That would be a profoundly strange choice.’

‘Why? Is it super painful or something?’

‘I don’t think it’s very pleasant, but then again, I can’t really attest to that, personally. Accessibility would be an issue, though. Getting your hands on cyanide, while certainly not impossible, would be inconvenient. So why choose that over something more widely available? Or something painless, perhaps?’

That was another good point, Hector thought. But he couldn’t help relating everything the reaper was saying back to his own death. He was a little surprised that Garovel hadn’t brought it up yet.

‘Plus, it’s all just a little too shady,’ the reaper went on. ‘Poison in the drink? If you were going to knowingly ingest poison, why would you bother mixing it with something?’

‘Er. Maybe he was worried about the taste?’

‘Yeah, sure he was. As far as I’m concerned, the presence of the drink really suggests murderous intent by some as yet unknown third party.’

‘Well, uh... okay. What should we do about it?’

‘We can probably just let the police handle it for now.’

‘Wait, what? Really?’

‘Sure. As far as we know, no one is in immediate danger now. There’s an attempted murderer out there who still needs to be brought to justice, of course, but that’s what the police are for. I’ll be keeping an eye on their investigation, though.’

‘What happened to all that shit about this being our second case together?’

The reaper laughed. ‘Are you disappointed?’

‘Well, you kinda built it up like it was a big deal...’

‘I was just screwing around, Hector. Having fun. You know what that is,

right?’

‘Garovel...’

‘Relax. And you should actually be hoping that I don’t ask you to do anything else on this case. Because if I do, then that’ll mean that the police can’t handle it on their own.’

‘Ah...’

‘You’re like a fire extinguisher, Hector. We only want to break you out for emergencies.’

‘I... uh... hmm.’

‘You did good work tonight, though. You should be proud of yourself.’

Pride wasn’t a feeling that Hector was particularly familiar with, but he appreciated Garovel saying so, at least. ‘Thanks...’

‘How does it feel to go around protecting normal people again?’

‘It’s, uh. It’s pretty nice, actually.’

‘How does it compare to fighting giant worms in Hell?’

‘...I like it a lot better.’

‘Me, too.’

Soon, they made it back to Warrenhold, and Hector went straight to his room. He’d been getting good sleep the past few days, but he was still feeling consistently exhausted. Eight hours never quite seemed like enough, but Garovel said that feeling would go away in a week or so, as long as he kept to a healthy schedule."

"1842

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

As had quickly become the norm, Hector started the next day early by training with Zeff. That may have been another reason for his persistent exhaustion, actually. The Lord Elroy did not hold back. At times, their sparring grew to have such ground-shaking intensity that Hector worried they might wake up everyone in Warrenhold despite the increasingly long distances they traveled from it.

A sudden surge of ice water knocked Hector off his feet, and the shield in his hand went flying from his grasp. He clattered to the ground like a sack of iron potatoes. Half of his armor was cracked or crumbling off of him already.

“Not good enough,” said Zeff. “If you plan to keep using that shield, then you had better learn to keep it in front of you.”

Hector appreciated all the effort the man was going through for him, teaching him personally. Truth be told, though, he was getting a little tired of the condescending lectures. “I’m trying,” he said as he climbed back onto his feet and reformed his armor.

“Try harder, then.”

Something in the man’s inflection made Hector immediately think that another attack was already coming at him from behind. Zeff had also made a habit of doing that, attacking him before he was actually ready to keep going.

Sure enough, he sensed something there with the Scarf of Amordiin, but even by then, he was already moving, having predicted what Zeff was going to do.

However, the attack did not arrive, and Hector ended up dodging out of the way of nothing at all.

Then a block of ice clobbered him from the front, and put him right back on his ass.

“Where are you trying to dodge?” said Zeff. “You face an opponent who is familiar with your capabilities. You can try to predict my actions, but I can predict yours as well, you know. Maintain your awareness at all moments and react accordingly. And keep your shield up, for god’s sake.”

Hector exhaled and just lay there for a moment longer.

“This is not the ferocity I witnessed when you were fighting that worm,” said Zeff.

Yeah, because this was just practice. Why would he--?

Oh shit.

Hector shoved himself out of the way of a half-dozen frozen spikes and was back on his feet again. More were coming, though, and he had to keep dodging, just barely skating out of the way and occasionally losing chunks of armor to them.

"Better, but not perfect," said Zeff, raising his voice as the distance between them grew. "Are you ever going to get around to counterattacking, I wonder? Or do you plan to keep on like this forever?"

The swirls of water were only growing faster, Hector noticed, and some had the sharpness of blades in addition to their speed. Everywhere around him. So much to keep track of.

He split his focus and materialized a thin, moving layer of iron beneath Zeff's feet while simultaneously launching a boulder down on the man from above.

Perhaps the Lord Elroy hadn't been expecting a two-pronged attack, because the man lost his footing for a moment, and the boulder nearly hit him before being slapped away by a tower of ice."

"1843

The storm of water around Hector subsided, giving him some room to breathe, but he knew it wouldn't last long. Zeff would no doubt get mad if he didn't seize the opening and attack.

He rushed in from the front and decided to flank Zeff with a trio of materialized lances, all bearing a velocity state.

A small castle of ice froze everything in place, including Hector.

He struggled, but without the undead vigor, the ice was way too strong to break through. Hell, it might've been too strong even with the vigor.

Well, shit.

Zeff opened a hole in the ice so that Hector could hear him. "That was better," he said. "You almost managed to hit me that time."

Hector just kind of sighed.

“It was impressive that you could materialize something under my feet without even looking in my direction. I suppose that, too, is thanks to that scarf of yours?”

Hector didn't answer him. Zeff probably knew that he wouldn't. Everything that the man knew about the Scarf had come from the past few days of observing Hector wearing it. Hector hadn't even told him its name.

“You have very good agility and spatial awareness, even for a materialization user, but neither of that really matters if your opponent is able to seal your movement, now does it? Preventing precisely this situation should be one of your top priorities.”

“...I'll try to keep that in mind,” said Hector. Damn, this ice was cold. His teeth were chattering, and he was already losing sensation in his extremities.

“Good.” Zeff folded his arms and stood there. “Now. Try and get out of it.”

Hector could barely even move his neck. “...How, exactly?”

“There are only two choices. Force or heat.” A rare smile found the Lord Elroy's face. “Hmph. Or you could try to talk me into undoing it, I suppose.”

Heat it was, then. Hector focused on his armor. It was stuck in the ice just as thoroughly as he was. But he could still dematerialize it and remake it from scratch, hotter.

So that was what he did.

It didn't do much.

Some sizzling and cracking noises permeated the ice, but that was about it. No breaking free, and certainly no melting.

“Mm. Wow. Another thirty minutes, and you might be out of there. Assuming I don't just make more, of course.”

Hector didn't want to spoil one of Zeff's anomalous good moods, but he was getting annoyed. “Yeah, you're stronger than I am.”

“Yes, I am,” said Zeff, frowning again. “Why don't you do something about it, then?”

Hector squinted with one eye. What was this supposed to accomplish? Was Zeff trying to make him achieve emergence? Because there was no fucking way that was going to happen.

"Alternatively," said Zeff, "you could tell me what you've been hiding from me with regard to Emiliana. I might be persuaded to let you out, then."

"1844

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

Hector's irritation was only growing. "I told you, already. She's not telling me anything about her situation. Probably because she's worried you'll try to rescue her and get yourself killed by Gohvis."

Surprisingly, the Lord Elroy did not get angry at that response. Which was perhaps even more unsettling, somehow. Instead, he merely returned a flat, dead-eyed stare for a moment.

"...Fine," said Zeff. "In any event, I suppose we can end our session a bit early today. We wouldn't want you to be too exhausted to attend your royal dinner tonight." The man turned and started walking away. "You're free to go, whenever you like."

"Wha? How do--? I'm still--!" Hector stopped himself. Obviously, Zeff knew what he was doing, that Hector was still trapped inside the soul-strengthened ice.

Maybe he was mistaken, but in that moment, Hector felt like Zeff wanted him to say something in desperation. To beg the man to let him out.

And Hector didn't want to do that.

Why, though? Was this pride? Or just stubbornness? It was weird, whatever it was, and Hector didn't like it much. It was putting strange thoughts in his head. In all likelihood, Zeff was just messing with him to mess with him. Or to teach him something, maybe. Not to humiliate him or assert dominance.

Probably.

Regardless, Hector held his tongue as he watched the Lord Elroy walk away. And much like the man had said, it took about half an hour to finally free himself. He was freezing his ass off and hardly able to move after he was out, but he was out.

He materialized himself a fresh suit of warm armor before heading back.

After that, the rest of the day went by way too quickly for Hector's liking. But then, most days were like that, recently. With so much he wanted to check up on and so many people he wanted to talk to, he was genuinely starting to feel like there were simply not enough hours in the day anymore. It sucked to always be in a rush.

He had a couple of interviews with more of the people Madame Carthrace was planning to hire. He had the reconstruction to help with. He had people coming up to him constantly, wanting to discuss one thing or another.

Independent though they were, the Rainlords sure had a lot of concerns. The tension between House Blackburn and the others worried him most, though. He'd heard about a few heated arguments that had taken place--so heated that they'd nearly come to blows.

The last thing Hector needed right now was the Rainlords fighting amongst themselves again, so he'd been trying to figure out what to do about it, but they weren't making it easy for him. Most of them didn't even want to talk about it. They seemed to find it embarrassing. Unbecoming of "lords," perhaps. And whenever Hector was around, everyone appeared to be very polite with one another."

"1845

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

That was just like them, though. Even now, with all they'd been through, the Rainlords were still concerned about not being a bother or a burden to their host. They made that pretty clear. Repeatedly, even.

"Yeah, but the thing is," said Hector, "you doing that is being a bother to me."

Horatio Blackburn and Salvador Delaguna just sat there, looking back at him. The last mention of a heated argument breaking out had been between members of their two houses, though they refused to acknowledge it, much to Hector's growing annoyance.

Hector frowned at their silence. "While I'm gone, Warrenhold and even Gray Rock is under the Rainlords' protection. If you guys can't even tell me what's wrong, then how am I supposed to trust you to take care of all these people in my absence?" This was something he'd given a lot of thought to already, and he was trying not to sound too irritated with them.

Horatio just cast his eyes to the floor, still not saying anything.

Salvador, however, kept his gaze locked on Hector.

Hector had a hard time looking back at the man, though. Not because he was embarrassed, but rather because the man's recent losses were so painfully visible on his face. The Lord Delaguna was one of the largest men Hector had ever seen, but that shrunken posture and those big brown eyes full of remorse made him seem somehow smaller.

Hector knew only too well how much grief the man was still coping with, how many family members he'd lost at Dunehall. It seemed wrong to be doing anything but trying to accommodate him, but after consulting Garovel a couple of times on the matter, he'd come to believe that treating Salvador any differently would just make things worse.

'The man needs many things right now,' Garovel had said, 'but from us, he needs only normalcy and respect. We need to treat him like a companion. Not a child or a victim.'

And though a part of him didn't want to, Hector agreed. Remembering his own, personal experiences with such things, he felt like Garovel was right on the money with that assessment.

So it was hard to look back at him, but Hector did it, nonetheless. Looking away would have been disrespectful in its own way, Hector felt.

"...You are right," Salvador eventually said, sighing. "My house is not in order..."

"Nor is mine," said Horatio, glancing over at the man before sighing as well. "I don't know how my uncle was able to make everyone feel so united and... I..."

"H-hold on," said Hector, feeling abruptly like he'd just slapped both of these poor men across the face. "I mean... look, all I'm saying is that you should let me help. It's, ah... it's okay if things aren't exactly stable for you, right now. It would be weird if they were. But you can't shut me out like you've been doing. You can't just... you can't just pretend like there's no problem when there obviously is, okay?"

"1846

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

Both men returned a solemn nod, still looking rather defeated.

Aw, geez. Even after saying all that, how exactly was he supposed to help these people?

'We need more information,' said Garovel privately.

All of their reapers were also present. Hector had invited everyone to discuss the matter in his bedroom. There was a conference chamber one floor above that he had been using pretty frequently, but Hector hadn't wanted this meeting to feel quite as formal as the ones in that chamber had begun to feel.

It didn't seem to be helping, though.

Garovel's next words were public. 'We would like you both to provide us with twice-weekly assessments of your houses' interpersonal affairs.'

Hector's eyes widened a little.

Mevox, Salvador's reaper, was the first to respond. 'Say what?'

'I know it might be a hassle or even a bit controversial,' said Garovel, 'but I assure you that you can trust Hector and I to keep any sensitive information you share with us to ourselves. And this is a very important matter. Above all, Hector and I want Warrenhold to be a place where everyone who comes here can have a reasonable expectation of safety. You must understand. Anything which might jeopardize that... well, that's just not something we can ignore, even if it inconveniences you for a while.'

Mevox opened his skeletal mouth but no words came out.

‘And I do apologize for the imposition,’ Garovel went on, ‘but it is my hope that these reports will help us come to grips with this problem before it gets out of hand. It’s imperative that we identify the cause of all this before taking any other kind of action which might make things worse.’

With the way Garovel was talking, it didn’t sound like he was leaving much room for discussion. It sounded like he was issuing an order, Hector thought. And he didn’t think the Rainlords would appreciate that.

There arrived an intermission of silence, presumably in which the other reapers and servants were discussing the matter privately.

Hector used the opportunity to ask Garovel a question of his own. ‘This is a little much, don’t you think? What if they say no?’

‘They won’t.’

‘But what if they do?’

‘Then I guess you’ll have to show them who’s boss.’

Hector’s jaw clenched. ‘Garovel! I’m not their boss!’

‘You’re the Lord of Warrenhold, Hector. We’re in Warrenhold. You’re the boss.’

Argh. He wanted to argue, but there wasn’t time, because Mevox spoke up again.

‘We understand,’ the reaper said. ‘Assessments sound like a reasonable step to take.’

‘Yes,’ said Yovess. ‘We think so as well. Obviously, we know what the overall cause of these tensions is, given what happened in Sair, but I do think a closer look at the finer details with an objective third party such as yourselves might prove helpful. I would even go so far as to recommend this as something all of the houses should begin doing.’”

"1847

'You might be right about that,' said Mevox. 'At least with regard to the larger houses. I doubt Zeff or Joana will want to do this.'

Hector very much doubted that as well.

'That's fine,' said Garovel. 'Their numbers are few enough that it shouldn't be a problem. Same goes for Evangelina and Diego, of course.'

The other reapers merely nodded, as did their servants.

'In the meantime,' said Garovel, 'I would suggest ensuring all of the men involved in the fight are given plenty to do over the next few weeks.'

'Way ahead of you there,' said Mevox. 'We have a very old saying in Deynos. Haven't gotten to use it in, oh, seven hundred years or so, but now seems like a good time to bust it out again. "Idle hands will be put in chains."'

There was a brief quiet.

'Ah--well, you may not need go quite THAT far,' said Garovel.

'Why not?' said Mevox.

'Because you're essentially talking about slavery?' said Garovel.

'Eh, what's a little slavery among family? Builds character and establishes discipline, if you ask me. Besides, it worked pretty well in the past.'

'I seem to recall a slave revolt taking place in Roth,' said Yovess. 'Which, funnily enough, also happened around seven hundred years ago, I think.'

'Yeah, but up UNTIL then, it was working great.'

The conversation lasted a little longer, and they discussed what sort of work would be assigned to the offenders. They ultimately decided on breaking down rocks and laying brick. There was certainly enough of that that still needed doing. After the two lords and their reapers left, there wasn't much time left before Hector would have to depart for Sescoria.

While he was getting ready, Roman paid him a visit, accompanied by Voreese and Gina, as usual.

'I still think it's bullshit that we weren't invited,' said Voreese.

"You know there's no way that I could show my face at such an event," said Roman. "And the Queen knows that, too."

'I'm not saying I think we should go. I'm just saying it would've been nice to be invited.'

"Shut up, Voreese."

'No, you shut up.'

As he was adjusting his black tie, which he'd finally managed to get right after nearly half an hour of trying, Hector thought of a question for his billionaire friend. "You've been to lots of parties like this before, haven't you?"

Roman gave a shrug. "Sure."

"Any advice for me?" said Hector.

"Oh. Hmm. Well, now, let me think..." Roman scratched his nose and sucked on his teeth for a moment. "Find the richest girl in the room, turn on the old charm faucet, leave her wanting for more, and THEN go and impress her father."

Hector just gave the man a look.

"Not that I've. Ever. Done that before. Or anything."

"1848

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

"...I was hoping for advice about how to conduct myself properly," said Hector.

"I don't think Master Roman is the right person to consult about conducting yourself properly," said Gina.

"That is both hurtful and profoundly untrue," said Roman. "I am a wonderful party guest. Ask anyone. Except maybe the President of Stecat. Though, I doubt he'd remember me, so that might be fine, too, now that I think about it."

"Well, then, uh... could you maybe tell me a little about the other nobles? Like, is there anyone I should be, er... wary of? Or something?"

'Oh-ho!' said Voreese. 'Good question!'

Roman bobbed his head to the side. "Yeah," he said slowly. "I do know a fair bit about the major players in Atreya. Your Madame Carthrace might know more, though, of course."

With the way that Roman let his gaze linger on Hector for a moment, Hector had to wonder if he had met her. By now, he must've. He wanted to ask what Roman thought of her, but now probably wasn't the best time.

"But, ah, yeah," Roman went on. "You've got your straight-up royals, of course. The Belgrants and the Lumenbels. The Lumenbels took a significant hit recently, as I'm sure you well know, so they're not quite as... shall we say, "politically potent" at the moment, as they once were. The Belgrants, as far as families go, probably have more influence now than any single family has ever had before in this country."

None of that was really news to Hector, but it was at least nice to have his current understanding of Atreyan politics reaffirmed as being correct.

"After those two, though, all of the other families can pretty much be described as either 'royalist' or 'nationalist' in nature. With maybe a couple wild cards thrown in there, for good measure."

'Which one are you?' said Garovel.

"Me?" The question seemed to take Roman by surprise. "Mm. That's a tough one. A year ago, I would've said nationalist without the slightest bit of hesitation, but now that I'm BFFs with the Queen, it's kinda hard not to consider myself more of a royalist." He smacked his lips. "I hate to be one of those fence-sitters, but right now, I guess that's what I am."

'You're kinda making it sound like Hector and I are royalists,' said Garovel.

Roman just returned a flat look. "Sayin' you aren't?"

'Heh. Maybe.'

Roman glanced at Hector, who had no idea what to say. "Whatever," said Roman. "The royalists and the nationalists aren't terribly different from one another, anyway. They definitely agree with each other more than they disagree. The main point of controversy between them, as you might expect, is their support of the royal family."

'Specifically, it's about whether or not they believe the royal family is appointed by divine will,' said Voreese."

"1849

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

"Really?" said Hector, not having known that. "The royalists believe the Queen was chosen by Cocora?"

'I think it's a little more complicated than that, but basically, yeah,' said Voreese.

"Hence why I have trouble calling myself a royalist, even though I obviously do support the Queen," said Roman.

Hector could understand that. He wasn't so sure he would be able to call himself a royalist, either, in that case--or why it was politically relevant, for that matter.

He wanted to keep an open mind, though. It was not lost on him, the fact that he was stepping into an arena that was very different from what he was accustomed to. It didn't seem like a good idea to go into it with too many preconceived notions about the way these things should or shouldn't work.

From the sound of it, though, it seemed like Roman wouldn't agree with that sentiment. "Anyway, the royalists are mostly a bunch of a small-minded pricks trying to get in the way of progress."

Hector couldn't help laughing. "Your objectivity impresses me," he said dryly.

Roman gave a shrug. "Look, I'm not your history teacher."

'Yeah, that's my job,' said Garovel. 'Don't try to teach him your biased version of events. Only I'm allowed to do that.'

Roman looked to Voreese. "It's the truth, isn't it?"

'Of course not, you ignorant douche. The royalists are all about protecting the system--you know, the one that's been in place for over three hundred years now and that seems to be doing pretty well for the people of this country?'

"You mean the system that's currently threatening to collapse and plunge the nation into poverty? THAT system?"

'YES, that system! The solution is to preserve what works and fix what doesn't! Not to shit on everything, you barbaric fuck!'

"Oh, here we go..."

'Shut up,' said Voreese. 'I'm not saying the current system is perfect, or that I agree with royalists all the time, but there's definitely something to be said for the importance that they place upon traditionalism.'

'That is the absolute last argument I ever expected to hear from you,' said Garovel.

'Really?' said Voreese. 'Garovel, I'll have you know, I am very old-fashioned kinda gal, deep down.'

"Horseshit," said Roman. "You're always yappin' to me about shit that you wanna change."

'Yeah, but it's gotta be the CORRECT shit!'

"Yeah. And it usually is."

'NO, IT USUALLY FUCKING ISN'T! That's the whole point! You need to be really fucking careful whenever you decide to disregard conventional wisdom, dammit! Oftentimes, it's conventional for a good fucking reason!'

'Alright, alright,' said Garovel. 'We're getting sidetracked here. And Voreese, I'm not sure yelling is helping your case.'

'Bah.'

Roman took a moment to put his hand on Gina's shoulder. "Sorry. I was just arguing with Voreese again."

"Yeah, I could tell," she said."

"1850

((Belated Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector had an idea. "Can you tell me about the other big Atreyan houses?"

She eyed Roman, then pursed her lips together.

"Why're you askin' her?" said Roman.

Hector scratched his cheek but couldn't help smirking just a little. "Ah... well, I just figured that she knows lots of stuff, and she probably isn't going to get sidetracked arguing with Voreese, so..."

Roman blinked, and his neck whipped around so that he could stare at Voreese.

'What?' she said. 'It's not my fault that Hector's finally realized he's been talking to a dumbass this whole time.'

As usual, Roman didn't look especially fazed by her insults, but seeing as his own name and thoughts were being brought into it, Hector felt compelled to intervene.

"I don't think Roman's a dumbass," he said.

'A close approximation of a dumbass, then.'

"No," said Hector through mild laughter.

'Aw, Hector, are you just saying that, because you guys are friends?' said Voreese. 'That's sweet, but it's okay. You can totally have a friend who's a dumbass.'

Hector just sighed and looked at Roman apologetically.

"Sometimes, I envy Gina for not being able to hear Voreese," said Roman.

‘See?! That right there is a prime example of his dumbassery! As if not being able to hear me could ever be considered a good thing! Absolute fucking idiocy, I tell you!’

Roman tapped Gina on the shoulder. “You just go ahead and explain the rest for me, please. It looks like I’ll have to take care of Voreese again for a little while.”

‘Take care of me?! What’s that supposed to mean, asshole?! I’m not some baby! I can--’

Without looking, Roman’s hand shot out and grabbed the reaper’s center of non-existent mass.

‘Whoa, hey! Easy on the merchandise! What do you think you’re doing?!’

“C’mon,” said Roman, standing. “We’re gonna leave ‘em to it.”

‘What?! No! I’m not done talking!’

“I know,” said Roman. “Everyone knows.”

‘No! I wanna stay! Stop it! I’ve still gotta tell them all about your tiny penis!’

“Wow.” He started carrying her toward the exit.

‘No! Hector, save me! Roman’s abusing me! This is illegal! It’s a human rights violation! I want my lawyer!’

“You don’t have a lawyer.”

‘Then I’ll use yours! This is a miscarriage of justice! I’ll sue, you bastard! I’ll take you for all you’re worth!’

By that point, Hector didn’t really know what to do, so he just kind of sat there and watched them go, watched Roman wave apologetically with one hand while gripping the thrashing reaper with the other.

There was a brief period of silence after they were gone.

Garovel was the first to speak up. ‘Well, that was... certainly something.’

Hector had to agree.

Gina smacked her lips. "Well, um... judging from your silence and the look on your face, I'm guessing Voreese just made a scene?"

"Uh. That's... one way of putting it, I guess."

"Yeah... she's been doing that a lot, apparently."

Hector cocked an eyebrow. "You mean that's, like, a recent development?"

"1851

"Yeah," said Gina. "As I understand it, she got into an argument with another reaper the other day. And ever since then, she's been acting even more out of control than usual. That was what Master Roman told me, anyway."

"Huh..."

"But anyway, that's not really important, right now." Gina folded her hands on the small table in front of her. She was sitting in the corner of the room while Hector stood by the wide window that overlooked the great courtyard of Warrenhold far below. "There's not much time left before you have to leave. Do you really not know anything about the political establishment? You were born in this country, weren't you?"

"Uh. I mean, sure, I know a little. Like, names and stuff. But, er..."

"Well, I assume you know who the Carthraces are, at least? You do have their oldest member working for you, after all."

"Ah... yeah," said Hector, suddenly trying to recall everything he'd ever heard about them over the course of his entire life. "I haven't met any of them besides Amelia yet, but uh, they're... real estate people, aren't they?"

"That's right," said Gina. "They own tons of land, especially in Sescoria and Klein. Probably other cities, too. And that makes them very influential. Who else do you already know about?"

He thought about it. "...Masdens. Volliers. Holbachs. Greenways. Um...?"

She kept waiting, but he couldn't think of any more. "That's not bad," said Gina. "You named pretty much all the major players, apart from the Kemps and the Gaolanets."

He was glad to hear that. "But like I said, all I know are names, really."

She straightened in her chair and cleared her throat. "Alright, well, let's run through them real quick. House Masden. They're a big fishing family. Their main territory is coastline, but they're pretty influential outside of Atreya, too. House Vollier. They're the country's leading industrialists. Nobody owns more factories in Atreya than they do. House Holbach. They're the nation's biggest tech family. Which isn't really saying much, compared to what's going on in Intar and Melmoore, but y'know. They're the best we've got."

She paused a moment, eyeing him and perhaps also gathering her thoughts.

Hector just waited patiently.

"House Greenway," she went on. "They're a little weird. They're more of a pure political family. A lot of people wonder how they're able to maintain their fortune, but there's no great mystery there, really. They invest. All the families invest in things, of course, but the Greenways take it to a whole different level. It's like all they do."

Hector nodded to show that he was listening.

"House Kemp," said Gina, looking at her phone now. "Their money comes from fashion and clothing. They're also pretty influential outside of Atreya, too. And then, finally, there's House Gaolanet." She paused again. "I'm a little surprised that they weren't on your list."

"Why?" said Hector.

"Because they're the local power around Gray Rock," said Gina.

Hector blinked.

"Or at least, before you showed up, they were," she added.
"1852 -- CXCIII.

Hector turned and looked out the window. "That's... good to know."

“If I had to pick one family that I thought you should be wary of, it’d probably be them. For obvious reasons.”

Hector nodded at his own faint reflection in the glass. He could only imagine what a miserable first impression he would’ve made if he had ended up meeting the leader of House Gaolanet without even realizing who they were. “Thank you for telling me...”

“Sure.”

‘Hey, I could’ve told you most of that,’ said Garovel.

‘Then why didn’t you?’ said Hector.

‘You never asked. And I was planning to. On the way to Sescoria, that is.’

‘Mm. Have you got any other information on the nobles for me, then?’

‘Of course I do. Hector, I’ve probably been preparing for this dinner even more than you have.’

‘Heh. Well, I’m listening.’

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Three: ‘The Gathering at Bosliat...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It felt like ages since he’d last seen the royal palace, but he knew it hadn’t been all that long, really. After having seen Warrenhold, the Golden Fort, Marshrock, Dunehall, and the Swallow’s Nest, Hector now felt an even greater sense of appreciation for this place. Despite all that competition, Bosliat Palace did not pale in comparison. Sure, it may not have been as big as Warrenhold or the Golden Fort; nor did it have a particularly eye-popping gimmick like Marshrock’s rock or Dunehall’s sand or the Nest’s defensive structure, but it did have a certain “regalness” to it, he thought.

Perhaps it was the national colors that did it. The more he looked at it, the more it seemed as if the blue-and-white flag of Atreya had been imbued into the building itself, somehow.

And perhaps it was, in a sense.

After receiving the invitation to the Gala, Hector’s curiosity had been piqued, so he'd been looking up the building's history during his rare moments of downtime--which usually meant reading off his phone while he was out patrolling Gray Rock. He remembered vaguely learning about the palace in school, but he certainly didn't remember any of his teachers telling him that it had been built as part of a declaration of independence.

Economic independence, that was. No actual rebellion had been fought, but Bosliat Palace had played a key role in accomplishing that feat--of securing the nation's borders without bloodshed. Of course, it had also helped that the Mohssian Empire had already been fighting five other wars at the time and probably hadn't wanted to make it six.

The idea that this building, with its turreted towers and sprawling gardens and dozens of guardhouses, was designed to be the proud, beating heart of an emerging nation, to represent Atreya as much as the sun-and-stars of the flag did--that made sense to Hector.

"1852 -- CXCIII.

Hector turned and looked out the window. "That's... good to know."

"If I had to pick one family that I thought you should be wary of, it'd probably be them. For obvious reasons."

Hector nodded at his own faint reflection in the glass. He could only imagine what a miserable first impression he would've made if he had ended up meeting the leader of House Gaolanet without even realizing who they were. "Thank you for telling me..."

"Sure."

'Hey, I could've told you most of that,' said Garovel.

'Then why didn't you?' said Hector.

'You never asked. And I was planning to. On the way to Sescoria, that is.'

'Mm. Have you got any other information on the nobles for me, then?'

'Of course I do. Hector, I've probably been preparing for this dinner even more than you have.'

‘Heh. Well, I’m listening.’

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Three: ‘The Gathering at Bosliat...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It felt like ages since he’d last seen the royal palace, but he knew it hadn’t been all that long, really. After having seen Warrenhold, the Golden Fort, Marshrock, Dunehall, and the Swallow’s Nest, Hector now felt an even greater sense of appreciation for this place. Despite all that competition, Bosliat Palace did not pale in comparison. Sure, it may not have been as big as Warrenhold or the Golden Fort; nor did it have a particularly eye-popping gimmick like Marshrock’s rock or Dunehall’s sand or the Nest’s defensive structure, but it did have a certain “regalness” to it, he thought.

Perhaps it was the national colors that did it. The more he looked at it, the more it seemed as if the blue-and-white flag of Atreya had been imbued into the building itself, somehow.

And perhaps it was, in a sense.

After receiving the invitation to the Gala, Hector’s curiosity had been piqued, so he’d been looking up the building’s history during his rare moments of downtime--which usually meant reading off his phone while he was out patrolling Gray Rock. He remembered vaguely learning about the palace in school, but he certainly didn’t remember any of his teachers telling him that it had been built as part of a declaration of independence.

Economic independence, that was. No actual rebellion had been fought, but Bosliat Palace had played a key role in accomplishing that feat--of securing the nation’s borders without bloodshed. Of course, it had also helped that the Mohssian Empire had already been fighting five other wars at the time and probably hadn’t wanted to make it six.

The idea that this building, with its turreted towers and sprawling gardens and dozens of guardhouses, was designed to be the proud, beating heart of an emerging nation, to represent Atreya as much as the sun-and-stars of the flag did--that made sense to Hector."

"1853

And indeed, Hector had read the historical accounting of the ambassador of the Mohssian Empire who had been largely responsible for convincing the emperor to grant Atreya its independence. In the account, the ambassador had arrived in this brazen little country to chastise its newly appointed King Domitrus and negotiate terms of a legal retraction, believing that a nation with such comparatively little land would have no other choice.

However, according to the account, the ambassador began changing his mind almost immediately upon seeing Bosliat Palace, because he didn't think there would be enough wealth in the entire nation to create such a grand structure.

It had made one hell of a first impression, in other words, and the king and all of his supporters had furthermore been able to follow through and change the ambassador's view of them so radically that Atreya's independence was officially recognized by the Mohssian Empire in less than a year.

Weirdly enough, Hector had never really felt or put much thought into national pride, but reading that had stirred something inside. Just a bit.

An odd feeling. Especially considering he'd already met the Queen and even fought for her. Multiple times. Shouldn't he have been feeling this way about Atreya all along?

He couldn't recall the school system ever evoking any sense of nationalism in him. Which was strange, wasn't it? Shouldn't they have been teaching national unity or whatever?

Eh, maybe they had, and he just hadn't been paying attention. In fact, that seemed like the most likely explanation, the more he thought about it.

He'd been thinking about what he would say if he were to be asked what he thought of Atreya--which, tonight, might very well happen. It was a tough notion to wrestle with. In the end, he felt like his allegiance was more to simply protecting innocent people, but he certainly knew that there were limits to that. There was only so much that he could do. And if he overextended himself, then the people who were already safe under his protection might very well end up in danger again.

Lives were on the line here. With a whole castle full of people waiting for him back in Gray Rock, Hector felt like he'd been too naive in the past. He needed be realistic about things now.

As he stepped out of the black SUV and onto the blue-striped carpet, he tried to push his anxiety down as far as it would go.

Which wasn't very far, sadly--not with all the cameras and microphones and eager reporters in front of him. The path forward remained clear, at least, thanks to a team of burly guardsmen holding the news crews behind a velvet rope, but the shouting and shuttering of cameras was still plenty distracting.

Oh man.

Jamal Easton was already there in front of him, having stepped out first, and Amelia Carthrace was stepping out behind him."

"1854

((Belated Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

The Rainlords had also put up something of a fuss about letting him go to the Gala alone. They'd repeatedly told him that he should take a team of servant bodyguards with him, but the obvious issue with that was the Rainlords' infamy. As much as Hector might've liked to bring Diego Redwater or Dimas Sebolt or someone else along, it wouldn't do if the Vanguard saw their faces on camera. Sure, the Gala was not an international event, but it wasn't like it was a national secret, either.

But the Rainlords had nonetheless been insistent. And the solution that they'd come up with was to simply avoid sending anyone recognizable. Hector had outright refused a full team of bodyguards, believing that would be more intimidating than protective, but he did decide to accept one Rainlord bodyguard, at least.

Matteo Delaguna was the chosen young man's name. Hector had seen his square face and heavy gaze a few times before, but that was it. The guy couldn't have been much older than him, probably not even twenty years old. His reaper, Ernivoc, accompanied them as well.

Matteo seemed to be taking his role as a bodyguard pretty damn seriously, too. He even dressed like one, complete with a dark suit, black tie, and sunglasses. He'd barely said anything since they'd left Warrenhold, though that was just fine with Hector. Ernivoc and Garovel talked plenty in their stead.

But it was weird, having this extra body around, following him like a shadow. He'd just been starting to get used to Jamal's frequent presence, and now there was this guy.

Hector felt like maybe he should've asked him some questions or something. Tried to get to know him better, maybe.

He felt that way. But he didn't act on that feeling, which ended up just making the feeling worse.

Agh.

Baby steps, he supposed.

It didn't help that he had about a thousand other things on his mind, as well. In between conversing with Ernivoc, Garovel had privately been explaining to Hector about all of the intel he'd been gathering recently about the various Atreyan nobles, and even now, as they were walking down the greeting carpet toward the palace, Garovel was still coming up with new things to tell him.

'Ah, see that guy?' The reaper pointed subtly forward with the tip of his scythe.

'Yeah?' said Hector, noting the well-dressed, gray-haired gentleman whom he was referring to.

'That's the Lord of House Vollier right there,' the reaper said. 'Domitrus Vollier. Important guy. Arguably the richest man in Atreya, right now.'

That name caught Hector by surprise. 'He's named after the first king?'

'Yep. Heh. Surprised you picked up on that. I'm proud of you.'

'Even first graders know who King Domitrus was,' said Hector.

'Exactly my point. That's very advanced historical knowledge for you.'

'Shut up.'

"1855

Garovel kept pointing notable people out to him as they continued toward the main entrance. It provided him with a helpful distraction, but even so, the walk felt like it was taking an eternity.

And everyone was staring at him, he realized. Not just the cameras but the other lords, too.

He just had to walk. And breathe. Walking and breathing. He could do that.

In theory.

Holy fuck, this was way too much attention. All the lights on him, the eyes, the noise. The weight of it was almost physical, as if he were suddenly moving underwater.

He'd known it was going to be like this, of course, but he still couldn't help feeling overwhelmed.

He could help showing that feeling, however. He just had to keep his thoughts and his actions separate, to maintain a poker face. Maybe that wasn't going to look particularly welcoming or friendly, but at least it would be better than looking like a panicking wreck. And at least it was something he'd been getting considerable practice with, too.

'How we doin', buddy?' said Garovel as they neared the enormous double doors with inlaid silver ornamentation. 'You're looking a little rigid there.'

He honestly didn't know how to answer that. Almost there. Just a bit farther. The long, flat steps up to the doors were only six in number, but they were beginning to look like a mountain climb unto themselves with so many people crowding the edges of the path.

Oh god.

'C'mon,' said Garovel. 'Keep talking to me. You can do it. You don't want the people of Atreya to see their fearless hero freaking out on national television, do you?'

'...That's not helping, Garovel.'

'Well, you're talking to me, so I think it is.'

He might've frowned if he wasn't so intent on keeping his face like stone.

Miraculously, he managed to make it up the steps and into the building. The noise from outside began to fade slowly, and a sharply dressed woman appeared in front of him, bowed, and then motioned him to follow her.

He did so.

He spotted more nobles loitering around the massive welcoming chamber, talking amongst themselves and throwing glances his way. Apparently, the press hadn't been invited inside yet, but Hector was fairly sure that they would be eventually. As he understood it, most of the Gala was going to be televised.

The guide led him through a number of rooms, and Hector relied on the Scarf to scout ahead a little. He was trying to make out where the Queen and Lynn might be. It was probably safe to assume that they were together, he figured, but there were just too many people around to tell. Bosliat was positively bustling with activity. He could only imagine how busy the palace's staff was.

Then, abruptly, Hector realized that the guide had taken him to a familiar room--a small offshoot of the main dining chamber. He'd previously had dinner with the Queen here, he recalled. That was when she'd decided to give him Warrenhold.

And lo and behold, there the woman sat again. With Lynn standing beside her."

"1856

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Hector was still feeling locked into his poker face, so he didn't smile, but the corners of his mouth did edge up ever so slightly.

Wow, it was good to see them. Safe and well, seemingly.

The Queen was looking more queenly than ever, he thought strangely. It was probably because of her dress. He'd never seen her wear anything so elaborate and flowing. It covered the entire booth she was seated at, draping over the side and sprawling across the floor like a sparkling blue carpet.

And her crown. She wasn't wearing it at the moment, but it was sitting right there on the table in front of her. A circle of silver, lined with gold and topped with sapphires in the shapes of stars. He'd seen it a few times in a history book or on television, but laying eyes on it in person was providing a decidedly different feeling.

He was perhaps the most keenly aware of Lynn's presence, however.

Her uniform was a little more elaborate than he recalled, too. The Atreyan Seal and the crest of House Belgrant were both woven into her collar. He remembered that she'd often taken to wearing her white cloak while on duty, but the one she was wearing now bore long silver stripes and boasted miniature Atreyan flags at each shoulder. It also had a deeply black interior, perhaps to conceal pockets or to be reversible.

She still had her eye patch and sword as well, of course. And her bone half-gauntlet was concealed beneath a glove, but Hector had no doubt that it was there, too.

And damn.

He was torn, wanting to both stare at her and to avoid eye contact.

"There you are," said the Queen upon seeing him. "I am glad you were able to arrive before the Gala was officially underway. I doubt we will have much opportunity to speak privately tonight--certainly not before midnight." She gestured to the other side of the table. "Please, come and have a seat, Lord Goffe."

Hector made his way over. Lynn was watching him like a one-eyed hawk. He thought she might say something, but she didn't, and he sat down.

Oh shit, he was probably supposed to say something here, wasn't he? "Ah, uh--thank you, Your Highness..."

Helen smiled warmly at him. "It is very good to see you again," she said. "In truth, we had been growing quite worried about you."

"Oh, ah... yeah. Er. Sorry about that..." He glanced between her and Lynn. Mehlsanz was there as well, he noticed, floating up from behind the Queen's enormous gown.

"I understand you had quite the eventful trip," said Helen.

"That's... one way of putting it, yeah."

"I wish I could hear all of the details, but from what Amelia told me, it would be quite a long story, and we have other matters to discuss."

'Not to worry,' said Garovel. 'I'll tell Mehlsanz all about it later, and then she can relay it to you.'

'Yes, I think I'd rather hear it from you than Voreese,' said Mehlsanz.

'Heh. I'll let her know you said that.'

'Oh, god, please don't.'

"1857

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

"I am, however, very curious to hear about these 'guests' who are currently staying at Warrenhold," said the Queen.

Hector had been wondering when that would come up. He'd known that Madame Carthrace had told her about them.

He considered his next words carefully. He knew that he shouldn't keep any of the important details from her, but it was still tough to know where to begin. He supposed he should just get the hardest part out of the way, though.

"...They're fugitives from the Vanguard," he told her.

For a moment, the Queen merely looked at him, her expression tightening. Then she exhaled and averted her gaze. "And here I was worried that they might be on the run from Abolish." She rubbed her brow with a manicured hand. "This is far worse."

"...Sorry," was all Hector could think to say. He glanced at Lynn, who seemed more interested with the Queen's reaction.

Helen took a long breath. "I assume you have a good reason for bringing them to Atreya?"

Hector had had plenty of time to prepare for that question. "They're good and noble people,” he said. “The Vanguard was in the wrong. And, ah... Abolish attacked them, too. They were kind of desperate for help, so...”

The Queen nodded. “So you volunteered.” She still did not sound terribly pleased. “I also understand that they are... warriors, of some sort?”

Lynn was looking at him again, he noticed.

“...Yeah,” said Hector. “They’re... well, they’re incredibly powerful, actually.”

“Wait,” said Lynn, her one eye widening, “these aren’t the Rainlords you went to help, are they?”

Hector head reared back a little. “Er, yeah, they are. I... thought you guys already knew that.”

Helen’s eyes widened a little now, too. “You brought the Rainlords back from Sair with you?”

He gave a small nod. “Ah, well, about half of them, anyway. The other half was captured by Sanko.”

“You fought Sanko?!” said Lynn.

“What? No, I didn’t fight her. The other half of the Rainlords did. And, er, they lost.” He was little surprised that Lynn even recognized that name, but after a moment, he supposed he shouldn’t have been.

The Queen was rubbing her brow again. Suddenly, she looked a lot more exhausted than she had a minute ago.

“...Madame Carthrace didn’t tell you they were Rainlords?” said Hector.

“No, she did not,” said Helen.

That was surprising. When she’d said that she’d “told the Queen about their new house guests,” Hector had just assumed that she’d informed her of everything she’d been learning about them while managing Warrenhold’s affairs.

Clearly, he should not have assumed that.

Bah. How amateurish of him. Not very lordly at all.

"How long do you intend to give them refuge at Warrenhold?" the Queen asked.

Now there was an important question. He exchanged looks with Garovel, wondering if he wanted to chime in here, but the reaper merely nodded at him.

"...As long as they need," said Hector.

The Queen expression tightened again. "Indefinitely?"
"1858

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

"Well, they've been driven out of their homeland," said Hector. "But they're very... proud, to say the least. I'm sure they'll want to go and win it back, sooner or later. I'm just hoping that it'll be later."

"Hector." The Queen rested her hands on the table and interlocked her fingers together. "I know you have only been back for a handful of days, but even so, you must realize that Atreya does not need this manner of trouble, at the moment."

He frowned, knowing that her mood was probably not going to improve after what he was about to say. "Ah... honestly, I don't think the Rainlords are going to be a problem. But I do think someone else will be..."

"Excuse me?" said the Queen.

There was no good way of putting this, he felt. "You know who Sai-hee is, right?"

Helen blinked at him a couple times. "Please tell me Sai-hee is not going to invade."

"Oh, uh, she's not. I mean, not as far as I know."

Helen did not look very reassured.

"...But I did bring another fugitive from her group with me," said Hector.

At that, the Queen actually buried her face in her hands.

‘Mm,’ said Garovel, ‘if I could butt in for a second here, I feel like maybe Hector isn’t explaining the situation quite as well as he could be.’

The Queen did not look up, but she did answer through her hands. “Do go on, then, Garovel.”

‘Well, y’see, we didn’t really have a whole lot of options with this Sai-hee fugitive. This guy isn’t one of the Rainlords, by the way. In fact, they kinda hate him, at the moment.’

‘I’m not sure your explanation is any better,’ said Mehlsanz.

‘Look, okay, we get it,’ said Garovel. ‘It’s a precarious situation. But it’s also an opportunity like no other, right? Like Hector said, the Rainlords are incredibly powerful. And right now, we’re on quite good terms with them.’

‘Yes.’ The Queen removed her hands from her face and took another breath. “Amelia mentioned that these guests of yours might make for valuable allies. I, however, remain unconvinced.”

Abruptly, Hector realized that Madame Carthrace had not followed him into this meeting. Jamal and Matteo weren’t there anymore, either. With the Scarf, though, he could sense that they were waiting outside the room with a pair of royal guardsmen. He had no idea where Madame Carthrace had gone, though.

‘That’s perfectly understandable,’ Garovel was saying. ‘I encourage you to come to Warrenhold and meet them yourself.’

The Queen gave the reaper a flat look.

‘We don’t really have the time for that,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘And all eyes are on us. It was difficult enough arranging this meeting here without drawing the attention of the entire media. If we visited Warrenhold, it would make it that much more difficult for you to keep your “guests” hidden--which I assume you wish to continue doing?’”

"1859

‘Yes,’ said Garovel, ‘but if nothing else, then at least YOU could come,

Mehlsanz, and give them a look.'

'Mm, perhaps. But I'm a busy girl, too, you know. And besides, I don't think Helen values my opinion that much.'

The Queen gave her a flat look, now.

'Heh, well, if that's true, then maybe she's right to not care about your opinion,' said Garovel.

'Excuse me?' said Mehlsanz dryly, though Hector heard a hint of amusement in her voice.

'You can't just revive someone and then expect them to treat you like a sophisticated intellectual,' said Garovel. 'I know I make it look easy, being this obviously smart all the time, but trust me, it's a whole ordeal unto itself.'

'Careful,' said Mehlsanz. 'You and I are old friends, but not THAT old.'

Garovel just chuckled.

"This fugitive from Sai-hee," said the Queen, apparently wanting to get the conversation back on track, "tell me about him. You said that you did not think these Rainlords will be a problem but that you think someone else will. You were referring to this man?"

"Oh," said Hector, "ah... yeah. He's... well, his name's Leo. He seems to trust me, but... ah... he might be under the impression that I'm... one of the oldest servants in the world."

The Queen expression remained blank, and she just stared at Hector for a time.

Hector and Garovel did their best to bring the Queen up to speed with regard to what had happened with Leo in the Undercrust. It ended up drifting all the way back into what happened at Dunehall and even into Marshrock, and by the end it, Helen and Mehlsanz were looking more bewildered than ever. Even Lynn was eyeing him as if he was suddenly a different person or something. It was always tough to tell what was going through her head, though.

'But anyway, enough about us,' said Garovel at the protracted silence. 'Tell us about what's going on with you. We'd like to help, if we can.'

'It sounds like you already have your hands full,' said Mehlsanz.

‘Yeah, well, if we can help you with your problems, then maybe you wouldn’t mind helping us with ours.’

“I am not certain how I could help with this Leo character,” said Helen. “He sounds rather unstable. Do you have a particular tactic in mind?”

‘We have a few,’ said Garovel, though Hector wasn’t sure if that was a lie or not. ‘But for the moment, I don’t think we’ll need your help in dealing with him. The way Hector talked about the man was a bit foreboding--and not unduly so, perhaps--but as for me, I’m optimistic about our relationship with him. I think Hector and I will be able to bring him around and count him as another valuable ally and protector of Atreya.’”

"1860

The Queen regarded Hector and Garovel both another time. “I see. Forgive me if I seem skeptical. I have had few reasons for optimism, of late.” She removed her hands from the table and folded them over her stomach.

“I can imagine,” said Hector. He wanted to say something more, something reassuring preferably, but nothing was coming to mind.

“This financial crisis,” the Queen said slowly, “it is... my failure. So many of this nation’s problems might have been avoided if I had only been more attentive in these last five years.”

Hector observed her face with silent surprise. He’d been seeing her all over the news lately, giving speeches and the like, and she always looked so confident and composed. But here and now? Hector had never seen her so uncertain.

Come to think of it, her worried reactions earlier were a lot more expressive as well.

It put a question in Hector’s head.

“...Is the crisis even worse than the public realizes?” he asked.

The Queen met his gaze but didn’t answer him.

Perhaps that was an answer in itself, though.

“...Madame Carthrace wants to open a bank in my name,” said Hector.

Helen’s eyes drifted away from him, seemingly in thought. “A bank? Why would she...?”

“Ah... she seems to think that, er... that my reputation would be able to help stabilize the economy. I mean, I don’t know if, uh... if that would work, but... eh... that’s what she said.”

The Queen seemed lost in thought, but she still managed to say, “I see.” And then, after a beat, “Interesting.”

Hector supposed he shouldn’t stop there. “She, uh... she also wanted me to ask you for funding for it.”

Helen frowned at him.

“Ah--if you can’t help, though, then, er, I understand...”

She sighed mildly through her nose and shook her head. “At this time, I am afraid I can offer you no such assistance.”

‘Really?’ said Garovel. ‘I don’t want to give you a hard time, but it seems a little odd that you wouldn’t choose to subsidize a potential solution to the main problem facing the nation. Or HELP subsidize it, at the very least.’

The Queen’s frown deepened. “I would if I could,” she said.

‘It’s that bad, huh?’ said Garovel.

‘It is,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘We’re already running on fumes, as it is. The Gala? Everything you see here tonight? Bought with funds borrowed from Intar.’

‘Intar, huh?’ said Garovel. ‘Well, it’s true that they’ve got plenty of money to throw around, but I can’t say I like the idea of Atreya being indebted to them.’

“Nor do I,” said Helen, “but it is all we can do to keep up appearances, for the moment. Why, if not for David’s silver tongue, I doubt even they would have agreed to lend us any more.”

‘And now they’re pressuring us to grant special privileges to their businesses. Their influence is growing stronger by the day.’

Well, that corroborated what Madame Carthrace had told him, Hector figured.

He would've much preferred to learn that she'd been wrong."
"1861 -- CXCIV.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

'I see,' said Garovel. 'So, then, what's your strategy moving forward? If things continue on like they have been, then it sounds like you won't be able to keep up appearances for much longer.'

At that, the Queen was silent for an uncomfortably long time.

Hector studied her expression, as well as Lynn's, and he couldn't help worrying about what he was seeing. Their solemn gazes. Their aversion of eye contact.

This wasn't right at all. He was the one who was supposed to be afraid of eye contact, not them.

At length, however, the Queen finally answered. "It may already be too late," she said. "I know you are expecting me to say that I have some grand plan to save the kingdom, and if you were any other of the lords here tonight, I would say exactly that. I would tell you what I thought you would wish to hear--indeed, what I would wish to hear. But with the two of you, at least, I feel I must share the fullness of my thoughts on this matter, terrible though they are."

Hector's own expression hardened as he listened, bracing himself for whatever he was about to hear.

"I fear there may simply be no way out of this particular crisis," said the Queen. "Not for me, at least. Not for the Crown."

Hector was confused. He waited for her to explain what she meant.

"Atreya will survive," she went on. "There is no doubt in my mind about that. Because Atreya is its people. And we are a hardier bunch than I think even we ourselves realize. We are tough and often underestimated." A thin smile crossed her lips briefly. "I would say you are a fine example."

Hector might've blushed if he wasn't more concerned about where this was going.

“And perhaps I am being overly dramatic,” she said. “It is not as if I will be gutted and thrown out onto the street.”

Hector couldn't hold his questions any longer. “What are you talking about? Why are you saying all of this?”

For a short time, the Queen merely looked at him, her eyes softening before seeming to find their steel again. “This information is not yet public, but... Intar has offered to annex Atreya.”

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Four: ‘Thine uncertain destiny...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's head reared back. He didn't even know what to make of that news.

The Queen was not done talking, however. “I have not yet given them an answer, but it is certainly not something I can dismiss out of hand. And the terms of it, as they have been relayed to me thus far, would be rather generous, considering our circumstances.”

‘Wow,’ said Garovel. ‘And what are these “rather generous” terms, if you don't mind my asking?’

“Complete absolution of all our debts to them,” said Helen, “as well as the shouldering of all debts we have to other nations--namely Korgum and Dozer.””

"1861 -- CXCIV.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

‘I see,’ said Garovel. ‘So, then, what's your strategy moving forward? If things continue on like they have been, then it sounds like you won't be able to keep up appearances for much longer.’

At that, the Queen was silent for an uncomfortably long time.

Hector studied her expression, as well as Lynn's, and he couldn't help worrying about what he was seeing. Their solemn gazes. Their aversion of eye contact.

This wasn't right at all. He was the one who was supposed to be afraid of eye contact, not them.

At length, however, the Queen finally answered. "It may already be too late," she said. "I know you are expecting me to say that I have some grand plan to save the kingdom, and if you were any other of the lords here tonight, I would say exactly that. I would tell you what I thought you would wish to hear--indeed, what I would wish to hear. But with the two of you, at least, I feel I must share the fullness of my thoughts on this matter, terrible though they are."

Hector's own expression hardened as he listened, bracing himself for whatever he was about to hear.

"I fear there may simply be no way out of this particular crisis," said the Queen. "Not for me, at least. Not for the Crown."

Hector was confused. He waited for her to explain what she meant.

"Atreya will survive," she went on. "There is no doubt in my mind about that. Because Atreya is its people. And we are a hardier bunch than I think even we ourselves realize. We are tough and often underestimated." A thin smile crossed her lips briefly. "I would say you are a fine example."

Hector might've blushed if he wasn't more concerned about where this was going.

"And perhaps I am being overly dramatic," she said. "It is not as if I will be gutted and thrown out onto the street."

Hector couldn't hold his questions any longer. "What are you talking about? Why are you saying all of this?"

For a short time, the Queen merely looked at him, her eyes softening before seeming to find their steel again. "This information is not yet public, but... Intar has offered to annex Atreya."

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Four: 'Thine uncertain destiny...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's head reared back. He didn't even know what to make of that news.

The Queen was not done talking, however. "I have not yet given them an answer, but it is certainly not something I can dismiss out of hand. And the terms of it, as they have been relayed to me thus far, would be rather generous, considering our circumstances."

'Wow,' said Garovel. 'And what are these "rather generous" terms, if you don't mind my asking?'

"Complete absolution of all our debts to them," said Helen, "as well as the shouldering of all debts we have to other nations--namely Korgum and Dozer.""

"1862

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

'Atreya is indebted to Korgum and Dozer?' said Garovel. 'How the hell did that happen?'

"A parting gift from my incarcerated brother, Luther," she said. "And it is no insignificant sum, mind you."

'Goddamn,' said Garovel privately. Then, publicly, he said, 'Okay, well, is that all we'd be getting out of the deal? Debt removal?'

"No," said Helen. "Intar would also grant an additional four billion troa to each of the great houses of Atreya. Which would include you, by the way."

Hector just blinked at that.

'The "equivalent" of four billion troa, you mean,' said Mehlsanz.

"Yes," said Helen. "The troa would become a defunct form of currency. We would have to transfer over to the Intarian tero."

'I can't imagine that the exchange rate on the troa is doing so great, at the moment,' said Garovel.

"I am aware," said the Queen. "I assure you, I would never agree to such a deal without being entirely certain of such details."

‘Of course,’ said Garovel. ‘But still, is that all? Money is great and all, but it takes more than that to make a nation whole.’

“Yes, Atreya would also be formally recognized as a ‘territory’ within Intar and granted all accompanying rights,” said the Queen. “Every Atreyan citizen would be granted full Intarian citizenship, as would any child born in Atreya in the future.”

‘Ah.’ Garovel paused. ‘Alright, now THAT does sweeten the deal quite a bit, if you ask me.’

“Indeed,” said Helen.

‘But still, are they offering anything else?’ said Garovel.

‘Is that not enough for you?’ said Mehlsanz.

‘What can I say? I’m greedy. And if we’re gonna go through with this, we should aim for the best deal possible, shouldn’t we?’

“No other beneficial stipulations were put forward,” said the Queen, “but there is time yet for further negotiations.”

‘Ooh, interesting,’ said Garovel. ‘So you could theoretically still swing for maybe another few billion for new infrastructure or schooling, eh?’

A faint smile crossed the woman’s lips again. “That would be pushing it, I imagine.”

‘Maybe a nice, big park for every city?’ said Garovel. ‘Gray Rock could use a nice, big park. Weirdly enough, Gray Rock has a lot of actually gray rocks everywhere. Not much greenery for all the proud, Atreyan families to raise their healthy, Atreyan kids in.’

The Queen tilted her head at the reaper. “I can no longer tell if you are for or against this deal.”

‘Why, I’m neither. Yet. You still haven’t told us what they want us to give up. Specifically.’

The Queen’s frown returned. “First and foremost, I would have to relinquish all governmental authority.”

‘Mm,’ hummed Garovel.

“I would still remain Queen of Atreya, but I would have no actual power. I would become a figurehead." She did not look like she much cared for that idea."

"1863

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector could hardly blame her, especially after all she had done to hold on to her power.

Everything Hector had helped her do, no less.

What a strange notion, that it might have all been for naught.

Well, okay, not all. They weren't at war with Rendon. That was kinda important, Hector felt.

"In my stead," Helen continued, "a governor would be elected, as is the case with all of the other Intarian territories. The ultimate authority over Atreya, however, would defer to the President of Intar."

'And this governor would be elected by Atreyans, right?' said Garovel. 'Not some sort of Inatarian council somewhere?'

"Yes, it would be a fully republican process," said the Queen. She shook her head. "And my traitorous brother's goal will have been achieved..."

Hector had no words for her.

Nor did anyone else, apparently.

The Queen soon found her composure again. "Apart from that, of course, Intarian federal law will apply in Atreyan territory, which will usher in a host of legislative changes. Taxes, in particular, come to mind."

'Still, that's pretty tame,' said Garovel. 'Were there any other stipulations?'

"Not as of yet, no," said Helen.

'Hmm. Then, is it just me, or is this deal sounding a little too good to be true? Not that I'm eager to see you removed from power 'r anything.'

‘No, I was thinking the same thing,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘The worst part is that it’s not entirely clear what Intar stands to gain from this deal. Land? Sure, but not that much. Atreya is a tiny country, after all. Extra taxes? Maybe, but it’ll be some time before that revenue pays off all the money that they would be spending on this deal.’

‘Ah, well, I may be able to answer that for you, then,’ said Garovel.

He had both Mehlsanz and the Queen’s attention.

‘Technically, Intar is not at war with anyone at the moment,’ said Garovel, ‘but from what I’ve been learning from the Rainlords and their reapers over the last month or so, Intar has developed a tendency in recent years to discreetly involve itself in international conflicts.’

Mehlsanz nodded. ‘Mm. Yes. I heard that as well when I was working for the Vanguard. The Vangaurd doesn’t keep its own “territory,” per se--not like Sai-hee and Abolish do, certainly--but at the same time, it would not be wholly inaccurate to say that Intar is one of the main countries where the Vanguard operates.’

‘Yes,’ said Garovel. ‘One of the core values of the Vanguard has been to never interfere with the peaceful governing of a people, so it has historically held Intarian law in high esteem--and even agreed to work for it, from time to time. It seems, however, that the bonds between the two are stronger than they have ever been. There is some fear that they may be merging into one, as is the case with Abolish and Dozer.’”
"1864

“What does that have to do with their desire to annex Atreya?” said the Queen.

‘Your debt to Korgum and Dozer,’ said Garovel. ‘Intar may be thinking a few steps ahead here. Suppose, for instance, that you went on being unable to repay your debt to Dozer, and then Dozer decided to come and collect? How would a country with such a reputation for violence do that?’

“You think Dozer would attempt to conquer Atreya?”

‘I think Intar may think that. And they probably have a better grasp of the situation across the continent than we do, so if they think it might happen, then I'd say, yeah, it might happen.'

'You're using a bit of circular logic there, aren't you?' said Mehlsanz.

'Am I? Well, you see my point, though, right? Intar is quietly allied with Korgum and therefore at war with Dozer. So in their eyes, it would probably be best if you never repay any of your debt to Dozer.'

The queen seemed to give the idea some thought. "If that is true, then that is quite the expensive strategy on their part..."

'Not as expensive as Korgum losing the war,' said Garovel. 'Abolish already has a fairly strong presence in Azirat, Kortan, and Calthos. It may not be completely dominant there, but Korgum and Lyste are currently barring Dozer's passage north. If Korgum were to fall, though, then I suspect that Dozer would storm into those countries and have them subjugated within a few months. Maybe less. Then Dozer would be able to knock on Intar's southeastern door or maybe just invade Sair and try to add that to the pile.'

'The Vanguard would never allow Dozer to take Azirat, Kortan, and Calthos that easily,' said Mehlsanz.

'Oh, I don't think they'd LET them do anything,' said Garovel. 'The Vanguard is having plenty of its own problems, right now--and worse, I think it might be blind to about half of them.'

"But its recent victory in Jesbol is a good sign, no?" said the Queen.

'Sure, but its even more recent loss in Kavia should raise a few eyebrows, too,' said Garovel. 'In fact, the line of thinking you just brought up is exactly what I'm most concerned about. It's true that the victory in Jesbol was a major one and that Abolish is no doubt suffering hugely for military strength now that both Dunhouser and Gunther are dead at Jackson's hands. But this is a full-blown war we're talking about. It's more complicated than just how strong its top guys are. The Vanguard still has to worry about managing its time and resources properly and not playing into the enemy's hands. Overconfidence isn't going to do them any favors. And anyway, the real top threats are Dozer and Morgunov, and they're both still alive.'

The Queen just folded her hands in front of her again.

'You think the Vanguard is growing overconfident?' said Mehlsanz."

"1865

‘Maybe,’ said Garovel. ‘The loss in Kavia shouldn’t be disregarded as a total fluke, I think. Considering the Vanguard’s current advantage in numbers, that loss probably shouldn’t have happened, so the fact that it did is a warning sign, in my opinion. And now you’re telling me about this annexation offer? I think there may be a connection. I think the Vanguard is trying to pull out every weapon in its arsenal in order to finally deliver a decisive blow to Dozer.’

“That may be true,” said the Queen, “but it does not answer the question of whether or not I should accept Intar’s terms.”

Garovel laughed mildly. ‘Are you asking me to make that decision for you? Why, I’m flattered you hold my opinion in such high regard.’

She gave the reaper another flat look, but the edge of her mouth turned up with the whisper of a smile. “I would appreciate your counsel, though nothing more.”

‘Heh. Well, regardless, I won’t pretend to know what the right decision for Atreya is, but as should be evident from the explanation of my perspective just now, I don’t think Intar is looking to abuse or exploit Atreya or its people, necessarily. I think they’re playing a complicated political and military game, and Atreya is just one small part of it.’

“I do not know if that is a relief to hear or a worry,” said Helen. “Even if Intar holds no ill will towards us, I still fear that Atreya is far from their mind. What is to stop this kingdom from being trampled under the feet of these warring juggernauts?”

‘What’s to stop it, you ask?’ said Garovel. ‘Well, I’m pretty sure that’s our job, isn’t it?’ He motioned not just to Hector but to everyone at the table. ‘And perhaps I’m wrong, but I don’t think any of our feelings on that particular subject are going to change anytime soon, even under Intarian law.’

The Queen’s gaze fell to the table, and she was silent.

So was everyone else for a time.

A question occurred to Hector, and given the current opening in the conversation, he decided to take it. “...If you did decide to give up power, what would you do?”

She looked at him, considerate. "A good question. I would still be queen, but I would have no legal authority. That does not mean I would be powerless, however."

Hector understood her meaning. Not being able to order people to do things didn't mean she wouldn't still have considerable influence.

But still. Queen Helen not being in charge?

He could hardly imagine it.

'Well, so far, I'm not hearing a whole lot of reasons why you should turn the Intarians down,' said Garovel.

The Queen merely frowned.

'Whatever you decide, though, you should know that we'll be with you,' said Garovel. 'Even, hypothetically speaking, if you were to make a horrifically unpopular decision that caused the public to turn on you, Hector and I would still be on your side.'

The Queen exhaled a curt sigh. "Thank you."

"1866

'And for the record, I do think it would be ideal if we could resolve this crisis without relying on the Intarians or any other foreigners,' said Garovel. 'Hector and I will continue to work towards that end--at least until you tell us otherwise.'

She looked between the two of them and nodded. "I appreciate that. I will take your words into consideration."

'You look great in that dress, by the way,' said Garovel.

The Queen seemed surprised by the compliment and eyed Hector, perhaps for an explanation.

He scrambled for an answer. "Ah--yeah. Uh. You do."

"Thank you," said Helen, though not without hesitation in her voice.

'Ask her about the King,' said Garovel privately.

It took Hector a second to realize that he was receiving instruction. He'd gotten comfortable just listening. "H-How is the King doing?"

"He is well," said the Queen. "I am sure he would like to speak to you, himself. He has been wanting to visit Warrenhold."

"Oh, uh. Well, uh, we'd love to have him."

"Only him?" said the Queen with a teasing smile. "Am I not invited, as well?"

Hector felt a flash of embarrassment at having missed that, but then realized that it was probably too late to backtrack with any sort of dignity, and so decided to just go with it. "...Eh, I'll have to think about it."

And the Queen actually laughed. Lynn cracked a smile, too.

Hector wasn't sure he'd ever felt more pleased with himself.

What an amazing feeling it was to make someone laugh. And royalty, no less.

Strange. For the briefest moment, he felt like he was having an epiphany.

He really liked making people laugh. In fact, it was one of the things he liked most.

How was he just now realizing this about himself?

'The party's going to begin soon,' said Mehlsanz.

'Soon isn't NOW, though, is it?' said Garovel.

'You have more you wish to discuss?' she said.

'Not particularly. But it's rare that I get to enjoy such fine company. I don't want it to end yet.'

'What a charmer.'

Hector noticed Garovel's hollow gaze turn toward Lynn. 'How is your bodyguard doing, by the way?'

The Queen perked up at that question, glancing at Lynn herself before regarding Garovel again. "Good, I hope. Is there anything specific you would like to know?"

Lynn's expression shifted somewhat as she was perhaps sensing that she was being talked about.

'Her aura seems a bit stronger than before,' said Garovel.

Oh? That certainly piqued Hector's interest.

"Yes, I am not surprised," said the Queen. "She has been training diligently."

'What manner of training would that be?' said Garovel.

"Attempting to unlock the secrets of that gauntlet," said Helen. "Mr. Norez has been kind enough to offer his assistance in that regard, as well."

Lynn just looked around awkwardly.

'Oh, yeah, Harper,' said Garovel. 'I'm looking forward to seeing him and Darsihm again, too. They're here, aren't they? It's tough to sense them with all these people around.'

'They are, yes,' said Mehlsanz."

"1867

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

"I am sure they will be happy to see you as well," said Helen.

'Yeah, no kidding,' said Mehlsanz. 'Darsihm wouldn't shut up about you the other day. It seems you left quite an impression on him, Garovel.'

'Oh, really?' laughed Garovel. 'That makes me happy.'

There arrived a knock at the door, and the amusement on the Queen's face diminished suddenly. "Enter," she said loudly.

The same guide from earlier poked her head into the room. "Dinner is ready to be served, Your Highness. Everyone is gathering."

"I see. Thank you, Willow."

The young woman bowed her head lightly and disappeared again.

Helen inhaled deeply. "I suppose we had better make an appearance." She stood, and her gigantic dress moved beneath her like a suddenly disturbed sea. Lynn had to step out of its way.

Hector stood up as well.

"Let us speak again later tonight," said Helen. "There is more I would yet discuss with you."

Hector just gave her a nod and followed her out of the room.

Somehow, he ended up walking next to Lynn.

It didn't seem like there would be enough time to say much of anything to her, but he still couldn't help being intensely conscious of her presence. She was so close. All of his discomfort from earlier came rushing back, stronger than ever, and his neck felt suddenly rigid as he tried not to glance awkwardly at her.

It was just a short walk. No big deal.

But she was right there next to him...

And she was looking damn good, too.

Oh, shit, he'd glanced at her, hadn't he?

And she'd noticed, too. He could see her looking at him in his peripheral vision.

Shit shit shit shit."

"1868 -- CXCV.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

He had to relax. Everything was probably fine. They were in the dining room. Everyone was being seated. He just had to focus on finding his assigned spot. His eyes half-panickedly searched among the triangular name cards for "Hector Goffe." There were so many tables, all pristinely decorated, but the Queen's was the largest and at the center of the room. That one would probably be reserved for all the Belgrants and Lumenbels, though, right? He wouldn't be assigned there, would he? He'd have been placed somewhere--

Nope. His name was right there at the Queen's table, only one chair away from her. And that one chair between them had the name "Lynnette Edith" assigned to it.

He was going to have to sit next to Lynn.

Of-fucking-course he was.

He closed his eyes, rubbed his forehead with one hand, and inhaled deeply.

It was going to be a long dinner.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Five: 'The furtive banquet...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The media was finally allowed into the castle, but only to take photographs of the enormous gathering before dinner. They were soon ushered back out by the security staff, presumably so as not to disturb the guests while they were eating.

Hector appreciated that, at least. The last thing he wanted was to have this miserable meal televised.

Unfortunately, it also had the effect of lessening the overall tension in the room, which seemed to make people more comfortable talking.

Hector was not one of those people.

But perhaps Lynn wasn't, either, because she was remaining noticeably quiet.

The person sitting on his left, however, was very much one such talker. Not that Hector minded. Prince David of House Lumenbel was someone he was most interested in listening to.

"I'm glad to see we both made it back in time for the Gala," said David.

"How was your time in Intar?" asked Hector, thankful for any excuse not to look to his right."

"1868 -- CXCXV.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

He had to relax. Everything was probably fine. They were in the dining room. Everyone was being seated. He just had to focus on finding his assigned spot. His eyes half-panickedly searched among the triangular name cards for "Hector Goffe." There were so many tables, all pristinely decorated, but the Queen's was the largest and at the center of the room. That one would probably be reserved for all the Belgrants and Lumenbels, though, right? He wouldn't be assigned there, would he? He'd have been placed somewhere--

Nope. His name was right there at the Queen's table, only one chair away from her. And that one chair between them had the name "Lynnette Edith" assigned to it.

He was going to have to sit next to Lynn.

Of-fucking-course he was.

He closed his eyes, rubbed his forehead with one hand, and inhaled deeply.

It was going to be a long dinner.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Five: 'The furtive banquet...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The media was finally allowed into the castle, but only to take photographs of the enormous gathering before dinner. They were soon ushered back out by the security staff, presumably so as not to disturb the guests while they were eating.

Hector appreciated that, at least. The last thing he wanted was to have this miserable meal televised.

Unfortunately, it also had the effect of lessening the overall tension in the room, which seemed to make people more comfortable talking.

Hector was not one of those people.

But perhaps Lynn wasn't, either, because she was remaining noticeably quiet.

The person sitting on his left, however, was very much one such talker. Not that Hector minded. Prince David of House Lumenbel was someone he was most interested in listening to.

"I'm glad to see we both made it back in time for the Gala," said David.

"How was your time in Intar?" asked Hector, thankful for any excuse not to look to his right."

"1869

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

The Prince frowned. "Not as productive as I would have hoped, sadly."

Hector just listened.

“Rather a turbulent place, Intar,” said David. “You wouldn’t know it just by looking, though. It’s a country full of deception. Calm on the surface, but a maelstrom beneath. Spies everywhere. I’m not sure I met a single trustworthy person while I was there.”

“Wow,” was all Hector could think to say.

“My business there is not yet concluded, however,” said David. “I will have to venture back into that den of vipers in a few days.” He allowed his gaze to linger on Hector a moment. “I don’t suppose there is any way I could convince you to accompany me, is there?”

Hector blinked at that. “Uh...”

David merely waited for an answer. He was genuinely asking, it seemed--not making some sort of strange joke.

“...Are you really that worried about your safety?” said Hector.

David bobbed his head. “Not to put too fine a point on it, but yes. I visited Intar much in my youth. I even studied at university there.” He paused. “Various universities, to be more precise. And before this year, I felt I had a fairly good grasp of the Intarian culture, mindset, and even its political landscape. But now...”

“Something’s changed?” Hector inferred.

“That is putting it mildly. Though, perhaps it is only my perception of it that has changed. Certainly, learning about the existence of... your less corporeal friends has had an effect on my worldview.”

“Hmm.”

“But even so, I cannot help but feel as though there is a greater game being played in Intar, right now.”

“Greater, how?” said Hector.

“Greater than a typical power struggle, I mean,” said the Prince.

“Those are common enough among those with influence.

Neverending, one might even argue. No, this strikes me as something different. It is more a war of ideas, I think.””

"1870

That sounded familiar to Hector, but he didn't want to jump to any conclusions about what the Prince was referring to. "...What ideas do you mean, exactly?"

Before the man could answer, however, their food began to arrive. Hector had almost forgotten what he'd ordered. He'd had to choose four days ago from a menu the size of a book. Apparently, the staff needed that much time to prepare all of these dishes.

A simple salmon entree with mashed potatoes and vegetables was all he'd gone for, but they'd managed to make even that look lavishly gourmet--and taste fantastic, too.

David picked the conversation back up as soon as the servers were gone. "I believe the clash of ideas, at its deepest core, is between pacifism and interventionism."

Hector was mid-bite as he thought about that. He wanted to say something, but he figured he should finish chewing first. A voice to his right was therefore able to beat him to the punch.

"Pacifism?" said Lynn.

Hector barely avoided flinching. He'd almost managed to forget that she was there.

"Indeed," said David. "It seems a popular ideology among youthful Intarian activists. They argue that their nation has been 'an arbiter of subjective truths on the world stage for too long.'"

"What does that mean?" said Lynn.

"Yes, the language they use makes it a bit unclear," said David, "but I believe they are saying that they think Intar is unfairly imposing its own sense of morality and justice upon the rest of the world. Eloa, in particular." The man paused. "Which, I have to say, is not an argument without merit."

Hector supposed that lined up with what Garovel had said about Intar becoming more interventionist in recent years--and growing closer to the Vanguard.

"And they think pacifism is the answer?" said Lynn, apparently not caring to conceal the disapproval in her tone."

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

"I take it you disagree?" said David.

Hector looked at her.

She looked back at him, perhaps thinking, then gave a small shrug. "I'm not a philosopher. It just seems... impractical, I suppose."

"Mm," was all David said.

She wasn't wrong, Hector felt. Trying to get an entire nation to become pacifistic? Especially one as big and proud as Intar? Impractical wasn't even the word for it.

He could only imagine what the Rainlords would think of that. Though, Intar had its own Rainlords, too, didn't it? Now more than ever, he wondered what they were like.

David skewered a small slice of buttered duck with his fork. "So would you mind joining me on my next trip to Intar?" he asked.

Hector hadn't forgotten the proposal. He'd been trying to work out an appropriate response in the back of his mind. "I, ah..." He looked toward Garovel, who was on the other side of the room, apparently eavesdropping on some of the lords' conversations.

Hector supposed he would have to decide on his own. If he was being honest with himself, though, he already knew what he needed to say. "I'm sorry. I... don't think I can leave the country, right now. I've got a lot, uh... that still needs taking care of here."

The Prince frowned but nodded. "I see."

After a moment of observing the man's face, Hector reconsidered his answer. "But... I may be able to find someone else to escort you."

"Oh?" said David. "Who, might I ask?"

That seemed to pique Lynn's interest as well.

Hector recoiled from both their gazes a little. "Ah, uh--er--like I said, I may be able to find someone. I don't, uh, have anyone in particular in mind yet..."

"1872

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

"Ah." David took a quick bite before lowering his voice a little. "Might this have anything to do with these 'guests' of yours I've been hearing about?"

Talking with his mouth full didn't strike Hector as very princely. Hector decided to keep that thought to himself, though. "What have you been hearing, exactly?"

"Oh, this and that. You're taking people prisoner. You're building an army. You've cloned yourself."

Hector cocked his head to the side. "Excuse me?"

"Wild speculation en masse," said David. "You are a popular subject, you know."

"...Cloned myself, though? Really?"

"At this point, I think people just have fun talking about what you might be up to. Much of what gets said is similarly unbelievable. But perhaps you would like to inform me of the truth of the matter?"

"Uh... I would like to, actually, but..." He looked toward the Queen, who was busy conversing with her husband, then toward Lynn, who merely gave him a knowing look. "This may not be the best place for it," he told the Prince. "But I already told, er... ah..."

The Prince glanced toward his sister as well, then nodded. "Ah. Say no more, then." David went for his glass of wine and held it up to Hector. "Let us forestall our worries for the moment and enjoy this fine meal, shall we?"

"Ah--" Hector grabbed his own glass of ice water and tapped it against the Prince's.

It was to Hector's surprise, however, when David turned to the man sitting on the other side of him--his brother Meriwether--to toast with him as well.

Which meant that Hector suddenly felt an obligation to do the same with the other person that he was sitting next to.

Lynn was already looking at him, holding her own glass, and waiting.

Dear god, why was this situation so immediately terrifying?"

"1873

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

Somehow, he managed to clink his glass against hers without the entire universe exploding.

He sipped his water quietly and tried to focus on keeping a clear mind. Clear like the water. Nice and calm. Nothing worth freaking out over. As peaceful as meditating.

"Are you okay?" said Lynn. "You seem a little..."

Oh fuck. A little, what? What was she about to say?

"...Different."

Agh. What in the hell did that mean? He needed more information. But that meant asking a question. Fuck! "...What do you mean?" he managed to ask without dying.

"I'm not sure," she said. "You're kind of... zen. Or something."

What?

No.

Huh?

"Also, what're you wearing?" She touched the Scarf of Amordiin.

Hector was not concerned about her suddenly being overwhelming by its sensory enhancing properties, however. Previously, that had been a worry, but he had discovered during his sparring with Zeff that the Scarf didn't work for other people. At least, as far as they had been able to tell. They hadn't revealed its power to Zeff, nor did they wish to, but the Lord Elroy had definitely touched it several times and apparently not noticed anything strange.

Hector still wasn't entirely sure why the Scarf didn't work for other people, but Garovel seemed fairly certain that it was a matter of the Scarf only being able to bond with one soul at a time. Something to do with the way bodies functioned as conduits for soul. Hector hadn't really followed the reaper's explanation too well."

"1874

None of that helped Hector to know what to say right now, though. He was still so far beyond confused that he was beginning to wonder if this was a dream or something. Or possibly a nightmare.

"Not that it looks bad on you or anything," said Lynn.

What was she talking about? Oh, the Scarf. Right. Agh. He had to say something. She was going to think he was a weirdo if he just kept sitting there in silence.

Well, she probably already thought that.

But what was he supposed to say? Nothing was coming to mind. All he could think about was how much he was fucking this up, right now.

Shit.

Perhaps Lynn grew tired of waiting, because she pulled back a little. "In any case... it's good to see you again."

Had she really just said that? Even if she was just being friendly or polite, Hector was over the moon. Did she actually mean that?

He had to say something in return, though. He had to.

"It, uh--" C'mon, he told himself. This shouldn't be that hard. "It's good to--er... to... I..."

"It's good to see me, too?" said Lynn. "Is that what you're trying to say?"

For a moment, Hector just stared at her, trying his hardest not to look like a wide-eyed idiot. He managed to nod, though.

"Well, thank you," she said with a demure smile.

Good god, this woman was incredible.

"On second thought, though, maybe you're not as different as I thought," she said.

Hector didn't know if he should take that as an insult or a compliment, but after a second, he realized he didn't really care. It was clear enough from the tone of her voice and smile on her face that she was enjoying herself.

Yeah.

This was the best dinner ever."

"1875

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

"You definitely do seem like you've gotten stronger, though," Lynn went on. "How about a sparring match later on? I'll gauge your progress."

"Uh--sure," said Hector unthinkingly. "Oh, but, uh... I'm not sure we'll have time for that..."

She glanced across the banquet hall. The myriad of guests were all talking amongst themselves at the moment, but there was little doubt that they would all be wanting attention from the Queen shortly.

"You're probably right." Her smile turned faintly more mischievous.

"Maybe we should just fight right here and make the news."

Hector gave her a look. He was only mostly sure that she was joking. "We've been in the news enough already, I think."

"Heh. Maybe you have. I wouldn't mind being in the news a little more."

"Really?" said Hector. "You want to become even more famous than you already are?"

She sat up more rigidly in her chair. "Oh, I don't want anything. I serve at the pleasure of the Queen. I have no desires of my own.”

Hector just kind of blinked at her.

“Aside from this salmon here.” She reached over to Hector’s plate with her fork and skewered a piece for herself. “You don’t mind, do you? This looks really good.”

That made him laugh, and he scooted the plate closer to her. “Go crazy.”

She took a bite. “Mm! Yeah, that’s great. Here, you want some of mine? It’s only fair, right?” She pushed her plate toward him now.

Oh geez. This was getting kinda--

Wait, what the hell was that on her plate? Octopus? Squid? Slimy, whatever it was. Covered in a white sauce and squishy yellow vegetables. Squash, maybe.

Ugh. He’d always hated squash.”

"1876

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

Hector hesitated, but Lynn was looking at him expectantly. Well, shit. He wasn’t about to refuse her, but he still had to ask, “...What is that, exactly?”

“Calamari and squash,” she told him, pushing the plate even closer now. “Try some.”

He was not pleased to know that his guess had been correct, but he supposed it didn’t matter now. He cut off a piece with his fork. It gooped together quite easily. And he shoveled it into his mouth.

“Oh,” he said as the taste hit his tongue and his face tried to scrunch into itself. “Oh, that’s awful.”

“I know, right?” said Lynn, laughing. “I made a huge mistake ordering it.”

He placed his fist in front of his mouth as he tried to muscle the food down. There was something especially horrible about the sauce. It was sweet in the most unfitting way he could imagine.

He got it down, though, and couldn't help coughing a little afterwards.

"Want some more?" she asked. "I've got plenty left."

"...You're a bad person," said Hector.

She laughed. "I'm sorry. But I need help finishing this. I don't think I can get through it on my own."

"I don't think you have to finish it."

"My mother would disagree with you."

Hector recalled Isabelle Edith and had no trouble believing that. "Well, I won't tell her if you don't."

Lynn just smiled faintly again before reassessing her meal. She took another bite. Her face remained perfectly undisturbed as she chewed.

"...You're good at hiding your disgust," Hector observed.

"It's a matter of professionalism," she said. Then she pushed the plate closer to him again. "Now have some more before I vomit."

"1877

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector didn't know why he was listening to her now, but he did as she asked and took another bite. It was just as bad as the first, if not worse.

Horrible as it was, though, he was enjoying himself. They kept taking turns, and Hector watched her face, waiting to see her facade break--which it eventually did, though only barely. But even just that small twist in her expression was more than enough to make him laugh. He helped her finish her abysmal meal and shared the rest of his own with her in order to alleviate the aftertaste.

It wasn't much longer until the servers began bringing out everyone's chosen dessert courses. Hector had ordered himself a slice of strawberry cheesecake with whipped cream. Prince David had gone for the chocolate cake, Hector noticed, and Lynn, apparently, had ordered... some sort of thick, yellow drink with a carrot sticking out of it.

Hector just looked at it, then at her, not saying anything.

She noticed his gaze. "What?"

He pointed at it. "What the hell is that?"

"It's carrot cake," she said. "In milkshake form. With honey. And something else, I think. I can't remember."

"Why...?" After a moment, he realized that word alone was enough. "Just, why?"

Another tiny smile crept into her face, and she looked momentarily distressed. "Why not?"

Hector just blinked slowly and shook his head. "Have you ever ordered that before?"

"No..."

"I am not helping you finish it."

"Oh, come on! It might be really good!"

"Yeah? Well, I can't wait to see you try it."

"Are you sure you don't want to try it first? I don't mind."

Hector almost refused immediately, but then he thought better of it. "Alright, fine, I will." He reached over and grabbed a spoonful for himself.

Lynn just watched him in silence.

Wow.

It tasted like a sugar pixie had taken a shit in his mouth."

"1878

Hector kept his composure, though. He'd expected it to taste horrible.

Maybe not quite this horrible, sure, but his plan remained unchanged.

He made his face light up. "Wow, it's actually pretty good," he said.

Lynn blinked and then tried the concoction herself. She wasn't able to conceal her displeasure at all this time, and she had to put a hand over her mouth.

He tried not to laugh too hard while she was glaring at him with her one eye, but he could see that she was trembling from muted laughter of her own, as well. He pushed his cheesecake closer to her as a peace offering.

The cheesecake didn't last much longer with the both of them sharing it, and not even Lynn wanted to touch the milkshake monstrosity again.

As everyone in the chamber finished up their dessert, Hector began noticing more movement among the serving staff all around them. At first, he thought they were bringing out some kind of secret extra course, but when he saw that they were carrying folded cards instead of food, he began to wonder what they were doing.

To and fro, they scurried, dropping cards off in front of the various lords and ladies. He didn't have to wait long in order to find out what the cards were for, because several of them arrived in front of him. He unfolded one and read its contents.

'Lord Henrich Masden requests a meeting this evening,' it read.

He picked up another one, and it said exactly the same thing, save that it pertained to Lord Arnold Greenway. Still another was for Lady Margaret Holbach.

And more cards kept arriving with more names, all requesting a meeting.

As he looked around at the other lords and ladies in confusion, he couldn't help noticing that they were all staring at him now."

"1879

It looked as though most of the dinner guests hadn't received any cards at all, and the ones that did had only received seven or eight, but here he was, sitting in front of a small mountain.

This did not bode well for the rest of the evening, he felt.

Now that he was thinking about it, he recalled reading about something along these lines during the dinner preparations. In the preliminary paperwork, where he'd also submitted his meal order, there had been a list of names whom he could extend up to four invitations to. He hadn't given it much thought, since he wasn't especially interested in meeting with any of the other guests, specifically. He might've picked the Queen, but she hadn't even been on the list, probably because she was the host, not a guest.

"Looks like you're in for a fun night," said Lynn dryly, brushing away a couple cards that had spilled over to her side of the table.

David was chortling as he stacked his own cards together. "I am not sure whether to envy you or pity you."

"I wonder what they all want to talk to you about," said Lynn.

Hector was wondering that as well. It probably wasn't just one thing, right?

Might be easier if it was, though.

After that, as if all the sudden attention from the other lords wasn't enough of a weight, the media was also let back into the dinning hall in order to take more pictures and even video this time.

He couldn't help but notice that they were fixating on him again. This stupid pile of cards was going to make the news, wasn't it?

Goddammit."

"1880

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

He had no idea what do, but he tried not to let that show on his face. He didn't know how successful he was at that, since there were probably about a thousand different ways for facial expressions and body language to be interpreted, but he did his best. It helped that he was able to compartmentalize this panic a little. He could focus on his body, his breathing, his posture--his existence in the universe, even. Like meditating.

When everyone started moving again, though, that wasn't much of a solution anymore. For a terrible second, he was worried that the press was going to start asking tons of questions, but apparently not. They were only allowed to take pictures and video, thankfully.

The dining tables were cleared away, and Hector was given a box to store all his cards in. The guests began to spread out and talk amongst themselves again, but Hector still couldn't help feeling like everyone was still staring at him. It was enough to make him consider putting on his armor again, just to help him cope with the pressure.

But then, he supposed he'd felt worse than this. Not much worse, but worse. Talking to Ivan and Leo, specifically came to mind. And Malast, too?

Actually, no, not really. He hadn't felt all that much pressure talking to that guy, comparatively speaking. Perhaps it was because he'd never really felt like Malast might slaughter him and everyone around him. That did tend to increase the stress level of a situation.

Ugh. He was not looking forward to talking to Leo again.

When he thought about it like that, though, it made all this attention feel a bit more bearable.

Madame Carthrace soon found him and started going through his invitations with him."

"1881

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

It seemed entirely apparent from the get-go that there would simply not be enough time to meet with everyone who had requested it--not this evening, at least. Madame Carthrace was already talking about scheduling future meetings back at Warrenhold for anyone they weren't able to speak to tonight.

"But that also presents its own challenges as well," she said. "These people are tremendously prideful. If we do not prioritize those with the most influence, some among them are liable to feel slighted. And while

I would find that intensely amusing, it would unfortunately be counterproductive.”

Hector just listened closely. He had little doubt that Amelia’s knowledge and experience here needed to be the driving force behind these interactions. Mostly, he just wanted to not say anything stupid.

“With your permission,” said Amelia, “I would like for us to meet with Lionel Carthrace first.”

Hector blinked at the name but didn’t say anything.

“You previously mentioned wanting to meet my family,” she went on, “and this is as good an opportunity as any. My nephew should not yet know about our plan to open a bank, and I would prefer that you talk to him before he does. I fear that knowledge will change how he presents himself to you.”

“I remember you mentioning that before,” said Hector.

“I don’t know what he wants to talk to you about, but there is a strong chance that he will not wish for me to be present during your meeting. In fact, it may even be better for me to not go with you at all. My presence will likely change his demeanor as well.”

“Hmm.”

“That being said, I would still like to be there with you.”

Hector considered her words.”

1882

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

Truth be told, he very much wanted Amelia to be there, too, but he still remembered his own reasoning for wanting to meet her family. He wanted to know more about her. If he was going to put this woman at the helm of the largest bank in the country, potentially, then he wanted to have a better measure of her as a person.

So maybe, in this case, going against his more fearful instinct and talking to the man without her would better help him achieve that end.

Plus, he would still have Garovel with him, so it wasn't like he'd be entirely on his own.

Yeah.

"...I'll talk to him by myself," he told her, "but I'd like you there for all the other meetings."

She frowned but nodded. "Very well."

They went through more names after that and began forming a list. They didn't get very far into it, considering how many names there were in total, but it would be enough for tonight. They gave their list to the palace staff so as to help with organization, and then Hector was off to go meet the Lord Lionel Carthrace.

En route, however, a man in glasses came up to him.

"Lord Goffe," the stranger said, "it's a pleasure to meet you."

"Ah--" Hector wasn't quite sure what to say. This didn't feel quite right. They were in a hall, and one of the palace staff had been in the middle of guiding him to a more private location where he could have his meeting. Who was this random guy?

"My name is Matthew Elias." The guy whipped out a pen and notepad. "Would you mind if I asked you a few quick questions, sir?"

Oh, shit.

'Careful,' warned Garovel privately."
"1883

"Do you think it's proper to be having the Gala now, given the current financial crisis the country is facing?" said Mr. Elias.

Wow. Hector definitely didn't plan on answering that. He could hear his guide from the palace staff radioing for security.

"No statement?" Mr. Elias scribbled something. "That's fine. I understand. What do you think about the Queen's recent decision to reinstitute the death penalty?"

What?

Hector's guide was intervening personally now, placing himself between Hector and the reporter and trying to usher the man away. Security was already arriving from the far end of the hall.

"Lord Goffe! Do you have a statement?!" Mr. Elias struggled mildly to hold his ground. "Where have you been these past few months?! Did you leave the country?! What have you been doing?! Lord Goffe!"

Hector felt a little bad for the guy as security arrived and pulled him away, all but dragging him.

Geez.

Hector didn't have much love for reporters, given how intrusive he'd known them to be, but seeing that dude fight so hard just for a story... well, there was something admirable about that, he supposed.

They proceeded on, with Hector's guide offering copious apologies and Hector assuring him that it wasn't a big deal.

It was still a long way to the negotiating chamber--such a long way, in fact, that Garovel seemed to grow impatient.

'Why the hell is this little walk taking so long?' he said privately. 'There are plenty of other rooms around here, and they're all empty. And we don't even need this guide, anyway. There's nobody else around, so I can sense where the Carthraces are pretty easily. I could take you right to them in twenty seconds flat.'

'Actually, uh... I know the answer to that,' said Hector.

'Hmm?' said Garovel."

"1884

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

'Er... I'm pretty sure that we're going to the solar level,' said Hector.

Garovel paused. 'The what?'

'The solar level. The floor where all the solars are. The top floor of Bosliat's main house was designed to have a bunch of solars, as a tribute to the Goddess of Light. Important negotiations are traditionally held there because they're supposed to be, like, sacred. You're not supposed to do anything shady in front of Cocora.'

Garovel didn't say anything.

Hector had more, though. 'The rooms are all on the top floor because they have windows in the ceiling--to let in the Goddess' light. The design became a problem at one point, though, when someone used them to break into the palace and try to assassinate the king. Like a hundred years ago or something. So all the windows have bars on them now.'

There arrived noticeable silence as Garovel just looked at him.

'...What?' said Hector.

'I really don't like it when you explain things to me,' said Garovel. 'Just feels all kinds of wrong.'

Hector had to suppress a laugh so as not to freak out his guide. 'I just, uh, happened to read up about Bosliat the other day.'

'You and your castle fetish.'

'I don't think being interested in something makes it a fetish.'

'Whatever you say, you little weirdo.'

Sure enough, after an elevator ride and a couple more long hallways, they arrived at their destination, which was a handsome room of mostly burnished wood with visible support beams under the ceiling--and a big window with bars under it as well. Of course, it was late enough into the evening that hardly any sunlight made it through, but a pair of tall bronze lamps still bathed the solar with plenty of warm light."
"1885

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Lionel Carthrace was not yet here, but Garovel informed him that he soon would be, so Hector took a seat at the table in the middle of the room and waited. The guide bowed and excused himself.

When Lionel Carthrace arrived, the man was not alone. A pair of enormous bodyguards in suits and ties flanked him. One entered the room, and the other remained just outside the door.

Briefly, Hector wondered if those bodyguards were here because of him. After a moment, though, he figured probably not.

Wait a minute, didn't he bring a bodyguard of his own?

Wow, he'd almost forgotten about Matteo Delaguna and Ernivoc. Hector hoped the guy wasn't too upset about being left to his own devices. He'd have to ask Garovel about where those two were later. Right now, the presence of the Lord Carthrace was demanding his full attention.

The middle-aged man had a friendlier disposition than Hector had been expecting. From the way Amelia talked about her family, he'd thought the current head of House Carthrace would appear more stern and unwelcoming.

Maybe he was just accustomed to the Rainlords, though.

"It is a pleasure to finally make your acquaintance, Lord Goffe." The man offered him a smile and a handshake.

Hector took the latter and said, "Likewise."

"I must say," said Lionel as he took his seat, "I am surprised that my dear aunt is not with you."

Hector wasn't sure what to say to that. Inquire? Yeah, maybe inquire. "Why do you say that?"

"She has a way of injecting herself into situations," said Lionel. "Not that that is such a terrible quality."

Again, Hector wasn't sure what to say to that and this time decided to say nothing."

"1886

For a moment, the Lord Carthrace merely sat there, perhaps expecting him to say something or perhaps just observing him. "Well," the man said, "seeing as you clearly received many more requests than just my own tonight, I suppose I should not keep you. Allow me to get right to the point."

Hector appreciated that.

"The reason why I--and so many of the others, I suspect--wished to speak with you was because I am gravely concerned about the direction our nation is going in."

Hector just nodded lightly, figuring that made sense--and that the man was not yet done talking.

"Furthermore," Lionel went on, "I believe you will play a large role in shaping Atreya's future."

Hearing that, Hector tried to keep his expression still. It was difficult. He couldn't stop himself from blinking a couple times, though the rest of his face remained flat.

Shaping Atreya's future?

Talk about pressure.

He supposed he couldn't really deny it, though. With so many people relying on him now, so many responsibilities to be mindful of, it wasn't such a stretch of the imagination.

It sure felt like it, though.

Ugh.

'Yeah, that's great 'n all,' said Garovel, who was hovering over his shoulder, 'but ask him to be more specific.'

"...Was there something specific that you wanted to discuss with me?" said Hector.

Lionel eyed him for a moment. "...No. No, not specifically. I simply wished to gain an understanding of your views. In general terms. Your worldview, in other words."

Why did Hector find that so hard to believe?

"...I find that very strange," said Hector flatly. "I would imagine... that a man with a real estate empire such as yourself... would be a little too busy to wonder about what I'm thinking.'"

"1887

Lionel breathed half a laugh. "You flatter me. I am not so busy a man as that. These days, I pay other people to run my 'empire,' as you put it, for me. I am much more of a man of leisure, I'm afraid."

Somehow, Hector doubted that. But he also wasn't about to come right out and declare the man a liar to his face. Mainly, he just wondered what game this guy was playing.

Thankfully, he had a three thousand year old reaper to consult.

'What do you make of him?' said Hector.

'Not much, so far,' said Garovel in the echo of privacy. There was no one else around who might be able to overhear him, but Hector supposed the extra caution couldn't hurt. 'He's just testing the waters right now, I think--trying to get the measure of you.'

"I wonder what my aunt has told you about me," said Lionel, tilting his head.

"She doesn't talk about her family very often," said Hector. "But I understand that you aren't... on the best of terms."

Lionel frowned and gave a nod. "Alas, that is so. Old wounds have a way of resurfacing when ignored."

"...What do you think of her?" said Hector.

"Mm. A difficult question, that."

"Why is that?"

"Because my opinion of her has changed over the years. Many times, in fact."

Hector just kept listening.

"Even when I was a boy, she was a bit of an outcast from the rest of the family. But I liked that about her. She had a kind of... ostentatious energy to her. She may not have gotten along with our parents, but there was little doubt that she loved us fiercely--the children, I mean.” Lionel shook his head with a small laugh. “That woman has always been a paradox. She said she never wanted children, yet she would play with us nonstop. She said she never wanted a husband, yet she only ever loved one man. She said she wanted to retire, yet now she has involved herself with you.””

"1888

Hector wasn't sure what to make of the man's tone. It didn't sound resentful or even condescending.

Lionel left an opening in the conversation for him to respond, but when Hector again elected not to say anything, the man asked, "What do you think of her?"

For some reason, Hector didn't want to answer that, but he supposed it was a perfectly fair question, considering he'd just asked it himself. "...I'm not sure yet," he decided to say.

"Ah. Truly?"

Hector just tilted his head at the man.

"If so, that surprises me," said Lionel. "I've always thought that my aunt was one of those rare people, those charismatic savants who can earn almost anyone's affection."

That didn't track with everything else Lionel had implied, Hector thought. "Then why is your relationship with her so strained?"

"Ah. Because charisma is, at the end of the day, only a superficial element of one's person. Inevitably, the underlying values that one cherishes are the real judge of someone's character."

Hector was trying to remain impartial, but he didn't much care for what the man was suggesting about Amelia. "In that case... what are the 'underlying values' of hers that you dislike?"

Lionel smiled, then frowned. "This is getting quite personal. And rather off-topic, perhaps."

"Maybe so," said Hector. "But all the same... it would be helpful to me if you... could provide a more rounded picture of her for me.”

At that, the man paused and leaned back a little in his seat. For a time, he merely studied Hector’s face.

It looked like he wanted to say something, though, so Hector just waited for him.

“Forgive me,” said Lionel. “When I came here this evening, I honestly expected you to have already been quite thoroughly wrapped around her finger, but I see now that this is not so.”

"1889

Again, Hector didn’t particularly care for what the man was implying, but he still resisted the urge to jump to any conclusions. It was important to keep a level head here, he felt. He knew only too well about how complex people and their relationships with one another could be. Families even more so. And he supposed the man was trying to pay him a compliment, as well, in his own way.

“In truth, I am relieved,” Lionel went on. “You are your own man, and that is a rarer and rarer thing in this day and age.”

Hector wanted to glance at Garovel but purposely held his gaze still. Ironic, he felt, that Lionel would say such a thing about a servant, of all people.

“I believe this country needs more people like you,” said Lionel. “You are an inspiration to many, you know.”

Boy, this guy sure was generous with the praise. Usually, Hector had a hard time dealing with that, but something about this conversation--or the context surrounding it, perhaps--was preventing any such flustered feelings from reaching him. It was hard to tell how genuine any of Lionel’s words were.

At the protracted silence, Lionel seemed to intuit that Hector was still waiting on him. “Ah, I apologize. I suppose you are wanting an answer to that rather penetrating question that you asked before, no? What underlying values of hers do I dislike? That is a tough one, I must admit. And I do find it very distasteful to speak ill of others. Are you sure you wish to pry these sour feelings out of me? Would it not be best to simply let sleeping dogs lie, as it were?"

Were all of these meetings going to go like this? Hector hoped not. "...Weren't you the one who just said that old wounds have a way of resurfacing when ignored?"

Lionel paused at that, then smiled. "Aha... I suppose you have got me there." Then he frowned.

"1890

Huh. Suddenly, Hector felt a little bad for him. Not enough to ease up, though. If Amelia Carthrace was going to run some gigantic, nation-rescuing bank for him, then he needed to know more about her.

Lionel took another moment to gather his thoughts. "Well... if I had to put my misgivings with her into words... then I would have to point to her propensity to say one thing and then do another."

Hmm. That was actually a pretty serious accusation, Hector felt. It spoke of untrustworthiness. He was going to need a hell of a lot more detail, though. "Is there a specific incident that you're referring to?" he asked.

"More than one, to be sure," said Lionel, "but off the top of my head, there was the incident in which she promised my sister a position in her company, only to turn around and give the job to someone else."

Hmm.

"And there was the time," Lionel continued, "when she claimed to be supportive of a marriage between my nephew and the daughter of Arnold Greenway. She decided to withdraw said support mere hours before our two families were to finalize terms, and when the Greenways caught wind of her change of heart, they decided to call off the entire thing. To the misery of my nephew. He was quite smitten, you see."

Hmmmm.

"Oh, and of course, there was also the time that she decided to go on a drunken tirade about my late father--her own brother--on the very occasion of his funeral. In front of hundreds of esteemed guests. That was certainly a manner of insult and humiliation that is difficult to simply forgive and forget, let me tell you.”

Okay, now that one did sound pretty bad, Hector thought. But Lionel was far from done, apparently, and as Hector continued to listen, he still couldn't help distrusting every version of events that this guy was feeding him.”

"1891 -- CXCVI.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Six: ‘Take root, seedling, and germinate...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana Elroy sighed as she realized that she had stopped paying attention to what she was reading again. Her lack of sleep was really starting to get to her, it seemed, and it certainly didn't help that her chosen reading material for the evening was so damn confusing.

The Many Mysteries of Mutation, by Agam Elroy.

Technically, she had read this thing twice already, but even now, she still wasn't sure that she actually understood any of it. The subject matter seemed complicated enough on its own, but the archaic prose only made it more difficult. And strangely enough, there was quite a bit of poetry in it, too.

That last part might've been more discouraging to her, but the book's normal writing was so incomprehensible to her that she kind of preferred the parts with poetry. She could at least occasionally feel like she understood what the poems were trying to say.

Desires held, promises kept.

The mind, the labyrinthine self, an unconscious adjudicator.

Therein is fulfillment met.

Desires held, promises broken.

The mind, the saboteur of god, a righteous terror.

Therein is misery spoken.

Aimless heart, promises unthought.

The mind, the ceaseless turner, a motivating factor.

Therein is a world of rot.

She'd been staring at this particular passage for the better part of an hour now, feeling somehow stupider with each passing minute. She could've sworn that it made sense to her the first time she read it, but the more she tried to deepen her understanding, the less clear it seemed to become.

She set the book down and rubbed her eyes. Maybe she needed a break. She'd been doing nothing but reading lately. It just seemed like the most useful way to spend her time, given the circumstances."

"1891 -- CXCVI.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Six: 'Take root, seedling, and germinate...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana Elroy sighed as she realized that she had stopped paying attention to what she was reading again. Her lack of sleep was really starting to get to her, it seemed, and it certainly didn't help that her chosen reading material for the evening was so damn confusing.

The Many Mysteries of Mutation, by Agam Elroy.

Technically, she had read this thing twice already, but even now, she still wasn't sure that she actually understood any of it. The subject matter seemed complicated enough on its own, but the archaic prose only made it more difficult. And strangely enough, there was quite a bit of poetry in it, too.

That last part might've been more discouraging to her, but the book's normal writing was so incomprehensible to her that she kind of preferred the parts with poetry. She could at least occasionally feel like she understood what the poems were trying to say.

Desires held, promises kept.

The mind, the labyrinthine self, an unconscious adjudicator.

Therein is fulfillment met.

Desires held, promises broken.

The mind, the saboteur of god, a righteous terror.

Therein is misery spoken.
Aimless heart, promises unthought.
The mind, the ceaseless turner, a motivating factor.
Therein is a world of rot.

She'd been staring at this particular passage for the better part of an hour now, feeling somehow stupider with each passing minute. She could've sworn that it made sense to her the first time she read it, but the more she tried to deepen her understanding, the less clear it seemed to become.

She set the book down and rubbed her eyes. Maybe she needed a break. She'd been doing nothing but reading lately. It just seemed like the most useful way to spend her time, given the circumstances."

"1892

She hadn't forgotten Germal's warning to her regarding the "honey trap" nature of the Library of Erudition, but according to Gohvis, as long as she followed the Library's rules, she would be fine. And she was being careful.

But there were other things to do besides read books all day. There was an impressive kitchen on the first floor where a few of Gohvis' followers had offered to instruct her in the culinary arts. Which was actually quite tempting, honestly. She had no idea how in the world these people managed to keep their food stores so well-stocked, but the skills of the chefs here were undeniable. Virtually every meal she'd had in this place had been an utter delight, and just thinking about next one was beginning to make her mouth water.

Aside from learning to cook, however, there was also the underground training facility where she'd seen people honing various combat abilities. She had yet to even ask if she was allowed to partake in any combat training, but she did plan to give it a go, eventually.

There was also a game room on the second floor, though she hadn't actually seen anyone using it yet. She might've liked to play someone in chess or pool or even foosball, but without any opponents, that didn't seem like it was going to happen. Maybe she just hadn't visited that room at the right time of day yet, but she wasn't getting her hopes up. These people belonged to the Dozer-half of Abolish, after all. She was frankly amazed that this place even had a game room.

All-in-all, this was a strange manner of captivity. So far, she and Chergoa had been free to roam around the building as they pleased, talk to whomever they desired, and seemingly do whatever they wanted.

Except leave, of course. Not that there was any chance of that, what with the Dáinnbolg raging endlessly beyond the Library's walls."
"1893

The main reason she felt reading to be the most valuable use of her time was simply because of the Shard of the Dry God in her possession--her one link to the outside world. As far as she had been able to tell, conventional communications technologies didn't even work here--which wasn't so surprising, she supposed. The eternal storm that enveloped Exoltha no doubt rendered such things impossible.

But that only made the Shard seem that much more incredible and precious.

For a while, she'd been intensely paranoid that someone in the Library might recognize the Shard and try to take it from her, but at the same time, trying too hard to conceal it also seemed like a bad idea. If someone noticed her hiding it or acting strangely with it, then that might tip them off to its importance. But if she acted like it wasn't anything special, then maybe no one would be the wiser.

That was what Chergoa had advised her to do, at least. Emiliana had also consulted Hector for Garovel's opinion on the matter and been told basically the same thing. Apparently, the Shards were not all that widely known about, and even the few who did couldn't possibly know about their "heretofore unheard of" capabilities as some type of psychic telephone.

She still couldn't help worrying about it in the back of her mind, though. Most of all, she was worried that Gohvis might take it from her, that he might somehow just... know. A part of her honestly questioned whether it was even truly possible to hide something from him. He had tracked her down from half a world away based on nothing more than some sort of shared "link," after all.

But surely, if he knew about the Shard, about the full extent of its capabilities, then he would've confiscated it by now.

...Right?"

"1894

She shook her head, not even wanting to go down that particular rabbit hole. She had enough things to worry about already without getting lost in paranoia over things she couldn't even control in the first place.

She wondered if she should contact Hector again soon. He had mostly been leaving her alone, probably because he'd gotten the impression that she didn't want to be bothered--which wasn't exactly inaccurate, of course--but even so, she wouldn't have minded another update on how her family was doing.

Then again, she was almost afraid to ask. What was that saying? No news was good news? She could see the wisdom in that now. No doubt, Hector would tell her if something really important happened.

Probably.

He was such an... odd fellow. Sometimes, he seemed so meek and fragile, and other times, he became downright obstinate. Of all the people for her to have ended up "bonded" to in this weird way, why was it him?

He was not entirely unpleasant to talk to, though, she supposed. Perhaps she merely needed to get to know him better.

Yes, she would have to--

A monstrous hand appeared suddenly from her peripheral vision and picked up the book that she had put down earlier. She flinched a little at the sight of Gohvis standing there next to her.

While she wasn't quite as uncomfortable around the Monster of the East as she was when she had first arrived here, she didn't know if she would ever get used to the way that he could just show up like that. No footsteps, no warning of any kind. How could someone so gigantic move so silently? "Back to this one again, are you?" he said, handing the book back to her.

She took it. "...I'm having a hard time wrapping my head around it.""
"1895

"Mm," hummed Gohvis with his low double-voice. He pushed the chair on the other side of the small table out of his way and sat down on the floor instead. He was tall enough that he was still slightly above Emiliana's eye level. "And the fact that it was written by your own ancestor has no bearing on your interest in it."

She eyed Agam Elroy's name on the binding another time. "I didn't say that."

"What do you hope to glean from that book?"

That question made her hesitate. "I don't know..."

Gohvis merely sat there, waiting for her to elaborate.

"What, um..." She felt like she might be treading on thin ice with this next question, but she just couldn't get it out her mind. "What was Agam like? You knew him, didn't you?"

The Monster took his time answering. "He was unique."

It was her turn to wait. That couldn't have been all Gohvis was going to say about him, surely.

"But he was not someone you should look up to, if that is what you are hoping for," said Gohvis.

That irked her for some reason, and she couldn't stop herself from saying, "And you are?"

And for a long moment, the Monster of the East merely looked at her.

Emiliana met his gaze steadily, but she could feel her heart in her throat, and her whole body seemed to become a statue, too scared to even twitch. In her mind, though, she was sure that Gohvis wasn't going to hurt her.

Mostly sure.

"Agam was more mystic than scientist," Gohvis finally said. "He was brilliant, to be sure, but superstitious did not even begin to describe him.”

Emiliana breathed again. Then her eyes went to the book in her hands.

“Perhaps it is for the best that you do not understand,” said Gohvis.

“His words have a way of seeding irrational thoughts into impressionable minds.””

”1896

She tried to consider her next words a bit more carefully than her last ones. “What was the nature of your relationship with him?”

Gohvis allowed that question to linger for a while before answering it. “He was like a father to me.”

“...That is difficult to imagine,” she said.

“Then don’t.”

She frowned. “He wasn’t a member of Abolish, was he?”

“No.”

“Were you with Abolish back then?”

“No.”

“Then...?”

“Then, what?” said Gohvis. “Ask a clear question.”

She wanted to, certainly, but she was afraid. She was abruptly on the verge of asking what she most wanted to know, what she had been wondering ever since she’d arrived here and begun learning more about Gohvis. It was perhaps the single most important question that she could possibly ask, but even though she finally found a good opportunity to pose it, she was somehow terrified of what the answer could be. She felt as if everything she knew about the world might be called into question if she heard it, as if such an answer might simply undo her as she currently knew herself.

But...

She still had to ask. She couldn't stop herself. "Then... why are you with Abolish now?"

"Because Abolish, at least, understands the greater problem facing this planet," said Gohvis.

"Which is?"

"Humanity itself, of course."

Emiliana didn't know what to say to that.

"Abolish has many different ideas about how to deal with the problem of humanity," said Gohvis. "Some of those ideas, it must be said, are mad. Yes. But such ideas are still attempting to address the problem, instead of merely ignoring it, as the Vanguard does. As everyone does."

"And what is the problem of humanity, precisely?"

"In a word? Growth."

She was even more lost than before. That hadn't been the word she would have expected.

"Humanity requires growth," said Gohvis. "In all things. Biological, philosophical, technological, psychological. Humanity requires growth. Growth requires struggle. Struggle requires conflict. And conflict? Conflict requires instigation.""

"1897

Emiliana didn't understand. "Are you... really trying to tell me that Abolish is helping humanity grow?"

Gohvis shook his huge head. "No. It may be true that Abolish is preventing stagnation on some level, but that is beside the point. What I am saying is that the aspect of humanity which compels growth is itself the problem."

"What do you mean?"

"It is a fundamental element of human nature to require--and therefore pursue--growth. Without that fundamental element, humans wither and die in agony. But as I said, growth requires conflict. That conflict may mean physical violence. It may mean an entirely psychological process. It may mean something in between. But that conflict is still nonetheless required for growth to occur. That is its nature."

She touched her forehead, still trying to understand what he was getting at. "So then... are you saying... that Abolish is trying to destroy humanity's need for growth?"

"Yes. Exactly."

"But... how does that translate into callously murdering so many innocent people?"

"You don't see? It could not be more simple. Broadly speaking, there are only two perspectives with regard to solving the problem of growth. The first is the very basic, straightforward method which you just mentioned. Genocide. No human conflict can exist if no humans exist."

She could hardly believe what she was hearing. "How can you say that so matter-of-factly? That's horrible..."

"Yes," said Gohvis. "To believe in such a method first requires a deep hatred of humanity--or perhaps of existence as a whole. And for people such as yourself, who have no doubt never personally felt such hatred, then its logical conclusion of genocide does not seem logical at all. I might as well be trying to describe the beliefs of an alien species. It would be just as relatable to you, I imagine.""

"1898

"The way you're talking about it," said Emiliana, becoming mildly hopeful, "you make it sound like you do not believe in that method yourself."

"That is because I don't," said Gohvis.

"I'm glad to hear that."

"I am more of a believer in the second method," the Monster said.

"And that is?"

"To change human nature."

A doubtful expression crossed her face, and she tilted her head. "And how do you plan to accomplish that?"

"I make no claim that it would be easy," said the Monster. "But there are many in Abolish who are pursuing this same goal, in their own way."

"But what is your way?"

"Hmph." He leaned back a little and allowed his gaze to drift away from her. "Take a guess."

Guess? How would she know how he intended to...?

Her eyes widened a little as the thought struck her. "...Mutation?"

"Indeed."

"You want to use mutation to change human nature itself?" Somehow, that notion made so much sense and yet none at all, like she'd connected all the dots correctly only to see them create an impossible image.

"Essentially, yes."

"But... how?"

Rather than answering, Gohvis merely looked at her again. Was he waiting for her to connect the dots again? Or to ask a more specific question? Or was he just done with the conversation entirely?

She wracked her brain for something, anything. "That's... I mean... you can't."

"Why not?" said Gohvis with even more of a knowing calmness than usual.

"Because--you--" It seemed so obvious that she was having trouble even putting it into words. "Because mutation only affects the user. And to change human nature, you would have to change everyone in the world. And everyone in the world can't be a mutation user."

"Are you sure about that?"

"1899

"I'm--" A horrified pause came over her as she considered what he might be implying. "I'm... pretty sure?"

"Mm."

She was hesitant to inquire any further, but there was no point in stopping now, she figured. "Are you really saying... that it is possible to make everyone like us?"

"I'm not saying anything," said Gohvis. "I'm merely questioning your certitude."

Emiliana just stared at him, trying to discern something from his unreadable lizard face.

Gohvis didn't say anything more, however. Even after another minute or so of silence, he seemed perfectly content to let the conversation end there.

She tried to think. She felt like she still had a million questions for him, but there was only one that was dominating her thoughts at the moment. "...Doesn't it bother you that your supposed comrades in Abolish are trying to kill so many innocent people?"

"Not particularly," he said flatly.

"But why? You said you don't believe in what they are doing."

"Yes," said Gohvis, "but just because I don't believe in it, doesn't mean I don't understand their perspective. And more importantly, it doesn't mean that they are incorrect."

That was not what she had wanted to hear. "What...?"

"The simple fact of the matter is, even if I disagree with them on principle, their logic is still perfectly sound. From a purely objective standpoint, they could be right, and I could be wrong."

"That's..." She sighed. "No. They can't possibly be right. How can you even think that?"

"How can you not?" he countered. "Just because you don't want something to be true doesn't mean it isn't."

She merely furrowed her brow at that response.

"I don't actually know if it is possible to change such a fundamental aspect of human nature," said Gohvis. "Certainly, there is little in the way of historical evidence that such a thing has ever been done before. It may very well be impossible.""

"1900

"That has nothing to do with the fact that you apparently think it's okay to kill innocent people," said Emiliana.

"It is not ideal, no," said Gohvis. "But if human nature itself is so flawed, then from a purely logical standpoint, there is no such thing as an 'innocent person.' Everyone is contributing to the decline of humanity merely by being alive."

She took an exasperated breath. "That's so wrong, though..."

"Mm. Hence why I said that only those who have known hatred for humanity are able to understand it, much less believe it. Try as they might, humans are not purely logical beings."

Agh...

Emiliana wanted to keep arguing, but she felt like she would only be reiterating her disapproval and dismay in various new ways, and that didn't seem very helpful.

Her eyes went to Agam's book again, and another thought occurred to her. "Isn't there a third option for dealing with the problem of growth?"

Gohvis merely looked at her, again seeming as if he might already know what she was going to say.

Emiliana was not going to let that deter her, however. "Making human growth sustainable. That's a solution, too, isn't it?"

"Hah." The Monster sounded in equal parts dismissive and amused. "I am sure the supposed 'brains' of the Vanguard would be pleased to hear you say that. Or they might even be foolish enough to argue that growth isn't a problem to begin with. But it is all wishful, emotional thinking--unsupported by the science. A dispassionate mind will see reality for what it is, no matter how horrible.”

It seemed they would have to agree to disagree on that point, but Emiliana was afraid to say as much. There was precisely a snowball’s chance in lakefire that she would be able to change Gohvis’ mind on a subject like this, she felt.”

”1901

But she was at least beginning to understand him a bit more. And he certainly wasn’t called the Monster of the East for no reason. As much as she had wanted to believe Germal’s words from before, that Gohvis might actually be some type of hard-working savior of humanity... well, suffice to say, she still wasn’t seeing it.

She considered trying to challenge his assertion that growth required conflict, but wasn’t sure how to go about it. Wait, had he even said that he was against conflict? He must’ve implied it, surely, but then again, he was also a member of Abolish, which instigated all sorts of conflict, so...?

Agh. She needed some sleep, and this was just too confusing for her, at the moment. If only someone else were here to argue with Gohvis for her. She certainly didn’t carry much love for the Vanguard in her heart right now, but wondered what their best and brightest would say about this subject.

“Hey, what’cha guys doing over here?” came the familiarly eager voice of Ibai Blackburn, and Emiliana turned to see him walking towards the table after having apparently teleported first, judging by the fleeting specks of brown shadow behind him. “Strategy meeting? Bonding time? Book club?” His eyes widened a moment, and his smile broadened as a thought seemed to strike him. “Staring contest?!”

“Philosophical discussion,” said Gohvis.

“Oooh! Can I join?”

“No.”

Emiliana spotted Chergoa hovering over as well, now. She wasn’t terribly surprised. Chergoa and Ibai had become quite good buddies, recently. It seemed like the reaper spent almost as much time with him as she did with Emiliana.

“Oh, c’mon, don’t be like that,” Ibai was saying. “I’ll admit, I don’t know a whole lot about philosophy, but I’d love to learn!”

“Go find a book, then,” said Gohvis.”

”1902

((Halloween Special -- Page 1 of 4))

Emiliana knew he wasn’t talking to her, but that sounded like a pretty good idea. The Library must’ve had tons of philosophy books, so maybe she could add some to her reading list.

Ibai opened his mouth again to say something, but a low rumble interrupted him.

Emiliana recognized that sound. She gave Ibai a look. “Have you been checking out too many books again?”

“No,” said the middle-aged Blackburn with all the composure of a child. “I’ve been good, I swear!”

“Hmm,” was all Emiliana said.

“He is telling the truth,” said Gohvis. “The Library simply doesn’t like him.”

Another low rumble arrived, as if in affirmation.

“Oh, no,” said Ibai, “is that really true?”

One more rumble.

Ibai just frowned.

Emiliana felt a bit bad for him. Ever since she had informed him about the death of Ismael Blackburn, his father, Emiliana had become even more uncertain about Ibai’s state of mind than before.

The aberration took the news... pretty well, Emiliana supposed, but he was rather quiet for a few days thereafter, and she had also been seeing him around less frequently.

His current demeanor didn't seem all that different from normal, but that too was worrisome in its own way. Being an aberration, Emiliana had to wonder if the man knew how to grieve properly--or the more terrible question of if he even felt grief in the first place.

Perhaps that was why Chergoa was spending so much time with him, lately. Emiliana had asked her about him, but the reaper hadn't told her anything that seemed out of the ordinary.

'I wouldn't worry too much about what a building thinks, if I were you,' said Chergoa.

"But it's not just any building," said Ibai. "It's my new best buddy! I can't have my best buddy hating me! That's not a best buddy at all, then!"

"1903

((Halloween Special -- Page 2 of 4))

'Ibai,' said Chergoa with the cadence of a disapproving mother. 'You can't be best friends with a building. Especially one that wants you dead.'

Ibai, however, seemed oblivious to her tone. "How come?"

'Because--that--it just makes no sense.'

"Why?"

'You--' Chergoa paused. 'Y'know what? You're right. You can be best friends with a rock, for all I care.'

Emiliana squinted and glanced at the reaper. 'Are you getting jealous of a building?'

'No,' she said privately. 'Shut up.'

Ibai was looking inquisitively towards Gohvis. "How can I get on the Library's good side?"

A beat passed, and the Monster gave a hulking shrug.

"Well, dang."

Surprising herself, Emiliana had an idea. "Um, maybe you could try writing a book of your own and then give it to the Library as a gift."

Ibai stopped. And then his face lit up. "That's brilliant! Ooh! What should it be about?! Wait, no, don't tell me! It would be better if I figured that on my own, wouldn't it?! Hmm! Interesting!" He turned around and started back in the direction that he'd just come from. "A book, a book! Fiction or non-fiction? Pictures or no pictures? Hmm!"

'And there he goes,' said Chergoa.

"I wonder how long that will keep him occupied for," said Emiliana.

'No telling,' said Chergoa. 'I could see it being ten minutes or ten months, depending entirely on how interested it keeps him.'

"Mm," hummed Gohvis. "I'm more curious about what manner of creation might arise from that brain. I am reasonably certain than no aberration-written book currently exists."

Chergoa's next words had the echo of privacy to them. 'You alright, Em?'

The question caught her off guard, but after a moment, Emiliana understood why the reaper was posing it. There hadn't been many occasions thus far where Emiliana had been alone with Gohvis. 'Yes, I am fine.'

Gohvis was still looking off in the direction that Ibai had gone.

"Increasingly, he reminds me of someone.""

"1904

((Halloween Special -- Page 3 of 4))

'Really?' said Chergoa. 'Who?'

Gohvis didn't answer. Instead, he asked, "How did an aberration come to be among the Rainlords?"

Emiliana had no idea how to answer that and so looked to her reaper.

'We're not sure,' was all she said.

"Mm."

There arrived an uncomfortable silence before Gohvis picked the conversation back up again.

"Do either of you know how aberrations are created?" he asked.

'No,' said Chergoa for the both of them.

And again, Gohvis fell silent.

'Well? Aren't you going to dispel our ignorance for us?'

"No."

Emiliana saw the reaper's face twist a little.

Gohvis stood. "I shall leave you to your studies. Make sure you meditate before you fall asleep." And without waiting for a response, he walked away, silent as a shadow.

'That guy can be a real prick when he wants to,' said Chergoa with privacy.

Emiliana could hardly disagree, but it was hard for her to dislike him too much, given everything he had done for her so far. Even if she was here against her will, a rather large part of her felt like she was probably better off in Gohvis' care--for the time being, at least.

Before coming here, she'd been terrified of her mutation power. But now? Now, she at least had a grip on it, and that was entirely thanks to Gohvis. He had been personally instructing her in how to safely tap into and moderate her ability.

The key, she had learned, was in the passively "building" nature of mutation. If she went too long without activating it, then it would eventually activate on its own, causing uncontrolled changes to her body. Previously, she had thought that the only way to cope with this problem was to use her ability in small, hopefully harmless ways in order to alleviate the buildup so that it could never activate on its own, but Gohvis had been teaching her a better, albeit more difficult, strategy."

"1905

"One thing you must understand immediately," Gohvis had told her, "is that meditation is more important for us than any other servant class. By far. Especially in the beginning. I believe this is the main reason why, historically, we have suffered so greatly. We and our accompanying reapers have vastly underestimated how much meditation is required for us to achieve stability with our power."

And indeed, ever since then, meditation had become the largest part of her daily routine. When she wasn't reading, eating, or sleeping, she was most likely meditating--and she hadn't been eating or sleeping that much.

More recently, she had reached a point where Gohvis finally allowed her to reduce her meditation hours by a small margin, which was why she had time to explore the Library more and talk to the Monster's followers, but it wasn't just increasing the amount of meditating that had been important. She had also needed to change how she meditated.

"How familiar are you with the concept of altered states of consciousness?" Gohvis had asked her.

"Um, not very?"

"Then it is time to learn."

The Monster went on to explain that the primary purpose of meditation for mutation users was to enter into a different state of consciousness so that they could achieve more meticulous management over their own bodies.

Supposedly, there were multiple states that she would eventually be learning, but the first and apparently most important one that Gohvis had taught her was what he had dubbed a "storage" state.

--or Sto, for short," he'd explained. "Naming them is helpful for codifying them in your mind over time. It makes them easier to reenter, which speeds up the meditation process."

The purpose of Sto, she had learned, was to create a space in her mind where she could "store" the problematic buildup of her mutation power. If mutation was like a leaky roof, then Sto was like a bucket in which to catch the dripping water."

"1906

Sto was not a cure for the buildup, as the metaphorical ""bucket"" could still ""overflow"" if not attended to regularly, but it did serve as an invaluable buffer to further postpone the unintended activation of mutation. And from what Emiliana had been able to tell, the activation could be postponed for quite a long time, depending on how much the user was able to refine Sto.

Needless to say, mastering Sto instantly became Emiliana's top priority.

From the way Gohvis had talked about it, she had expected it to be incredibly difficult, but she was relieved to discover how easy it was. Within a couple hours, she had begun ""constructing"" it. She could visualize the space as a kind of pocket dimension, to which her own mind was merely a window. She didn't know if that was actually case, though, since it seemed just as likely--if not more so--that space required for Sto simply existed in her own mind. But somehow, thinking about Sto as a different space, separate from herself, seemed to make the whole process easier.

She wondered if it was because of what happened with Rasalased. The so-called Dry God. Perhaps something about that experience was now informing her view of reality or planes of existence.

Regardless, she wasn't complaining. Sure, the construction of Sto was still a rather slow and tedious process, since she wanted it to have as much ""capacity"" as possible, but she definitely didn't find it difficult. In fact, it was so easy that she had even been able to construct it while performing a general meditation as well.

She could even almost do it while reading.

She had only been attempting that feat for the past couple days, but she felt like it was possible. Perhaps if she wasn't so tired."

"1907

She really needed to get some rest. Heh, maybe she should try to sleep and meditate at the same time. That would be helpful.

'You look like hell,' said Chergoa. 'Still haven't been sleeping well?'

""Yes...""

'So that herbal tea I told you to make didn't work?'

She gave a mild laugh. ""I'm afraid not.""

'Tsk. I knew that recipe was horseshit. I'm sorry, Em.'

""It's not like it's your fault.""

'Have the nightmares changed, at least?'

""I don't think so. It is all a bit murky. It can start normally enough, perfectly pleasant, but it always ends with that weird... starfish monster. Screeching at me."" She grimaced a little, just recalling the horrible image.

'Well, that sucks. If it gets any worse--holy shit!'

Emiliana turned to see what Chergoa was reacting to, only to flinch when she saw Gohvis' hulking figure standing there again.

""What were you talking about, just now?"" the Monster said with his two voices.

Hadn't he gone off to--? Wait, where had he gone? And why was he back?

'Would you mind not scaring the crap out of us like that?' said Chergoa. 'You just left. Why did you come back so soon?'

""I happened to overhear your conversation,"" said Gohvis. ""Or I thought I did, at least, and it interested me. Mind repeating what you were saying?""

""Uh..."" It took Emiliana a second to find her words. ""I've... been having nightmares?""

""Mm. About what?""

""A... er... some kind of starfish thing?""

""And these have been preventing you from sleeping soundly?""

""Y-yes...""

""I see."" He turned and started walking away again.

Emiliana stood up. ""Where are you going now?""

""Return to your quarters and sleep. But don't forget your meditations first.""

She was getting really sick of all these unanswered questions. ""No. Wherever you're going, I'm going, too."" She ran to catch up with him."
"1908

He didn't stop walking, but he did turn to look back at her. ""Hmph. Are you sure you want to do that? You may come to regret it.""

She matched his pace, as did Chergoa. ""Why? Where are we going?""

""Do you wish to see your nightmare with your waking eyes?""

Admittedly, that did give her pause. ""Um... not especially, no.""

""Then do as I said.""

She gave a wide frown. ""Well, I don't want to do that even more.""

""That is not a proper sentence,"" said Gohvis.

""Oh, whatever, just tell me where we are going.""

""To see the Weaver.""

Emiliana was about to ask who or what that was when Gohvis abruptly stopped in front of a blank wall.

He pressed his huge hand against it, and then it became clear that there was a square-shaped button there, previously imperceptible due to how seamlessly its edges had blended into the rest of the wall's flat gray stone. A deep click resounded, followed by a shunk, and then a nearby section of the wall gave way, revealing a hidden path.

Gohvis went first, though he was too tall and had to duck down.

Emiliana exchanged uncertain looks with Chergoa before following.

The path forked multiple times, and it wasn't long before Emiliana was sure that she would have gotten lost in these musty tunnels for ages if Gohvis wasn't here.

In time, they arrived at a stone door, which lead to another area of the Library that she had never seen before.

It was a cavernous chamber with a vaulted ceiling and not much light. Rows of candles filled several long tables, and the scent of vanilla hung in the air. The atmosphere was strangely pleasant in its own way, but Emiliana's wariness wasn't allowing her to feel much other than creeped out."

"1909

'What the fuck am I sensing right now?' said Chergoa privately.

The reaper didn't often curse around her, which told Emiliana that Chergoa really was shaken up, right now--and that knowledge didn't do much to ease her own anxious heart.

Continuing to follow Gohvis, it soon became clear that they were heading toward the far end of the chamber, which was largely concealed in shadow. But as they drew closer, Emiliana gradually began to make out a form therein.

And not a humanoid one, either.

The shape just sat there in the darkness, lumpy and pulsing and as big as a rhinoceros. Emiliana had to strain a bit, but she could hear the sound of faintly labored breathing as well. The ground seemed to be damp around it, too.

""Weaver,"" said Gohvis in a stern tone when they were finally close enough.

'Greetings, Master,' came an unfamiliar voice in Emiliana's head. 'And to you as well, Elroy.'

""Why have you been intruding in her dreams?"" the Monster said.

'I wished to speak with her. It seems I only succeeded in frightening her, however. I must apologize.'

Wide-eyed and still mildly horrified, Emiliana couldn't help herself and asked what was probably quite a rude question. ""What are you?""

'Ah, yes. A relic, perhaps. One that has lasted long past her usefulness.'

Chergoa decided to chime in now. 'You were human once?'

'You say that as if I no longer am,' said the Weaver.

'No offense, but I'm not sure you are,' said Chergoa. 'I've never met a human, servant or otherwise, who could speak to other humans telepathically like you're doing now.'

'Ah. So you do not consider yourself human anymore, either, then?'

'Not really, no. That's why I meant it when I said no offense.'

'Ah. I see.'"

"1910

Gohvis decided to interject. ""Why did you wish to speak with her? And more importantly, why did you invade her dreams instead of simply asking me to let you see her?""

'Would you have allowed me such a privilege?' the Weaver said.

Gohvis folded his arms. ""She is here now, is she not?""

'With your supervision, yes.'

Gohvis was quiet a moment. ""And why would my presence be such a bother?"" His tone was only becoming more irate.

'Because, Master, you have a way of stifling discussion with your imposing disposition.'

""Mm, yes. Or perhaps you simply wished to play with her mind.""

'Ah.'

Emiliana was liking this conversation less and less by the second.

'Her brain DOES have a curious complexion to it,' said the Weaver, 'but do you think her so malleable as to be my plaything?'

""She is a child,"" said Gohvis.

'True. But stubbornness knows no age.'

Emiliana didn't much care for the way they were talking about her like she wasn't even present. And now Gohvis was giving her a look, as if he were reconsidering the Weaver's words.

She felt she had to say something before the lull in the conversation disappeared. ""Why are you here in the dark, all by yourself?""

'I am sensitive to light,' said the Weaver. 'And it must be said, I am not very pleasant to look at. It is better for everyone this way. I do not wish to be seen.'

Emiliana could believe that. If the Weaver looked anything like that starfish monster from her nightmares, then it made sense. There was another thing that still didn't, though. ""Why were you screaming at me in my dreams?""

'Screaming? I was not screaming.'

""Um, yes, you were. It was terrifying.""

'Ah. That is very strange. I merely attempted to speak to you, as I am now. Perhaps your mind is even more curious than I thought.'"

"1911

'HER mind is curious?' said Chergoa. 'What about yours?'

'Ah. Flattery? I have not received that in many years.'

'Wasn't what I was getting at, but sure.'

""You still have not answered my question,"" said Gohvis. ""What did you wish to talk to her about?""

The Weaver gave a telepathic sigh. 'If you must know, I was wondering if she remembered me.'

Emiliana blinked a couple times, and she glanced at both Gohvis and Chergoa in bewilderment. ""I've never met you. I'm sure I'd remember if I had.""

'As I am now, no, I suppose you would not remember me,' said the Weaver. 'And not you as you are now, either.'

For some reason, those words gave Emiliana a chill. ""What is that supposed to mean?""

""Stop confusing her,"" said Gohvis. ""You are mistaking her for Agam.""

'No, I am not,' said the Weaver. 'Agam, you may recall, would sometimes remember people whom he had never met previously. Places he had never been before. Knowledge which, by all conventional expectations, should not have belonged to him.'

""And as I said, she is not Agam,"" repeated Gohvis.

'Hmph. Do not play dumb, Master. Her mind is not Agam's, yes, but does it not remind you of him? That curious complexion? His was not perfectly identical, but is the resemblance not still uncanny? I am sure that is why you have brought her here, no?'

Gohvis made no response.

Emiliana was only growing more uncomfortable, but she didn't know what to say, what question to ask.

Apparently, Chergoa did, though, and she didn't hold back, either. 'Are you talking about reincarnation? As in the true, reaperless variety? Because if you are, then I think you're trying to sell me some bullshit, right now. There are plenty of other explanations for why someone might have memories that they didn't recognize as their own.'

"1912

'Ah.' The Weaver sounded amused for the first time so far. 'I would not call it reincarnation, no. Rather, I suspect it is a higher form of inheritance.'

'A higher form?' said Chergoa. 'You make it sound like some kind of magic.'

'I cannot help how you choose to interpret my perspective,' said the Weaver.

'Hmph.'

'In the matter of inheritance, the Rainlords of Sair already carry quite a pedigree, would you not agree? The ancient Water Dragon walks among us still, does he not? Is it so difficult to believe that this blood of kings might yet hold more secrets?'

Blood of kings? That was one way of putting it, but Emiliana had to disagree on principle. ""You seem to know a lot about me,"" she said, ""I'll grant you that. But you don't know much about Rainlords, do you?""

'Why do you say that?' the Weaver asked.

""We do not suffer kings. We never have."" And Emiliana couldn't explain it, but she had felt an unexpected warmth in her chest when those thoughts had occurred to her--and it only swelled further when she spoke them.

Her entire life, she had never once thought that being a Rainlord was anything special. Despite all the stories and lectures and reapers and powers, she had always thought it was just silly bravado. Masculine posturing.

But here and now, all of a sudden, it made complete sense to her.

She was a Rainlord. And she was proud.

'Call it what you like,' the Weaver said. 'The purportedly divine appointment of the Water Dragon is a kingly quality. But that is neither here nor there. All that matters is your inheritance from Agam. Perhaps we should reconsider the potential of such a gift.'

Emiliana was still listening, but she couldn't help feeling suddenly homesick. Something in this strange conversation was making her wonder if she would ever see her family again."

"1913 -- CXCVII.

'I encourage you to search your memories when you find the time,' said the Weaver. 'One day, you may discover more there than you expect.'

'And what might she discover about you?' said Chergoa.

'I would like to know that myself.'

Chergoa's next words were private. 'She's being evasive again.'

Emiliana was hardly surprised.

Gohvis unfolded his arms, but his tone remained grave. ""Whatever the case, you will stop bothering her in her dreams. You will not bother her at all without my permission.""

'As you wish, Master.'

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Seven: 'O, lordly guardian, know thy burdens...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, had there been a lot more that Lionel Carthrace had ended up telling Hector. For all the fuss that the guy had made about not wanting to speak ill of his aunt, once he'd finally gotten going, it was like a dam had burst, and story after story flowed out with such force that Hector eventually began to realize that Lionel probably didn't care so much about changing Hector's mind regarding Amelia as he did about finally having someone listen to him complaining about her.

Which seemed odd in its own way. Surely, his other family members would be happy to listen to him complain, no? Then again, perhaps not. Lionel was the head of House Carthrace, after all. Maybe he didn't want them to think he was weak or something by whining a whole bunch.

It didn't really matter, Hector supposed. After a while, he just kind of tuned the guy out and consulted Garovel about how best to extricate himself from the situation.

In the end, Hector relied on the thankfully good excuse that they had many more meetings to get to before the night concluded, and Lionel became abruptly apologetic, having apparently regained control of himself.

And after all that, Hector still didn't really know what to make of Amelia Carthrace and her family."

"1913 -- CXCVII.

'I encourage you to search your memories when you find the time,' said the Weaver. 'One day, you may discover more there than you expect.'

'And what might she discover about you?' said Chergoa.

'I would like to know that myself.'

Chergoa's next words were private. 'She's being evasive again.'

Emiliana was hardly surprised.

Gohvis unfolded his arms, but his tone remained grave. ""Whatever the case, you will stop bothering her in her dreams. You will not bother her at all without my permission.""

'As you wish, Master.'

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Seven: 'O, lordly guardian, know thy burdens...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, had there been a lot more that Lionel Carthrace had ended up telling Hector. For all the fuss that the guy had made about not wanting to speak ill of his aunt, once he'd finally gotten going, it was like a dam had burst, and story after story flowed out with such force that Hector eventually began to realize that Lionel probably didn't care so much about changing Hector's mind regarding Amelia as he did about finally having someone listen to him complaining about her.

Which seemed odd in its own way. Surely, his other family members would be happy to listen to him complain, no? Then again, perhaps not. Lionel was the head of House Carthrace, after all. Maybe he didn't want them to think he was weak or something by whining a whole bunch.

It didn't really matter, Hector supposed. After a while, he just kind of tuned the guy out and consulted Garovel about how best to extricate himself from the situation.

In the end, Hector relied on the thankfully good excuse that they had many more meetings to get to before the night concluded, and Lionel became abruptly apologetic, having apparently regained control of himself.

And after all that, Hector still didn't really know what to make of Amelia Carthrace and her family."

"1914

Hector's next few meetings went a bit more smoothly, perhaps because the Madame Carthrace was present for them. She didn't speak all that much, but when she did, it usually served to point the conversation in a helpful direction.

The meeting with Domitrus Vollier left perhaps the biggest impression on Hector. The wealthiest man in the country certainly did not carry himself like everyone else, but Hector wouldn't go so far as to call him arrogant, either. The man was very collected and polite, and his relationship with Amelia seemed somehow both affectionate and hostile, though maybe that was just some trick of the aristocracy that he didn't quite understand yet.

Oddly enough, Hector ended up kind of liking Domitrus, but he didn't exactly know why.

"He would be a very good ally to have," said Amelia in between meetings. "The Volliers are probably the second most influential family in the nation, at the moment."

Hector wanted to ask about her history with him, but there wasn't much time, and it seemed like there would be a lot to tell.

As the evening drew on, with meeting following meeting following still more meetings, Hector gradually began to feel less like a guest of royalty and more like a prisoner being interrogated.

'How many are left?' he asked Garovel.

'A mere fifty-seven,' the reaper said dryly.

He tried not to sigh audibly. 'Garovel, if I asked you to release my soul right now, would you do it?'

'Maybe if I got to go with you.'

Each meeting was only five to ten minutes, but with so many to get through, it quickly became clear that they were simply not going to be able to finish them all tonight."

"1915

Amelia and her apparent secretary set to work writing up apology letters, including requests to reschedule. It looked like Hector was going to be having sporadic meetings with the rest of the Atreyan lords for the next two or three months.

He wasn't terribly excited by that notion, but at least it freed up what little remained of the evening. He still hadn't even gotten to talk to Harper Norez yet.

When he finally did, however, it was not quite the reunion that he had expected.

'Well, look who it is,' said Darsihm, Harper's reaper. 'A pleasure to finally see you two again.'

'Likewise,' said Garovel, though his hollow eye sockets were drifting towards the unconscious man sitting at the bar. 'Uh...'

'Oh, ah--sorry.' Darsihm tapped his servant on the back of his head, and Harper jolted awake.

""Mugh?!""

Hector caught the stocky man before he fell off his bar stool. When Harper turned and squinted confusedly at him, Hector returned a flat smile. ""Hello, Mr. Norez...""

The man needed a moment. ""Oh, hey."" He stood up without Hector's help and suppressed a burp. ""Great to see you guys. How've you been? You look great. Been workin' out? It shows. Me, I'm doin' good, too, thanks for asking. You guys are so thoughtful, y'know that? There's no one better. Y-you--you guys're just the best. I hope you know that, okay? If anyone tells you different, y'just--"" He had to steady himself on the edge of the bar. ""Y'just send 'em my way. I'll set 'em straight, mkay? And y'know what else? This country of yours is great, too. You should be so proud of all the things that, uh, y'know. You have. Here. It's just great. Everyone's great. I hope we can--""

And the man just kept talking.

Hector was wholly entertained, but he did have a question. 'Garovel, can reapers fix drunkenness in their servants?'

"1916

'Mm, sort of,' the reaper said privately. 'We can suppress it temporarily, and we can numb the pain of a hangover, but they just come back stronger later.'

Perhaps Darsihm was guessing what they were thinking, because he said, 'If there's anything important you want to talk about, I can put him back to normal for you real quick.'

""What're you sayin'? I'm not broken. I'm feelin' great, right now. I could talk about anything. I could tell you the secrets of the universe. Ask me whatever you want. I've got an answer.""

'Is that right?' said Garovel through mild laughter, and Hector could already tell that the reaper planned to screw with him.

""You're damn right it is,"" said Harper, sniffing loudly.

'Alright, then I've got a question for you,' said Garovel. 'What is the meaning of life?'

""Oh, duuude. What a great question. Y'know somethin'? You're a great questioner. Anyone ever tell you that? 'Cuz it's true. Hundred percent. So great. If I could give you an award, right now, I would. I'd vote for you, too. Come election time. You'd be a great prez-i-p-prezi... m-minister.""

'Well, thank you.' Garovel sounded like he could barely contain himself.

""You think I'm kiddin'? I'm not. You'd kill it. I'm sure you could fix. Just. Everything, y'know?""

Garovel was nodding along. 'Do you even remember my name?'

Harper squinted at him. Then he inhaled so much air at once that Hector wondered if he was trying to inflate his whole body until he popped like a balloon. ""Yeah, o'course I 'member your name. You're... V... Vvv--?""

'Starts with a ""G"",' advised Darsihm, who apparently didn't feel like keeping that bit of assistance private.

""Mm."" Harper thought for a long moment. ""Grant?""

'That's a Vanguardian Field Marshal,' said Garovel. 'Good try, though.'

""Buh..."" Harper scratched his head. ""Germal?""

"1917

'Germal?' said Garovel. 'That's an Ancient Melmoorian folk hero. How do you even know that name?'

""Mugh?"" was all Harper had to say.

Darsihm chimed in for him. 'You're very knowledgeable. But as it so happens, Germal is also currently the name of a prominent member of Abolish. Perhaps you've heard of him without realizing it. The Liar of Lyste?'

'Ah, yes, I remember that moniker,' said Garovel. 'Have the two you ever encountered this person?'

'We have not,' said Darsihm, 'but one of our superiors has taken a keen interest in him--an interest which I think has rubbed off on Harper here.'

Harper looked like he wasn't even listening, anymore. He was staring at the bartender, who was busy pouring a glass of wine for a different guest.

'When he's sober, anyway,' the reaper added.

'Hmm. Which superior would that be, if you don't mind my asking?'

Darsiim took a moment to perhaps deliberate whether or not he should share that information with them. 'Captain General Frederick. I'm not at liberty to share any more than that, I'm afraid. I probably shouldn't have even shared that much, honestly, but I feel you've earned a modicum of trust.'

'I understand,' said Garovel. 'Believe me, there's no need to explain yourself.'

The reapers kept talking, but a familiar voice acquired Hector's attention.

""Lord Goffe?""

He turned to see King William standing there, looking quite regal in his formal attire. His coat was mostly white laced with silver, aside from the big blue sash that extended diagonally down his chest. The man's missing arm wasn't all that noticeable if one wasn't looking for it, but Hector was. In fact, it was usually the first thing he thought of when seeing the King, and that probably wasn't going to change anytime soon.

Hector had no intention of ever forgetting the brutality that Abolish had visited upon this innocent man.

Upon his king."

"1918

""Your Highness,"" Hector said with an uncertain bow. ""How are you feeling?""

The King smiled at him. ""Quite well, thank you. And are you in good health, my young friend?""

""Ah--yeah. I'm--er--thank you."" Crap, why was he getting nervous again? Sure, he didn't know all that much about King William compared to the Queen, but they were just exchanging pleasantries here. Why was that beginning to feel more stressful than talking business with a bunch nobles he'd never met?

""You certainly look well,"" said William. ""Unlike the poor Lt. General over there.""

They both glanced at Harper, who was unconscious again. Perhaps Darsi had knocked him out to prevent him from drinking more.

That made Hector curious, though. ""Have you been getting to know him?""

""I have. And I must say, I find his company quite enjoyable when he is sober.""

Hector bobbed his head. ""I found it quite enjoyable when he was drunk, too.""

The King chortled. ""At first, I was worried that such inebriation would hinder his ability to protect my wife, but he was happy to demonstrate for me earlier this evening that he could turn it on and off as easily as flipping a switch.""

Hector wondered if the King knew about the longer term ramifications of 'turning it off,' but he supposed it didn't matter that much.

""You servants are very curious,"" said William. ""The term 'servant' hardly even seems appropriate, given all of which you are capable.""

Hector could only bob his head again. He was pretty sure that the man already knew all about reapers as well, so he didn't try to clarify that point.

""But I digress,"" said the King. ""There was a matter that I have been wishing to discuss with you. Perhaps we could talk in private?""

Hector was a bit surprised to hear that, honestly, considering he'd already had a serious conversation with the Queen earlier this evening, but he certainly wasn't about to turn the man down, either.

""Ah--sure. Lead the way.""

"1919

William guided Hector to the eastern hallway, then into a small conference room. A couple of palace staff members were using it, but when the King asked to borrow it for a few minutes, they were practically falling over themselves to accommodate him.

Once they were alone, William walked to the other end of the long table in the middle of the room. While he waited for the man to begin talking again, Hector noticed Garovel phase through the wall.

'What're you talking about in here?'

'Don't know yet,' said Hector. 'The King seems kind of... apprehensive for some reason.'

Garovel didn't get the chance to inquire further, because William began talking.

""This has been stewing in my mind for some months now, and yet with all of that time to prepare my thoughts, I am still uncertain about where to begin.""

Hector gave a sympathetic frown. The man sounded like he needed reassurance, so Hector decided to say, ""Whatever it is, I'm listening.""

The King spared him a glance. ""I appreciate that.""

And there was more silence, but Hector chose to just be patient.

""In this past year,"" said William, ""I have come to realize that the world is far stranger and more terrifying than I ever dared imagine. In particular, learning about the existence of reapers has caused me to reevaluate my perspective on a great many things.""

Still, Hector merely waited.

""...How much do you know about my family?"" the King asked.

""About House Belgrant?""

""Ah... not very much, I guess.""

""Are you at all familiar with the story of how House Belgrant came to be?""

Hector shook his head.

""Then perhaps I should tell it to you before I say anything more. Forgive me if this seems self-indulgent. That is not my intent. I do not mean to waste your time or mine.""

""Okay... ""

"1920

""Before Atreya was born, this land belonged to the Mohssian Empire,"" said William. ""And at that time, the noble House of Belgrant did not exist, either--unlike virtually every other family that is present at the Gala tonight. As far as the aristocracy is concerned, we are still comparatively young.""

""You're talking about over three hundred years ago,"" said Hector. ""If your house is young, then what does that make mine?""

The man gave a faint laugh. ""You have a point, but such is the nature of this country's aristocracy."" He paused, perhaps to regather his thoughts. ""Regardless, the story of how my family rose to the noble class is intimately tied to the story of Atreya's independence.""

""Er, really?"" said Hector. ""I, uh... I happened to be reading about that subject the other day, and I don't remember seeing the name Belgrant mentioned.""

""Ah, yes. We were given little credit for our role, historically. The nobles of the era likely thought that our ascension into the aristocracy was enough of a reward.""

""I see...""

""But if you know the story of Atreya's acquisition of independence, then you know that it was a peaceful affair accomplished with no bloodshed.""

""Yeah,"" affirmed Hector. ""And it was even more impressive because of how violent things were at the time.""

""Indeed,"" said William. ""Some might even argue that it was more than impressive. They might say that it was a genuinely impossible feat.""

Hector wasn't sure what he was getting at.

""Such claims, when I heard them in the past, I did not take seriously,"" said William. ""And why would I? It was an achievement to be admired, not questioned--not used to fuel conspiratorial or magical thinking.""

Hector couldn't conceal the confusion on his face. ""What are you trying to say?""

"1921

The King took a deliberate breath. ""I am saying there may be evidence--which I previously dismissed as mere superstition--that my ancestor used something from your realm of expertise in order to help secure Atreya's independence from the Mohssian Empire.""

""Something like what?"" said Hector.

""Some type of object, I think.""

""Why do you think that?""

""Stories told among my family imply the existence of such an object. And more recently--"" William reached into his coat and retrieved something. ""--I discovered this.""

It was a small, misshapen book, leathery and brown apart from the black edges on one side, where it looked like a chunk had been ripped out of it--or burned out, perhaps.

""The ancestor in question was named Charles Belgrant,"" the King said. ""Unfortunately, this is not his journal. From what I have gathered, he may not have even known how to read or write, despite being the one who elevated my family into the upper class. Instead, this is the journal of his eldest daughter, Irina Belgrant.""

Hector was sufficiently intrigued. ""And what does it say?""

""Well, as you can see, it is somewhat... charred. I believe this was the result of the tragic fire which nearly ended my family's bloodline--and also burnt Belgrant Castle to the ground.""

""Wow, uh... I'm sorry to hear that.""

""As was I.""

That last bit of information sparked an incredulous question from Hector. ""How many times has that castle been destroyed, by the way?""

The man took a moment to think. ""Four, I believe.""

Hector's eyes widened a little. ""Seriously?""

The man nodded. ""But we are digressing. This journal, as you might imagine, gives only a partial picture of Charles' life and accomplishments, but having pored through its pages multiple times now, I can say with some confidence that it corroborates the notion that Charles was in possession of some type of special item--if only briefly. It also mentions him losing it, though the text is unclear as to when this occurred.""

"1922

A special item, huh?

After everything that happened during his last treasure hunt, Hector wasn't terribly excited to get involved in another one.

Still, he couldn't deny that his curiosity was piqued. ""Do you have any clue what this 'special item' actually was?" he asked.

""Not exactly," said William. ""I was hoping that you would be able to help me discover more details--or the item itself, even.""

""Ah--hmm."" Hector nearly asked how the King expected him to be of any help, but he held his tongue. It seemed like the man had more to say, anyway.

""The only clues I currently have are those that can be gleaned from the story of Charles and our nation's independence. And that is not much from which to work.""

Hector bobbed his head, then shrugged. ""Well. It's better than nothing. Tell me.""

""Very well," said William. ""There are various tellings of the tale, but they all begin the same way: with Charles having the spirit of an explorer from a very young age. He enlists in the military not in order to serve the Empire, but instead simply to escape Sunland, his hometown. And a life of poverty, perhaps.

""His time in the Mohssian army is always glossed over in the tales, and his service records paint a rather uneventful picture as well, but I feel that something quite crucial must have happened to him during this period of his life, because in every telling of his story, he returns to Atreya a changed man. He is charismatic and confident. He gets married and starts a family. He quickly builds a reputation for himself as a reliable and personable man. And though he is not described as extravagant, he never seems to struggle financially, either.""

Hector already had more questions, but he decided to just concentrate on listening for now."

"1923

William continued. ""Charles becomes involved in the independence movement several years before it begins to pick up steam with the general public. He continues to travel to other countries regularly for various reasons, but increasingly, those reasons involve speaking with prominent revolutionaries across the Empire."" The King paused, eyeing Hector a moment. ""The Rainlords were among them. Lluc and Marcelo Redwater. Perhaps you know of them?""

The last name certainly rang a bell, but he didn't recognize the first ones.

Garovel chimed in privately. 'Those two were the chief instigators of the Redwater Uprising. I'd be happy to explain all about them later.'

Hector didn't doubt the reaper's enthusiasm. ""The Redwater Uprising,"" was all Hector chose to say to the King, however.

""Yes. Now that I'm thinking of it, Warrenhold had an oblique connection to that ordeal as well, did it not?"" He smiled, but his eyes seemed to hold a keener interest behind them. ""What an interesting coincidence.""

Garovel was chortling. 'Is this guy some kind of history nut?'

Hector was beginning to think so.

'We should talk to him more often.'

That pulled a small laugh out of Hector, despite trying to hold back. And at the King's apparent curiosity, he tried to clarify. ""I think my reaper likes you, Your Highness.""

""Oh? I am... flattered. I think.""

""Yeah, it's a compliment.""

The man looked aimlessly around the room. ""Well, thank you then, wherever you are.""

Hector pointed the reaper out for him, and the King corrected his line of sight.

'Hey, tell him my name.'

""His name is Garovel, by the way.""

""Ah, yes, that sounds familiar. Helen may have mentioned him before.""

Garovel gasped. 'Now I'M flattered. Tell him how flattered I am.'

""Now he's flattered, too.""

'Tell him how smart and handsome I am, as well.'

'Shut up, Garovel.'

"1924

""Well, I am pleased to please,"" said William.

Hector smiled but also cocked an eyebrow at the man.

""Heh."" The King's expression was briefly distant with memory. ""My father used to say that all the time. He greatly enjoyed making other people happy."" After a moment, the nostalgia in his eyes passed.

""But I suppose we are getting sidetracked again. Where am I in Charles' story?""

""He's meeting revolutionaries around the Empire,"" said Hector.

""That's right. It is at this time that the Atreyan independence movement begins to gain popularity--in large part, I think, because the idea of achieving it peacefully is put forth by a young and vibrant Domitrus Lumenbel. The news of all the inhuman violence taking place elsewhere in the world has likely soured the general public to any and all notions of war. Charles, meanwhile, returns home after another long journey abroad, and this is where his story becomes... questionable."

Hector just tilted his head and waited.

"As far as I have been able to tell, up until this point in his life, Charles Belgrant has had no direct contact with any members of the aristocracy. He has built up quite a network of friends and associates all across the Empire--and perhaps even beyond it--but no Atreyan nobles have ever been among them. Until, that is, his long-time involvement in the independence movement propels him to the forefront of discussion between the aristocracy and the lower classes.

"Why he is chosen as one of the mediators between these clashing groups... is unclear. Perhaps it is merely his charisma, but it still seems strange to me, given the rather oppressive era in which this took place, that someone without even a drop of noble blood would have been picked for such a task. Every other mediator mentioned is someone of this type. A distant cousin's fifth son. An eccentric lord's stepchild. Lower nobles, yet nobles nonetheless. But not Charles."

"1925

Perhaps it was a bit late into the conversation, but Hector decided to pick one of the conference chairs and sit down as he listened.

The King followed suit with barely a pause. "I believe that Charles, at this point, may have already been in possession of the special object in question."

"Really?"

"Yes, I think his appointment as mediator might just be odd enough to have been instigated via some supernatural means."

"Hmm."

"In any case, the job of the mediators at this time is very important. Though the aristocracy may be loathe to admit it, they need the public's support on grand matters of state such as this, lest they end up having to fight both a revolutionary war and a civil war simultaneously. And moreover, there is no definitive Atreyan royalty yet. The aristocracy can choose anyone to lead them at their own discretion, of course, but if they pick someone who is sufficiently despised by the commoners, then that too might very well result in a quick demise for this fledgling nation.""

'Y'know, I really appreciate all these unnecessary-yet-still-relevant-and-interesting details,' said Garovel. 'This is a man after my own heart.'

Hector knew the reaper wasn't being sarcastic.

""And so,"" the King went on, ""Domitrus Lumenbel emerges as a candidate for rule. He has both the pedigree and disposition for it. We know now, of course, that he went on to become Atreya's first king, but he was not without competition. His foremost rival in this endeavor is Linus Vollier, and in the competition between these two men, Charles becomes a significant factor. You see, there is a tournament being held in Brighton."" The King paused again, apparently remembering. ""Your hometown, no?""

""Oh, uh, actually, I was born in Selbury,"" said Hector. ""But my family moved around a lot when I was younger, so... uh, I don't really... feel like I have a hometown, I guess."" After a beat, he felt compelled to add, ""I do like Gray Rock so far, though.""

"1926

""I see,"" said the King. ""In any case, the tournament in Brighton that I am speaking of is perhaps different from what you might be imagining."" Before continuing, he seemed to catch himself, and then smirked. ""Then again, perhaps it is exactly what you, of all people, would imagine.""

Hector cocked an eyebrow at that. ""What do you mean by that?""

""Heh. Because it is a knight's tourney.""

Hector was unsurprised. Of course it was. Was there any other kind of tournament three hundred years ago? Well, on second thought, Hector supposed it could've been one of those super old sports for rich people, like polo or something.

Oh, but this was what the King meant, wasn't it? That he, of all people, would already be imagining it correctly.

Hmm.

""In terms of physical prowess, I am sure this tournament pales in comparison to those featuring the monstrous knights of Intar or Sair,"" said the King, ""but I feel it is nonetheless still an event of virtually incomparable importance where the history of Atreya is concerned.

""Charles, of course, is not a knight, so he does not personally participate, but at the beginning of the tournament, he befriends one Paul Greenway, who does participate--and in spectacular fashion, no less.

""You see, Paul is one of many knights who support Domitrus, but they are still outnumbered by those who support Linus. As far as the Empire is concerned, the official prize of the tournament is merely coin and horses, but unofficially, there is a quiet agreement among the lords that whichever faction wins will be the one that they all rally behind in pursuit of independence.

""As you might imagine, this raises the stakes quite a bit. In particular, the melee is especially brutal, where over a dozen men are killed, and even more are wounded. There are rumors of sabotaging horses and equipment, rampant bribery, and even attempts to assassinate competitors while they sleep.""

Hector was staring. ""Holy crap..."""
"1927

""It does not paint a very 'noble' picture, does it?"" said William.

Hector had a question that he both did and did not want to ask.
""Was... was King Domitrus' faction doing that, too? Cheating?""

""The exact truth of the matter is unclear, but it would not surprise me if that were the case. At the very least, I suspect that Charles did something because of what happens at the climax of the tourney.

""Paul Greenway is alone in the final melee against four mounted opponents. Half of his quad had become suddenly ill and were therefore unable to participate. His only companion in the fight was killed almost immediately, and even his own horse threw him off and fled the arena.""

Hector could guess where this was going. ""And he still won?""

""Yes. In a miraculous display of ability, Paul Greenway is able to win the day single-handedly.""

""Do you think he was a servant?"" Hector asked.

""That is one possibility,"" said the King, ""but by all accounts that I have read, Paul went on to live a largely unremarkable life thereafter. Never again did he distinguish himself in any military matters, and he died peacefully in his sleep at the age of seventy-three.""

""Hmm.""

""While it is possible that he could have hidden his abilities for the rest of his life or that these records could simply be false, I am now of the opinion that Charles gave Paul some manner of supernatural aid.""

""Were there any details of the fight itself?""

""Only that his opponents never landed a single blow on him. This, despite him being lightly wounded earlier in the tournament.""

""That does sound pretty suspicious..." Hector wondered if even the Scarf of Amordiin would allow him to avoid getting hit by four simultaneous opponents on horseback. Eh, maybe it could. He almost wanted to give it a try."

"1928

""In the end,"" said William, ""I believe this tournament served as a springboard for Charles into the upper class. Naturally, in the wake of the tourney, Paul's reputation skyrockets, and his friendship also grows even stronger. Nearly every event to which Paul is invited, Charles also attends.

""And now, finally, we arrive at the heart of the story. The push for independence. Charles' role as a mediator between the aristocracy and the lower classes is more important than ever. He understands the plight of the common man, and he is also able to articulate his points to the lords and ladies without slighting them or otherwise incurring their wrath.

""Within six months of the Tourney at Brighton Castle, Charles has gained a reputation for charm and persuasiveness. It is he who convinces the many advisors to King Domitrus to build Bosliat Palace as a show of wealth and power to all who would later visit our nation.""

Hector was still listening, but in a parallel thought, he couldn't help being surprised at something.

There was a castle in Brighton? Was it still standing to this day? What did it look like? What kind of fortifications did it have? Was it still functional?

""It was for this reason,"" the King was saying, ""that I believe Domitrus chose Charles to be a member of the welcoming party for Nominus Lobo, the now famous ambassador of the Mohssian Empire who would later convince the emperor to grant Atreya its independence.""

Hector merely nodded. He'd read Lobo's personal account of events just the other day, but somehow, mentioning that now seemed like a bad idea--like he would be trying to show off, maybe. That, and he didn't want to interrupt the King. He enjoyed observing the man's apparent passion for his subject matter as he spoke."

"1929

""This next part of the tale is not widely agreed upon by Atreyan historians,"" said William. ""Many, I am sure, would argue that Charles' role in persuading Ambassador Lobo was minimal or even nonexistent. But I tell you: I do not believe it. Two other members of that welcoming party wrote of their experience, and they both stated that Lobo was incredibly unpleasant from the moment he set foot in the palace. He refused to try any local cuisines and instead demanded that every meal include certain foods, one of which was carambola, a fruit which only grows on the other side of the world in Ardora.""

""Geez..."

""He was also reportedly disrespectful toward King Domitrus and even made a pass at the man's wife--along with several other married women.""

Hector pressed his lips together flatly as he painfully imagined that.

""However,"" the King continued, ""on the third day of his visit, his attitude suddenly and dramatically changed. He became much more accommodating and amiable. He even apologized for his past behavior."

Hector scratched his cheek, still a bit skeptical. "'And you think Charles was behind that?'"

"'I do.'"

"'But...'" Hector was worried he might spoil the King's enthusiasm by saying this, but he needed clarification. "'Lobo's own accounting of those events never even mentioned a Charles Belgrant.'"

"'Ah!'" Instead than looking upset, the King's expression lit up even more. "'You have read it?'"

Oh, crap, he'd intended to keep that to himself, hadn't he? "'Er, y-yeah...'"

"'Wonderful!'" The man's smile only broadened, but he tilted his head at Hector, too. "'Why do you seem so embarrassed?'"

"'Uh... I... ah...'" Aw, shit, what should he say? Maybe just the truth? "'I... I don't know.'"

The man's brow depressed with either confusion or pity--or possibly both. "'You are a very strange young man.'"

Hector just kind of rubbed his neck and averted his gaze."
"1930

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

"'But you are right,'" said William. "'Nominus Lobo's personal account of the visit makes no mention of Charles. This fact is precisely what most historians point to whenever they try to downplay Charles' role in the independence movement.'"

"'Ah--I didn't mean to be disrespectful or anything, er--'"

William held up a hand. "'Oh, no, I understand that. Worry not. I appreciate your concern, but it is not necessary. While I do cherish my family's legacy, it is not pride that compels me to share this story with you. Rather, I am hoping it will be of some use to you--or your reaper, perhaps.'"

Hector glanced at Garovel.

'Thoughtful guy,' the reaper said.

""In any case,"" said William, ""there is a reason why I believe Nominus Lobo's personal account may be inaccurate, and that is because of Paul Greenway's account of the knight's tourney.

""Late in his life, Paul wrote a memoir in which he reveals that, despite how much of an impact that tournament had on the rest of his life, he did not actually remember the final melee. He could recall nothing after his first joust, in which he was injured. After that, he only remembered waking up and being informed of the spectacular events after the fact.""

Hector's eyes went to the floor as he thought about that.

""To me,"" said the King, ""this speaks to the nature of Charles' intervention. I believe Charles did something to help Paul, and in so doing, left the man with no memory of what happened. And if this was truly the case, then I do not think it unlikely that Charles could have done something to Lobo's memory as well.""

Hector was quiet. He did not much care for how uncomfortably familiar this tale was beginning to sound."

"1931

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The King motioned to the charred book from earlier, which he had since laid on the conference table. ""In Irina's journal, she describes her father's version of events regarding Lobo. According to her, Lobo became much more 'persuadable' after Charles showed him... something. The chunk of text where Irina presumably named and provided details about the object in question was unfortunately burned off.""

Of course it was, Hector thought. ""So... to sum up... this is secondhand information that is in dispute by other, firsthand information. And it's been partially burned, too, so this secondhand information isn't even complete.""

A beat passed as the King looked at him. ""Yes, that about covers it.""

Hector gave a chuckling nod. ""Great.""

""You can see why most of our historians do not put much credence into this theory.""

""Yes, Your Highness. Yes, I can.""

""I acknowledge that it is not ideal.""

Hector held back a sigh, but not because he found the King's story exasperating. Rather, if he was being one hundred percent honest with himself, he already kinda believed it. He just wished that he didn't.

As little as three months ago, he probably would've been far more skeptical of a story like this, but after his experiences in the Undercrust--particularly in Himmekel--this flimsy, barely-making-any-sense tale from the King was actually ringing somewhat true to Hector's ears.

The idea of a magical artifact holding such power... sadly, that sounded perfectly reasonable now.

Agh.

Somehow, Hector felt like this was spoiling the entire tale of Atreya's independence for him. The notion that Bosliat Palace in all its splendor had wowed Ambassador Lobo so greatly that it changed the course of history? That had been such a beautiful and surprising thing to learn about. In retrospect, Hector loved it.

And now it was ruined by some kind of dark magic mind fuckery.

Goddammit."

"1932 -- CXCVIII.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Eight: 'Preparedness, be acquired...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a relief to be back at Warrenhold again. He hadn't even been gone a day, but it felt like weeks. As much as he had enjoyed catching up with everyone at the Gala, it was still exhausting, and the media circus around it certainly hadn't helped, either. The sun had already started coming up by the time he'd finally left the palace, and he had naively thought that the media would've dispersed by then, but nope. They jumped on him the second they saw him and made that last stretch to his vehicle as uncomfortable as possible.

At least he'd been able to say goodbye to Lynn and the Queen before departing. Thinking back on it now, in the comfort of his own bed, he wished that he could've talked to them more. About what, he wasn't sure. Anything would've been fine, really. As he drifted off to sleep, he foggily wondered when he might see them again.

The warm embrace of sleep was fully welcome. Damn, this bed was cozy.

Only too soon, he awoke--and not on his own.

A dreadfully familiar voice was talking to him in a horrifically familiar tone.

""--up. If you don't get up in the next twenty seconds, a cold shower will be visiting you in your bed.""

Hector groaned but began to stir.

""It's time to train, Lord Goffe."" Whenever Zeff called him that, it didn't sound like a term of respect for some reason.

Much as he wanted to, though, Hector didn't complain beyond a few more grunts. There was nothing to be gained by resisting, especially because in the back of his mind, he knew perfectly well how important these training sessions were--and how lucky he was to have found an instructor as experienced as Zeff.

He got dressed, making sure to choose clothes that he didn't care too much about, in the likely event that they ended up utterly obliterated."
"1932 -- CXC VIII.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Eight: 'Preparedness, be acquired...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a relief to be back at Warrenhold again. He hadn't even been gone a day, but it felt like weeks. As much as he had enjoyed catching up with everyone at the Gala, it was still exhausting, and the media circus around it certainly hadn't helped, either. The sun had already started coming up by the time he'd finally left the palace, and he had naively thought that the media would've dispersed by then, but nope. They jumped on him the second they saw him and made that last stretch to his vehicle as uncomfortable as possible.

At least he'd been able to say goodbye to Lynn and the Queen before departing. Thinking back on it now, in the comfort of his own bed, he wished that he could've talked to them more. About what, he wasn't sure. Anything would've been fine, really. As he drifted off to sleep, he foggily wondered when he might see them again.

The warm embrace of sleep was fully welcome. Damn, this bed was cozy.

Only too soon, he awoke--and not on his own.

A dreadfully familiar voice was talking to him in a horrifically familiar tone.

""--up. If you don't get up in the next twenty seconds, a cold shower will be visiting you in your bed.""

Hector groaned but began to stir.

""It's time to train, Lord Goffe."" Whenever Zeff called him that, it didn't sound like a term of respect for some reason.

Much as he wanted to, though, Hector didn't complain beyond a few more grunts. There was nothing to be gained by resisting, especially because in the back of his mind, he knew perfectly well how important these training sessions were--and how lucky he was to have found an instructor as experienced as Zeff.

He got dressed, making sure to choose clothes that he didn't care too much about, in the likely event that they ended up utterly obliterated."
"1933

He was hungry, but he decided to forego a meal for now. Zeff had warned him before about training on a full stomach, and Hector didn't doubt him. With how demanding the Lord Elroy was becoming during these sessions, Hector could easily imagine himself puking his guts out afterwards.

And today was certainly no exception.

""How is your progress with mapping?"" said Zeff, as calm as if he were asking about the weather, despite the fact that he was currently trying to chop Hector's head off with a broadsword of solid ice.

Hector met the blow with his own iron sword, but the man's soul-strengthened ice still cut through it, though not without resistance. The icy blade was partially deflected and clipped the top of his iron helmet instead of decapitating him. ""It's going okay, I think,"" Hector managed to say through labored breath.

""Show me,"" said Zeff, not even pausing to let Hector do so. The flurry of slashes from his sword only seemed to grow more intense.

They were wild, though. There was more power behind them, sure, but Hector could tell that Zeff was really just trying to push him back now instead of actually hitting him. And that was why Hector decided to do the opposite.

Instead of losing ground, Hector gathered his concentration and moved toward the slashes--between them. His armor made him bulky, but he didn't mind if it took some shallow cuts. The Scarf of Amordiin helped him sense the path of least resistance, and he was able to get in close and do exactly what Zeff just asked for.

The mapping technique was something that Hector had been working on for a while, ever since Zeff and Asad had told him about it when their group had first entered the Undercrust. In short, it was a method of easing the cognitive load of complex materializations by ""mapping"" them to physical movements in one's body, such as hand signs.

It was a slow process to refine, since it required memorization, but Hector hadn't been slacking on that front. He focused and made a fist with his right hand, but not to throw a punch with."

"1934

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

In an instant, thousands of iron spikes grew out of his armor--a tactic he had used several times before--but it didn't end there. With the basic spike defense mapped to his right fist, he was able to devote more cognitive power to adding complexity.

So the spikes grew faster than they ever had previously, granting them greater puncturing ability. But even more importantly than that, they branched off into more spikes--and kept branching.

Hector felt his spikes catch flesh briefly before Zeff backed off and covered himself in his own armor of solid ice, but this new spike technique was still not done, because he was giving it direction.

The spikes continued growing away from Hector and chased the Lord Elroy down--a feat which the man did not seem to expect, because they managed to catch up to him and enveloped him completely.

Not that it mattered too terribly much, of course. After a moment, giant icicles tore through the network of iron barbs and set Zeff free.

""Hmph."" The Lord Elroy dematerialized his ice armor and wiped a bit of blood from a gash on his cheek. ""Not bad. Simple, yet effective.""

Hector dematerialized his spikes but not his armor. ""Thanks...""

""Many a warrior look down upon little tricks like that, but in my experience, they might very well save your life, one day.""

Was that praise? Was Zeff actually in a good mood today? Hector was still waiting for the criticism.

""However, that particular trick won't help you much against an opponent who keeps their distance.""

Ah, there it was. Still not nearly as harsh as he'd expected, though.

""Have you put similar thought into improving your projectile capabilities?"" the man asked.

""Ah--yeah, I have."" His projectiles had been key in that fight with the worm, so of course he'd been thinking about different ways to iterate or otherwise modify those types of attacks since then."

"1935

~~Thanksgiving Special (page 1 of 6)~~

""Good,"" said Zeff. ""We'll go slow this time. Show me the simplest concept of what you have for a quick projectile--something that you can use to retaliate instantaneously at range. Then we'll see about amplifying its intensity.""

The simplest concept, huh? Hmm.

Hector actually hadn't put much thought into that. He'd only really been thinking about how to make things more potent, recently. Thus far in his ""career"" as a servant, he felt like his offensive abilities had always been his biggest weakness. It didn't help, of course, that he always seemed to be fighting uphill battles, but he also didn't expect that trend to change anytime soon.

He took a few more moments to think about Zeff's instruction here. A simplified version of what he had been working on. For purposes of instantaneous retaliation.

That definitely seemed like a useful thing to have in his arsenal.

Alright, then.

Hector made a hand sign that would be familiar to anyone in the world. A finger gun. He held off on pointing it at Zeff, though. ""Ready?"" he asked.

The Lord Elroy frowned, perhaps with disappointment. ""Your control over velocity states has improved, but I don't think you are quite at the point where you can use it as a replacement for real firearms. I've yet to witness you harness that kind of explosive power without first requiring at least a few seconds of prep time.""

That was true. Velocity states were fairly simple, all things considered, but they still had a high skill barrier when it came to achieving really potent speeds.

Hector already had a notion of how he might overcome that, though. He raised his finger gun in front of his chest. His question hadn't actually been answered, so he decided to ask it again. ""Are you ready?""

Zeff's brow lowered, but he seemed intrigued at least. He donned his ice armor once more and took a bracing stance. ""Yes, I am."" "1936

~~Thanksgiving Special (page 2 of 6)~~

Even before the man had responded, however, Hector had technically already begun. Rather than simplifying his technique to the point where he no longer needed any prep time, Hector felt that he might be able to achieve better results if he could just make his prep time invisible to his opponent.

The orbiting technique that he had developed in the Undercrust had gone through several iterations since its inception, especially during the worm fight. Here and now, Hector was sure that it was his best idea so far for creating powerful attacks.

The problem with it, as Zeff had already mentioned, was the prep time. Anything that he put into orbit around himself required at least a few seconds to accelerate before becoming truly threatening.

But what if he didn't actually put something into orbit, and instead merely imagined that it was there?

Everything about materialization only functioned as a result of the imagination in the first place. The cognitive process would be identical. The only difference would be that there was no physical object there.

Until he put one there, of course.

So what would happen if he went through the entire cognitive process of putting an object in orbit, increasing its speed, and then, only materialized that object into reality at the moment he was ready to let it fly?

It would conceal his prep time, wouldn't it?

Hector hadn't actually had time to test this theory out, but it had been in the back of his mind for a while now, and he was fairly confident that it would work.

So when he pointed his finger gun at Zeff--having the cognitive process already ""loaded"" into his mind and made easier by the hand sign--he was able to instantly let rip an iron bullet.

It burst into existence with a deafening crack and tagged Zeff right in the chest. It didn't go cleanly through, but judging from the fresh red stain on the man's translucent armor, it at least managed to draw blood.

And considering that was just the proof of concept, that he hadn't even tried to soul-strengthen the bullet, Hector was pretty damn pleased with that outcome."

"1937

""Time out,"" said Zeff as Axiolis flew in to check his wound for him. The regeneration had been active for a while, so Hector knew that wasn't their concern. More likely, they wanted to see exactly how much damage the bullet had caused.

Axiolis in particular had been quite studious about these things whenever Hector and Zeff sparred. The aged reaper seemed especially interested in trying to measure every major wound they received and collateral impact points in the environment. Hector still wasn't entirely sure how observing these things so closely all the time was supposed to be of any use, but he wasn't about to doubt a four thousand-year-old reaper's expertise, either.

'This is fantastic,' the reaper was saying. 'Hector, this puncture is significantly more damage than anything you have previously landed on Zeff. The flesh wound is still relatively minor, of course, but this impact area where your iron connected with the armor--the diameter of this must be around, oh, five hundred percent larger than even your second most damaging blow was.'

Hector wondered if he would ever be able to share Axiolis' apparent passion for geometry. He certainly wanted to be able to share it. But math just sucked so hard. It had always been one of his worst subjects, and learning new concepts in it always felt like he was trying to chisel rock with his bare hands. Or even his bare face, sometimes.

'How were you able to muster such a profound increase in velocity with so little prep time? I was watching closely, and I didn't see anything.'

Hector explained what he'd done.

""Ah, so you cheated, then,"" said Zeff, carrying that familiar tone of disapproval again. ""I told you to do something with zero prep. Hiding your prep, while potentially useful, was not the point of the exercise. You need to be able to summon power like that on a moment's notice--to take advantage of fleeting openings in combat. If your prep takes two seconds, but your window of opportunity is only one second, then your technique is still useless.""

"1938

""No, I understand that,"" said Hector. ""My intent is to prep beforehand, and then just keep it 'loaded' in my head. Like an actual gun, y'know? So I'll still be able to react to that one second window.""

Zeff's expression was doubtful. ""You'll keep it 'loaded?' Hector, doing that is not free. You would be sacrificing some of your cognitive power for a technique that you may not even use, depending on how the rest of the fight goes. And because you have less cognitive power at your disposal, the rest of the fight is then more likely to go badly for you. You'll be distracted. Your reactions will be slower.""

'Trying to multitask so heavily like that in the heat of combat is highly dangerous,' added Axiolis. 'Your brain is already processing a million different things at once in those moments. Prioritizing a ""loaded"" gun, so to speak, means not paying attention to other things.'

They had a solid point, Hector knew. And he didn't want to go against their collective experience and wisdom, especially when compared against his own, but... he also felt like they were underestimating the blessing of Focus that Rasalased had given him.

He had explained it to them previously, but in retrospect, he couldn't tell if anything he'd said had actually made sense. It was difficult to explain something that he didn't fully understand himself.

""I get what you guys are saying,"" said Hector, ""but I, uh... I think I can manage it pretty easily with parallel thought processes."" He scratched his cheek. ""I mean, it's true that I could be using that extra thought process for something else, but... I think having a 'loaded gun' at all times during the fight might be my most powerful option, right now--even if I don't end up using it all that often. Especially because... well, that was the weakest version of it. I'm sure I can make it stronger without overextending myself.""

'Hmm,' was all Axiolis said."
"1939

Zeff took his time considering what Hector had said. The disappointment in his face seemed to diminish somewhat, but the sternness didn't. ""If you truly believe that, then there is little point in discussing this further."" He waved Axiolis away and took a readying stance. ""Your hypothesis is set. If you are to ever prove it true, then we will have to push you much harder than we have been until now.""

Aw, shit.

The sparring erupted anew, more brutal than ever. It soon seemed obvious that, despite what Hector might've previously thought, Zeff really had been going easy on him before.

It was like trying to fight a blizzard all of a sudden. The Lord Elroy had never bothered to use any visibility-reducing tactics against him, and the piercing cold that accompanied it couldn't be overlooked, either.

He tried to rely on the Scarf, but with all the snow, hail, and icy daggers flying everywhere, it was only so helpful. In fact, the Scarf might've even been making things more difficult, because there was just so much more sensory information swirling around him constantly. Choosing what to focus on was crucial, lest he lose a limb to a blade that he didn't see coming.

And if he didn't maintain a heated variant of his armor, then the cold would quickly begin to wear down his movements and render him even more vulnerable.

He tried simply escaping from the localized blizzard entirely, but that didn't seem like much of an option, either, because Zeff could just make it follow him.

After a while of getting smacked around, sliced up, and just generally humiliated, a period of calm arrived as Hector was still trying to pick himself up off the frozen ground.

""You're not thinking clearly,"" came Zeff's disembodied voice from somewhere in the blizzard. ""You must assess your circumstances quickly and efficiently. And prioritize. Determine your most pressing problem. Don't try to deal with lesser issues first. A man can't repair his house while it's still on fire.""

"1940

The most pressing problem...

To Hector's mind, that had to be the poor visibility. But how in the world was he supposed to overcome that? He'd already tried to escape the blizzard, and that hadn't worked at all.

Agh. Don't complain. Just focus. Figure it out or die trying. That was his job, when it came down to it.

Well, how about just big, fat chunk of iron? So big that it could disrupt the blizzard? Make the snow and wind break against its body?

Worth a shot.

He materialized an enormous cylinder all around him as a kind of shelter, making it far wider than it was tall. As it grew, he hollowed it out and gave himself more space to move around. It wouldn't be long before Zeff broke in, so he was already preparing for it. He had multiple bullets ""loaded"" into his finger gun, and they were larger than that test version had been. He was just waiting for Zeff to show himself.

That did not happen, however. Instead, a dozen giant spears of ice pierced the iron shelter and peeled it apart like so many can openers.

And Hector still couldn't tell where Zeff was. The blizzard was still there.

Hector expected another walloping, but that didn't happen, either.

""Better,"" came Zeff's voice again, ""but still not good enough. You're at least trying to solve the problem, now. Your solution was just incorrect. Try again.""

Huh.

Hector couldn't help being a bit awestruck at how much slack the man was cutting him. Maybe he really was in a good mood, today.

He focused on the task at hand.

A simple structure wasn't going to work. That much was clear. He could try a complex one, like the maze that he'd used against Karkash.

But no, that didn't seem right, either. The problem was locating Zeff. A maze wouldn't improve his visibility. It would just help him hide-- essentially giving Zeff the same problem that he had, right now. And sure, maybe that would be useful in its own way, but he felt like he could do better.

In parallel, another thought process was thinking about wind. Could he generate wind with his iron? Yeah, probably. But could he generate enough to blow the blizzard away?

Hmm.

Time to find out, he supposed."

"1941

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector put a half-dozen big iron plates into orbit around himself, positioning them flat against the clockwise direction in which they were moving. He wanted as much air resistance as possible so that when he increased their speed, they would begin to whip up a nice little tornado around him.

And it worked like a charm. As he focused, pushing them for higher and higher speeds, the winds began to rise visibly amidst the blizzard. Snow and hail stopped touching him entirely, and then he began to notice something very interesting.

The Scarf of Amordiin was telling him all sorts of crazy new things that he'd never sensed before. Being at a center of a whirlwind changed everything. The flow of air immediately around him had become uniform, and as a result, it was suddenly very easy to sense any disturbances within that flow.

Like, for instance, a pair of icy spears flying at him from behind.

He launched himself out of their path on an iron platform, and the whirlwind moved with him.

This was so weird. Not quite disorienting, exactly--just very unfamiliar. He almost felt like he was in a video game all of a sudden, where there was a set radius of visibility around him while everything beyond it was just darkness--except in this case, that darkness a blizzard.

Unfortunately, that blizzard wasn't simply dispersing as he had hoped, but his miniature tornado was still cutting into it like butter. It was progress, at least.

He was looking for Zeff, but the man must've been keeping his distance. He wondered why Zeff didn't seem to have any trouble seeing through his own blizzard. Was Axiolis just telling him where Hector was with soul radar? That seemed a little unlikely. So was there some other trick to it, then?"

"1942

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

He sensed more spears coming for him, a trio this time from the side. He simply stepped out of their way. They, along with the two from before, hadn't really been moving all that fast now that he was thinking about it. Zeff was going easy on him again, he figured.

And while he appreciated not getting gored through the chest or having another limb torn off, Hector wasn't sure he liked this sudden show of compassion from his teacher.

In fact, he was starting to find it kind of annoying in its own way.

He needed to find Zeff if he was ever going to give the man a reason to stop taking him so lightly, and Hector had a couple ideas of how he might be able to accomplish that.

The first was to make his tornado larger. More uniform wind meant more area for the Scarf to describe for him, and he still felt like he wasn't losing control of it yet.

His second idea was guideposts. At the edge of his vision, he raised temperature-manipulated iron pillars, making them hot enough to glow so that he could see them better through the blizzard. He would've liked to make the pillars more complicated, or even add orbiting whirlwinds of their own, but he was already worried about reaching the limit of his cognitive load. Between his warming suit of armor, his growing tornado, and his loaded finger gun, he already had plenty of things that required constant focus. The most he wanted to risk on anything else was single-instance creations like platforms or guideposts.

Plus, of course, he had to keep an eye out for Zeff. Where the hell was he? Hector just needed--

There. A whiff of movement and shadow on his right. Hector let his gun rip, firing multiple shots this time. He thought he heard them make contact, but he couldn't be sure.

Until a few moments later, when Zeff came charging in with a slew of his own icy gunfire."

"1943

Rather than trying to dodge, Hector just relied on Haqq's shield in his left hand. The Lord Elroy's bullets left a few impressive dents in it, but that was all, and Hector kept 'loading' up more bullets of his own.

After having his ice armor pierced a few times, Zeff raised a full barricade for himself and took cover behind it.

Hector decided to do the same. He strengthened his iron barricade with his soul, as well. He knew it wouldn't help much with his weak soul-synchronization, but he wanted every bit of extra durability that he could get.

And then they had a shootout on their hands. Just straight up gun-blazing chaos, constant firing back and forth. The stream of deafening cracks in the air that accompanied each and every bullet soon became just background noise, like a waterfall raging in his ear, and Hector could hardly think of anything other than loading more bullets, keeping it going, not falling behind. He sacrificed his warming variant armor and devoted a second thought process to just making more ammo. He started adding heat to his bullets as well, just to give them that much more of an edge over ice.

The barricades on both sides were being shredded like cardboard, and they both just kept remaking them.

It probably wasn't even an entire minute of battle, but the sheer intensity of it made Hector feel like it was taking an eternity. At length, he felt like he might actually be gaining a slight advantage until he realized that most of his right hand was gone, blown off and spurting blood.

And suddenly, Zeff's gunfire seemed to grow even more furious. The man's barricade was in shambles, but he didn't bother recreating it. He merely stood up and started marching closer."

"1944

This wasn't going to be good. Hector knew he had to do something, but not having a right hand in this moment was more than just an inconvenience. Ever since having his mind ""tempered"" by Rasalased, he'd been having trouble using his left hand for normal iron materialization. At first, he and Garovel had thought that he'd completely lost function with it, that he could only use his left hand to materialize Haqq's shield, but more recently, Hector had tried practicing with it anyway and discovered that he actually could still use it for iron--but only a little.

He'd been trying to regain more functionality with it and had made a bit of progress, but it still had a long way to go, he felt. And hell, even before the tempering, he'd been right-handed, so that might've been a factor, too.

Here and now, though, his left hand was already quite busy just holding onto his shield--the only thing currently keeping him from being turned into a bullet-induced meat-spaghetti.

So his options were limited. And Zeff was closing in. And Hector was starting to get really freaking cold again, too.

But he still had his orbiting iron plates left. This whole time, they'd never stopped moving. They'd caught a few stray bullets here and there, sure, but they were still whipping around him just fine.

Hector decided to use them and go all-in. He ramped up the speed of the plates while simultaneously modifying their shape and increasing their mass, turning them into big blocks. He leapt high up into the air with the aid of an iron platform, flipping haphazardly and unintentionally--yet still maintaining his focus enough to sense the spears of ice that Zeff was already raising up from the ground to skewer him. They broke upon his shield instead. Hector took a half-dozen bullets to the chest as a result, but in exchange, he was able to bring down two of the big iron blocks simultaneously--right where Zeff was standing.

The impact with the ground had the force of an explosion, and Hector was sent flying backward, completely beyond the range of the blizzard. He hit the ground skidding and toppling on his half-busted armor.

A bit dizzy, he struggled back to his feet."

"1945

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

The blizzard was mostly gone, Hector saw. In its place was a cloud of dust and mounds of destroyed rock.

Perhaps that training session had gotten a little out of hand. He was glad that they'd decided early on to move these sessions quite far away from Warrenhold. This empty cavern on the other side of the lake below the castle provided plenty of space to test things out, and with the lamps that they'd set up to dispel the darkness, no one could approach without being spotted. Plus, Axiolis or Garovel was usually around to observe, and the reapers could easily sense any nearby souls thanks to how lifeless the rest of the environment was.

Axiolis hovered to Hector now. 'Not bad, my boy.'

Hector sensed Zeff approaching from his upper left and half-expected to get attacked again, but instead, the man came sliding down from an icy platform.

""Indeed,"" said the Lord Elroy. ""That was an admirable showing." His left arm was missing, and his clothes were dirty and torn in several places, but... was that a slight smile on his face? ""I'm proud of you.""

Wide-eyed, Hector didn't know what to say.

After a beat, however, the man's expression was wiped clean again, and he said, ""Don't be too pleased with yourself, though. You still gave me many opportunities to kill you.""

""I-I know that.""

Axiolis grabbed Zeff's shoulder, then addressed Hector. 'How's your regeneration? It should be starting to wear off now, no?'

The reaper was right. Hector could feel a familiar sensation, an oncoming wave of fatigue. Not quite there yet, but he'd felt it enough times now to know that it wouldn't be much longer. ""Yeah.""

'That's probably enough training for today, anyway. Let's go meet up with Garovel.'

"1946

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Zeff carried them both back over the lake on a mobile platform of ice while Axiolis kept apace.

Along the way, Hector was reminded of the buildings in the water there. He hadn't forgotten, exactly, but he wondered when or even how he might be able to restore them to use. It seemed like a waste to just let them sit there.

Zeff had more to say before they reached the other shore, however. ""Before I forget,"" he said, ""there is an important lesson I should teach you. Or perhaps you are already aware of this, the fact that you still have a critical vulnerability.""

Hector just listened.

""When you are fighting a materializer who is significantly older than you, such as myself, they can simply do this to you."" He flicked his wrist.

Hector's mouth and nasal passage felt suddenly and blisteringly cold. It was painful, and he couldn't breathe, but after a moment, it was gone.

""If that ever happens to you again, you're dead,"" said Zeff. ""They can grow a spike straight up into your brain--or worse, they could carve it out of your skull and capture you.""

Hector wasn't entirely surprised by this revelation. He remembered pondering similar techniques a while back.

Zeff seemed amused. ""This isn't a very common problem for most servants, which is why I hadn't thought to tell you about it sooner.""

""Er... what do you mean? Why wouldn't it be a common problem? Everybody's soul sync is weak when they start out, right?""

""Yes. I am saying that it is not a common problem, because most servants don't put themselves in such situations to begin with. But the more I've come to learn about you, the more I've come to think that you and I are kindred spirits, in this rather unfortunate way." The man spared him a look. "We both always seem to end up fighting opponents well above our station."

Hector wished he could argue with him."
"1947

"In any case," said Zeff, "if you think that such an attack is coming, then remember that you can block their materialization by doing it to yourself, first."

Hector blinked a couple times as he imagined that. Hmm. He hadn't thought there would be a solution, much less one so simple.

"Your armor may afford more help in that regard as well," said Zeff.

"The heart of the problem, of course, is your soul's field density being simply too weak. So even if you block the opponent from materializing a spike inside your head, they can still coat it from the outside and spike you that way."

"And you think my armor will protect me from that?"

"If it is fitted closely enough to your head, yes. Your eyes might still be vulnerable, however. They are a small enough target that, in the middle of combat, you may not need to worry about it, but it is still good to keep in mind, nonetheless."

"Hmm." With the Scarf, he actually didn't need his eyes all that much. Which reminded him.

He inspected the Scarf more closely, searching for tears or bullet holes, and indeed, he found a couple of the latter.

He and Garovel had been wondering about the durability of the Scarf for a while now. The item hadn't been bothered at all by face-melting heat of the Undercrust, so it had seemed reasonable enough to assume it was quite tough.

But that didn't mean it was invulnerable. And with how incredibly useful the Scarf was, Hector was afraid of it getting destroyed in battle, one day.

However, this wasn't the first time that he'd noticed damage to the Scarf. And he had since come to discover that the Scarf appeared to have a very slow regenerative capability of its own. These two bullet holes that he was looking at right now would probably take several days to heal.

He had been quite relieved to learn that about the Scarf, and yet, it still didn't quite alleviate all of his concerns. It seemed very possible to him that the Scarf could become too damaged to repair itself--or just get completely obliterated by a strong enough attack."

"1948

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

He would just have to do his best to take care of it, he supposed. Much as it concerned him, Hector certainly wasn't about to stop wearing the Scarf in battle for its own protection. The whole point of it was to aid him in battle, and it had to hang freely over his armor in order to function properly. He'd tried tucking more of it in, but he found that it became less effective.

Which only made sense, he supposed. Its power was undoubtedly linked rather closely to its surface area. The more that was exposed, the more it could help him sense.

He parted ways with Zeff when the man's children came to greet him in Warrenhold's main plaza. Marcos and Ramira Elroy were strange kids, to be sure. Before departing with their father, Ramira offered Hector a high-five for some reason, and Marcos, a polite bow--which he found somehow even more weird.

But he was glad that they seemed to be in good spirits, at least. Ramira's foot injury all the way back in Dunehall was still mending, and unaided, she was largely immobile. Zeff seemed only too happy to have her in his arms or on his shoulders, and Marcos could often be seen pushing her around in her wheelchair or following close behind her when she was on crutches.

Marcos had worried him a bit, too. The boy's shyness was something that Hector could intensely relate to, and his apparent melancholy, even more so. Garovel said that the poor kid had been having nightmares ever since his mother's death.

They'd been through so much. Hector wished he could do more for them. They were his ""cousins,"" after all, via Garovel and Chergoa's relation.

How the heck were you supposed to cheer kids up, though? Toys? Food? He was pretty sure they already had plenty of those things.

Eh, he was being stupid. He knew perfectly well those things wouldn't actually help them. Superficial things only helped superficially. If there was one thing Hector knew in life, it was that."

"1949 -- CXCIX.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

He didn't want to just give up on the idea, though. He was the Lord of Warrenhold, now. There had to be something he could do for the Elroy kids. He just had to figure out what it was.

With his training for the morning over with, Hector returned to his chamber to change into clothes that weren't tattered, and then started making the rounds. Garovel had previously told him that he should make a habit of visiting all of Warrenhold's facilities every day.

'Even if it's just a brief check-in, the routine of it is important for a multitude of reasons,' the reaper had told him. 'As a lord, you have a responsibility to your subjects, and the more visible you are to them, the easier it will be for them to place their trust in you. But also, there's no telling when someone might use this routine as an opportunity to inform you of something that you didn't already know. A proper lord should try to know everything that happens on his land.'

Hector very much appreciated the advice. When it came to acting like a lord, he was basically just winging it.

As he was making his rounds, however, a familiar sensation acquired his attention, and he decided to interrupt his lordly duties for a more pressing concern.

The Shard of the Dry God was calling out to him.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Nine: 'The designs of the Disparate...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'That's everything,' said Emiliana. 'Did you get it all?'

Hector's pen was still scribbling. 'What was that last one again?'

'Ridgemark,' she said. 'A sunken cave near the two-toned rock.'

He nodded as he finished transcribing her words. 'What's a two-toned rock?'

'I don't know. I am just telling you what it said.'

'Hmm. Do you know where Ridgemark is, exactly?'

'I do, actually. I looked that up, too. It's a city on the southernmost coast of Vantalay. Near the Gulf of Vantalay.'

He added that to his notes. 'Thanks.'

"1949 -- CXCIX.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

He didn't want to just give up on the idea, though. He was the Lord of Warrenhold, now. There had to be something he could do for the Elroy kids. He just had to figure out what it was.

With his training for the morning over with, Hector returned to his chamber to change into clothes that weren't tattered, and then started making the rounds. Garovel had previously told him that he should make a habit of visiting all of Warrenhold's facilities every day.

'Even if it's just a brief check-in, the routine of it is important for a multitude of reasons,' the reaper had told him. 'As a lord, you have a responsibility to your subjects, and the more visible you are to them, the easier it will be for them to place their trust in you. But also, there's no telling when someone might use this routine as an opportunity to inform you of something that you didn't already know. A proper lord should try to know everything that happens on his land.'

Hector very much appreciated the advice. When it came to acting like a lord, he was basically just winging it.

As he was making his rounds, however, a familiar sensation acquired his attention, and he decided to interrupt his lordly duties for a more pressing concern.

The Shard of the Dry God was calling out to him.

Chapter One Hundred Ninety-Nine: 'The designs of the Disparate...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'That's everything,' said Emiliana. 'Did you get it all?'

Hector's pen was still scribbling. 'What was that last one again?'

'Ridgemark,' she said. 'A sunken cave near the two-toned rock.'

He nodded as he finished transcribing her words. 'What's a two-toned rock?'

'I don't know. I am just telling you what it said.'

'Hmm. Do you know where Ridgemark is, exactly?'

'I do, actually. I looked that up, too. It's a city on the southernmost coast of Vantalay. Near the Gulf of Vantalay.'

He added that to his notes. 'Thanks.'"

"1950

'Do you really think you will be able to find all of these things?' Emiliana asked.

Hector put his pen down. 'Ah... no, probably not. I expect we'll run into a lot of dead ends before anything pans out.'

'I suppose it simply depends on how good my information turns out to be,' she said.

'Fingers crossed...'

'Yes.'

Hector paused, considering how to transition into his next query. 'Ah... have you, er, discovered anything about the other stuff I mentioned before?'

'Not yet. You said that those subjects were not as much of a priority, did you not?'

'Yeah. It's just curiosity, right now.'

'...""Right now?"" Does that mean you expect your interest in them to eventually become MORE than curiosity?'

Boy, she sure knew how pick up on little things, didn't she? On impulse, he wanted to tell her that she was reading too much into his words, but... she wasn't, and he knew it.

'It's possible,' he told her. 'At this point, I honestly don't know what I expect the future to bring. It seems like a thousand different things could happen--or none of them.'

'I see. So in other words, this interest of yours in ancient gods and peoples is not merely academic?'

'Yeah.'

'...Dare I ask why?' she said.

'Uh. Well. If you really want me to explain, I will. But it's a long story--and probably pretty confusing.'

'Hmph. I have time, right now. And compared to the tomes I've been trying to read lately, I'm sure your tale will be much easier to understand.'

Tomes? Had she been reading physical books for all this research? Hector supposed that wasn't surprising. Abolish probably had loads of libraries. But considering how tight-lipped she'd been about her circumstances so far, that sliver of confirmation almost felt like a slip up on her part.

He didn't want to draw attention to it, though."

"1951

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Alright, well, it started when we went to the Undercrust...'

And Hector told her all about his time in Himmekel. She had several questions, especially about Malast and Ettol, and he wasn't able to answer any of them. That was why he had asked her to look into those names, after all. If nothing else, his story seemed to provide her with extra motivation to do so.

He told her about the ""tournament"" as well, and the mayhem that ensued during it, particularly at the end.

'Ah, so that was why you wanted to know more about worms,' she said. 'You were fighting one.'

Hector tilted his head as he thought back. 'I told you that at the time, didn't I?'

She gave a telepathic giggle. 'You were quite cagey about it at first, but yes, you did. You yelled it at me, actually.'

'Oh yeah...' He was about to apologize for that when he remembered something else. 'And you laughed at me.'

'Hehe.'

She'd already said once before that she was sorry for laughing at him back then, but hearing her tone now as she apparently recalled it, Hector wasn't so sure he believed that anymore.

Not that it actually bothered him, of course. If anything, he was a bit relieved to hear her laugh. Most of the times when they talked, she'd seemed rather somber. A few of those times, he'd even been able to feel her sorrow through the Shards.

Which was another subject that he was reluctant to bring up. So he chose not to.

'Well, I wish you luck with your search for money,' she said. 'I hope my research bears fruit. I will try to contact you again with more information in a few days.'

'Thanks for doing this.'

'Not at all. If I am not able to make myself useful, I fear I might go crazy in this place.'

At that, Hector was tempted to pry a bit more into her circumstances, but he resisted. It seemed like she was in a relatively good mood, and he didn't want to risk spoiling that for her. He got the impression that this strange relationship with her might be extremely important in the future. So he really didn't want to fuck it up."

"1952

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

He was trying to think of something else to tell her that might make her happy. He'd never felt like the best purveyor of 'good news,' but there had to be something, right?

'...Uh. Y-your dad seems to be doing better.'

'Oh? How so?'

'When we were training earlier today, he was actually kind of nice to me.'

'Hmm. Is he not normally nice to you?'

'Ah. Uh. Well. Not exactly, no. Not that I mind. He's my teacher, so it's good that he's strict. It's just--er... He seemed like he was in a good mood today.'

'I see.'

Hector wondered if that had made her feel any better. He couldn't tell.

'By the way,' said Emiliana, 'have you ever heard of something called ""Sto?""'

'No. What's that?'

Apparently, it was a meditation technique that Gohvis, of all people, had taught her about.

Hector didn't know all that much about mutation, so he took the opportunity to ask questions. When Garovel had first described it to him, the mutation type had sounded like quite a horrible power to have, and judging from all that Emiliana had gone through--and was still going through--Hector's opinion of mutation didn't really change all that much.

But it was a relief to know that she was getting a handle on it, at least.

And a part of him did find it fascinating, to be sure. Altered states of consciousness? Tapping into hidden areas or features of the brain? What a wild concept.

'I don't know if any of this will be useful for a non-mutator,' said Emiliana, 'but I thought that it couldn't hurt to tell you.'

'Hmm.' It was giving him ideas, to be sure, but after hearing her say that, maybe he shouldn't get his hopes up. After a moment, though, another thought struck him. 'Hey, uh... have you noticed anything different about your ability to concentrate, lately?'"

"1953

'Um, now that you mention it,' said Emiliana, 'I suppose I have. Why do you ask?'

'Malast told me that I was already in possession of a blessing called Focus. I'm not entirely clear on what it does--or what it MIGHT do in the future, I guess--but, uh... I'm pretty sure it helps me concentrate on multiple things at once.'

'I... see.'

'And I definitely got it from Rasalased. So I'm pretty sure you got it, too.'

'Um. I suppose that explains...' She paused. 'Wow. And here I was, beginning to feel like such a smarty pants, when in reality, my brain had been hacked.'

'That's... I mean... hmm. I don't know if ""hacking"" is the best way to think of it.'

'No? You don't think Rasalased hacked our brains and toyed around with them?'

'Well. Sure. But... a blessing sounds like a perfectly reasonable term for it, to me. I mean, has it been anything but helpful, so far? If not for Rasalased, I'm pretty sure I'd be dead by now.'

'You are very optimistic, aren't you?'

Hector's eyes widened a little, and he snorted. 'You'd be the first to think so.'

'Mm.'

'But that reminds me,' said Hector, 'Malast granted me a second blessing, which I know even less about than Focus. He called it Domain. If you could find out more about that--anything at all--I'd really appreciate it.'

There came a dainty sigh through the Shard. 'Despite no longer attending school, I seem to be acquiring quite a lot of homework...'

He breathed a half a laugh. 'Ah--sorry. It's not urgent or anything. I can probably figure it out on my own. You don't have to look into it if you don't want to.'

'It's fine. I'll tell Chergoa to remind me about it later. Domain, was it?'

'Yeah. And thanks. Again.'

'Mm.'

Hector felt a fleeting surge of embarrassment, and it took him a second to realize that it wasn't coming from himself but rather through the Shard.

'Oh no,' she said. 'I think I'm beginning to pick up Gohvis' mannerisms.'

Hector just kind of pursed his lips as he tried to imagine that."

"1954

Their conversation didn't last much longer after that. Hector went back to checking in on Warrenhold's facilities.

Everything seemed to be going smoothly, for the most part. The kitchens were bustling with cooks. Deliverymen were arriving with food and supplies. Children were playing in the central courtyard. All the underground lights were still working. No one was getting attacked by bloodthirsty monsters or murderers.

That was pretty much all Hector wanted, when it came down to it. Everyone safe and fed.

But there was more to it, of course. The reconstruction effort was progressing at a remarkable pace now with so many of the Rainlords pitching in--and not just the ones who were servants, either. They had a few planners, organizers, and designers offering their expertise, as well. There'd been some disagreements a few days ago between the old crew and some of the Rainlords, but as far as Hector could tell, they'd sorted things out now, which was nice to see.

Either that, or they were just pretending to get along whenever he was around. That seemed quite possible, too. But maybe if he was around often enough, they would have to pretend to get along so much that they eventually would.

Whatever the case, they were already approaching the end of the renovations on the Entry Tower, and smaller teams had already branched off to begin working on the Bell Tower. Prevailing wisdom seemed to be that if Warrenhold ever came under attack, then a functional Bell Tower would be the next most valuable thing to have after a defensible Entry Tower.

Hector knew that he had one Rick Cortes to thank for much of the progress they were making. The man was a carpenter with some twenty years of experience under his belt, and being the husband of Zeff's sister, Joana, seemed to afford the guy an extra level of clout as well."

"1955

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Rick and Joana's six children had been of particular interest to Hector as well. Unlike him, they were the Elroys' actual cousins, and Hector occasionally saw them playing with Marcos and Ramira.

As of late, Garovel had been paying especially close attention to that family's circumstances and had since come to learn quite a lot about their history. Apparently, the reason they and the Elroys had so many kids was because they were trying to reinvigorate their bloodline after their near extinction some twenty-five years ago. It was a touchy subject, according to Garovel, but one that had obviously affected the Rainlords of Sair quite deeply. Hector had heard similar tales from the other houses as well, but that one sounded like it was perhaps the worst one in recent memory.

Beyond that, however, there was also the matter of Selena Cortes and her reaper, Ojarea.

Thus far, Hector hadn't seen very many instances of a genuinely worrying servant-reaper relationship. Sure, there were plenty of reapers who talked loads of shit about their servants--hell, that even seemed to be the norm--but there was almost always a playful or affectionate undertone in their words.

Not so with Selena and Ojarea.

After he'd relayed his concerns to Zeff about the two of them, Hector had yet to see Selena and Ojarea together again. According to Garovel, both Houses of Cortes and Elroy were keeping them separate and under observation for the time being.

So when Hector happened to see Selena Cortes sitting on the steps of the Tower of Day with Ojarea floating over her, he was surprised. And somewhat concerned.

Garovel wasn't with him at the moment, so he informed the reaper of what he was seeing.

'Be right there. Let me find Joana first.'

Hector noticed Ojarea looking his way and decided not to just stand around until Garovel showed up."

"1956

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'Hello there, Lord Goffe,' said Ojarea as he approached.

Selena looked up at him with apparent surprise but didn't say anything.

""Hello,"" said Hector, very calmly. He didn't have much justification for taking a suspicious or accusatorial tone, nor did he think that would be especially helpful even if he did. ""How are the two of you doing?""

'We're doing very well,' said Ojarea.

""Y-yes,"" said Selena. ""Thank you for asking.""

Hector just looked between them for a moment.

Garovel's private voice arrived from afar with more information. 'Apparently, they're being granted a bit of time together, today. Joana's decision.'

Hector was glad he hadn't said anything out of turn. He didn't quite feel ready to leave them alone just yet, though. ""Is... there anything I might be able to help with?""

And to his surprise, they both seemed to hesitate. It looked like they might be exchanging words privately, but of course, there was no way to tell.

Selena's eyes darted between the floor and Ojarea, before finally landing on Hector. ""We have been having a--""

'Selena, don't trouble him.'

""He asked, didn't he?""

'As a guest, you shouldn't trouble your host. And as a Rainlord, you--'

Hector chose to interject. ""It's alright."" He was trying to smile but probably not succeeding. ""Please, ah... tell me what's bothering you.""

After another few moments of timidity, Selena said, ""We are having... a bit of a disagreement.""

Hector expected Ojarea to chime in again, but she just floated there, her hollow eye sockets seemingly devoid of emotion.

""I... hate fighting,"" said Selena. ""I don't... I don't want to do it anymore. But Ojarea says that I--that I have to.""

Hector looked at the reaper again, but she didn't say anything. He took a moment to mull over Selena's words.

Thinking back, something seemed strange to him. Certainly, he remembered the instance where she'd apparently frozen up in the middle of the fight with the worm on the train and been yelled at by Ojarea here, but he also recalled an encounter with her slightly earlier, before that had actually broken out.

""When we spoke on the train, you seemed pretty eager to fight,"" he said. ""A little too eager, I thought...""

She averted her gaze and looked at the ground. ""That was just--I was... I was being foolish. I'd never been in a real battle before, and I thought--I was trying to... agh...""

"1957

Hector frowned as he listened. In his peripheral vision, he noticed Garovel hovering toward them from the direction of the Tower of Night.

""That monster was... just... so terrifying,"" Selena said, and Hector could see her hands trembling slightly. ""I never thought real combat would be that frightening. I... remember being so scared that I couldn't even move--or think. I just... it was..." She broke for a sigh. ""And then, later, there was the fight with that man... and he overwhelmed everyone so quickly. I thought we were all going to die..." She touched a hand to her forehead and shut her eyes.

What man was she talking about? Oh, it must've been Leo, Hector realized. Hmm.

Ojarea was just staring at him, waiting.

Garovel was present for the conversation now, but he remained quiet, perhaps sensing that it wasn't a good moment to intervene with greetings.

Hector considered his next words carefully. ""You're not wrong,"" he said. ""Real fights can be terrifying, even for servants.""

Selena looked at him with big, despondent eyes. ""I'm pathetic, aren't I?""

Hector's frown deepened. ""No, you're not.""

""I am,"" she said with surprising calmness, as if stating an obvious fact. ""Everyone else is so brave, but I..." She hesitated again. ""I've always been clumsy and weak. I thought that would change once I became a servant, but it hasn't, really. And on top of that, I just... I hate violence. I don't want to get hurt, of course, but I also don't want to hurt anyone else, either. Even if--even if they deserve it, I'm not sure I could--ah..." Her gaze returned to the ground.

Hector scratched his cheek with one finger as he thought. ""Well... that's okay, too.""

Selena looked up again, surprised.

"What?" said Ojarea.

""You do need to be able to defend yourself,"" said Hector. ""You're a Rainlord, after all. But... I also think there's a big difference between training to defend yourself and training to fight on the front lines."" He motioned around the main courtyard, toward the throngs of people bustling to and fro behind him. ""This is a group effort. The important thing is to contribute. And there are a lot of ways to contribute besides just fighting.""

"1958

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Selena stared at him. And after a few more moments, when she still hadn't said anything, Hector began to feel uncomfortable.

Ojarea, however, was not quite so speechless. 'Lord Goffe, I appreciate your attempt to provide Selena with encouragement, but I must disagree with you rather strongly on this point.'

Hector just waited for the reaper to explain.

'You speak of Selena taking on a more supporting role,' said Ojarea, 'but as a servant, not having her fight on the front lines would be a profound waste of a precious resource. Servants are not easy to come by, you know. And we have many non-servants who are perfectly capable of taking on supporting roles.'

Hector bobbed his head admissively. ""What you're saying makes sense... and I do think that you should try to make use of all the advantages of being a servant, but at the same time, is that really all there is to it?""

Ojarea's skeletal form shifted a little beneath her black shroud. 'What are you saying? Servants have a responsibility to protect others. Rainlord servants, even more so. You may not be a Rainlord yourself, but I thought you, of all people, would understand that much.'

""No, I get it,"" said Hector. ""Believe me, I do. But if you want to talk about managing resources, then... I mean, what if Selena, as a servant, is able to provide higher-quality support than a non-servant can?""

Ojarea's hollow gaze seemed to twitch, and she glanced at Selena. 'I find that unlikely.'

Garovel decided to chime in. 'Why?'

But Ojarea made no response.

And Hector was left to wonder. With what little else he knew about their relationship, he couldn't help thinking that perhaps Ojarea didn't have much faith in Selena's overall competency--and that she didn't want to come right out and say so.

'I agree with Hector,' said Garovel. 'Take your time and look around Warrenhold--REALLY look around it, I mean. Every facility in this place is meant to provide support in one way or another. And yes, some of those facilities are in shambles or barely functional at the moment, but that doesn't mean they won't become important or valuable in the future. One day, perhaps the Book Tower over there or the Bell Tower next to it might become the difference between life and death for someone here.'"

"1959

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'Hmph.' Ojarea did not look pleased. 'What, are you advising her to become a librarian or a bell keeper?'

'I wouldn't presume to tell her or her family what path she should pursue,' said Garovel. His gaze became fixed upon Selena, who seemed to be hanging on his every word now. 'But I would also remind her and them that, once upon a time, long ago, the world was full of warriors and not much else. And it was an absolutely miserable place to live.'

Hector could all but see the gears turning in Selena's head. Or maybe that was just wishful thinking. He hoped she would take Garovel's words to heart.

Ojarea was watching Selena's face as well. '...We shall take your words under advisement,' the reaper said. She turned to Hector. 'Both of you.'

'What is her ability, if you don't mind my asking?' said Garovel.

'Oxygen materialization,' said Ojarea.

Hector's brow receded a little. That sounded like it could be quite powerful, if harnessed well. And thinking about it like that, he suddenly understood Ojarea's point of view even more than he did before. Not putting a power like that to use in combat did seem like a bit of a waste.

But it didn't change his mind. He stood by what he'd said wholeheartedly.

Garovel elected to remain silent as well, which made Hector wonder if he was thinking the same thing.

As the silence drew out, Selena's eyes moved from Garovel to Hector, then lingered there. ""I'm sorry for taking up so much of your time,"" she said. ""Thank you for listening. You've given me a lot to think about."" She gave a small curtsy before turning and walking away, with Ojarea bidding farewell and following.

Hector just watched them go."

"1960 -- CC.

Chapter Two Hundred: 'The Horror at Bellvine...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...89 years ago...

The reports had been curious, to say the least. Livestock going missing. Strange lights in the night sky. Rumors of ""inhuman creatures"" skulking around the city.

But none of that was why Parson Miles had bothered to come investigate the quiet Stecatti town of Bellvine in person.

No, the only reason he was here was because of a report about an ""unidentified black goo.""

His peers in the Vanguard hadn't thought much of it, of course. A black goo? It was probably just a bit of spilled oil or some such thing, they'd said. Why was he even pointing it out? Everyone knew that worms from the Undercrust couldn't survive on the surface.

They all just assumed that that was what he and Overra had been worried about. Worms. Of course.

But Parson hadn't forgotten that encounter he'd had in Calthos, nearly forty years ago now. He was not the same man that he was then, but he still remembered it as clearly as if it were only yesterday. A strange man, appearing in a dust storm, identifying himself as ""Ettol,"" and then disappearing amid a disturbing fountain of black and slimy vomit.

Parson had tried his damndest to find out more about who that person was or what had happened there, but all he'd managed to discover was that ""Ettol"" was the name of an Ancient Melmoorian trickster deity. And that wasn't much to go on.

So after deliberating on it a bit further, he and Overra decided to keep this investigation off the Vanguardian record books--for the time being, at least.

Instead, they decided to rely on their other friends for help. ""Ettol"" had inquired about them, after all, so perhaps they were the missing pieces that Parson had never wanted to use. With so many years gone by and nothing to show for it, his questions had never done anything but burn in the back of his mind.

And now, for the first time since they were bratty little war orphans in Melmoore, all three of them were going to be in the same place again. Parson, Damian, and Germal."

"1960 -- CC.

Chapter Two Hundred: 'The Horror at Bellvine...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...89 years ago...

The reports had been curious, to say the least. Livestock going missing. Strange lights in the night sky. Rumors of ""inhuman creatures"" skulking around the city.

But none of that was why Parson Miles had bothered to come investigate the quiet Stecatti town of Bellvine in person.

No, the only reason he was here was because of a report about an ""unidentified black goo.""

His peers in the Vanguard hadn't thought much of it, of course. A black goo? It was probably just a bit of spilled oil or some such thing, they'd said. Why was he even pointing it out? Everyone knew that worms from the Undercrust couldn't survive on the surface.

They all just assumed that that was what he and Overra had been worried about. Worms. Of course.

But Parson hadn't forgotten that encounter he'd had in Calthos, nearly forty years ago now. He was not the same man that he was then, but he still remembered it as clearly as if it were only yesterday. A strange man, appearing in a dust storm, identifying himself as ""Ettol,"" and then disappearing amid a disturbing fountain of black and slimy vomit.

Parson had tried his damndest to find out more about who that person was or what had happened there, but all he'd managed to discover was that ""Ettol"" was the name of an Ancient Melmoorian trickster deity. And that wasn't much to go on.

So after deliberating on it a bit further, he and Overra decided to keep this investigation off the Vanguardian record books--for the time being, at least.

Instead, they decided to rely on their other friends for help. ""Ettol"" had inquired about them, after all, so perhaps they were the missing pieces that Parson had never wanted to use. With so many years gone by and nothing to show for it, his questions had never done anything but burn in the back of his mind.

And now, for the first time since they were bratty little war orphans in Melmoore, all three of them were going to be in the same place again. Parson, Damian, and Germal."

"1961

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

He entered the old diner in the heart of town and only began to realize how hungry he was when the smell of freshly baking bread and pasta hit his nostrils. The welcoming staff greeted him, but Parson could already see where he was going to sit and politely refused their assistance.

The two men sitting at the far end of the room noticed him immediately, as did both of their reapers. With Overra following close behind, he walked right over to them. They had been playing cards while they waited, apparently.

Parson had last seen Germal only a few short years ago, but he hardly recognized him. That wasn't so surprising, though. Each time they'd met, Germal had always seemed like a different person. Some things never changed, Parson supposed. At least he wasn't trying to get them to call him by different names, anymore.

Damian, on the other hand, was the opposite in almost every respect. It had been decades since Parson had been able to meet him face-to-face like this, yet looking at him now, Parson could recognize him instantly. That strong chin and those thick, angular eyebrows were simply too distinct; and that perpetual scowl on his face might as well have been a signature.

""Gentlemen."" Parson tried to keep a perfectly stern face, as his mentor would, but it proved too difficult. Just seeing the both of them there, together, was more than enough to pull a smile out of him.

Germal flashed a grin in return. Were his teeth always so white? And that big, fluffy hat he was wearing--it was appropriate for the cold weather, sure, but Parson knew it was probably meant to conceal that horn on his head that always looked a little bit larger every time they met up.

Damian, however, scarcely even looked up from his cards. ""Germal's cheating.""

"1962

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""And how, exactly, am I cheating?"" said Germal. ""You're dealing, aren't you? And it's your deck of cards, isn't it?""

Damian just grumbled at him.

Parson pulled up a chair. ""Poker?""

""You want in?"" said Damian.

""Sure, as long we can get some food, too."" Parson waved the waitress over, and they placed their orders.

At the end of his very first hand, Parson found himself staring at a straight flush. He managed to get both of the other men to raise their bets twice that round before taking their money.

""You're cheating, too,"" said Damian.

Parson and Germal shared a laugh.

The reapers weren't talking much, likely because their reunion wasn't quite as momentous. Overra, Feromas, and Nerovoy had been in more regular contact with one another over the years. Those three were often the means through which the servants communicated with one another--and that was mostly due to their concerns over security. Letters and telegrams could be lost or intercepted, and the reapers still didn't fully trust telephones, despite the technology existing for over fifty years already.

Parson wanted to enjoy the company of his old friends a bit more before letting the conversation turn more serious, but as he was eating, he began to notice something.

""Germal,"" he said, eyeing the man more carefully this time. ""Are you feeling alright?""

Germal returned another smile, as innocuous as the last, but he seemed even paler than usual and beads of sweat had been gathering at the edges of his face for a while now. ""Heh. Yeah. I'm fine. Why do you ask?""

Overra answered for Parson. 'You look a bit ill.'

""Oh, it's just the nature of mutation,"" said Germal. ""Nothing to worry about.""

""You're sure?"" said Parson. ""I thought you had stopped struggling with your power decades ago.""

""For the most part, yes. But it still acts up from time to time--often whenever I visit new places.""

"1963

That response only made Parson more curious. ""Why would a new location have an impact on your power?""

Germal's smile slackened somewhat. ""That is a tough question. Even after all these years, I'm still not sure I fully understand it, myself. But I have always... resonated with the land, so to speak.""

Damian cocked an eyebrow. ""What does that mean?""

Germal set his cards down. ""Well, in the beginning, it meant that I was utterly miserable all the time. Much of that was because I simply could not control my mutations and had all but destroyed my own body, but even after getting a much better handle on my ability, I discovered that there was more to it than mere physical pain. There was something psychological beneath it. Spiritual, even.""

Parson and Damian exchanged glances as they continued to listen.

""The land breathes,"" said Germal. ""Wherever you go, you'll find something distinct. Even in places still untouched by humans. But there are some places where... I am not sure how to explain it, exactly, but... there are some places where I feel such a strong resonance that it affects me physically.""

""Hmm."" Parson set his cards down, too, and leaned forward to place his elbows on the table. ""And you have no idea what causes this 'uncommonly strong resonance' of yours?""

""I didn't say that,"" said Germal. ""I believe I have some notion of what might be behind it.""

""Well, don't keep us waiting in suspense,"" said Damian.

""Ancient monuments, of a particular sort,"" said Germal. ""Statues or monoliths that, for whatever reason, have a power to them--a power which has seeped into the land over time, altering its breath. Its resonance.""

Parson had always known that Germal's power was odd, but hearing all this now was still fairly surprising to him, and he wasn't sure what to think.

""You tellin' me you're some kinda ultra-tree-hugger?"" said Damian.

Germal snorted a laugh. ""Of a sort, perhaps.""

"1964

Parson was too preoccupied with his thoughts to be amused by the other men's conversation. Germal's power resonated with the land and monuments of ancient power, eh? Thinking back to his encounter with Ettol, Overra had mentioned something about Ettol using a long-forgotten name for the region at the time.

And taken in combination with everything else Ettol had said, it seemed clear to Parson now that Germal must have been the one that the mysterious man had been searching for.

But what did that mean in regard to their present circumstances? In regard to this town? This whole area?

Parson was beginning to get a bad feeling.

But why, exactly?

Perhaps because he had only meant to come here in order to investigate. In the back of his mind, he'd hoped to encounter the mysterious Ettol another time and hopefully discover some answers to his long-lingering questions, but he still had a vague instinct in the pit of his stomach that was telling him that he shouldn't give Ettol what he wanted, that he shouldn't allow his friends here to meet him.

That could've just been paranoia, though. As a servant, he was getting old. That was becoming an increasingly greater concern.

And yet... something about Germal's explanation just now was really starting to bother him. If Germal's power was linked with the very land itself, then... wasn't that an unprecedented risk factor? Parson had never even heard of a servant ability working like that before.

...What if they had made a mistake? Could the mere act of coming here have been foolish? Sure, it had been forty years, but... what if this was a trap?

Looking at Germal's face now, though the man may have been laughing at the moment, the sweat droplets on his face only seemed to be multiplying. And that paleness...

Parson stood up from the table, drawing looks from both men and all three reapers.

""Something wrong?"" said Damian."

"1965

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""I think we should leave,"" said Parson.

""Hmm?"" Damian sat back in his chair. ""We just got here.""

""I know,"" said Parson. ""But Germal's condition concerns me. And if it's because of the location, then let's quit this place for the time being and gather more intel, first.""

His old friends seemed uncertain, but they also began gathering themselves up to leave.

That was, until, Germal froze in place, wide-eyed and stuck like a statue.

Parson and Damian both stopped and stared at him, then looked to the man's reaper, Nerovoy.

'Germal,' the reaper tried, to no avail.

Parson touched Germal's shoulder and shook him. ""Hey.""

Still no response. And the sweat on the man's face was stronger than ever.

""Damian."" Parson's voice held the urgency of a command under it, and Damian seemed to understand.

Together, they scrambled to pull Germal out of his seat and carry him out of the restaurant. People were gawking at the scene they were making, but Parson was beyond the point of caring about that now.

""The hell's wrong with him?"" said Damian.

'I don't know,' said Nerovoy. 'I've never seen him react like this.'

Once they were outside, they started toward Damian's vehicle. Parson had brought a horse, still preferring them to automobiles, but he wasn't about to argue when the vehicle was closer and roomier.

Before they could reach it, however, Germal spasmed violently and slipped out of both their grips. The man caught himself on the ground with all four limbs and just remained that way, his head swiveling around like an animal looking for something.

""What the--?! Hey!"" Damian was about to walk up to him when Parson held out a hand in front of him.

""Careful,"" said Parson. ""Be mindful of the reapers' safety, before everything else.""

And indeed, the three of them were crowding around Damian and Parson now.

'I am sensing something VERY strange,' said Feromas.

""No shit,"" said Damian.

'I sense it as well,' said Overra.

'Same here,' said Nerovoy. 'It's--it's quiet. Subtle. As if it's been here the whole time but I'm only now realizing it. And it's... it's...'

'Everywhere,' finished Overra."

"1966

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Parson hardly needed them to tell him that something was wrong here. He could sense it himself--physically, even. The air was different. Heavier. Thicker. And this sound. Like that of rushing water, perhaps.

Dark splotches began to appear on the ground, pools of black, as if the remains of a dark rain that had never come. They were small at first but spread quickly, staining the earth.

And from the nearest one, arrived something almost inexplicable to Parson's eyes.

A dark rainbow. Swirling and visibly confusing. But it seemed to have a shape. Like an arm reaching up out of the ground. It gripped the solid ground outside of the dark splotch and pulled itself up, retrieving more of its shape, revealing a larger, more beastly figure--yet still fully covered in the rainbow.

Everyone backed away from it, even Germal who was growling like an animal now.

But much to their surprise, as soon as the beastly rainbow form finished clawing its way out of its murky pit, it collapsed onto the ground.

Was it breathing?

It seemed to be. And quite heavily, too. As if it were exhausted.

Germal, meanwhile, was still on all fours and growling.

Parson was so baffled that he didn't even know where to begin asking questions or who might even possess answers.

Then the rainbow moved, but the figure it was attached to did not. Its dark swirls slid down the beastly form like oozing paint, and the monster beneath it was revealed more clearly.

A giant wolf? Silver gray fur. It merely lay there, not moving, aside from its barrel-sized chest as it was panting.

Inexplicably, Germal started barking at it. Or was he barking at the rainbow ooze? Parson had no idea.

The ooze was still moving, though. Even after dripping off the dog completely, Parson could see it pulsing and twitching erratically on its own."

"1967

Germal was backing away from the scene, even as he continued barking. Parson was inclined to follow his lead on this one.

Without warning, the rainbow slime jolted straight toward Germal.

Damian, however, intervened. From too far away, he threw a punch with his right fist, and an invisible impact bridged the distance and blasted a massive chunk of the slime before it could touch Germal.

'Why is it going after him?' said Nerovoy.

The question went unanswered as a separate chunk of the slime leapt toward Germal from another angle.

Parson was the one to stop it this time, with a soaring blade of wind that he'd sacrificed the skin of his left forearm to create.

The different bits of ooze all bristled with seeming frustration for a moment, then started moving towards one another again, perhaps trying to recompile.

'Kill it,' said Feromas with commanding force, grabbing Damian's shoulder. 'Do whatever you have to do.'

Parson felt Overra grab his as well, and the regenerative vigor flowed through his body.

Perhaps sensing the danger, however, the ooze burrowed suddenly underground, causing cracks and tremors beneath their feet with increasing force.

Parson saw the cracks grow suddenly in the direction of the restaurant they had just left, and scarcely a moment passed before the foundation of the entire building shifted. A few shrieks rang out from the people still inside.

""Stay with Germal!"" shouted Damian. And without waiting for a response, he bounded into the building.

More shouts and even more violent tremors erupted, and the building shifted again, this time shattering all of its windows and causing the walls to buckle.

Parson placed himself in front of Germal, who for whatever reason had finally stopped barking.

Then Damian came crashing back out of the building through a wall. A young woman was in his arms, one of the waitresses, Parson recognized. Damian managed to land on his back instead of her."

"1968

And abruptly, the tremors stopped. Complete quiet arrived, save only for the panicked and terrified breaths of the woman in Damian's care.

Parson waited. A part of him wanted to just attack the ruined building with every blade of wind that he could create, but the thought of hitting the civilians inside stopped him.

But then those same civilians began to appear from the rubble, crawling out from under the collapsed roof or climbing atop it or emerging from behind a half-destroyed wall.

And they were not as they should be.

Even if he didn't pay attention to their abnormal movements or their too-still faces, Parson could sense something inherently wrong with their souls.

They were missing.

Whatever these creatures were, they were not the people who had been in that building a few minutes ago.

The reapers could tell something was wrong with them, too, and tried to warn their servants, but Parson was too focused on what these soulless husks were doing to listen.

The husks all lunged toward them in unison.

Parson and Damian smacked them all down without much difficulty, but they refrained from using deadly force. Whatever was happening here, these were still, seemingly, innocent people. Even if their souls were missing, perhaps they could be recovered in some way.

That was what Parson's Vanguardian instincts were telling him, and he was glad to see that Damian was apparently thinking something similar.

When the tremors returned, however, so did the rainbow ooze from beneath the cracks in the ground. And when it began to slather itself all over the soulless husks, everything that Parson had just been thinking went out the window.

The husks changed. Their bodies contorted impossibly. Grotesquely. And they grew. As big as gorillas. New limbs sprouted from their backs or even their necks. Their heads twisted and twitched, some splitting a part and becoming two or even three.

The rainbow's swirling colors seemed to melt away into nothingness, but in their wake, their work was apparent. New faces were there on the husks, but not on their heads. On their bulging stomachs. On their extra-jointed legs. Or their torn-open arms."

"1969

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

For a few horrible moments, Parson could only stare, eyes wide with disbelief. This couldn't be real. It was impossible.

And yet, it was also somehow... familiar.

He had glimpsed similar forms before with his waking eyes. Forty years ago. In the infinite infinities of Chaos itself.

They had been only fleeting images at best, but he was recalling them clearly now.

Madness.

He remembered, too, being underwhelmed. He remembered thinking that such impossible things couldn't touch reality, couldn't affect it any way.

Ha.

He'd been a fool.

The distorted husks all began moving at once, completely unlike their previously human selves. They leapt or crawled or scuttled to and fro-- but it was clear enough that they were all coming for the trio again.

Parson and Damian did not hold back this time.

The nearest one exploded into meaty chunks as Damian pointed at it with a fist, and the one next to it was shredded to pieces by a flurry of wind blades. A dozen more were still coming as the two men stood back to back with only Germal between them on the ground.

Parson, for his half of the enemies, sacrificed most of his left arm in order to summon a small tornado. He didn't want to make it too large, else it would disrupt whatever Damian was doing. And the abominable husks all had an obvious heft to them, so the tornado didn't have enough power in it to send them flying--but it did have enough to slow them down.

He could see them struggling to summon various counterattacks of their own--flames from one of their many mouths or bolts of crackling blue energy or even bubbling green acid.

He didn't intend to give them the opportunity to use any of that.

'Rozum,' he thought.

And Overra obliged."

"1970

The pan-rozum merge provided him with more than enough control to manipulate the tornado that he'd previously created. He was therefore able to dive headlong into it without having to worry about the winds slowing him down like the husks.

He blitzed cleanly through the roaring maelstrom as quickly as one might blink, and in rapid succession, he crushed each of the disfigured abominations into the ground with a bone-breaking blow straight to their skulls.

Within seconds, his work was done, and he and Overra separated again so as not to let pan-rozum keep draining their collective stamina.

It looked like Damian was just about finished as well, though his work was far messier.

Germal, meanwhile, was still on the ground and shaking his head.

Parson was just waiting for the rainbow ooze to reappear so that he could obliterate it with his most powerful attack. The Instant Air Burst. It would require sacrificing almost all of the flesh in his body, but pan-forma could fix that in no time, and Overra was still attached to his back, ready to activate it.

What happened next, however, completely disrupted his plans.

Overra gasped with sudden panic and activated pan-forma without asking. 'The Mad Demon!'

'Wh--?!'

That was all the warning the reaper managed to give him before the ground beneath everyone's feet erupted with the force of a volcano.

Parson was sent tumbling through the air, completely confused and disoriented. He thought he saw the rainbow again in all the mayhem. It wasn't until he transfigured oxygen all over his body that he managed to catch himself in midair and reassess the situation.

And indeed, it was true.

From his position in the sky, looking down on the smoldering crater where the restaurant and surrounding property used to be, Parson saw the man standing there amidst the smoke--the man whose face he had only ever seen in wanted posters among the Vanguard.

The Mad Demon himself. Morgunov.

The rainbow ooze was wrapped around his arm, thrashing wildly as if to escape his clutches, while Morgunov just seemed to be calmly inspecting it and smiling."

"1971

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Parson tried to think. The Mad Demon was here--quite possibly the most dangerous person on the planet. What was the best way to handle this development? Did Morgunov know who he was? That he was Vanguard? Would it be better to just flee?

Damian just ignored all of those concerns and called out to him. ""Morgunov! What the hell are you doing here?!"" Somehow, he sounded more like he was talking to a child than to his superior officer. ""Don't tell me you were following me again!""

""Okay, I won't tell you!"" said Morgunov, not bothering to remove his gaze from the slime.

Germal seemed to be regaining his senses, Parson noticed.

Parson was reluctant to get any closer to the Mad Demon, so he decided to move toward Germal instead.

""You can't keep doing this,"" Damian said, having walked right up to him. ""I told you. I need my space.""

""Aw, don't be like that,"" said Morgunov. ""I was just concerned for your well-being, my boy.""

""Yes, well, as you can see, I'm perfectly fine.""

""Hmm, I'm not so sure you are. You wouldn't have allowed me to follow you if you were in top form."" With his free hand, Morgunov touched Damian's forehead. ""You're not coming down with something, are you?""

Damian batted him away. ""Stop that. You're being ridiculous.""

""Silly boy. Just because you're a servant doesn't mean you're immune to sickness.""

""Um. Yes, it does.""

Morgunov just stared at him for a second. ""Oh, yeah, I guess you're right. But hey, you should still be careful. What if someone engineered a new disease that specifically targets servants, huh? Where will you and all of your certitude be then, huh?""

Damian's expression was flat. ""And who would do such a thing? Other than you?""

""What, I don't count?"" said Morgunov. ""I could betray you at any time, you know. Why, perhaps I'll use this technicolor puke here to achieve some nefarious end. You can never be too careful, Damian. Why aren't you wearing the mittens I made for you? They'll help keep the germs at bay, you know. Especially in this cold.""

"1972

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Damian ignored the question and asked his own. ""You say you were worried about me, but I was hardly in any danger. Why did you really decide to show yourself?""

Morgunov's smile became briefly manic in that infamous way. ""I was planning to just observe from afar, but when this little guy appeared, my curiosity was piqued."" The rainbow slime was slapping him in the face with enough force to create ground-shaking impacts, but it didn't seem to be bothering him in the slightest. ""I'll admit, I was worried that you and your friends here were going to destroy it without even bothering to analyze it first! Which would've been so heartless of you! I mean, just look at how cute it is!""

The ooze manifested a sudden mouth and hissed at him.

""Ehehe. What should I call you? Binky? Slime-o? Stretchy McJeffy?""

Parson was helping Germal to his feet, finally, but he was still wary of moving any closer to Morgunov. Maybe it didn't matter at this point, but frankly, he was at a loss for what to do now.

Damian and Feromas seemed to be having a silent conversation, but it was again Damian who decided to speak up. ""That thing was trying to kill us.""

""You don't know that,"" said Morgunov. ""Maybe Slime-o just wanted some attention.""

It latched onto his face.

Morgunov grabbed it with his other hand and squeezed it like a balloon before yanking it off again. ""Some face-hugging attention. But isn't that what we all want, at the end of the day? I don't see what's so wrong about it.""

""It kept attacking us,"" said Damian. ""And I'm certain it was trying to touch my friend over there.""

And Morgunov's gaze finally turned to Parson and Germal. ""Mhmm. And just who are these friends of yours, by the way?"" Somehow, the man's smile only ever seemed to widen. ""Introduce me, why don't you?""

Did he really not know? Parson had to wonder. He certainly didn't know the Mad Demon like Damian did, but it didn't seem unlikely that the man might decide to play dumb on any number of different subjects."

"1973

Apparently, Damian had been thinking the same thing. ""Don't act like you don't already know. I'm sure you know exactly who they are.""

""Hmm."" Morgunov turned slowly toward Damian and, with an abrupt flatness, said, ""Perhaps I just wanted to know if you would try to lie to me again.""

At that, Damian seemed to lose most of his fervor, and Parson could feel a physical difference in the environment. The upturned earth all around them shifted beneath the extra weight in the air. Even the slime on Morgunov's arm settled down.

Without moving his head, Morgunov's silver-gray eyes shifted to Germal. ""You. You are one of the Monster's men, are you not?""

""I am."" Germal looked perfectly calm, at least.

Morgunov spared a glance for Parson as well but chose not to address him and returned to Germal. A morsel of his earlier cheer found his face again. ""What does Slime-o want with you?""

""I have no idea,"" said Germal.

""Hazard a guess, then,"" said Morgunov.

Germal opened his mouth but apparently didn't know what to say. He looked to Nerovoy for help, then to Parson.

Parson wished he hadn't done that, because it made Morgunov look in his direction, too.

""Do you know something?"" said the Mad Demon.

Parson clenched his jaw, trying to think.

The silence only seemed to amuse Morgunov. ""Come now, General Miles. Your hesitation does a disservice to the Vanguard's reputation.""

Parson struggled not to scowl.

""What would your Lawman think if he was here? I imagine he would be embarrassed by his pupil, hmm?"" The Mad Demon smiled wide again. ""Or do you think he, too, would be afraid?""

'Parson,' came Overra's private voice.

He didn't need her to say anything more. He knew what she was warning him against. No matter how much he cared for Lamont as his mentor, he wasn't about to let this bastard goad him into reacting stupidly."

"1974

At the same time, however, Parson didn't know how he was supposed to avoid Morgunov's questions. He very much did NOT think it was a good idea to share his encounter with Ettol. There was no telling what the Mad Demon would do if he knew that Germal was supposedly ""a key unto Chaos,"" as Ettol had claimed.

""Not very cooperative, eh?"" said Morgunov. ""Well, I can't say I'm surprised. I suppose I could just force you to tell me, but..."" His gaze returned to the slime. ""How about you, Slime-o? Do you know anything useful?""

It shivered visibly.

""Don't be scared. Share with me all your secrets, and you'll see just how kind I can be."" He held the slime up to his head, right by his ear. ""Here. I'll make it easy for you.""

Still, it just sat there, shivering.

""Go on. I know you're tempted. Show me what a Primordial is really capable of, why don't you?""

The slime stopped suddenly, then bristled one more time. It launched itself against Morgunov's head and started struggling there.

Parson squinted as he watched, unsure what was happening until he noticed that the slime was slowly shrinking.

It was disappearing.

Into the Mad Demon's ear.

Into his head.

Morgunov looked far from concerned, however. His eyes were alight with as much excitement as Parson had ever seen. ""Oh, wow! I see! Yes! So that's what you were hiding! Ooh, and I feel quite ill as well! I could yack at any moment! Amazing!""

Parson found the scene so repulsive that he thought he might vomit at any moment, as well.

But it was all he could do to watch and wait, for whatever happened next--for whatever Morgunov decided to do.

The Mad Demon's head twitched grotesquely as he eyed his own hands.

Then, the rainbow gradually began to appear again, as if melting out of his skin. But it didn't quite look like ooze or slime any more. It was more like just a coating around Morgunov's body.

Or a shadow, perhaps. One of many colors."
"1975

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Ehehe!"" Morgunov raised his hands towards the sky, and his laughter only seemed to heighten with each passing moment. ""Well, well, well! Isn't this just the greatest gift that a man of science could have ever asked for?! What have I done to deserve this?! Oh, magnificent God of All That Is Not! Have my sacrifices truly pleased you this much?! Rarely have I ever known humility in my life, yet even I can't help feeling unworthy of such love! Ehehe!""

Parson wished he were anywhere but here, right now. The man's laugh carried through the air, as if being amplified by the field density of his soul, and Parson could've sworn that the night sky was becoming even darker than it already was. The more he watched and the more he listened, the more he realized how terrifyingly accurate the moniker of ""the Mad Demon"" truly was.

""This wealth of knowledge is nigh unbearable!"" cackled Morgunov. ""Ignorant world! You leave me no choice! I must share it with you!"" He turned suddenly, and his gaze snapped to Germal. ""O, Heart's Trinket! I see your Path! Allow me to help you achieve Fulfillment!""

And in a flash of dark brown, Morgunov blinked out of existence, only to reappear with both hands already wrapped around Germal's head.

""What are you--?!"" The words died in Germal's throat and were replaced by a bloodcurdling scream.

""Yes! YES! See and understand, young one!""

Damian and Parson were both moving. Their friend's agony was proof enough that there could be no peaceful resolution to this situation, and it now seemed an insane notion to Parson that he ever humored the idea that there could be.

Whether they lived or died here--it mattered not. They could not stand idly by and watch."

"1976

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Parson loosed a surge of wind blades, but they broke harmlessly upon a sudden wall of red. And when the red vanished, Morgunov and Germal and Nerovoy were all gone, having blinked a dozen meters to their right.

Damian reacted first and attacked with an invisible impact. The red shade rose to Morgunov's defense again, but this time it buckled under the force of the blow.

Parson and Overra resorted to pan-forma once more and concentrated on increasing their speed. Multiple small jets of transfigured oxygen appeared on his back and behind each limb. He'd had considerable practice with this technique in the past and could now control it effortlessly even while being propelled along at speeds high enough to tear a normal body to shreds.

Parson launched another flurry of wind blades in advance as he dove straight toward Morgunov. They didn't do much, but they were just padding while he prepped a pressurized drill in place of his entire right hand. As soon as he was close enough, he would--

Morgunov caught him by the throat.

Parson found himself completely immobilized, though he couldn't tell precisely how. A swirl of colors flashed across his vision and when he looked at the drill that should have replaced his right hand, he instead found the limb replaced with something transparent.

Glass? He had a glass arm now?

He didn't get the opportunity to process what had happened before Damian barreled into the group, jostling Parson free of Morgunov's grasp but not Germal.

""Release him!"" yelled Damian with two voices.

""Ehehe! Calm down, dear boy! Your turn will come!""

""I said release him, Demon!""

Parson was on the ground, struggling to regain himself. Even with pan-forma making his regeneration almost instantaneous, the glass was getting in the way of his flesh regrowing properly--and even more of his body had been replaced by it than he'd first realized. Only his head, chest, and left arm were still flesh and blood. He had to break the glass to free himself."

"1977

By the time Parson was back on his feet, Damian was caught in Morgunov's shadowy grip as well. Most of Damian's body was glass, and Morgunov was holding his face with one hand and Germal's face with the other.

""Become as you were meant to be! See truth unlike you have ever known!""

Both of his old friends were screaming in agony, and so were their reapers.

Parson's most reliably powerful attack would require sacrificing most of his body, but the collateral damage might very well destroy the very people he was trying to save in the process. He had to do something else--and what came to mind in that moment was far riskier.

'Rozum,' he told Overra.

She melted out of his body for the briefest moment to deactivate pan-forma before returning to it and reactivating pan-rozum.

He wasted no time. His body divided in two, creating a second Parson.

But he doubted that would be enough. This was the Mad Demon they were dealing with. And they weren't likely to get another chance.

Parson demanded more. Difficulty be damned.

A third Parson. A fourth. A fifth. And finally, a sixth.

Six of himself. Six warriors of oxygen, manifested with pan-rozum.

It was so much information at once, overwhelming his mind even with Overra's help. But that hardly mattered now. He didn't need to know it all. He only needed to know his goal.

All six moved together. Three attacked the Mad Demon in unison directly. One grabbed Germal. One grabbed Damian. And the last stayed back, readying his most powerful attack--the same attack that he'd elected not to use with pan-forma a moment ago.

The Instant Air Burst.

As soon as the others were clear, the sixth clone would sacrifice its entire body to use it.

But Morgunov did not make it that simple, of course."

"1978

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 1 of 10)~~
The Mad Demon teleported again, and half of the Parsons accompanied him--the two trying to free Damian and Germal, along with one other who was clinging to Morgunov's back and trying to drill into it. The remaining three Parsons gave chase.

Morgunov jumped several more times before apparently realizing that the three clones clinging to him were not going to be thrown off. In another shadowy flash, the clone trying to free Damian was turned entirely to glass, but the one trying to free Germal actually succeeded.

""So many new powers!"" said Morgunov, teleporting again. ""So much to play with! It's almost too much! Even for me!""

With Parson and Overra's consciousness now divided between five bodies, it was relatively easy to track the Mad Demon's erratic movements.

It was not so easy to do anything about the multicolored swamp that kept expanding outward all around him. Two of the clones became quickly stuck, waist deep, and had to separate themselves at their torsos and retreat to the air with hovering tornadoes of oxygen. The clone on Morgunov's back had been swallowed almost immediately.

Germal and Nerovoy were both out cold, and one of the Parsons had to pick them up and carry them so that they didn't get swallowed by the swamp.

The four remaining clones all spread out, each finding a point of high ground to squat on--chimney, a pine tree, a tall boulder, and a rooftop. Parson and Overra's collective consciousness tried to reevaluate the situation as a sudden lull in the chaos arrived.

Damian and Feromas were still in Morgunov's grasp, but they were no longer screaming. Perhaps they had fallen unconscious like Germal and Nerovoy. What in the world had the Mad Demon done to all of them?

""Little Vanguardian!"" came the Demon's echoing call. He was high up in the air as well, propped up by a tower of rainbow shadows. ""Would you like to know the secrets of this world, too?! I am generous, but I am not sure I wish to share them with you, little Vanguardian! Perhaps if you show me that you are deserving, I might change my mind!""
"1979

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 2 of 10)~~
Parson didn't plan to take him up on that offer, but he was having trouble coming up with what to do, instead. Madly, he could sense Overra's thoughts humoring the idea. Perhaps whatever Morgunov had done to the others wasn't actually that bad. Perhaps Morgunov really was trying to help them in some strange way.

Those arguments only served to make Parson angry.

""Alas!"" shouted Morgunov. ""It seems our time together is at an end!""

Parson didn't know what he was talking about.

Then the rainbow shadows swirled one more time and vanished. Blinking? Teleporting?

When Morgunov had teleported every time previously, there had been the briefest flash of brown, but Parson hadn't seen that this time. And none of the Parsons could see where Morgunov had jumped to, either.

""Improve thyself!"" came Morgunov's voice again, seemingly disembodied. ""I will be taking my silly boy back with me, but I hope you and I will meet again, one day! Little Vanguardian! Ehehe! Until then, farewell!""

And Parson waited. And kept waiting.

Nothing happened.

He didn't understand. Why had he just left like that? Had the Demon sensed someone else approaching in the distance? And if so, who? Parson wasn't sensing anyone, even after all this time waiting.

But at length, he knew that if he remained in pan-rozum much longer, he would begin to lose himself. Parson and Overra chose the clone nearest Germal as the location of their split, and the other three Parsons all disappeared into whiffs of dematerializing oxygen.

The fatigue hit him immediately and strongly, but he knew there was much work still to be done. And he was worried that something else might--

""Just kidding."" Morgunov's whispering voice was right in his ear this time.

Without even a moment to think, Parson tried to wrench himself away from the voice, but it was too late. The Mad Demon's hand found his neck, and the swirling rainbow shadow turned him around to face Morgunov.

""I apologize for lying like that. Lying is such a base form of trickery--I know. But hey! If it works, it works, eh?! Ehehe!""

"1980

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 3 of 10)~~
Parson tried to speak, but the Mad Demon's hold on his throat was too strong. How did he have such strength? The man didn't have two voices. He didn't appear to be in a hyper-state. And his reaper, Bool, was nowhere to be seen.

Overra, however, could still talk despite her shadowy bindings. 'Explain yourself, Demon. What have you done to them, exactly? And why?'

""Hee-hee, so good of you to ask! Your curiosity speaks well of your worthiness! But that alone is not enough, I am afraid!""

'Then what must we do to prove ourselves?'

""A good question, hmm! Perhaps if--"" Morgunov cut himself off as his eyes locked with Parson's. He clicked his tongue before smiling in that horrible way again. ""No. You have already born witness, haven't you? To Chaos?""

He might've answered if his throat wasn't being crushed. For all this madman's ramblings, Parson felt as if he might actually know what Morgunov was talking about this time.

The Mad Demon laughed. ""Would you like to see it again?!"" Wide-eyed, he forced Parson to nod his head, treating him like a puppet. ""Oh?! Such courage! What's that, you say?! You aren't frightened at all?!"" He made Parson shake his head. ""My, my! Are you, perhaps, suggesting that you would like to do more than merely see it again?!""

Parson's mind was racing as Morgunov forced him to nod another time. He could of course transfigure his entire body at once, excepting only his brain. That was the one thing that a transfiguration user could not manipulate directly, and leaving Morgunov with his brain certainly wouldn't improve his circumstances--or Overra's, which was the real problem here. Even if he exploded his entire body and destroyed his brain in the blast radius, how would that help her? It could very well kill her.

Agh, and this fatigue. He could hardly think straight. What could be done? Were there truly no options?

""I admire your enthusiasm!"" Morgunov was saying. ""But witnessing Chaos is quite different from experiencing it, you know!"" He giggled and propped up Damian and Germal's limp bodies. ""Why, just ask them! When they wake up, of course!""

"1981

Parson tried to keep struggling against the shadow, but even that much effort was proving difficult for him. The energy just seemed to be draining out of him. Was his body being turned to glass again? He couldn't tell. Maybe it was just pan-rozum's aftereffects.

Whatever it was, he was losing hope by the second.

But Overra, bless her, was still trying.

"What is this Chaos you keep referring to?" she asked, sounding genuinely curious and quite calm somehow. Hell, maybe she really was both of those things, but Parson highly doubted it.

Reapers were like that, weren't they? Always desperately trying to talk their way out of a situation--and always trying not to sound desperate when doing so. Parson had learned that long ago.

""To attempt to explain Chaos would be doing it a profound disservice,"" said Morgunov. ""All that is not, all that may yet be--even all that should not be. Can you even begin to imagine that? I do not think--""

Morgunov's expression froze, and his mind abruptly seemed to be elsewhere.

Was he sensing something unexpected? Parson's own senses were too foggy to tell.

The Mad Demon turned around just in time to see a pair of open jaws, mere inches from his face. They had been halted by the rainbow shadow, apparently, and when they snapped shut, Parson recognized the silver fur of the giant wolf from earlier.

""Ah,"" said Morgunov, though he sounded considerably less jovial now. ""The Beast of Ardora. Still, you persist. But of course you do, hmm? The Prime Hunt must continue, mustn't it?""

The beast's growl had enough force behind it to make the surrounding shadows tremble.

""Do you even remember anything?"" said Morgunov. ""Or are you now a creature of instinct alone?""

The growl grew into a snarl, and this time, the shadows shuddered so strongly that the wolf was able to thrash itself free again."

"1982

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 5 of 10)~~
""Uh-oh!"" said Morgunov, too late but still smiling.

The beast's jaws found the man's shoulder and bit through it.

The attached arm had been holding Parson, and with it severed, he dropped to the rooftop below and rolled haphazardly down its wooden shingles, taking several with him. He tried to catch himself on the ledge, but the shingle that he grabbed just ripped free, and he went flying off.

He hit the already-broken ground with a thud and groaned as he tried to get his bearings back. The sense of urgency in the back of his mind spurred him on, despite his entire body protesting, and when he looked up, he saw Overra there. The wolf had freed her, too?

She melted into his body without a word, and he felt the hyper-state once more.

Not pan-rozum. They'd already stretched themselves to the limit with that one. But pan-forma was still doable.

Parson launched himself up into the air with legs of pure wind and reassessed the situation.

He was not prepared for what he saw next.

The wolf had grown to twice, or perhaps even thrice, its previous size. And its fur was even blacker than the night surrounding it. And moving. Almost like a shadow of its own.

The rainbow shadow raged even more wildly around Morgunov than it had before, but the beast was not being deterred. Parson could hardly believe his eyes, but it looked like the beast might've actually been pushing the Mad Demon back. Its hulking teeth and claws were tearing through the rainbow shade like so much paper. And... eating it?

Parson couldn't let himself remain awestruck, though. He may not have known the first thing about that monstrous dog over there, but he knew that he had to give it every bit of assistance possible."

"1983

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 6 of 10)~~
Catching up with them proved rather difficult with how fast they were both moving, and as he got closer, Parson began to notice greater and greater changes in the environment. The air was thicker, making it harder to breathe, and it felt like there was an electric charge gathering around him, too.

And his vision.

The ability to see souls was decidedly not helpful here. Wisps of souls--or at least, soul-like energy--could be found all around him, like fragmentary embers escaping a fire.

At first, he was horrified, thinking they were all souls belonging to the hapless citizens of Bellvine--hundreds, if not thousands of people being killed.

But that couldn't be it, he realized. The battle between Morgunov and the Beast was certainly razing the land all around them and leveling buildings like they were sand castles, but they simply weren't covering enough ground to have killed so many people in so short a time.

Which begged the question.

Where was all this soul power in the environment coming from?

Parson had only ever seen this phenomenon twice before--and both times, it had been when two emperors clashed.

He didn't get the opportunity to dwell on it, however.

Morgunov vanished underground, and a moment later, a chunk of landmass as big as a city block was cast into the air. Parson had to stop and throw himself out of its path, but even while it was still in midair, he caught sight of the wolf running horizontally across its uneven body as easily as water flowing over a rocky riverbed.

Parson decided to follow the wolf's lead. It seemed like it still had a perfect bead on Morgunov's location, regardless of all the obstacles and debris in the way.

Attacking the Mad Demon head on was obviously a bad idea, but if he could provide covering fire for the wolf from a distance, then perhaps that would be enough."

"1984

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 7 of 10)~~
Parson loosed a barrage of wind blades from his hands as he soared around Morgunov. The Mad Demon's arm had not grown back after being ripped off by the dog earlier, but it didn't seem to have slowed him down at all. Parson kept up the pressure while the dog torpedoded closer.

Just before impact, however, Morgunov decided to simply take Parson's attack and spun around to catch the wolf by its open and salivating jaws. The Beast tried to bite down, but the man's horde of shadows had a hold on it as well, so even with one hand, he was able to check the Beast's advance.

The wolf wasn't exactly stopping, though. His massive bulk still pushed Morgunov backward, digging into the earth when the emperor's legs didn't budge and carving out a visible path of destruction through Bellvine.

Parson hadn't expected his wind blades to do much, but the fact that Morgunov just ignored what little damage they had done was a problem. He needed to go stronger.

He readied the Instant Air Burst again as he tried to move in closer. Maybe this time, he'd actually get the chance to use it.

He could hear the Beast roaring again, and he could see the emperor's shade wavering as well, but at the end of the exchange, it was the wolf who went flying backward from a one-handed punch from Morgunov.

And even among the increasing number of shrieks from innocent bystanders, Parson heard that familiar cackle one more time.

""Ah, this is so wonderful! I haven't had a fight this messy in ages!""

Parson thought he saw his opening while Morgunov was busy prattling on. He narrowed the distance a bit more and then launched--

Something blindsided him and clobbered through a line of trees.

""No, no, little Vanguardian! You'll have to be sneakier than that!""

The Instant Air Burst was dropped from his thoughts again, and he tried to pick himself up off the ground.

""Wouldn't it be better if we had more playmates?"" said Morgunov.

""We shouldn't keep all the fun to ourselves!""

"1985

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 8 of 10)~~

At that, Parson expected to see Morgunov start turning the innocent bystanders into disfigured monsters, like the slime had done before, but that was not what happened.

Instead, entirely new monsters were starting to appear.

They came from the ground--or more precisely, from the black pools that the Mad Demon seemed to be summoning.

To Parson's disbelieving eyes, they were entirely inhuman. Impossible creatures. And not very alike in shape, either. Some were bloated, some were gangly. Some had far too many eyes, some had none at all. Some had several arms, some were just blobs. They didn't even all have heads.

The only shared feature among them seemed to be their sickly pale and gray skin, but even that had a degree of variation with spots, stripes, blemishes, spare hair, and probably more that Parson couldn't even see.

He was without words.

Was he really going to have to fight all these things? What were they?

However, as he was preparing himself for wherever this new nightmare was going to take him, the circumstances changed yet again.

Before any of the pale monsters climbed fully out of their black portals--or whatever the hell those were--they all stopped, frozen.

As did the Mad Demon, Parson noticed.

After a moment, the monsters all began to slink back down into the blackness below.

Morgunov clutched his head with his one hand. ""No!"" He dropped to his knees, trembling. ""Listen to me!""

By now, Parson's utter confusion had amplified a dozen times over.

But he wasn't about to waste an opening.

He readied the Instant Air Burst once more, trying to hurry while the Mad Demon just sat there, having of some sort of existentially psychotic breakdown.

And perhaps the fourth time was the charm, because to Parson's own amazement, the attack actually, finally connected."

"1986

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 9 of 10)~~
Ninety percent of his body was sacrificed to heighten the attacks explosive power, but pan-forma's improved regenerative effects could take care of that problem in a matter of seconds.

When the dust cleared, a crater stood where Morgunov had been. He looked around for any trace of the man. And after a few more seconds of not finding it, Parson began to wonder.

Could it really be? Was the Mad Demon gone?

Parson hardly allowed himself to breathe. He wasn't sensing anything. Just more terrified people fleeing. And the dog approaching.

And the slime.

It was there in front of him--or what was left of it was, at least. Its movements were sluggish now. Tired, perhaps. Parson had to wonder if slime could even feel exhaustion.

He took a deep breath, finally, and let his legs buckle while he considered what to do. He wanted to run and leave all this madness behind. He wanted to go grab his two unconscious friends and never look back.

And a rather large part of him was still waiting for Morgunov to pop up again out of nowhere.

But that didn't happen.

The Beast reappeared first, ambling nearer at a leisurely pace. Its hulking body had shrunk back to its comparatively smaller form, and its black fur had reverted to silver again.

Oddly enough, the dog's calm movements helped to confirm for him that Morgunov really was gone.

Not for good, of course, but Parson wasn't about to complain. It would've been downright incredible if he had been able to capture the Mad Demon's head at the end of that fight, but the more he thought back on how it had all gone down, the more certain he was that he had made the right call. If he'd tried to hold back even a little bit in order to prevent the Instant Air Burst from obliterating Morgunov's head, then there was a decent chance that the bastard might have lived it well enough to keep fighting.

Then again, maybe that was just his lack of experience talking. Lamont probably would have been able to capture him in that situation. Morgunov had all but offered himself up.

Parson sighed."
"1987

~~The Christmas Day Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 10 of 10)~~

Overra melted out of his body, ending the pan-forma merge, and yet another wave of fatigue washed over Parson. The reaper must've been feeling it, too, but she wasn't showing it.

'Hello,' she said to the giant wolf. 'Thank you for your help. I suspect my servant and I would be dead now, if not for you.'

That was an understatement, Parson thought. All of Bellvine probably would've been annihilated, though perhaps the Demon would've taken his time with that.

The Beast made no response. It only walked over to the pile of leftover rainbow sludge and gobbled it up.

Parson frowned. He would've like to have captured that stuff for study later.

The wolf licked its chops, threw them both a look, then lowered its butt and sat down. If not for its size, Parson might've mistook it for a regular old dog now.

'...Do you have a name? Mine is Overra, and this is Parson Miles. We are with the Vanguard.'

Still, the wolf said nothing.

Overra tried talking to it a few more times, but to no avail, and Parson was beginning to think the whole thing was a fool's errand. After a while, he decided to interrupt her.

'Overra,' he said, eyes still on the wolf.

'What?' she said in the echo of privacy.

'Are you sure that thing can even understand what you're saying?'

'I suppose not. You think I should try different languages?'

He rubbed his sore neck as he stretched it. 'Go ahead, but that wasn't what I was getting at.'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean, is that thing even a servant?'

She hesitated. 'Of course it is. Why wouldn't it be?'

Parson didn't have an explanation for her. Just a feeling that he couldn't quite articulate."

"1988 -- CCI.

Chapter Two Hundred One: 'The house of the hushed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was nice to be out on patrol. Hector hadn't had much time for it over the last few days. Between all the meetings, training, and maintenance around Warrenhold, he had started to wonder if he would ever be able to do this again.

Even now, he wasn't entirely on patrol. He was just sort of taking his sweet time as he went to look into something else. The fact that he was able to stop a burglary and a murder along the way was technically just a coincidence, though Hector had gone quite a bit out of his way to do so.

It was a bit annoying how every criminal just started running as soon as they saw him, but it also served as good practice for various mobility techniques that he'd wanted to try out. Flight, in particular.

Creating iron that could counteract gravity and support his weight was certainly doable, but exercising tight control over it was still rather difficult. And he was very hesitant about ramping up its speed in these situations. If he went too fast and accidentally barreled into someone while in full plate armor, that person would probably die.

When it came to dealing with normal human beings, he always tried to err on the side of caution, especially when practicing relatively new things. All of his really dangerous ideas, he intended to save for Zeff.

And possibly Asad.

The Najirs had left Warrenhold a few days ago now, but not without a promise to return soon. Hector got the impression that Asad's wife, Samira, had not found the underground castle to be a very pleasant place to stay. Whether that was because of all the Rainlords around or because all the construction going on was bothering her, Hector couldn't say.

Or maybe she just didn't like Warrenhold in general. It wasn't exactly a five-star resort.

Whatever it was, Hector tried not to take it personally. It was kinda hard, though. He hadn't been the Lord of Warrenhold for very long, all things considered, but he was already quite attached to it."

"1988 -- CCI.

Chapter Two Hundred One: 'The house of the hushed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was nice to be out on patrol. Hector hadn't had much time for it over the last few days. Between all the meetings, training, and maintenance around Warrenhold, he had started to wonder if he would ever be able to do this again.

Even now, he wasn't entirely on patrol. He was just sort of taking his sweet time as he went to look into something else. The fact that he was able to stop a burglary and a murder along the way was technically just a coincidence, though Hector had gone quite a bit out of his way to do so.

It was a bit annoying how every criminal just started running as soon as they saw him, but it also served as good practice for various mobility techniques that he'd wanted to try out. Flight, in particular.

Creating iron that could counteract gravity and support his weight was certainly doable, but exercising tight control over it was still rather difficult. And he was very hesitant about ramping up its speed in these situations. If he went too fast and accidentally barreled into someone while in full plate armor, that person would probably die.

When it came to dealing with normal human beings, he always tried to err on the side of caution, especially when practicing relatively new things. All of his really dangerous ideas, he intended to save for Zeff.

And possibly Asad.

The Najirs had left Warrenhold a few days ago now, but not without a promise to return soon. Hector got the impression that Asad's wife, Samira, had not found the underground castle to be a very pleasant place to stay. Whether that was because of all the Rainlords around or because all the construction going on was bothering her, Hector couldn't say.

Or maybe she just didn't like Warrenhold in general. It wasn't exactly a five-star resort.

Whatever it was, Hector tried not to take it personally. It was kinda hard, though. He hadn't been the Lord of Warrenhold for very long, all things considered, but he was already quite attached to it."

"1989

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

As for the meetings regarding the tentatively titled ""Bank of Darksteel,"" those had been progressing a bit as well. Hector was able to get a better picture of the kinds of people whom Amelia Carthrace was planning to bring on board to help manage the project; and thus far, Hector hadn't seen anything that discouraged him.

Other than, of course, the whole problem with lacking the necessary funding. But that was a different matter. And he and Garovel were working on it.

Right now, Hector's biggest concern was what he was going to do with Leo. The day when he was supposed to meet with that man again was fast approaching, and the last thing that Hector wanted to do was go in without a solid plan.

He was hoping that his task this evening might be able to offer some help on that front, but Garovel kept telling him not to get his hopes up too much.

Apparently, the address that the reaper was leading him to was part of an ongoing investigation for the Gray Rock Police Department.

'There's been a string of rather mysterious deaths over the last several years,' the reaper had told him before they set out. 'And do you remember that guy whose drink was laced with potassium cyanide?'

'Yeah?'

'Well, he didn't die, thanks to you, so the police haven't quite put the pieces together on this yet, but I suspect that was meant to be another person along that string.'

'...Are you talking about a serial killer, Garovel?'

'Mm, possibly, but no, I don't think so.'

'Then what do you think is behind these mysterious deaths?'

'Well, I don't know, Hector. That's why we're investigating further. I think the police could do with some more clues on this one.'

Beyond that, the reaper hadn't been able to provide him with much more information. Hector was starting to worry that this whole ""case"" would ultimately turn out to be some kind of dead end or otherwise not worth his time, but at least it gave him an excuse to go out on the town for a while.

When they arrived at their destination, Hector wasn't sure what to think. It was a large house surrounded by a tall gate, and in the pale moonlight of the late evening, the building had a bit of an ominous look to it."

"1990

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'This place isn't haunted, is it?' said Hector.

'About as haunted as Warrenhold is,' said Garovel.

'...I can't tell if that's a ""yes"" or a ""no.""'

'It's a ""no."" Ghosts aren't real, Hector. And therefore, hauntings aren't real, either.'

'I feel like I've heard this conversation before...'

The reaper phased through the gate's black bars, not waiting for him. 'Don't tell me you're scared of some old building without its lights on.'

Hector used an iron platform to leapfrog over the gate, then employed a descending platform on the other side to ease himself back down the ground without making a big thud.

The courtyard was more expansive than it had seemed from the other side of the gate, and the house, a bit farther away. The plants were overgrown, crowding the narrow walkway.

'So why did you pick this place to search?'

'It was where the first death on the list occurred, eight years ago.'

Hector quickened his pace to catch up with the reaper. 'And how are all these deaths connected, again?' He was pretty sure that Garovel had already told him that part, but he'd only partially been listening, since he'd been busy chasing an attempted murderer down at the time.

'Poisoning,' said Garovel. 'Remember? The potassium cyanide in the alcohol? Like I literally just mentioned?'

'Right, but, uh... are you saying ALL of them were killed with cyanide? 'Cuz that seems kinda, er...'

'No, no, the poisons themselves have varied. As far as I could tell, that was the first case of cyanide poisoning in Gray Rock in the last two hundred years.'

'Hmm.' That made Hector curious, though. 'What happened two hundred years ago?'

'Heh, I looked into that, actually. Apparently, it was a ""scientist"" experimenting with the stuff. His notes mentioned a hypothesis that cyanide might be the key to increasing human intelligence to astonishing new heights.' A beat passed. 'It killed him, instead.'

Hector just kind of pursed his lips together flatly as he imagined that."
"1991

When they reached the main entrance, Garovel just phased through it, and Hector was left standing there. He tried the curved handle, but as expected, the door was locked.

Garovel poked his head back out through the door. 'Sucks being corporeal sometimes, doesn't it?'

'How do I get inside?'

'I mean, you could just break the door down.'

'Garovel.'

'What? Do we have to be law-abiding citizens ALL the time?'

Answering that question seemed like it would open up a can of worms, so Hector decided to ignore it and look around the front of the building another time. There were several windows, but they were all boarded up. He supposed there might be a chimney to he could go through somewhere.

'Can't you just do something clever with materialization?' said Garovel.

'Hmm. Like what?'

'Like make a key for yourself.'

'How would I--?' As he thought about it, though, he wondered if that might actually be possible.

He hunched forward a little and found the keyhole in the evening darkness. Relying on the Scarf of Amordiin, he focused on the air flowing through it, trying to get an image in his mind of what the space inside the lock was like.

Not knowing much about how locks actually worked, Hector wasn't sure if this would be as simple of a task as it seemed. He gave it a shot, though.

He pressed his gloved right hand against the keyhole and filled it with iron. He made a flat protrusion for himself to grab onto, and then tried turning it.

It resisted, but it turned, and Hector heard a low shunk.

He pulled his materialized ""key"" back out and stared at it, a little surprised with himself.

'There you go,' said Garovel. 'Easy, right?'

Hector was somewhat disconcerted by this revelation, however. 'Garovel, if all materialization users can pick locks like this, then this is a serious design flaw.'
"1992

'Well, not all materialization users can use the Scarf of Amordiin to sense the inside of the lock,' said Garovel.

Hector remained unconvinced. 'I barely used it. In fact, I basically just filled the hole with iron, turned, and it worked on the first try. That seems way too simple...'

'Are you actually complaining because something went RIGHT for a change?'

'I'm not--I mean--that's not what I'm trying to say!'

'Then what ARE you trying to say, exactly?'

He took a breath and scratched his head, examining the house and the lock another time. 'How old is this place, anyway?'

'Pretty old, I suspect. By your standards, at least. Why? What difference does it make?'

Hector rubbed his chin. 'Er... was this particular lock just super old and shitty? But you said someone was living here eight years ago, didn't you?'

'I did.'

'Then the lock shouldn't be THAT old...'

'Hector. We didn't come here to examine locks.'

That was a fair point, but Hector felt like being stubborn. 'No, we came here to investigate the place. And I think this lock is suspicious. This is a form of investigation, isn't it?'

The reaper sighed. 'Technically. I guess.'

'You seriously don't think that was weird at all?'

Garovel just stared at him, not saying anything.

Hector persevered. 'Aren't locks supposed to have, like, tumblers in them or something?'

'Do you even know what a tumbler is?'

'No, but I'm sure I could find out.' He whipped out his phone.

'Please DO NOT start surfing the internet in the middle of our murder investigation.'

'It's research!'

'Is it, though?'

'Garovel, just... have a look around while I do this.'

'I need your flashlight, goddammit. It's too dark.'

Begrudgingly, Hector pulled out his flashlight with one hand while he tried to search the internet with the other.

Garovel just turned and shook his head as they both entered the building together."

"1993

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector only spared a quick glance around the dusty old antechamber before returning his eyes to his phone. After a while of silent browsing and considerable reading, he decided to share his findings.

'Hmm, I think that might've been what's called a "'warded"' lock.'

'And what is that?' said Garovel.

'Well, according to this website, it's a really old type of lock that doesn't get used much anymore because of a major design flaw.'

'Which is?'

'Skeleton keys,' said Hector. 'It says here that all you have to do is take a key that belongs to one warded lock, file down some of the bumpy parts, and then bam. It'll open any other warded lock you want. I think.'

'That's fascinating, Hector.'

'I can tell you really mean that and aren't being sarcastic at all.'

'Sorry,' said Garovel. 'I don't mean to be rude. I'm just a little preoccupied at the moment. Y'know, with trying to solve a case of multiple homicides.'

Hector put his phone away and started looking around more carefully. 'I still think that lock is weird.'

'Of course you do.'

'What if there's a reason why it's there?'

'A reason, huh?'

'Yeah. A reason it was never replaced with a more modern lock.'

'I dunno, Hector. Perhaps the owner just never got around to it.'

'But warded locks fell out of usage like 150 years ago or something.'

That would mean that EVERY owner since then never got around to it. And how many owners do you think this place has had?'

At that, the reaper actually stopped hovering and slowly turned to look at him. 'That is... a decent point, I suppose...'

'Right?' Hector couldn't conceal the smile that accompanied his sudden feeling of accomplishment. 'That lock might be an important clue!'

Garovel was looking more worried than intrigued, however.

Hector hadn't expected the reaper to share in his enthusiasm, but the expression on Garovel's skeletal face still caused him some concern. 'Something wrong?'

'...I hope not.' Garovel floated onward again. 'Let's just keep looking, for now.'

"1994

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Hector wanted to press further, but figured that Garovel would tell him in his own time if it was important. However, after a while of looking around the first floor and not finding much besides empty rooms full of dust, Hector's mind began to wander.

'I wonder if I would be able to pick a more modern lock with materialization.'

'Still going on about that, huh? What's with the sudden interest in locks?'

'I just feel like I should learn a lot more about locksmithing in general,' said Hector.

The reaper gave him a flat look. But then Garovel shook his head, laughed a little, and said, 'Y'know what? Good for you. I was about to try and rain on your parade, but if you're really so eager to educate yourself on a new subject, then I think that's great, Hector. I admire your enthusiasm--even if you DO have about a thousand other things on your plate, right now.'

'Well, we need to make sure that Warrenhod has good, strong locks,

right?'

'Oh my GOD. Is THAT what this has all been about?! Your castle fetish again?!'

Hector just kind of stood there awkwardly.

Garovel lowered his voice. 'Alright, maybe that was an overreaction on my part. Look, I'm not mad at you. I'm mad at myself. For not seeing that coming. Of course you would care about locksmithing, because it's tangentially related to castles. I just feel dumb, now.'

Hector gave a sympathetic chuckle. 'You seem a little high-strung, Garovel.'

'And YOU seem weirdly chill. It's making me uncomfortable.'

'Sorry. I'll try to freak out more often for you.'

'Hmph. Is this the effect of those few morsels of praise that Zeff has been giving you, lately?'

Ah. He'd noticed that, too, huh? Of course he did. Hector wasn't sure what to say now.

They found some stairs leading into a lower level and took them. This area was also empty, but Garovel stopped."

"1995

'Hmm. I think there's another floor below this one,' said Garovel.

'How can you tell?'

'Bugs. The way that their tiny little soul-masses are congregating below us--it's vaguely room-shaped. If it were just regular dirt down there, I would sense them filling the whole area.'

'I don't see any more stairs, though.'

'Mm. That's a big ""uh-oh,"" then.'

'What do you mean?'

'Let's have another look around the rest of the house first, but if we aren't able to find a way down there, then guess what? That means it's a secret room. And maybe I'm just jaded, but when I think of a secret room, I start imagining some pretty fucked up shit inside it.'

Hector wasn't about to argue.

They returned upstairs and gave the house another once over. There were second and third floors to examine as well, but they were just as empty as the first, so it wasn't long before Hector and Garovel were back down in the basement again, reevaluating their circumstances.

'Looks like you're gonna have to break in there, chief,' said Garovel.

'I'd rather not destroy someone's property,' said Hector, scanning the cobblestone walls. 'Shouldn't there be like a hidden lever that opens a path somewhere?'

'Maybe. It might not even be in this room, though.'

'Well, let's just... look a little harder before doing anything dramatic.'

'That's less fun, though.'

'Garovel, c'mon.'

Hector used the Scarf again. He looked for any strange movement in the air as he walked along the basement's walls.

There. In the corner. The air was flowing just a little bit differently. He moved closer to examine the location, and sure enough, the crevices around one of the stones were noticeably deeper than of those surrounding it.

A button, perhaps?"

"1996

~~The New Year's Days Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 1 of 6)~~

Hector tried pressing it, but it didn't budge. He tried pressing harder, but still nothing.

Hmm. Had he been wrong?

'Try one more time.' Garovel grabbed his shoulder, and Hector felt the undead strength surge through his muscles.

He did as the reaper requested. The stone resisted still, but only at first. It sunk deep into the wall, and Hector heard a kind of a rumbling click.

Abruptly, an opening in the seemingly dirt floor appeared, popping up like the trunk of a car and throwing a large cloud of dust into the air.

'Well, shit,' said Garovel.

Hector had a pretty good idea why he was saying that.

'That right there is a room only accessible to someone with superhuman strength,' the reaper said.

'Yes, it is...'

'And combined with your clue about the lock, then it's suddenly looking like a servant used to live here.'

'Yeah...'

'It's not proof that they were responsible to the mysterious deaths, buuut...'

'Not looking good, is it?'

'Not one bit.'

They descended into the lower room.

As Hector shined his flashlight around in the pitch blackness, it quickly became apparent that this hidden chamber was not empty like the rest of the house.

There were tables and shelves everywhere. Piles of documents and books. An old, bulb-shaped lamp.

Hector tried flipping the switch on the lamp, but it remained dark.

'I'd be worried if that thing had turned on,' said Garovel. 'That would mean someone was paying the electric bill.'

Hector inspected the nearest table more closely and began sifting through the documents thereon with his flashlight. There were lots of numbers and names, seemingly. Maybe street addresses as well. Hector couldn't really make heads or tails of most of it.

He tried another table, this one larger, and rifled through its drawers until he found a stack of small papers which seemed to have more substantial writing on them:

Citizenry still largely unaware of reaper presence. Recommend renewal of quarantine status.

Hector's eyes widened."
"1997

~~The New Year's Days Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 2 of 6)~~

What the hell had he just read? His mind raced as he tried to process it, but there were still dozens more notes to go through:

Third cancellation this month. Possible leak. Think someone is scaring them off.

Garovel floated closer. Hector put his flashlight in his mouth and held up the notes that he'd finished for the reaper while he continued reading the others in the stack:

Asset missing. Unable to make contact. Will keep trying, but expect bad news.

The next one read:

Asset still missing. Friends and family uncooperative. Possible domestic dispute, but the coincidence is unsettling.

And the next:

Asset still not found. Expect never will be, at this point. Could have skipped country, but suspect foul play. Don't think it's A. Too quiet. Not their style. Might be local.

Hector stopped to reevaluate those words, especially the last part.

""A, "" huh?' said Garovel, having apparently caught up to him in reading. 'Hmm.'

Hector was reluctant to say, but he had to. 'Please tell me that this isn't referring to Abolish...'

'Mm. Yeah. Wish I could, buddy, but I think it probably is.'

Agh.

'On the bright side,' said Garovel, 'the writer is saying that they DON'T think Abolish is behind this missing ""asset"" of theirs.'

'Except, Abolish DID come to Atreya.'

'Well, yeah, but given everything else we know about this house, these notes are at least eight years old. So I highly doubt this has anything to do with the group that attacked the Queen. Call me crazy, but they didn't seem like the type to make such long-term plans.'

'I guess you're right. But then... if whoever was writing these notes knew about Abolish, then... does that mean these were written by the Vanguard?'

'I'm thinking so. Could also be Sai-hee's group. Or even both.'

Hector blinked at that. 'Both?'"
"1998

'I wouldn't say it was likely,' said Garovel, 'but Sai-hee has been known to work with the Vanguard in the protection of civilians. The Vanguard typically doesn't spare much personnel for regions with very low threat-levels. It would make a degree of sense if they both stationed some people here undercover in order to monitor things.'

'I got the impression that Sai-hee mostly just stuck to her own territory, though,' said Hector.

'She does. Monitoring isn't the same as actually intervening. Or, maybe she was considering expanding her territory to include Atreya.'

Hector had a hard time imagining that. 'You really think so?'

'No. But it's still a possibility.'

'What I really wanna know is what the hell happened to these people.'

'Looks like they might've just decided to leave on their own.' Garovel pointed at one of the several notes that Hector hadn't read yet. It was still half-covered by the others in his hand, so he brought it out to read it in full.

More trouble than this is worth. Potential value of intel here seems low. Recommend moving operations to Lorent.
Hector cocked an eyebrow.

'Seems like there was someone in Atreya who was aware of their presence,' said Garovel. 'And that someone was making their job difficult.' He pointed at yet another note:

Another asset lost. Poisoned. Operations here are compromised. Recommend immediate withdrawal and mission value reassessment.
'There's your poisoning,' said Hector.

'Indeed. Let's have another look around and see if we can find a name attached to this room.'

'Okay.' Hector sifted through the last few notes first, and though they had different handwriting, they were more of the same. Reports of failure and recommendations to leave the country. There must've been several agents reporting to whoever was working out of this place, he figured.

He moved on to the bookshelves on the other side of the room and spent a while searching through the reading material there.

'It's strange that they left all this evidence behind,' said Garovel."
"1999

~~The New Year's Days Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 4 of 6)~~

'Maybe they had to leave in a hurry,' said Hector.

'Maybe. But none of those notes mentioned direct attacks on the agents themselves. It sounded more like someone was sabotaging their attempts to cultivate a network of informants. And if these agents decided to leave because that task became impossible, then they should've either destroyed all this stuff or taken it with them.'

At length, Hector found what appeared to be some sort of logbook. It was filled with nothing but names and timestamps, to the point that only the last few pages were blank. He showed it to Garovel.

'These appear to be the comings and goings of various personnel over the course of... several months? Maybe years, even. This thing is quite thick, isn't it?'

'If they were undercover, why would they document all this?' said Hector.

'Only one reason, really. Security concerns.'

'The notes did mention a leak. And being compromised. Do you recognize any of these names from your time with the Vanguard?'

'Mmmm. Keep flipping pages.'

Hector did so.

'Stop.'

Hector did that, too.

'Yep. That one's pretty distinct.' The reaper pointed to the middle of the page at a hastily scrawled name. 'Eckard. It doesn't seem to appear much in this book, which suggests that the guy didn't visit this place very often.'

'So... he was a high-ranking officer checking on his subordinates?'

'That's what I'm thinking. And as I recall, Eckard was also the name of a Captain General of the Vanguard.'

'So this really WAS their hideout, then.'

'Looks like it. Keep flipping.'

Hector did as the reaper asked. He tried to keep an eye out for the name Eckard now, but he didn't see it all--until the last few pages, that was, where it appeared several times.

'Well, now,' said Garovel."

"2000 -- CCII.

~~The New Year's Days Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 5 of 6)~~

'So he showed up again in order to close down operations here?' guessed Hector.

'It's possible. I'm not sure why he would need to show up in person for that, though. And again, it doesn't explain why they would leave all these documents behind.'

It was then that Hector noticed another name near the very end of the logbook. It was a name he'd only heard a few times before, but seeing it now in writing, he knew at once that this was no coincidence.

""Garovel,"" he whispered as he pointed at it.

'Hmm?'

The name read: Pauline Gaolanet.

On the night of the Atreyan Gala of Royal Associates, Hector had received an invitation to meet with virtually every lord in the country. He had not had time to do so in a single evening and had been forced to reschedule the vast majority of them for later dates.

However, there had been one house of Atreyan nobility that had been noticeably absent from that list of invitations.

House Gaolanet, the Lords of Gray Rock.

Chapter Two Hundred Two: 'The Lion's insight...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Asad Najir was tired. His return to Sair had been rather turbulent, to say the least. At times, it felt like he was constantly being interrogated. The other Sandlords were constantly questioning him, wanting to know his intentions.

They had not been pleased to learn of what had transpired in the Undercrust and now seemed to think that he would soon bring more trouble down upon their heads.

He supposed he could understand their concerns. He was responsible almost entirely for the current predicament that the Sandlords found themselves in with the Vanguard.

Having met with Iceheart personally now, it seemed clear to Asad that the Vanguard was suspicious of him but lacked the justification to take any kind of action. The other Sandlords had covered for him during his absence, thankfully. An impromptu family retreat. Much needed after the harrowing attack on his childhood home of Dunehall.

Not to mention, Abbas Saqqaf had delivered Ivan's head to them on a silver platter. The Vanguard could hardly complain about that."

"2000 -- CCII.

~~The New Year's Days Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 5 of 6)~~

'So he showed up again in order to close down operations here?' guessed Hector.

'It's possible. I'm not sure why he would need to show up in person for that, though. And again, it doesn't explain why they would leave all these documents behind.'

It was then that Hector noticed another name near the very end of the logbook. It was a name he'd only heard a few times before, but seeing it now in writing, he knew at once that this was no coincidence.

""Garovel,"" he whispered as he pointed at it.

'Hmm?'

The name read: Pauline Gaolanet.

On the night of the Atreyan Gala of Royal Associates, Hector had received an invitation to meet with virtually every lord in the country. He had not had time to do so in a single evening and had been forced to reschedule the vast majority of them for later dates.

However, there had been one house of Atreyan nobility that had been noticeably absent from that list of invitations.

House Gaolanet, the Lords of Gray Rock.

Chapter Two Hundred Two: 'The Lion's insight...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Asad Najir was tired. His return to Sair had been rather turbulent, to say the least. At times, it felt like he was constantly being interrogated. The other Sandlords were constantly questioning him, wanting to know his intentions.

They had not been pleased to learn of what had transpired in the Undercrust and now seemed to think that he would soon bring more trouble down upon their heads.

He supposed he could understand their concerns. He was responsible almost entirely for the current predicament that the Sandlords found themselves in with the Vanguard.

Having met with Iceheart personally now, it seemed clear to Asad that the Vanguard was suspicious of him but lacked the justification to take any kind of action. The other Sandlords had covered for him during his absence, thankfully. An impromptu family retreat. Much needed after the harrowing attack on his childhood home of Dunehall.

Not to mention, Abbas Saqqaf had delivered Ivan's head to them on a silver platter. The Vanguard could hardly complain about that."

"2001

~~The New Year's Days Special + Mon/Wen/Fri Double (page 6 of 6)~~

That particular development had overshadowed almost all others, it seemed. The Lord Saqqaf's fame had skyrocketed, along with that of the Sandlords as a whole.

With the Rainlords ""missing,"" the Sandlords had been forced to intervene in western Sair to prevent anarchy from taking over.

At least, that was what the Sandlords had been telling themselves. And while it was hard to argue with that justification, Asad couldn't help being quite uncomfortable about it.

He did not think it would go as smoothly as many of his brethren seemed to.

The Rainlords' subjects were not your average civilians. They were a hard, resilient people, as proud of their heritage and their history as perhaps the Rainlords themselves. And the loyalty that those subjects had for the Rainlords--Asad did not think that would be forgotten any time soon.

Not to mention that, from a historical standpoint, this event was not exactly unprecedented. The Rainlords had been driven from their land once before by the Mohssian Empire. They had been brought to the brink of extinction.

Yet it was the Rainlords who had persisted into the modern day, not the Empire. And of course, having just spent considerable time among them, Asad knew perfectly well how much the Rainlords wished to return to Sair and reclaim their territory.

There was no telling when they might be able to accomplish that, however. Having raised an organized resistance against the Vanguard was no minor issue. According to the Sandlords' intel, the Rainlord Rebellion--as it was now being called--had sent shock waves through the Vanguardian ranks.

Which was no surprise. The Rainlords were renowned for their honor and virtuous ideals. It would be difficult for even the Vanguardian propaganda officers to paint them as wholly in the wrong.

Perhaps that was why the Vanguard, in spite of all the inquiries being conducted, still seemed quite eager to work even more closely with the Sandlords than ever before. While their reputation was faltering, the Sandlords' was swelling."

"2002

Asad sat down in his favorite chair and closed his eyes. It was finally the end of the day. All his meetings were either done or postponed, and he very much looked forward to getting a good night's sleep.

But a few things were still bothering him, and he wanted to take some time to sit here and think.

Not to meditate. He should probably do a bit of that, too, before going to sleep, but no, this was a ritual that he learned from his father. It was an opportunity to stop and take stock of things. To reevaluate them.

With so much going on around him, it was easy to become overwhelmed. To let things slip by, unnoticed.

He tried to focus his mind. To concentrate on what was bothering him.

There were actually more than a few things, he soon realized.

There was his family. Specifically, his wife, Samira. She was being... rather difficult to please, again.

When they had first gotten married, she was always so happy. And her happiness was his happiness. In retrospect, it was perhaps naive to think that time would last the rest of their lives. Especially since they were both servants.

But still. The extent to which she had changed troubled him.

She was fearful of so many things, these days. That always seemed to be at the heart of whatever foul mood she might be in. Today, for instance, she had accused him--and not for the first time--of adultery.

She hadn't come right out and said so, of course. That wasn't her way. She had instead asked, ""Who are you trying so hard to look good for?""

He had smiled at first, thinking it to be a surprisingly sweet compliment. But the look on her face quickly killed that notion. And when he had tried to have a conversation about it with her and explain, again, that he would never be unfaithful, she had refused to say anything more.

It was difficult not to hate her, sometimes."
"2003

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Asad supposed he should start scheduling appointments for marriage counseling again. He was reluctant to resort to it, but looking back, it had helped before. And the reapers were only so helpful to that end. Samira didn't seem to trust them to tell her the truth, either. And being members of the family, it was probably difficult for her to see them as genuinely ""objective.""

He truly had to wonder why she believed he might ever be unfaithful to her, though. Historically, yes, Sandlords had often taken multiple wives and mistresses, but Asad had only ever had eyes for her. How could she not know that?

He decided not to dwell on it further. He'd already resolved to return to counseling. It was time to move onto the next matter that had been bothering him.

And that was Abbas Saqqaf, the Lord of the Golden Fort, and the new de facto leader of the Sandlords.

Abbas had been the most powerful of them for some years already, but it was never more apparent than now. Having captured the Salesman of Death single-handedly, the man's reputation was at an all-time high.

Which put him in a particularly precarious position, for several reasons--the first of which being the fact that Abbas Saqqaf was not a member of the Vanguard.

And boy, did they want him to be.

The other Sandlords who were part of the Vanguard were pressuring the Lord Saqqaf constantly. Asad, who was not a member either, hoped that the man would remain firm in his conviction to not join.

The second reason that Abbas' newfound fame was so dangerous was because of the potential for abuse of political clout. Asad didn't see eye-to-eye with him on several subjects, but he still trusted his judgment for the most part.

The same could not be said for all of his fellow Sandlords, however. Asad was quite worried that certain other Hahls would see Abbas' ascent as a threat to them in the long-term.

Because perhaps it was."

"2004

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Asad wanted to keep a close eye on his brethren in the days to come. Hopefully, none of them would do anything stupid and jeopardize their union. The lessons of the War of the Three Sands should still be fresh in the mind of many reapers, so Asad wanted to be optimistic, but it was also good to remain vigilant with these types of things. He had never personally experienced disunity with his kin on such a level as to provoke violence, and he hoped he never would.

The next matter on his mind was Abolish.

They had been quite thoroughly and brutally routed from Sair--and in large part, without the Vanguard's help. All of the Sandlords had been concerned about the Vanguard capturing Abolishers who were present at Dunehall--or in other words, Abolishers who might be able to tell the Vanguard that the Rainlords had been there.

And so the Lords of the Drylands had given no quarter in hunting the bastards down. Asad had even caught wind of a few Abolish prisoners who DID get captured by the Vanguard, only to end up dead anyway under ""questionable circumstances.""

Asad had little doubt that one or more of the other Hahls was behind it, and thankfully, the Vanguard hadn't been able to prove anything so far.

And this, combined with the Vanguard's simultaneous eagerness to win favor with the Sandlords? It made for a very strange state of affairs, to be sure.

And then, of course, there were the Rainlords back in Atreya. What manner of trouble might be brewing there, Asad had to wonder.

On the one hand, the Rainlords had not been in the best of spirits when he last saw them--as anyone would be, after having been repeatedly battered, trampled, robbed, and humiliated. Even their unity might still be in question, he felt, considering the trouble that had transpired with House Blackburn.

But on the other hand, they were also now under the protection of the young Lord of Warrenhold."

"2005

When he had first met him, if Asad was being brutally honest, he hadn't thought much of the boy. A mere child, tagging along because of a tangentially-related reaper.

But now?

Now Asad found himself wondering if Hector might just be the most formidable of all his allies.

He knew how young the boy really was, but perhaps that didn't matter as much as he had previously thought. Hector's list of accomplishments spoke for itself. At Marshrock. At Dunehall. At Babbadelo. And apparently also at Himmekel and Capaporo, too. Even now, he still wasn't sure he believed half of what he had been told about those last two.

The accomplishment that was occupying Asad's thoughts the most, however, was the one that occurred at Babbadelo. Others who recounted the young lord's exploits might not even mention it, but to Asad's mind, the invention of that orbital materialization technique was no minor thing.

That technique had been bothering him ever since Hector first explained it to him and Zeff, but he had never been quite sure why. There was just something about it. Something subtle, yet still somehow fundamental, perhaps.

With everything else going on lately and all his other concerns weighing on him, Asad hadn't been able to give that technique the amount of analytical consideration that he wanted--the amount that it probably deserved. He'd discussed it a bit with Zeff, but the man had probably been even more distracted than he was.

But here and now, as he held his hand out in front of his face and practiced the technique for himself, watching a pair of quartz cubes float around his open palm, Asad finally had the opportunity to really stop and dwell on it for a while.

And after a time, to his own surprise, he began to gain an inkling of what his problem with it might be.

So it was extra unfortunate that Qorvass phased through the wall and interrupted his train of thought. 'Hey, Haqq wants to talk to you,' the reaper said in Valgan."

"2006

Asad's tattooed face scrunched up a little as he tried to hold on to his thoughts. "About what?" he asked, not wanting to complain.

The reaper hovered there for a moment, looking at him. 'Ah... you were doing your thing again, weren't you?'

"My thing?"

'Your "not meditation" thing. Whatever you want to call it.'

"I believe it is called 'thinking.' Perhaps you should try it sometime."

'Ouch. Someone's grouchy.'

He took a breath, knowing Qorvass hadn't deserved that comment. "I apologize. I didn't mean that..."

'Yes, I should hope not. Would you rather be left alone, right now? I don't mind leaving. Or telling Haqq to go plow himself. In fact, I would enjoy that.'

Asad rubbed his neck and breathed a faint laugh. "No, that is alright. I enjoy your company, Qorvass."

'Oh. And now you're being nice? I'm getting some mixed signals here.'

Asad moved on to rubbing his forehead. "Well, maybe the signals in my head are mixed to begin with."

'Hmm.' The reaper floated closer. The flaming wings of Qorvass' scorpionfly form beat rapidly and constantly but still without making any noise, even as he moved. 'What were you thinking about, then?'

Maybe talking it through with me will help.'

He gave the reaper a look, considering. He supposed it couldn't hurt. "Do you remember that orbital materialization technique that Hector Goffe came up with in Babbadelo?"

'Um. Yes. THAT'S what you were thinking about?'

He decided to ignore that question. "Did you think anything was strange about it?"

'Ah. Sure. I thought it was strange that such a young servant could come up with something like that.'

"Anything else?"

The reaper hesitated. 'Are we turning this into a game? I would prefer you just tell me what you are getting at. Is there something YOU found particularly strange about it?'

Asad decided to oblige. "I think it might be impossible.""
"2007

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'What?' said Qorvass. 'What do you mean? How could it be impossible? You watched him do it. We both did.'

"Yes," said Asad, holding up a hand to perform the technique. "And I can do it myself. As can Zeff."

The reaper gave an insectoid shrug. 'So it's not impossible, then.'

Asad shook his head. "What I mean is, given our current understanding of materialization, this technique might be considered impossible. Or in other words, it should be impossible, but it isn't."

Qorvass' eyes bugged out slightly more than they did normally. 'You're saying... you think our understanding of materialization is flawed?'

He nodded. "Perhaps."

The reaper seemed a bit dumbstruck. '...That would be a really big deal, Asad.'

"I know."

'What do you think might be flawed about it?'

"That is what I was trying to work out."

'Okay... so talk me through it, then. What part of the technique seems impossible to you?'

"Well... I'm still trying to work that out, too."

'Ugh. Come on. You can't just tell me something like that and not go into anything specific.'

Asad frowned and made the pair of cubes hovering around his hand go faster. "This part seems sensible enough to me. The orbiting. These moving objects are merely extensions of the 'perpetually falling cube' trick that is simple enough for even rookie materializers to perform. That trick keeps the cube still, whereas this allows them to move by designating a point around which to orbit. It is, hypothetically, a complex cognitive process, requiring constant creation and annihilation around the edges of the object, but in practice, it is relatively easy to perform.

"I suspect this ease comes from the simplicity of imagining the object moving along a set distance away from the designated orbiting point. If I were to alter the distance of orbit like so--" He pushed the cubes farther away from him and tried to make their paths bumpy and irregular. "--it becomes significantly more difficult for me." He squinted a little while maintaining his concentration, watching the cubes tremble along their new, erratic orbits.

'Okay,' said Qorvass. 'So if the orbiting makes sense to you, then...?'

"It's the technique's ability to create explosive impact forces that I find baffling."

"2008

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'Hmm,' the reaper hummed. 'And why is that? My understanding is that it merely functions as a way to achieve exceptionally high velocity states at a lower skill threshold. Like a means of overcoming a mental block, perhaps, by conceptualizing the problem in a different manner.'

"Yes... and also no. That may be what the technique is accomplishing, but it shouldn't be. At least, theoretically. Because the actual orbiting part that I just described... doesn't use 'velocity' states. It only uses 'position' states."

Qorvass just looked at him, perhaps waiting for elaboration.

Asad held the orbiting cubes up again. "Technically, these objects aren't actually 'moving' at all. They just look like they are. And I suppose you might argue that there's no difference. If they are going from point A to point B, then that is all that matters." Asad exhaled a long breath. "But it's not all that matters, at least on a technical level."

'I'm still not sure I follow your logic here...'

"It's more like... looking through a three-dimensional window into an alternate universe."

The reaper's head tilted at that. 'Excuse me?'

"These cubes that you see are not moving--not in the same way that a thrown ball moves or a planet orbiting the Sun moves. Rather, they're more like an image in a window. In some sense, it is the window that is moving, not the object on the other side. And we just can't tell by simply looking at it, because we ARE the window. This physical reality is the window."

'I'm not sure that's any easier to understand, Asad.'

He sighed another time. "I told you I was still struggling to figure this out, didn't I?"

'You did. But alternate realities? Really?'

"I'm not saying that it IS an alternate reality. I'm saying that it may be easier to conceptualize it as such, for the purpose of understanding that these orbiting cubes are not actually moving."

'Hmm.'"

"2009

Asad rubbed his chin with his free hand. "This is probably even more difficult to explain to a non-materialization user."

'Mm. Okay. Well, let's just say you've convinced me of that part, then. They aren't moving. Why is that so incompatible with the idea that the end result is some kind super-enhanced velocity state?'

"Because that would mean that materialization's own rules hardly even matter--that it's all ultimately just a trick of the mind."

'Well. Is it not?'

Asad's expression soured. "No. These sorts of tricks should only work to a certain extent. This is far beyond that, I feel."

'Hence why you think our understanding of materialization might be flawed.'

"Yes... there is something fundamentally off with this."

'Hmm.'

"It would almost make more sense if only Hector could utilize this technique," said Asad.

'How do you mean?'

"If neither Zeff nor I could perform it, then perhaps this could all just be chalked up to the young lord's encounter with Rasalased. A gift from the Dry God."

'Agh, don't even bring that up, please.'

Asad couldn't help smiling a little. "Are you still upset that they were able to meet him before us?"

'Intensely, yes. That entire scenario was just absurd.'

"At least we have confirmation that Rasalased is still there after all this time." His eyes went to the travel bag by his bed. Hector Goffe and Emiliana Elroy were currently in possession of two of the Shards of the Dry God, and the remaining two were in that bag there.

Asad and Qorvass had never made a big issue out of it in front of anyone else, but it had not been a trivial decision to allow Hector to keep one of the Shards. With Emiliana, the poor girl had been whisked away by the Monster of the East, so she had obviously never been given an opportunity to return her Shard--and likely wouldn't for a very long time. And given Hector's--and ONLY Hector's--ability to converse with her through them, it would have been quite cruel to insist Hector return his."

"2010

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

The circumstances were extenuating, to be sure, but that didn't change the fact that those Shards were arguably more precious than any other artifact that the Sandlords as a whole possessed. And the power that lay dormant within them was no meager thing. One day, they could become very real weapons again. And that could prove to be either a great blessing or a great problem.

'I didn't require confirmation that he was still there,' said Qorvass bitterly. 'I remember perfectly well.'

Asad didn't doubt him. Qorvass was one of the oldest reapers among the Sandlords. Asad knew that Qorvass felt especially attached to the Shards. "Even so, a lot can change in seven hundred years."

'Hmph.'

"Anyway, we are getting off-topic," said Asad.

'Are we? It seems similarly possible that even if Rasalased didn't grant Hector this new ability, he could have still granted him the knowledge needed to discover it.'

The thought had occurred to Asad as well. "Maybe, but it makes little difference at this point."

'I disagree. If Rasalased granted him this knowledge, then who knows what else might be in that young man's head, now?'

"All the more reason to remain on good terms with him," said Asad.

'I wasn't trying to suggest otherwise. Rather, I recommend bringing him into the fold, if at all possible.'

Asad knew exactly what the reaper meant, as he had been considering it as well. "I'm not so sure that it IS possible, but yes, I agree in sentiment, at least."

‘Are you concerned that our Rainlord friends will not approve?’

“Oh, I’m certain they won’t.”

‘They are no doubt trying to find a suitable bride for him at this very moment. But even if Hector were to agree--and I’m not sure he will--I don’t imagine that Garovel will just sit idly by and watch his servant be married off to just anyone. He seemed a shrewd one to me.’”

"2011

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

“I thought you liked Garovel,” said Asad.

‘Oh, I do. We haven’t known each other long, but I already consider him a good friend. But that doesn’t mean he will do as we wish, even if we ask nicely.’

""Heh. What a shame.”

‘But whether Rasalased granted him this knowledge or he really did come up with it on his own, it doesn’t change the fact that this technique SHOULD still follow the rules of materialization.’

“Hence why I said it makes little difference. I’m not sure that even Hector himself fully understands his technique.”

‘You think he invented it without realizing the full depth of its complexity?’

Asad deliberated silently for a moment. That notion seemed particularly absurd, somehow. While it was perfectly possible for someone to discover something accidentally or invent some kind of machine without understanding its full functionality, Asad had a hard time believing that such a thing was possible when it came to materialization. So much of materialization depended on the wielder’s understanding of the thing being materialized. Even someone of very high skill level would struggle to create something simple if they didn’t understand how it was shaped, what physical features it had, or how it was supposed to work.

It seemed very unlikely that Hector could have invented something unintentionally, and yet...

“...What if it’s not so much ‘the orbital technique’ that Hector invented, as it is something else?”

‘And what in the world does that mean?’

“The latter part of the technique,” said Asad, thinking back, “after the orbital acceleration, Hector said it requires the user to ‘lose control’ of it in order to launch. I hadn’t thought much of that before, because I was able to do it so easily, but... that is incredibly unlike most materialization techniques. Or ALL of them, really. Losing control? On purpose? Materialization is always about tightly concentrating and fully comprehending everything you are doing. Always being in control. Because when you are not, your work goes completely awry.”””
"2012

‘Are you saying that merely allowing yourself to lose control is somehow the catalyst for the technique’s explosive power?’ said Qorvass.

When the reaper put it like that, it sounded stupid. “I don’t know if it’s the only reason, but it might play a role.”

‘Right. And what role would that be, exactly?’

Asad was getting a little irritated. “If I knew that, I would’ve told you by now!”

‘Well, believe it or not, I may have an alternate theory.’

“Oh? I’m inclined to not believe it.”

‘I may not be a materialization wizard like you, but I do have a few thousand years of observing servants under my belt.’

“Go on, then. Dazzle me with your insight.”

‘Okay, now you’re putting too much pressure on me. This theory might be complete hogwash, by the way. I’m just putting it out there, alright?’

“Just tell me.”

‘Alright, well, uh... what if I said that your suspected flaw in our understanding of materialization went beyond just materialization?’

Asad raised an eyebrow at that.

‘Listen. Throughout history, I have occasionally heard of anomalous occurrences like this. Surprising displays of ability that were previously thought impossible. Many of those occurrences have since been explained, and the understanding of each corresponding servant ability-type has increased as a result.

‘However, a few of those occurrences remain mysterious even to this day. This could be an instance of that. Which would make it a flaw in our thinking that is not necessarily specific to materialization, but perhaps instead to all ability types.’

Asad stared past the reaper as he tried to wrap his head around that concept.

‘I know it’s not much of a theory, really, but I wanted you to broaden the scope of your thinking, at least.’

Asad gave a slow nod. “Well, you’ve accomplished that.””
"2013 -- CCIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))Chapter Two Hundred Three: 'Premonitions of a dark horizon...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Nere Blackburn was not herself. She hadn't been for many years, if she were telling the complete truth of things, but she could feel it now more than ever.

The instability in her thoughts. The erratic emotions that gripped her. Anxiety. Sorrow. But perhaps most of all, fear.

Fear of what? She could hardly tell anymore. Of everything, perhaps. Of all outcomes. All possibilities.

Ismael, her husband of forty years, was gone. Slain by the Salesman of Death. Ibai, her darling son, was missing. Taken by the Monster of the East.

Her two greatest ties to this world. Severed.

She knew she was broken now. She had known it for some time. These events only made it that much more clear to her.

Because more than anything, she deserved this.

She had never believed in the water god before, but now she did. This was divine punishment, surely.

For her deception.

She hadn't left her room in several days now. The other Blackburns, the kind and pure souls that they were, did nothing but try to help her, to provide her with any manner of assistance she required.

But they didn't know that their kindness, their perfection, hurt her now more than any cruelty she could think of.

If they knew the truth, they would hate her. They would turn. All that kindness would turn to wrath--and rightly so.

Look at all she had wrought.

Now, not only was her own family shattered beyond repair, but so many others were caught in the grip of the madness that she had begun so many years ago.

With her weakness.

Her love for Ismael had grown to such extremes as she had never even dreamt possible, far beyond what it was even when they were newly married. It had grown so strong, in fact, that the thought of ever living without him had become a thing more terrible to her than anything else. She could have lost anything else. Just not him. Not after all he had done. She would have gladly died in his stead, if she only been given the chance.

But there had been a time when she hated him."
"2013 -- CCIII.

Three: 'Premonitions of a dark horizon...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Nere Blackburn was not herself. She hadn't been for many years, if she were telling the complete truth of things, but she could feel it now more than ever.

The instability in her thoughts. The erratic emotions that gripped her. Anxiety. Sorrow. But perhaps most of all, fear.

Fear of what? She could hardly tell anymore. Of everything, perhaps. Of all outcomes. All possibilities.

Ismael, her husband of forty years, was gone. Slain by the Salesman of Death. Ibai, her darling son, was missing. Taken by the Monster of the East.

Her two greatest ties to this world. Severed.

She knew she was broken now. She had known it for some time. These events only made it that much more clear to her.

Because more than anything, she deserved this.

She had never believed in the water god before, but now she did. This was divine punishment, surely.

For her deception.

She hadn't left her room in several days now. The other Blackburns, the kind and pure souls that they were, did nothing but try to help her, to provide her with any manner of assistance she required.

But they didn't know that their kindness, their perfection, hurt her now more than any cruelty she could think of.

If they knew the truth, they would hate her. They would turn. All that kindness would turn to wrath--and rightly so.

Look at all she had wrought.

Now, not only was her own family shattered beyond repair, but so many others were caught in the grip of the madness that she had begun so many years ago.

With her weakness.

Her love for Ismael had grown to such extremes as she had never even dreamt possible, far beyond what it was even when they were newly married. It had grown so strong, in fact, that the thought of ever living without him had become a thing more terrible to her than anything else. She could have lost anything else. Just not him. Not after all he had done. She would have gladly died in his stead, if she only been given the chance.

But there had been a time when she hated him."

"2014

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))It was the height of youthful folly. Understandable, perhaps, if one were to characterize the emotions that had motivated her actions as those of the unwise or the unlearned, but she dared not even give herself that meagerest easing of her conscience.

In her anger, in her disappointment, in her yearning to become a different person, she had been unfaithful to her husband.

And the result of that was Ibai. An aberration. A thing worthy of only death.

In truth, after that first incident with the dead cat, when it became clear that Parson Miles' warning had been the truth, she might have gone through with the killing of her only child if not for Ismael--if he hadn't been the greatest man she had ever known.

And to think. It had worked.

Ismael had actually succeeded in changing Ibai's nature.

She took no credit in that for herself. She knew it beyond doubt--that had all been her husband's doing. Someone as pathetic as her could not have been of any use to anyone. It was only too obvious where the goodness in Ibai had truly come from, even if he didn't have Ismael's blood in him.

Just thinking about it now made her want to start crying again. She might've allowed herself to, if she were alone, but her reaper, Sentsia, was present. And talking to her. As usual.

Nere was hardly listening, though. The reaper's moral pontifications and words of encouragement were without end.

Even though Sentsia knew the truth, too. The one person who should have been able to genuinely understand how worthless she was--but Sentsia didn't. Even her own reaper was too good for her, Nere knew.

How cruel Lhutwë was. To have her grow to love her family so much after betraying them so utterly, after having thought herself above them for so long."

"2015

When she had first met Ismael, the unimpressive nobleman from the backwaters of Luzo, she had thought him a puppy in the guise of a man. So innocent and meek. Not at all domineering like many of the other men of the Wetlands whom she had met.

She, on the other hand, had been so full of fire and ambition. Even from the beginning, she felt that she could wrap this silly, awkward man around her finger and get him to do whatever she wanted.

And she'd been right.

It had been so easy. A few teasing looks here. A few flirtatious words there. Ismael hadn't known what to do. Obviously, he hadn't had much experience with women before. In no time at all, he became so eager to please her.

The rest of his family probably would have been more wary of her if they weren't in complete tatters. They were in a state of mourning, all of them. At the time, she didn't know what exactly had happened to them, only that many were killed during some horrible conflict.

She could have inquired further. She should have. She didn't.

It didn't matter to her. Looking back, she wanted to think that if she had known more at that time, she would have acted differently, not tried to take advantage of Ismael the way she did, but that was probably just wishful thinking, she knew.

She was so selfish back then. Blind to the problems of others unless there was some way she could benefit from it.

Ismael was a means to an end. Nothing more.

The thought never even occurred to her that she might be the same.

Her mysterious benefactor had remained so for far too long. She had never given proper thought to why someone would just start mailing her money and instructions. She'd questioned it, certainly, but being in such dire need at the time, in a state of constant financial misery, she had been only too happy to take the help, wherever it came from."

"2016

When the day finally came that her benefactor revealed his true identity to her, the shock alone nearly destroyed her then and there.

Because it had occurred in two separate steps.

The first time he revealed himself to her, she had thought that everything was becoming clear, that this man was someone who truly loved her and cared for her--and most importantly of all, someone who was worthy of her. Obviously, she could never settle for a puppy like Ismael. No. This man, this "Bas" as he called himself at the time, was the real love of her life. And together, they would conquer the world.

Why had she been so lucky? Why had he chosen her out of all the other girls in the world? Well, because she was just that great, of course. What need was there to even humor any other notion?

Oh, how he was able to inflate her ego. To make her think she was deserving of so much more than she really was. To make her think that she, a girl whom he had raised up from nothing, was somehow above all these lords and ladies of Sair.

Looking back on it now, on how foolish she had been, she almost wanted to laugh. She must have been insane. That seemed the only explanation to her now.

But the charm of that man... of all people, how could he have wielded such charm? She had prided herself on seeing through people, manipulating them to her will. So why hadn't she been able to see through his lies? Just because she hadn't known his true name at the time? Had she really been that blind?

Perhaps if she had joined the Vanguard sooner, she might have seen his face before on a wanted poster. Or heard a description of him, maybe. Something.

No doubt, that was why he had instructed her to keep putting off joining. And that must've also been why he decided to reveal himself as "Bas" when he did. He would have been unable to do so if he had waited much longer.

It was just so absurd. How could she have ever fallen in love with someone like the Mad Demon?"

"2017

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

She must have been mad to have not thought anything was strange about him, but even all these years later, her memory of that night was still so clear. He had been so warm. So understanding. So ready to listen and admire and be the most wonderful human being she had ever met in her life.

He was everything she could have ever wanted in a man and more. That secret tryst in overgrown wilds of Steccat had been one of the best experiences she'd ever had.

And now it was the worst. Her most enduring nightmare.

The day she had first seen Morgunov's face listed among the others of the Vanguard's most wanted, everything had begun to crumble. Like the ground itself had somehow been ripped out from under her.

It should have come as no surprise to her then that "Bas" never contacted her again, but for some reason, being the stupid girl that she was, she hadn't expected that, either.

And then, of course, she discovered the pregnancy.

Ismael had been so happy. Seeing him that way broke her heart in ways she never thought possible. Such a betrayal of such a perfect man.

She nearly lost her mind completely then. If not for Sentsia, she would have. It was all a fog, but she felt certain, nonetheless. Sentsia was the only thing that had gotten her through that pregnancy.

And Ibai. Sweet, darling Ibai.

She'd thought him a monster for so long, but even he proved to be a better person than her in the end. Far, far better.

She didn't know how it was possible to be so proud and so sad at the same time.

If there was any sliver of hope or salvation to be found through all of this, it was him. It was Ibai."

"2018

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Nere had to imagine that Ibai's existence had been Morgunov's goal all along. He'd wanted to create an aberration. One of the very first, seemingly, but if Morgunov was hoping for a monster of madness like himself, then he would be sorely mistaken.

Nere had no idea why Morgunov had never come for him. She had feared that every single day since he was born. But whatever the reason was, she thanked Lhutwë for it. She only prayed now that Ibai would be able to remain safe. Somehow. Please.

If there was any goodness left in the world, that had to be so.

But.

That was the real question for her at this point, wasn't it?

Was there any goodness left in the world? Not for her, surely. She readily acknowledged that. She had no future now. But what about everyone else? Was there any goodness left for them, at least?

She wanted to think so. In the few times she had actually gone outside and seen the other Rainlords bustling about this underground fortress, this Warrenhold, she had seen the light of hope in their eyes. In their postures. In their intent.

They saw it. They saw goodness in the world. Somewhere.

Were they wrong? Were they just fooling themselves until the inevitable found them, as it had found her?

She honestly did not know.

What was the point anymore? Everything was so meaningless now.

But.

But perhaps...

Perhaps if everything was meaningless, then... perhaps she could do something that had never dared do before.

Perhaps she could tell someone the truth. Perhaps she could just... confess.

Could it really be that simple? All these years, that had seemed like a thing so utterly impossible that it hardly even bore thinking about.

But now...?

Maybe it didn't matter. Maybe nothing did.

And she was beginning to wonder what might come of it."
"2019

As she sat there in the corner of her room, thinking over the idea more and more, Nere began to rock back and forth.

Yes.

Yes, perhaps telling someone the full truth of things would be for the best. Would it ease her conscience? Perhaps not. But it was a step forward, wasn't it? A step somewhere, at least? As opposed to just being lost in this dark fog forever? And if it didn't matter anymore, why should she be afraid to say anything? Because everyone would shun her? Because they would hate her?

She wanted them to. She deserved it. For too long, her sins had remained unknown, unpunished.

Maybe Sentsia would even release her soul.

She had never contemplated asking Sentsia to do that before. Why not? Perhaps it was selfishness. She had cared for her own life too much. But what need was there to care now? What was there left to live for?

All these years, she had never really understood those stories about servants asking their reapers to release them. And with as often as she had heard such tales, it seemed a fairly common occurrence. How could that be, she'd wondered?

Now she knew. Or rather, she had some semblance of knowing, at least. Perhaps it was presumptuous at this juncture to assume she could know anything of value to anyone, but she felt an understanding like she never had before.

A silent epiphany.

All those servants who asked to be released--they knew then what she had only just now realized.

In the future lay only darkness.

It was all, ultimately, without hope.

Looking back, it seemed somehow absurd that she had ever had hope to begin with. Hope for what? To what end?

Which meant that, for her, there was really only one thing left to do at this point.

But who should she tell? Well, everyone, perhaps. But who would be the best person to reveal this horrific secret to first?"
"2020

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))
Now there was a dilemma.

The best person to tell. Or the worst. Those two concepts seemed intertwined to her now.

Well, the first person who came to mind was Sentsia, of course. Being Nere's reaper, it only made sense to tell her everything first.

But what if Sentsia decided to simply release her soul then and there? Wouldn't that be too quick an end to her suffering? Sentsia probably would never do such a thing. She was too gentle and understanding.

But Nere still didn't want to take that risk. And more than likely, it just wouldn't be punishing enough. Sentsia might even try to comfort her, for some reason, and that was the absolute last thing that Nere wanted now.

No, she needed to pick someone who would hate her. Truly. Someone who would take vengeance on her.

And the more she thought about it, the more she could think of no better candidate than the Lord Zeff Elroy.

Of all people, his hatred for her would surely burn the most fiercely. He was one who sought vengeance. And he wouldn't make it quick, would he? He would make sure she paid for what she'd done.

Oh, but he probably wouldn't care all that much about Morgunov or Ibai, would he? Comparatively, at least. No, the thing that would make him hate her the most was a bit different, wasn't it?

Yes. He still didn't know about the role House Blackburn had played in the Elroy Massacre all those years ago. It had been Abolish's work, of course, but the Blackburns had let them into the country. Unwittingly, perhaps, but since when did ignorance alleviate one of responsibility?

She nodded to herself as she decided. Yes. She could tell him about that.

Finally, she could see the path forward.

Someone was talking to her. Oh, yes. Sentsia was still there, wasn't she?

'--important to attend these things,' she was saying. 'It will do the rest of the family good to see you there. They could use a morale boost, right now.'

"2021

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Morale? What was she talking about?

Oh, yes, there was some sort of family gathering today. Something to do with... a birthday?

Yes, one of the children was turning thirteen today, and the family was celebrating.

How nice.

She might have liked to go to such an event if she wasn't sure that she would just bring the mood down. If it was to be a celebration, then her presence would ruin it for everyone.

Telling Sentsia that truth would probably just upset the reaper, however. Nere decided to ignore the subject entirely.

"I would like to speak with Zeff Elroy," said Nere.

The reaper just stared at her.

To her eyes, Sentsia had the appearance of a dim ball of light with a face vaguely outlined in ethereal fire that flickered silently. A fading star of sorts.

"What?" said Nere.

'You don't say a word to me in days. You don't speak to the therapist. You don't talk to ANYONE. And then you say THAT? Of all things?'

Why was she upset? Nere didn't know. "I wish to speak with Zeff Elroy," she said again.

'No.'

Nere blinked. "Why not? You haven't even asked my reason."

'I don't need to. The answer is no.' The reaper hovered closer.

"I wish to speak to him," was all Nere could think to say. She hadn't expected Sentsia to refuse her. Sentsia had almost never refused her in all the time they'd known each other, which extended all the way back to when her engagement to Ismael had been formalized.

'There is not a chance in lakefire that I will let you to talk to that man, right now.'

"Why not?"

'Don't play dumb.' The reaper's echoing tone was perhaps colder than Nere had ever heard it before ‘Oh, but I guess you wouldn’t need to “play,” now would you?’”

"2022

Nere was trying to understand and failing. “What do you mean?”

‘Forget it. You are in no condition to be talking to anyone outside the family. Not right now, at least. Once you’ve had time to properly grieve and get your mind in order, then we can revisit this conversation.’

Nere didn’t know what to say. No one outside the family?

Hmm.

Well, perhaps Melchor would do, then. In fact, now that she was thinking about it, he might be even better. Melchor was a man who had sought vengeance for House Blackburn many years ago--and found it.

That had happened after what came to be known as the Culling at Denya.

Nere had only learned of that horrible incident long after the fact, but her understanding was that it had been a Vanguardian stealth operation that went terribly awry. The Vanguardians were betrayed, their locations revealed, and Abolish turned what should have been an ambush against them into a slaughter in their favor.

Nere had occasionally wondered if Darktide’s subsequent terrorizing of Abolish had in some way impacted Morgunov’s decision to use her as a tool against House Blackburn the way he did, but if there was a connection there, she had never been able to find it. Surely, if the Mad Demon had wanted to destroy the Blackburns, he would have been more direct about it and not resorted to such subterfuge, no?

Well, she supposed that it hardly mattered now, anyway.

“In that case,” said Nere, “I would like to talk to Melchor.”

Sentsia just stared at her again.

Nere waited, shifting uncomfortably in her tall chair. The reaper seemed quite different today, and Nere found it very unsettling.

‘Why do you want to talk to Melchor?’ said Sentsia.”

"2023

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Should she lie? Once upon a time, she had been quite a skillful liar, but here and now, with so much uncertainty roiling around inside her, she didn't know if she could muster up even the slightest bit of cunning. “What does it matter? He would not be unwilling to speak to me, would he? I wish to see him. To hear his voice.”

‘No.’ Sentsia’s tone did not imply that her mind could be changed.

Nere wanted to ask why again, but she was afraid to now. What was Sentsia thinking? How much did she really know?

‘You seem confused,’ the reaper said. ‘As you would. You stupid girl. Even after all this time, you STILL haven’t learned to see beyond yourself, your own pain, your own worry. I can’t believe I ever thought you could change.’

Nere’s eyes were wide as she listened. She could feel tears welling up already. “What are you saying? How can you--?”

‘Oh, shut your mouth, you lying whore. I can’t do this anymore. I can’t keep trying to support you in spite of everything. I can’t keep trying to bring out the best in you. There’s nothing left to bring, is there? You are little more than an empty shell now, aren’t you?’

Nere had no words. Was this even the same reaper she had known all these years?

‘If only I had learned the truth sooner,’ said Sentsia. ‘I would have revealed your infidelity forthwith, and you would have been tossed aside by House Blackburn. And Ismael might have found a woman who was truly worthy of him. But no. For whatever reason, Lhutwë deigned not to allow that justice to come to pass, and now, here we are instead. Ismael, that wonderful boy, is dead. And I must continue to endure YOU.’

Nere could only listen. The reaper was far from done.”

"2024

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'Honestly, why do you look so surprised?' said Sentsia, still in the echo of privacy. 'Tell me. Do you remember when we first harnessed pan-moc, you and I? Hmm?'

Nere managed to shake her head.

'No. You must. Do you remember how it nearly killed us both? Do you have any idea why that might have been? No? Of course you don't.' The reaper sighed. 'That was precisely the time when I learned of what you had done. When I probed our shared minds. I couldn't believe what I found. I didn't WANT to believe it. The shock was so great, in fact, that I nearly lost control of the hyper-state and allowed it to kill us both.' She paused for a chuckle. 'Perhaps I should have.'

Nere was trembling. She couldn't look at the reaper anymore.

'I want you to think about the decision that I was faced with at that time, Nere. Really think about it. Ibai was already a teenager. Melchor had returned to us. He was his old self again. House Blackburn was more unified than it had been in generations. And this knowledge that I had just acquired would tear all of that apart in an instant. Can you imagine what was going through my mind then? Hmm?'

Nere clutched her head with both hands as if to shield herself from Sentsia's words, but there was no stopping them.

'Naively, I thought there was hope,' Sentsia went on, 'because you really DID come to love Ismael and Ibai and everyone else. I could see that in you as well. I saw it. But I was a fool. Something like this was always going to happen.'

Nere asked the only question that she could think of. 'Why didn't you tell me any of this sooner?'

'To what end? To shame you? What purpose would that have served, exactly?'

'I... I don't...'

'I have always tried to be above such base instincts,' said Sentsia. 'But damn if it doesn't feel good now. Perhaps you're right. Perhaps I should have done this a long time ago.'"

Nere just shut her eyes and hung her head. Arguing was fruitless, she felt. She deserved all of this and more.

'I've never been a believer in punishment, really,' said Sentsia. 'I always thought that it was better to try to "rehabilitate" someone than to "punish" them. The desire to rehabilitate comes from a place of empathy. It's "nicer." While the desire to punish comes from a place of, arguably, anger. It's more brutalistic. It felt like something that only the unenlightened person would pursue.

'But thanks to you, I see now that I was wrong. I was too confident in my sense of moral superiority. I think, perhaps, my lack of awareness in this regard may have only served to make this situation worse. If I had thought to punish you for your actions sooner, to make you seek repentance as Lhutwë would want, then perhaps we could have begun on a slow road to betterment. Somehow.

'Now, of course, it is far too late for that. You are too far gone. Or perhaps I am. The hatred I feel for you is unlike any I have ever known in the last two thousand years. And that, I must say, is quite an accomplishment.'

Nere didn't move. 'Then just release me...'

'Ah, yes. I am considering it. This is what you desire?'

She chanced a frail look at Sentsia. 'Yes...'

'You don't wish to find a way to atone for your sins?'

Nere sat on that idea for a time. It had crossed her mind before, briefly, but it seemed so utterly impossible that she hadn't really given it much consideration at all. 'How would I be able to do that?'

'By helping me bring House Blackburn into a new, golden era.'

Nere's head reared back a little."

'You may think your life is in ruins,' said Sentsia, moving even closer still, 'and you may think that there is no point in living anymore, no future for you to look forward to. And you may be right. For you. But for the family? For all of House Blackburn? We are far from defeated.'

Was she right? Nere had a hard time imagining that she could be, but Sentsia did have two thousand years of experience and knowledge to pull from.

'You will likely find it difficult to believe in your current state of mind,' the reaper continued, 'but allow me to remind you that this family has endured worse circumstances than this in the past. You know our history. Our struggles. Even if you are ready to roll over and die, your kin--those who still consider you their family--are perfectly capable of seeing the dawn of a new and even more glorious age.

'But if you ever wish to see such a future, then you must first be punished. And as I am the only who knows the depths of your crimes, I must be the one to deal it out to you.' The reaper latched on to her arm and stayed there.

Nere did not resist. She could only think to ask one thing. 'If you do not intend to release my soul, then what do you intend to do?'

'I will have you abandon yourself.'

'W-what do you mean?'

'Any notions of your own well-being, your own desires--you will discard them. On the outside, you will pretend that nothing has changed, that you are still the same Nere that the family knows and cares for. But in private, between the two of us, you will submit to my will. Entirely.'

Again, Nere found herself without words.

'You are my servant no longer. Now, you are my slave.'"
"2027 -- CCIV.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been a long and frustrating day, to say the least. He sighed wearily as he flopped down onto his favorite bean bag, enjoying its soft and fuzzy coating in tandem with its familiar squishiness. Sour-faced and upset with himself, he allowed his eyes to drift slowly around the room.

As far as workshops went, his wasn't exactly what one might call "conventional." Old televisions lined one of the walls entirely, but most of them hadn't seen any use in twenty years or more. At one time, he'd been enamored with so many different daytime soap operas that he'd gotten into the habit of watching many of them simultaneously, but these days, he didn't have much love for the genre anymore. Looking back, it may've perhaps been a bad idea to mail in that threatening letter to the producers of Daily Love. Sure, the show had gone to hell, and everything he'd written in that letter had been one hundred percent accurate, but he hadn't wanted them and virtually every other producer in all of Bellvine to quit making daytime soaps altogether.

It had taken a few years before any new soaps had dared to start airing, but the industry had never quite recovered, he felt. The stories just didn't have the same kind of punch that they used to. True, they didn't infuriate him like before, perhaps because they no longer killed off his favorite characters--or any characters, for that matter--but they also felt, on the whole, much safer now. The writers were too afraid to take risks, he supposed. Which was a shame.

Then again, maybe it was for the best. Without so many soaps distracting him all the time, he'd been able to focus more on his creative work again.

Which was the source of his current frustration."
"2027 -- CCIV.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))
Chapter Two Hundred Four: 'When an archdemon stirs...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been a long and frustrating day, to say the least. He sighed wearily as he flopped down onto his favorite bean bag, enjoying its soft and fuzzy coating in tandem with its familiar squishiness. Sour-faced and upset with himself, he allowed his eyes to drift slowly around the room.

As far as workshops went, his wasn't exactly what one might call ""conventional."" Old televisions lined one of the walls entirely, but most of them hadn't seen any use in twenty years or more. At one time, he'd been enamored with so many different daytime soap operas that he'd gotten into the habit of watching many of them simultaneously, but these days, he didn't have much love for the genre anymore. Looking back, it may've perhaps been a bad idea to mail in that threatening letter to the producers of Daily Love. Sure, the show had gone to hell, and everything he'd written in that letter had been one hundred percent accurate, but he hadn't wanted them and virtually every other producer in all of Bellvine to quit making daytime soaps altogether.

It had taken a few years before any new soaps had dared to start airing, but the industry had never quite recovered, he felt. The stories just didn't have the same kind of punch that they used to. True, they didn't infuriate him like before, perhaps because they no longer killed off his favorite characters--or any characters, for that matter--but they also felt, on the whole, much safer now. The writers were too afraid to take risks, he supposed. Which was a shame.

Then again, maybe it was for the best. Without so many soaps distracting him all the time, he'd been able to focus more on his creative work again.

Which was the source of his current frustration."

"2028

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Feldeaths were so obnoxious. It was unbelievable how stubborn they were. It was like they were somehow made of stubbornness. At first, he'd merely been curious as to whether or not it would be possible to supercharge an aberration by feeding a feldeath to one of them, but after a string of continuous and sometimes explosive failures, he'd resorted to merely trying to observe feldeaths more closely and hopefully learn something about the composition of their mysterious bodies.

They were the only beings on the planet that could manipulate physical reality directly while having entirely incorporeal bodies--or at least, that was the commonly held belief. He'd begun wondering if perhaps they did have some physical component to them--a component which had simply yet to be discovered by any scholar in history. It shouldn't be possible, given everything that was known about how feldeaths were born, but Nibas Dimitri Aurelion Lotorevo Morgunov wasn't one for allowing his curiosity to be sated by the theories of other supposed scientists.

He'd learned long ago not to trust information he couldn't verify for himself. And boy, did feldeaths make that widely held theory difficult to verify.

They absolutely hated being observed. And the way they could change the composition of their bodies at the drop of a hat certainly didn't help, either. If they did have some hidden physical component to their bodies, he wondered if they might be able to phase said component in and out of reality at will. And in such a case, confirming the component's existence would require around-the-clock study using every observational instrument known to man--and perhaps some which were still unknown to it.

But accomplishing all of that meant capturing one of the bloody things, and there existed no material on this planet which could keep a feldeath caged for very long. Maybe if he took a break and studied up on quantum fluctuations, he would be able to figure out some new method of approach for these problems.

But.

Meh..."
"2029

His fervor for the feldeath problem had diminished rather substantially, of late. He had always despised the idea of ""giving up,"" no matter what the experiment entailed, but living as long as he had, he'd slowly grown to have a different understanding of what that meant. To him, he wasn't so much giving up as he was just shelving the project for a while. He'd return to it whenever his interest in it was rekindled. True, that could be a hundred years from now or more, but such was the nature of immortality.

On the other hand, though, a part of him didn't think he would actually last another hundred years. In truth, a part of him didn't want to--but not because he was so miserable or otherwise tired of living, as several of his contemporaries seemed to be.

Rather, it was just the opposite.

The idea that someone out there might finally punch his ticket for him?

That would be so exciting. Who could pull off such a feat? And how?

There was a time when he genuinely thought that Jercash might be the one to do it, but that sourpuss didn't seem interested in the idea, anymore. What a disappointing realization that had been. Jercash obviously wanted to lead Abolish, but apparently, he didn't much care about getting the credit for doing so. These days, the sly boy seemed only too happy to use his ""crazy"" boss as an excuse for all manner of things, whether it be scapegoating him or feigning an inferiority complex or some other underhanded thing.

There was no doubt in Morgunov's mind that Jercash had a hand in the untimely deaths of Gunther and Dunhouser. Sure, Jackson may have been the one that actually killed them, but Jercash probably manufactured the circumstances that had allowed that to happen."
"2030

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

In a way, Morgunov was proud of him. The world hadn't started calling his sly boy the Devil's Knife for nothing.

Of course, Jercash probably didn't think that he could see any of that.

But he could.

Morgunov could always see.

If anything, his problem was that he could see too much.

It had always been that way.

There was a time, long in the past now, when he had hated that part of himself. When he had wanted to be normal. To have a regular brain like everyone else. The world had certainly tried its damndest to make him feel that way in his youth. Adults didn't like being seen through by a child, nor told what to do, even for their own betterment--even if they could tell that it was for their own betterment.

But perhaps that was merely human nature. Compulsive independence, even against demonstrable truth. 'Twas a matter of pride, he supposed.

It too often was.

Those times were so distant to his mind now that they felt almost as if they had happened to someone else--and indeed, he sometimes questioned if they did.

The mind was a funny thing, wasn't it? There was no more powerful object in the known universe than the human brain, and yet it was still so prone to errors. The philosophical problem of the unreliable narrator: summarized. How can a man trust his own thoughts when he knows his mind to be so deeply flawed? How can one think correctly when the act of thinking itself might be incorrect?

It was a dilemma that had always fascinated him--even to the point of dabbling in the treacherous technology of cerebral enhancement for a while--but he had yet to find a satisfactory resolution to it."

"2031

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

This was why he had never had a problem with hubris and never would. Unlike certain others. He knew only too well how fine a line there was between intellect and delusion, genius and madness. It was as slippery a matter as the very struggle between Order and Chaos themselves. And that probably was not a coincidence.

Hmm.

Wait a minute.

Yeah. Now there was a thought. It probably wasn't a coincidence, was it?

So then... what was it?

Morgunov sat up suddenly.

Order and Chaos. Intellect and delusion. Order and Chaos. Genius and madness. Order and Chaos. Death and life. Order and Chaos, Order and Chaos, Order and Chaos...

Hmm.

Destruction. And. Creation.

Or?

Creation. And. Destruction?

It all made sense to him now. And yet, none of it did.

Was this, too, as it was supposed to be?

There was a grand separation between merely understanding something and manifesting that knowledge into reality. Understanding how to build a thermonuclear warhead, for instance, was one thing, but actually building one--now that was quite another thing, wasn't it? There were little differences here and there that came with the genuine experience. Philosophizing and intellectualizing were only good up to a point.

He wondered how well the ancient ""gods"" of this world had known that. Hmm. Perhaps they'd known it even better than he?

Well, if they hadn't known it then, they certainly knew it now, didn't they?

Eheheh.

He stroked his chin.

Whoa, there was a lot more hair there than he remembered. When was the last time he'd shaved? Two years ago? Ten? No telling.

'Hey, Bool, when was the last time I shaved?' he asked.

The response arrived so slowly that Morgunov thought Bool might've been giving him the silent treatment again. '...I have no idea,' the reaper said from elsewhere in the underground compound."

"2032

Morgunov probably could have located him more precisely if he concentrated, but he didn't really feel like it. 'Hey, are you mad at me again?'

'Always.'

'Aww.'

'Are you finally finished playing around with your toys?' Bool asked. 'The world is still in dire need of purging.'

'Eheh.'

There came a pause. 'What is that laugh for?'

'You sure love your purges, don't you?'

'You used to love them, too, as I recall. Before you got lazy.'

'I dunno. After the hundredth one, they got kinda boring, y'know?'

'Morgunov.' There arrived a familiar sigh. 'I know I might as well be talking to a tree at this point, but I shall keep trying, nonetheless. This is a serious matter. The Vanguard is at an advantage, right now.'

Morgunov picked his nose and inspected the booger. 'Oh, are they?'

'Yes. If you continue to do nothing, they may soon destroy the whole of Abolish.'

'Uh-huh...'

Another sigh. 'If you would take to the field but one time, I am sure that we could--'

'Eh, I'm sure my boy can handle it.'

'Jercash has his back against the wall, at the moment. If you care for him at all, then you should--'

'I JUST told you he could handle it.'

'Yes, but if Sermung or Jackson--'

'Hey, I had an idea I wanna run by you real quick.'

Another noticeable pause arrived. '...What is it?'

'You remember that time I went a little crazy?'

'...You will have to be more specific.'

'In Bellvine. With the whole rainbow slime situation?'

'I was not present for that. You deliberately left me behind, remember?'

'Oh, yeah. But you remember me telling you about it afterwards, right?'

'Yes. Why?'

'You know, that was one of the few times in my life that I've heard a voice in my head that wasn't you.'

'...I do not think that is true at all.'

'Hmm? Oh, yeah, sure, I've heard loads of other voices, but ultimately, I knew those were all still ME.'

'...I doubt that as well.'

"2033

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Okay, maybe I got a little muddled here or there,' said Morgunov, 'but I'm telling you, it's the truth. There's a nuance to it that I don't think you--or most people, really--can appreciate. When voices are just appearing in your mind from your very own imagination or subconscious, there is a difference. Compared to when someone is trying to invade your mind? Talk to you? Plant ideas in your head? Control you? You can feel the intent behind it. That's the thing that never changes. The will of the speaker.'

'I suppose you would be an authority on that subject, wouldn't you?' said Bool.

'Eheheh. Yeah. I wish another telepath would try to play with me again. The last time was so much fun.'

'After what you did to the Weaver, I doubt any of them would be so stupid.'

'Hey, she did that to herself. It wasn't my fault.'

'If you say so. Why are you bringing all of this up, anyway?'

'Because I had a thought. That time in Bellvine. I searched for so long afterward, but I never did find the source of that voice I was hearing.'

'Yes, I recall it causing you quite a bit of frustration.'

'That voice was so bossy. It really wanted my body.' Morgunov paused for a chortle to himself. 'It seemed very upset when it realized that my will was stronger than its own.'

'Didn't you say that you had an idea that you wanted to run by me? What does any of this have to do with that?'

'Oh, because I was thinking I might like to give that another go.'

'What? You want to try merging with a primordial ooze again?'

'Hmm? No, no! That would be boring! Merging is boring! But pets?! Pets never get boring! Everyone loves pets!'

'...Come again?' said Bool."

"2034

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'One of these so-called primordial ""gods"" would make for a great pet, don't you think?' said Morgunov. 'No, not just a great pet. The BEST pet. Right? You agree, don't you?'

'I am sorry,' said Bool. 'I must be misunderstanding something. You want to turn an ancient being of untold power into your PET?'

Morgunov's smile widened. 'Yep!' He bounded off of his fuzzy beanbag and onto his feet again.

'And. Um. Okay. How do you plan to pull that off, exactly?'

'That IS the question, isn't it?'

'You don't even have an idea?'

'Eheh. Didn't say that.'

The reaper sighed yet again. 'Were you not trying to turn feldeaths into your pets, also?'

Morgunov's expression soured a little. 'No. That was for aberration research. Feldeaths wouldn't make good pets. Don't be stupid.'

'Oh, but an ancient god would be a better choice?'

'Duh!'

'Why? You're not making any sense.'

'Because! A feldeath is just a creature of pure instinct. There's no rational mind there to converse with. There's no ego to be laid low. You can't humble a feldeath. They have no pride.'

'Ah... and what if you can't control whatever ""god"" you manage to find?'

'Eheh. Well, then, things will get fun.'

'Morgunov. This isn't--' But the reaper didn't finish.

And Morgunov was made to wonder why.

'Actually,' said Bool with a sudden spark of enthusiasm, 'you might just be onto something.'

'You think so?'

'I do. And of course, if you intend to find yourself a pet god, then I suppose you'll have to do some rather extensive traveling, won't you?'

'Hmm. Yeah, I suppose I will.'

'What could be more fun than that?' said Bool. 'Exploring the world for ancient secrets?'

'Yeah! It's been a long time since I went on a proper adventure!'"
"2035 -- CCV.

'Make sure you bring plenty of your gadgets and tools. Never know when you might need something,' said Bool.

'Right!'

'And personnel, as well.'

'Oh. You think?'

'Of course. More people will help the search go faster. And besides, traveling in a group is always more enjoyable than doing it alone.'

'Hmm-hmm.'

'And we have many fantastic subordinates who are eager to help you. You have not even met some of them yet. Let us send out word for them all to begin gathering. We shall make a party out of it.'

'Okay! I mean, I know you're trying to trick me, but I don't care, because it just sounds so great!'

'That is perfectly fine with me.'

Chapter Two Hundred Five: 'O, light that shines from the darkness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ibai Blackburn never had so much to do. The Library of Erudition was unlike anything he had ever dreamed of. So much knowledge resided here, just waiting to be discovered--or rediscovered, perhaps.

The Library had a mind of its own. That much was quite clear to Ibai by now. And it was greedy, too. Despite how much it tried to tempt people into its clutches, the Library most certainly wanted to hoard all its secrets for itself.

Hopefully, it would like the book he was writing for it. Maybe then it would warm up to him a little.

He didn't have much experience with writing, really. It had always seemed like a rather boring thing to do, and the only reason he knew anything about sentence structure or grammar was because his mother had forced him to learn at a very young age. Even now, he wasn't quite sure how she'd managed that feat. He remembered being quite the rambunctious kid, back then--not at all like his more mature and serious self today."

"2035 -- CCV.

'Make sure you bring plenty of your gadgets and tools. Never know when you might need something,' said Bool.

'Right!'

'And personnel, as well.'

'Oh. You think?'

'Of course. More people will help the search go faster. And besides, traveling in a group is always more enjoyable than doing it alone.'

'Hmm-hmm.'

'And we have many fantastic subordinates who are eager to help you. You have not even met some of them yet. Let us send out word for them all to begin gathering. We shall make a party out of it.'

'Okay! I mean, I know you're trying to trick me, but I don't care, because it just sounds so great!'

'That is perfectly fine with me.'

Chapter Two Hundred Five: 'O, light that shines from the darkness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ibai Blackburn never had so much to do. The Library of Erudition was unlike anything he had ever dreamed of. So much knowledge resided here, just waiting to be discovered--or rediscovered, perhaps.

The Library had a mind of its own. That much was quite clear to Ibai by now. And it was greedy, too. Despite how much it tried to tempt people into its clutches, the Library most certainly wanted to hoard all its secrets for itself.

Hopefully, it would like the book he was writing for it. Maybe then it would warm up to him a little.

He didn't have much experience with writing, really. It had always seemed like a rather boring thing to do, and the only reason he knew anything about sentence structure or grammar was because his mother had forced him to learn at a very young age. Even now, he wasn't quite sure how she'd managed that feat. He remembered being quite the rambunctious kid, back then--not at all like his more mature and serious self today."

"2036

Ibai's pen stopped moving for a minute. How was his mother doing, he wondered? Hopefully well. The rest of the family, too.

The news of his father's death had had a strange effect on him.

He supposed this was what people meant when they referred to being ""sad""--this oppressive feeling, deep in his chest and in his mind. Like someone had draped weights all over him.

Even though he was thirty-five years old, sadness was a thing unfamiliar to him. Sure, he'd known that horrible stuff could happen, that the world beyond his little ""cage"" in Marshrock could be cruel and unforgiving. Anyone who had watched a serious movie or read a sad story could tell that much.

But this?

Actually experiencing it?

It was absolutely awful. And the worst thing about it, Ibai thought, was that there was nothing he could do. Because in the end, it wasn't really about him, was it? It was about what had happened to his father.

In a weird way, sadness was a surprisingly selfish compulsion. It was like it wanted him to focus on himself, on this horrible feeling within him, instead of on his father--on the actual loss. And wasn't that what he was supposed to be focusing on? The object of his grief?

Was this what sadness was really meant to feel like?

It was confusing.

His body didn't always feel in perfect concert with his thoughts. Occasionally, there would just be tears in his eyes for no apparent reason to him, and he found himself thinking of the past a lot more as well.

That part, at least, he didn't hate. It felt nice to remember the past. It seemed like a better thing to do than simply dwelling on how terrible he felt. Less self-concerned, maybe.

He wondered if he would ever be the same again. Or if anything would, really."
"2037

~((National Bubble Wrap Appreciation Day Special - page 1 of 6))~~

Ibair returned to his writing.

Despite his lack of experience, his pen moved without the slightest hesitation. The words just flowed.

He hadn't spent long agonizing over what to write about. At first, he considered just compiling and commenting on various reading materials that struck his fancy, but then he began to think that, no, he shouldn't use material that the Library already possessed. He wanted to give this book to the Library as a gift--to make it happy--and he figured that his best chance of doing that was to make something original.

So he resorted to fiction. A little novella. And at the rate he was going, it would probably be finished before long.

He just wrote. He had no idea where the story was going. Hell, he didn't even know where each new sentence was going. He just focused on keeping his hand moving and letting the words fall where they may.

It was surprisingly quite fun. He'd heard about the supposed difficulty of writing, but so far, it had been easy as pie. Almost like he wasn't even doing anything, like he was merely a vessel for the story being told, rather than the one creating it.

He hadn't thought of a title just yet, but thus far, his story was about a snake that could transform into a human. The snake enjoyed being a human so much that he began to question if he hadn't been a human all along and simply forgotten. Was he a snake that could become human? Or a human that could become a snake? Or did it even matter?

Oh, and there were robots. And flying camels. And two sentient bowls of chili that argued over philosophy.

All in all, he was eager to see how it would progress."

"2038

~((National Bubble Wrap Appreciation Day Special - page 2 of 6))~~

'Hey, Ibai,' came the voice of Chergoa.

Ibai looked up from his paper to see the reaper hovering over him. To his eyes, reapers were tiny things--little action figures that bobbed amusingly through the air as they moved. He had always enjoyed watching them, though they had not often enjoyed being watched. By him, in particular.

Chergoa, however, didn't seem particularly uncomfortable around him anymore. And he found that quite surprising. Even the reapers of House Blackburn, despite all that they had done to protect him, had still always carried a slight air of uneasiness in his presence. He had long since grown used to it. That was just how reapers were.

But Chergoa was different. She'd been going out of her way to spend time with him, lately.

It was really nice.

'How's the story comin' along?' she asked.

He looked down at what he'd written and discovered many more pages full of text than he'd realized. ""Uh. Pretty good, I think. Thanks for asking."" It was easy to give her a big smile. ""Is there something you need?""

'No. Just checking in with you. You've been writing all day, you know.'

""Have I?"" He blinked and scratched the middle of his forehead.

This little desk that he'd been using was wedged into one of the farthest corners of the Library's main chamber. Giant bookshelves surrounded him on all sides, save one narrow gap that led to a zigzagging path back to the middle of the room.

Cramped was one word for it, but he'd found it quite cozy. It was so quiet here, and the smell of books was its own kind of alluring.

'Have you eaten anything today?' Chergoa asked.

Ibai wasn't actually sure. ""Um...?""

'Alright, c'mon. You and me. We're going to the refectory right now.'

Ibai chuckled faintly and put his pen down again."

"2039

~((National Bubble Wrap Appreciation Day Special - page 3 of 6))~~

'You should really be more mindful of these things,' Chergoa was saying as they navigated their way through the maze of bookshelves together. Even as a reaper, she had to follow the path along with him. For whatever reason, she was unable to phase through any part of this building, even the books. 'What would you do if you collapsed from exhaustion, huh?'

For a change, Ibai didn't know what to say--nor did he particularly want to say anything at all. Somehow, he enjoyed listening to her talk to him like this. Her tone may have been a bit harsh or irritated, but it still made him happy, nonetheless.

Heh.

It was a rather long walk, and Chergoa inquired further into the details of the story that he was writing. Ibai was quite pleased to elaborate for her, but after a while, she asked about another subject.

'Still no luck finding any books about aberrations?' she said.

""Nope,"" said Ibai. ""I think our existence might be too recent for this Library. It's tough to find any book that's less than two hundred years old.'"

'Shame. I bet Gohvis would know more about your kind, but good luck getting it out of him.'

Ibai flashed a quick grin. "'He does seem pretty tight-lipped, doesn't he?'"

'Ha. Good one.'

""Because he doesn't have lips.""

'Yes, I understood the joke, Ibai. You don't have to explain it.'

""Yeah, but I wanted to, though.""

'Well, it kind of kills the humor of it when you explain the joke.'

""Mm, I've heard that before, but I disagree. I think it makes it even funnier, actually.""

'You do, huh?'

""Yup!""

'Well. Uh. That's. Really weird, but alright.'

""Plus, I think it helps ensure that no one is left out of the joke--which is important, because that's never a good feeling, is it? Missing out on the thing that everyone else is laughing at? That's no fun.""

'You've given this more thought than I would've expected.'

""Here, let me tell you another joke.""

'Oh, okay, this oughta be good.'

"2040

~((National Bubble Wrap Appreciation Day Special - page 4 of 6))~

""Why did the chicken cross the road?"" said Ibai.

'To get to the other side,' finished Chergoa.

""Oh, so you've heard this one before?""

The reaper laughed. 'Yes. Crazily enough, I have.'

""Well, anyway, you see, the reason that joke is funny is because the punchline is so mundane that you don't expect it. And humor, at its core, is all about subverting expectations.""

'Uh-huh.'

""With that particular joke, you probably would've expected something sillier like, 'to get to his five-O'CLUCK meeting.'""

'...That's probably a better punchline, actually.'

""Hmm, maybe. And the reason that one is funny is because it's a play on words.""

'Yeah, I got that.'

""It's what they call a 'pun.'""

'Okay, please stop,' said Chergoa, though she was laughing again.

""Are you sure you don't need me to keep explaining?""

'I'm pretty sure.'

""Well, I think I've proved my point, anyway.""

'I'm really not sure you have.'

""Oh, so you do want me to keep explaining! In that case--""

'Oh, look, we've arrived!' laughed Chergoa. 'Why don't you go pick something out to eat?'

Ibai couldn't deny that he was famished, so he decided to do as she suggested.

The refectory was an interesting place in its own right. A huge, vaulted chamber--the selection of food here rivaled what he had known in Marshrock all his life. Which made very little sense to him, considering the Library of Erudition was located on the dead continent of Exoltha, surrounded by the impassable storm, the Dáinnbolg. It was certainly enough to make him curious about how they were able to maintain such a luxurious stock, but he hadn't been able to solve that mystery yet.

He decided on chicken tenders. A simple meal, perhaps, but an old favorite. His mother had previously chastised him for his ""unrefined palate,"" not befitting a nobleman, but his father had never seemed to mind, so Ibai had never really taken her words in that regard to heart."
"2041

~((National Bubble Wrap Appreciation Day Special - page 5 of 6))~~

Typically, when looking for a good spot to sit and eat, Ibai would join the nearest group of people and just start chatting away. He'd gotten to know several of Gohvis' subordinates much better as a result, but today, he wasn't feeling quite so sociable--and he already had Chergoa for company. He settled on a table in the far corner of the room.

'By the way,' said Chergoa as he was sitting down, 'have you found any neat books, lately?'

""Boy, have I!"" he said mid-bite. ""There was one I saw the other day called The Deadly Cantaloupe and the Five Rings of Mercy.""

'I... see. What did you like about it?'

""Oh, I haven't read it yet, but with a name like that, it has to be incredible.""

The reaper's tiny, plastic face seemed suddenly even more flat than it already was. 'Anything else?'

He took a minute to chew on that question and his chicken at the same time.

She'd been asking a lot about his reading list, lately, and the question as to why she was so interested had occurred to him a few times. He hadn't bothered to actually ask it, though, because he was a little afraid it might deter future inquiries. And he liked telling her.

Maybe she was honestly just curious, but Ibai had the feeling that she was looking for something. Maybe not something specific, though. Just something to latch onto. Something that might trigger a thousand-year-old memory, perhaps, and present her with an opportunity to learn some phenomenal secret.

In the short time he had known her, Ibai had come to care very deeply for Chergoa, but he was also not blind to the ambition that burned quietly within her.

He kind of liked that about her, too, though. It was good to be so driven."

"2042

~((National Bubble Wrap Appreciation Day Special - page 6 of 6))~~

""Well,"" said Ibai after swallowing his food, ""I suppose there were a few other titles that also sounded interesting, like Emergent Phenomena, The Composure of Fate's Arbiters, The Theory of Empty Worlds, and The Hypothetical Evolution of Friendship.""

Chergoa needed a second to process all of those.

Ibai had more, though. ""Oh, or maybe The Little Grape That Tried His Best, Kaleidoscopes for Kaleido-dopes, and Little Jimmy and the Pear-Shaped Pear.""

'...That first batch sounded a little more to my tastes.'

""Hmm. Really? I also saw How to Climb the Ladder of Success by Only Cheating a Little Bit, How to Program a VCR, and Learning to Read Your Own Thoughts.""

'Yeah, uh. Still prefer the first ones.'

""Oh, but you might also like--""

'Have you actually read any of these books yet?'

""I usually just skim. Reading titles is super fun, though!""

'Uh-huh...'

""Truthfully, I'm always a little reluctant to actually sit down and try to get into a new book,"" said Ibai, ""because I can't tell you how many times I've ended up disappointed. I see a title that sounds super neatburrito, only for it to get boring really quickly. It's super unfortunate when that happens.""

The reaper paused. 'And how often DOES that happen for you, exactly?'

""Oh, I don't know, maybe ninety-three percent of the time or so.""

'I see...'

""Hmm. You think that's too much?""

'Maybe a tad, yeah.'

Ibai resumed eating.

'Well, I don't suppose you happened to skim through any of those first books you mentioned, did you?'

He thought back. ""Emergent Phenomena by Roberto del Otoy. That one talked about famous historical instances of emergence among servants. Apparently, it's a bit of a bad omen when lots of people find out you've achieved emergence, because in many of those cases, the servant and reaper pairing were either killed a few years thereafter or otherwise ended their relationship for some reason.""

"2043

'Interesting,' said Chergoa, looking around the refectory. 'What else did it say?' Her voice had noticeably lowered. While she couldn't technically ""whisper,"" since the radius of people who would be able to overhear her would always remain the same, she could still control her speaking volume, somewhat.

Ibai knew why, of course. The other people in the room were Gohvis' men. Members of Abolish. Ideally, she didn't want to share information with them needlessly. Chergoa might have come right and told him as much, but unfortunately, she could only speak privately with her own servant, Emiliana.

Ibai didn't know if that should be such a big concern, though. These Abolishers were quite different from the ones he'd met at Dunehall. He couldn't even tell if any of them actually wanted to leave this place. Many of them seemed perfectly content to remain in the Library with Gohvis.

He'd asked a few of them why. They'd all given some variation of the same basic sentiments.

""Because we are safe here, and it is the Master's will.""

The loyalty that these people had for Gohvis was not to be underestimated, Ibai felt. Whether it was fear or adoration that motivated them, he couldn't yet tell, but whatever it was, it was strong. It seemed like some of these servants were even more loyal to Gohvis than they were to their own reapers.

But he understood Chergoa's caution, of course. Even if these people planned to stay here indefinitely, it was still a good idea to keep as much information between the two of them as they could. And given that notion, it might've been wiser to move this conversation somewhere other than the refectory, but Ibai felt like it hardly mattered, really. As far as he could tell, there was no location within the Library that could truly guarantee privacy. For all they knew, even the Library itself could've been listening to their conversation.

Technically, he also could've enveloped her with his muddy shadow to conceal her voice for her, but how suspicious would that be?

No, it was better for Chergoa to simply be careful with her words.

Ibai, however, being able to whisper, was quite happy to say whatever he wanted."

"2044

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Oh, it said lots of other stuff,"" said Ibai. ""Have you heard of something called the 'Breaking of Korgum?""

Chergoa was silent a moment. 'Yes.'

""And did you know that there were tons of famous people who achieved emergence during it?""

'Yes...'

""Like the Devil's Knife, the Man of Crows, Bloodeye, the Hammer, the Gargoyle, the Surgeon Saint. And those are just the ones still alive. There were dozens more who are dead now, like the Red Tiger, Bug Boy, Darkhand, the Owl, the Mad Piper, and so on. There were loads of 'em.'"

'It is a trend I am familiar with,' said Chergoa. 'And it makes a degree of sense, of course. Those prone to achieving emergence in the first place are generally not the most safety-conscious. They keep throwing themselves into dangerous situation after dangerous situation. It only makes sense that, at some point, their luck runs out. Or the ungodly level of stress gets to them, and they just snap--at which point, any reasonable reaper would release them.'

Ibai had to frown. ""That's not a very pleasant way of looking at it.""

'Is there a way of looking at it that IS pleasant?'

""Hmm. Maybe not. But I also imagine that their undoings might not have all been their own fault. That kind of fame would place a target on your back, no?""

'Oh, of course. Your kin have a term for that, don't they?'

Ibai nodded. ""An astero.""

'That's an old Arman word, isn't it? Does it have a literal translation?'

""'Star that burns with the fires of all.' And the word 'all,' in this instance, is specifically meant to include oneself.""

'Bit of a mouthful, that. I can see why they wanted a term for it.'"
"2045

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""The book also mentioned instances of 'multi-emergence' and 'counter-emergence.' Battles between emergence-prone servants have historically been known for that type of thing, along with all the collateral damage caused.""

'Hmm, it doesn't sound like you only ""skimmed"" this book,' said Chergoa.

Ibai smiled as he took another bite. ""I skim very thoroughly.""

'That doesn't--y'know what? Alright. Anything else?'

He thought about it as he chewed. ""Mm, don't think so. It had a lot of dates and stuff in it. The author was a very detail-obsessed, I think. Which is cool 'n all, but I got kinda bored. The Hypothetical Evolution of Friendship by Kareem Rambata was able to hold my attention a bit better.""

'Oh? And why is that?'

""Because it was full of all sorts of crazy ideas!"" A bit of food flew out of Ibai's mouth, but he paid it no mind. ""Like, what if it was possible for normal people to sync their souls in the same way that servants and reapers can?""

Chergoa looked unimpressed. 'Is that what the title was referring to by ""Friendship?""'

""I think so, yeah. The writer theorized that a strong enough bond of friendship could make up for the lack of a reaper's presence in the relationship.""

'Uh-huh...'

""Wouldn't that be neat?""

'Sure. If it wasn't complete horseshit. Such an idea is demonstrably untrue. Thousands of years of servant-reaper history prove it. Honestly, that's one of the dumbest things I've ever heard.'

Ibai's mouth flattened. ""Well, if you're gonna be like that, then maybe I won't tell you about the other theories that the book talked about.""

'Doesn't sound like I'd be missing out on much,' said Chergoa.

""That's very rude, you know.""

'Look, not every book is gonna be a winner, okay? In fact, statistically speaking, most are gonna be stinkers. I know you're a curious guy by nature, and that's good--great, even. But you should really try not to get distracted by crackpot ideas that make no sense.'

""Hmph."" He went back to his tendies for comfort.

'Don't get me wrong. They're fun to delve into every now and again for a laugh, but c'mon.'

""What about the potential for a technological solution to the same problem?"" said Ibai, still chewing.

'What do you mean?'

""It's another idea put forth in The Hypothetical Evolution of Friendship--the concept that one day, perhaps, science and technology will be able to accomplish what only you reapers are currently capable of.""

Chergoa was silent.

""It makes sense, doesn't it? It might be a very long time, but given the steady march of human ingenuity, it seems all but inevitable, don't you think?""

'Hmm.'

""I think that book had a slight anti-reaper bias, though. The author seemed to take a certain level of delight in the idea that reapers might one day be rendered obsolete.""

'That's understandable,' said Chergoa. 'I would wager that reapers, in large part, could be blamed for many of the world's societal problems throughout history. We make for pretty easy scapegoats.'

""The book also discussed a kind of 'secret society' of reapers,"" said Ibai. ""The Andanatt? Or 'Sovereign,' in modern Mohssian? Ever heard of it?""

'I have.'

""And? What do you think of it?""

The reaper was quiet a moment, and she glanced around the room another time.

Ibai looked as well, but it didn't seem like anyone was paying them any attention at all.

'It's tough to say for sure,' said Chergoa. 'I've heard rumors, of course, here and there. But decades go by, or centuries, until I hear something else, and it's hard to tell if it's anything more than someone's overactive imagination.'

Ibai's nose was itchy, so he scratched it. And kept eating. ""Well, Kareem Rambata seemed to believe it was real. He even said that Andanatt was the true enemy of all mankind and that it had been actively trying to suppress technological development all over the planet for millennia.""

'Yes, I've heard the like before,' said Chergoa."
"2047

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))
""But you don't believe it, I suppose,"" said Ibai.

'I don't know,' she said. 'It just seems a little counterproductive to obsess over it when there's no real proof to go on.'

""Hmm-hmm.""

'What about those other two books you mentioned? What were those about?'

""One was about shared qualities of famous historical figures,"" said Ibai. ""The Composure of Fate's Arbiters by Jara Hanseth. It has some pretty wild theories of its own, actually.""

'Oh, goodie.'

""It puts forth the idea that there's this super-secret 'bloodline of kings' that has existed since ancient times!""

'Uh-huh...'

""The author points to a bunch of ancient people like Rizo the Great, Arnel the Terror, and Makio the Immense, saying that they all emerged from total obscurity to build vast empires.""

'Okay, look, I hate to shit on reading, but this is why books are overrated. Comparing Rizo the Great to Arnel the Terror is the stupidest fucking thing I've ever heard in my life. Good god.'

At her reaction, Ibai's eyes widened a bit, and he smiled. He had seen her get like this a few times before when they were discussing reading material, and he couldn't wait to hear more of her opinion.

'I lived through both of those men's eras, and Arnel was such a colossal douche and overall hate-filled bastard that I don't even want to mention his name any more than that. Rizo, meanwhile, was a visionary who actually worked to improve the lives of his subjects. Sure, in some ways he failed at that, but in many others he succeeded. Suggesting that those two guys had anything more than the most superficial qualities in common is utter nonsense. They could not have been more different.'

""Heh heh. You're very passionate.""

'Yeah, well. I know a lot of historians try their best, but I also know that a lot of others DON'T. And it pisses me off, because who's gonna correct them, huh?'

""Mm, reapers?""

'Theoretically, yeah. But what about when the reapers are the ones getting it wrong in the first place? We're certainly not perfect, either.'
"2048

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Ibai nodded with understanding. ""I suppose that would be a problem, wouldn't it?""

'Yeah. But anyway, it sounds like listening to anything else that book had to say would just make me angry, so what about the other one you mentioned?'

""Oh, The Theory of Empty Worlds by Hamish Harundel,"" said Ibai. ""That one was kind of neat, but I have a feeling you might hate it, too.""

'Oh? And why is that? Does it include more crackpot conspiracies, pseudoscientific musings, or idiotic historical takes?'

Ibai pursed his lips and avoided looking at her. ""Maaaybe...""

The reaper gave a small laugh. 'Well, I'll try to keep an open mind this time.'

""Heh, okay."" He took a second to consider how best to begin. It was a pretty weird thing to try and explain, he was suddenly realizing. ""Um. Basically, the book was trying to put forth this idea that the physical world as we know it is, in truth, comprised of many 'sub-worlds,' so to speak.""

'Hmm.'

""Another way of thinking about it might be alternate dimensions, but not in the sense of parallel realities. When I think of parallel realities, I think of alternate versions of myself and everyone else roaming around, living slightly different lives 'n whatnot, but that's not what the author was getting at. In fact, he went on a rather long tangent about how frustrated it made him when people mistook his theory as something like that. That part was interesting. You could really feel his exasperation. It seemed like his theory wasn't very well-received by his scholarly peers.""

'...Are you sure you only ""skimmed"" this book?'

""Yeah, why?""

'Doesn't matter. What made this theory of his different from more conventional ideas of alternate dimensions?'

""Oh, because his versions of alternate dimensions are directly connected to and affected by one another. And most importantly of all, our dimension is the only one with people in it. The only one that's not 'empty,' in other words.""

'Ah. So that's why he called it the Theory of Empty Worlds.'

""Yeah.""

"2049 -- CCVI.

'Well, it does sound pretty far-fetched, but at least it's not making me angry,' said Chergoa. 'How did Hamish Harundel think all these different dimensions ""connected"" to each other, exactly?'

""In a 'foundational sense,' was how he put it,"" said Ibai. ""So like, if there's a big rock in our dimension, then every element of that rock might exist simultaneously in its own dimension. He suggested that we therefore live in what he called a 'higher dimension,' and these elemental ones would be considered 'lower dimensions.'""

'Hmm...'

""He also seemed to think it was linked with the use of servant abilities, particularly materialization and transfiguration.""

'Wait a minute. Was he trying to argue that servants are actually summoning their material from other dimensions?'

""Yes, I think he was.""

'That would be pretty nuts. And also rather difficult to disprove.'

""Ooh, then it must be true!""

'That's not how finding the truth works. But I think you know that, already, don't you?'

""Hehe.""

'How dare you tease me.'

Chapter Two Hundred Six: 'The advancing vista...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The past few days had been busy for the young Lord Goffe, but not in a particularly abnormal way. Daily meetings and training and overseeing things around Warrenhold--he was starting to realize that this was just how his life was going to be from now on. It probably wasn't going to let up anytime soon.

As he was becoming more accustomed to the routine of it, he was starting to find it slightly easier to squeeze in time for patrols or even for actual leisure--which was a thing he'd almost forgotten how to do. If not for Garovel's insistence that he occasionally take some time to just relax and decompress, Hector probably wouldn't have done it at all.

It helped that the underground hot springs were beginning to take shape. There was still quite a bit of construction left to do on them, but they weren't all flooded anymore, and there were two small but functional areas."

"2049 -- CCVI.

'Well, it does sound pretty far-fetched, but at least it's not making me angry,' said Chergoa. 'How did Hamish Harundel think all these different dimensions "'connected"' to each other, exactly?'

""In a 'foundational sense,' was how he put it,"" said Ibai. ""So like, if there's a big rock in our dimension, then every element of that rock might exist simultaneously in its own dimension. He suggested that we therefore live in what he called a 'higher dimension,' and these elemental ones would be considered 'lower dimensions.'""

'Hmm...'

""He also seemed to think it was linked with the use of servant abilities, particularly materialization and transfiguration.""

'Wait a minute. Was he trying to argue that servants are actually summoning their material from other dimensions?'

""Yes, I think he was.""

'That would be pretty nuts. And also rather difficult to disprove.'

""Ooh, then it must be true!""

'That's not how finding the truth works. But I think you know that, already, don't you?'

""Hehe.""

'How dare you tease me.'

Chapter Two Hundred Six: 'The advancing vista...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The past few days had been busy for the young Lord Goffe, but not in a particularly abnormal way. Daily meetings and training and overseeing things around Warrenhold--he was starting to realize that this was just how his life was going to be from now on. It probably wasn't going to let up anytime soon.

As he was becoming more accustomed to the routine of it, he was starting to find it slightly easier to squeeze in time for patrols or even for actual leisure--which was a thing he'd almost forgotten how to do. If not for Garovel's insistence that he occasionally take some time to just relax and decompress, Hector probably wouldn't have done it at all.

It helped that the underground hot springs were beginning to take shape. There was still quite a bit of construction left to do on them, but they weren't all flooded anymore, and there were two small but functional areas."

"2050

The heat was still a bit too intense for non-servants, Hector felt, but it was much better than it used to be. Soon, he would be able to open this place up to everyone and hopefully provide the current residents of Warrenhold with an extra bit of much needed comfort. He still had no idea what to call this place or who he should put in charge of it, but he could worry about all that later.

Right now, he sat alone in the hot water with his eyes closed, breathing in the steamy air and trying not to think about anything in particular.

And not succeeding.

There were so many different things vying for his attention that just keeping his thoughts organized between them all was beginning to become a tiresome task unto itself. Garovel had suggested that he hire a personal secretary, and while Hector had been very resistant to that idea at first, he was starting to come around. It certainly wouldn't solve all his problems for him, but if things kept up like this indefinitely, then it would probably be a huge help.

Who the hell could he get for a job like that, though?

Ugh.

He added that to the list of things he could worry about later.

At the moment, he felt as though there were three big issues that were more demanding than any others.

The first was House Gaolanet. After his and Garovel's little investigation in that empty mansion, the Gaolanets had been at the forefront of his mind. He knew he should probably talk to them, and he supposed that a simple courteous visit from one local lord to another would be a good enough excuse, but what would he say to them, exactly? It certainly didn't help that he suspected they might have been the culprits behind a string of mysterious poisonings over the last few decades.

And then, of course, there was his meeting with Leo tomorrow. Hector at least had a plan for that one, but thinking about it was still nerve-wracking in the extreme."

"2051

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

It felt like the fate of the entire nation might be riding on his ability to deal with Leo. He didn't want to think that was actually true, but the more he allowed himself to dwell on it, the more he was becoming convinced of it.

Well, at least he wouldn't have to deal with Leo alone this time. That was the only thought that was providing Hector with any degree of comfort.

The third issue that was on his mind, however, was his meeting with the Rainlords tonight. All the heads would be gathering to discuss their plans moving forward.

And Hector had something quite important to tell them. He wasn't sure how they would react to his proposition, but he was trying to remain hopeful.

Not his forte, that.

He tried to enjoy his soak in the hot spring as best he could, but there was just no way he could relax. And the entire day seemed to drag on and on as the anticipation for tonight's meeting continued to build in his mind.

Training hadn't been able to take his mind off it, nor had meditation, and now making the rounds throughout Warrenhold wasn't doing it, either.

Eventually, however, the time came. He made his way to the Tower of Night, to the largest conference room therein, on the floor just below his own chambers.

A couple of the heads were already there, he found. Dimas of House Sebolt and Horatio of House Blackburn, along with both of their reapers.

They exchanged courtesies and waited for everyone else to arrive.

'Nervous?' came the private voice of Garovel, who was of course there with him as well.

'Kinda,' said Hector.

'Don't be. It's a good strategy. I'm sure they'll be receptive to it.'

Hector hoped so.

Zeff of House Elroy appeared next. Then Evangelina of House Stroud, Diego of House Redwater, Joana of House Cortes, and finally Salvador of House Delaguna."

"2052

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Diego wasn't technically the head of his family, but he and Evangelina were the only representatives of their respective Houses, and no one else seemed to object to his presence here.

Garovel started them off. 'Thank you all for coming. Hector and I have something very important we would like to ask everyone, but before we do, please allow me to make it clear that we completely understand if you decide to refuse us. We know that we are asking a lot.'

'You're makin' me antsy,' said Mevox, the reaper of Salvador Delaguna. 'No need for all the preemptive politeness. Just tell us what it is.'

Garovel looked to Hector, as did everyone else.

Honestly, Hector would have greatly preferred to just let Garovel handle everything, but they'd already talked this over and decided that they would both participate in the conversation. For some godforsaken reason, Garovel seemed to be under the impression that Hector had to be the one to tell everyone the basics of the idea. And if this group here were comprised of anyone else, Hector probably would've refused, but because it was the Rainlords--because it was these Rainlords, in particular--he felt like he could handle it.

It was still intensely uncomfortable with all their eyes on him, though.

""...We would like to start deploying small teams of servants on missions,"" said Hector, ""for the purposes of gathering both resources and intelligence.""

A few of the heads seemed surprised and exchanged looks with one another. However, Dimas Sebolt and Salvador Delaguna did not.

Those two, along with Horatio Blackburn, made up the most important three in this regard. More than ninety-five percent of the Rainlords currently staying in Warrenhold belonged to those three families. Perhaps some version of this idea had already occurred to them.

Dimas' reaper, Iziol, asked the first question. 'Start deploying them where, exactly?'

'Wherever we need them to go,' said Garovel. 'All over the world, potentially.'

"2053

'All over the world?' said Ezura, Evangelina's reaper. 'Is that not a bit excessive?'

'We have specific targets in mind,' said Garovel. 'Some are quite far away. And we will have more in the future.'

'What are these targets?' asked Axiolis.

'In short?' said Garovel. 'Legendary treasure.'

The whole room was quiet for a moment.

'Our escapades in the Undercrust reminded me of the absolute deluge of powerful artifacts scattered throughout the world. We encountered several of them while in Himmekel, due to the exploits of one particularly troublesome Hun'Sho. I wish we could have retrieved all that we saw down there, but given how heavily guarded that area was--and no doubt still is--I think our time would be better used pursuing the same goal in other parts of the world.

'And right now, while Hector and I are more than happy to have you all staying here at Warrenhold, we also understand that YOU don't want to stay here indefinitely, do you?'

""Of course not,"" said Zeff.

'And to that end,' said Garovel, gesturing broadly with a bony hand, 'what we require now is not just time to rest and recover strength. We require NEW strength, don't you think?'

""That is true,"" said Evangelina. ""And hunting down artifacts of power sounds much more appealing to me than trying to forge alliances with more people who might betray us later.""

Hector saw a couple nods of agreement.

'That's all well and good,' said Mevox, 'but the problem with treasure hunting isn't the usefulness of it. It's the IMPOSSIBILITY of it. If we don't know where to look for these treasures, then it doesn't matter how powerful they are. We'll never find them. Are you sayin' you guys have leads for us to go on?'

'Yes,' said Garovel. 'We do.'

Mevox tilted his skeletal head. 'And where exactly are you getting such valuable intel from?'

'It's not that I don't wish to tell you,' said Garovel, 'but operationally-speaking, the fewer people who know, the better.'

'Right...'

"2054

Hector could see Zeff and Axiolis both staring at him.

'Additionally,' said Garovel, 'it is important to us that we continue to keep a low profile on this one. And that means not sending out any of our most famous combatants on these missions. They would only draw attention.'

'I agree in sentiment,' said Yovess, the reaper of Horatio Blackburn. 'But while assigning these missions to young servants who have not yet made names for themselves out in the world would certainly be possible, such servants are also significantly less experienced, which would make things much more perilous for them without anyone around to help guide them.'

Dimas decided to chime in. ""And if we truly wish to operate discreetly, then even sending a reaper who is widely known would be a bad idea. And most of our reapers are widely known--at least insofar as being associated with the Rainlords.""

'Yes, that does present a problem,' said Garovel. 'I would therefore ask that you think very carefully about who to select for these assignments. Lesser known reapers are harder to come by, so if you have any in your family, then they might make for good candidates. Depending on how many we have available to us, we may wish to form teams without any reapers on them at all.'

'Your point is a valid one, but I dislike that idea greatly,' said Sentsia to Hector's mild surprise.

He had never heard the reaper of Nere Blackburn say anything at all--and not just in this meeting. He wondered briefly if she and Garovel had ever spoken before. Probably, he figured. Garovel seemed to spend the majority of his time lately just talking to all the different reapers around.

Ever since they'd first traveled to Sair, Hector had gotten the impression that Garovel was trying to collect as much knowledge from every other reaper they encountered as he possibly could--without seeming like that was what he was doing, perhaps.

But maybe every reaper was constantly trying to do that. He was beginning to see what Rasalased had meant about all reapers being hungry for power."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""In that case,"" said Evangelina, ""perhaps we should also organize separate teams whose functions are purely to provide operational support for the servants we choose to deploy.""

""A good idea,"" said Dimas. ""And the reapers seem to be forgetting that we can still provide guidance over long distances with the use of technology.""

'Oh, please,' said Axiolis. 'We didn't forget. That method is simply inferior to having reapers onsite.'

'Yes, Dimas, that was quite rude,' said IzioI.

'And uncharacteristically foolish,' added Yovess.

'No, actually, I did kinda forget about that,' said Mevox.

The other reapers just looked at him.

Mevox did not seem fazed by all the attention, though. 'Anyway, how many teams do you think we should deploy?'

'Well, we have several targets in mind,' said Garovel, 'but I would prefer that we begin slowly and then see about creating more if-and-when things begin to go more smoothly. Perhaps four teams to start off? Three or even two would also be fine. It's more important that we only deploy as many servants as we have confidence in. While we do need young, unknown servants for this task, I'm sure there are many whom you all feel are TOO young for this level of responsibility, and I would prefer we exercise caution.'

Hector kept a stone face, but he also couldn't help feeling a little ridiculous as he listened to Garovel talk about servants being too young for these missions. He was just barely eleven months old as a servant himself, yet the people Garovel was talking about were probably twice that or more.

He was having another one of those moments where he felt like he really wasn't supposed to be here, like at any moment, the rug would be pulled out from under him, and everyone would laugh at how moronic he was for ever even humoring the idea that he might actually belong in a place like this.

But that was alright.

He could deal with it. He'd dealt with worse. He just had to keep reminding himself of that fact."

"2056

'Overall, I think this is a fantastic idea,' said Sentsia. She shared glances with Yovess and Horatio. 'And given the... circumstances of our own House, I believe we may be especially well-suited to these tasks.'

'How do you mean?' said Garovel.

Mevox was quick to answer for her. 'She's referring to the fact that the Blackburns have been holed up in Marshrock for the last thirty years, barely ever setting foot outside Luzo. Y'know. That thing they did which caused pretty much all of our current problems? Everyone remembers that, right?'

'Mevox,' said Iziol.

'What? Was anything I said wrong?'

'It is true,' said Sentsia. 'We are at fault. But that is all the more reason that we, as a House, should work harder than any other to aid all of our kin here now.' She held Mevox's gaze steadily.

'Hmph. Nice words.'

'Thank you.'

Garovel took control of the conversation again. 'Well, in any case, there's no need to rush. I'd like everyone to take the next few days to evaluate potential candidates for both deployment and support. I want to be clear that the point of these missions is not to engage our enemies or to stomp out injustice wherever we find it. The objectives are strictly reconnaissance and, if possible, artifact retrieval. And that being said, those whom you wish to send should be capable of defending themselves if the need arises.'

'Makes sense to me,' said Mevox.

'Agreed,' said Yovess.

The meeting continued for a while longer as they moved on to other subjects, such as housing arrangements. Some of the Sebolts and Blackburns wanted to either swap rooms or move in to some of the recently renovated areas in the Entry Tower--which segued into the larger topic of Warrenhold's restoration.

It was proceeding well, by all accounts, but Hector knew that it wouldn't be able to continue like this indefinitely. Not without reliable funding."
"2057

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

That was also one of the big motivating factors for these treasure hunting missions. It wasn't just about finding powerful artifacts. It was about finding valuable ones.

Garovel had already expressed some of his reservations about that to Hector in private. The idea of selling legendary artifacts for cold, hard cash apparently didn't sit perfectly with the reaper, and Hector could understand why. There was more to ""value"" than just money, of course. History and sentiment were important, too.

But with all the new financial demands being placed on them recently, Hector found it a little difficult to care that much about such things. Rebuilding Warrenhold and feeding all its residents were much greater priorities in his mind.

Then again, perhaps the so-called Bank of Darksteel would soon be able to help with that problem. After meeting with Lionel Carthrace at the Gala and not being very satisfied with how it had gone, Hector had decided to meet with a couple more members of House Carthrace, just trying to get a clearer picture of Amelia's true character.

Those brief meetings hadn't really gone much better, though. He met with Lionel's son, Kenneth Carthrace, who seemed entirely uncomfortable and rather like a frightened mouse the whole time. Kenneth did speak a bit more favorably about Amelia than Lionel did, going so far as to say that she had always been kind to him, but Hector's main takeaway from that meeting was just feeling sort of bad for the guy.

Which was really odd, because Kenneth, at least on paper, was supposed to be the vice president of his family's real estate company, the CPG, or Carthrace Property Group. Hector would've expected a bit more composure from the man.

His other meeting had been with Lionel's sister, Delilah Carthrace, who certainly had more fire in her than her nephew--that was for sure. She actually kind of reminded Hector of Amelia in some ways, if Amelia were about twenty years younger and about five times more angry-looking."

"2058

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Delilah had not had many nice things to tell him regarding Amelia, either, but the examples she provided had been similarly questionable to Lionel's. Things like Amelia ""acting disrespectfully toward her in the presence of guests,"" ""giving shameful gifts to her children without her approval,"" and ""promising her a job only to renege on it later.""

That last one, Hector remembered hearing about from Lionel.

He decided to ask Amelia about it directly, and lo and behold, the old woman's version of that incident turned out to be quite different.

""I never promised Delilah any job at all,"" she'd said. ""She just assumed I would give her the position and then became furious when she eventually found out that I had hired someone else for it. Oh, and she did not appreciate it when I explained the concept of nepotism and the corresponding problems with it.""

All in all, Hector had felt like he'd heard enough by now. He decided to give the Madame Carthrace the green light with the Bank of Darksteel, and now the whole thing was finally in motion. He'd already met with a few of the new people she wanted to hire, and he'd even given his approval for most of them as well.

Everything was moving a bit fast for his tastes, but he supposed the economic crisis facing Atreya wasn't going to wait for him start feeling comfortable. The sooner they were able to get things set up, the sooner the nation might be able to recover.

In theory, at least.

Funding the Bank was still a problem, of course, and while Roman's ten million troa in help was more than enough to meet the minimum threshold required for legally opening it, Hector and Garovel had decided to ask the Rainlords for their assistance as well."

"2059

That had been a much more difficult meeting than this current one. Understandably, none of the Rainlord families had seemed especially eager to lend him such a large sum of money, but in the end, they did agree to help--and to the collective tune of twenty-five million troa, no less.

Hector had to credit Garovel with the victory on that one. The reaper had been able to reframe their ""loans"" as ""investments""--which was true, Hector supposed. He fully intended to pay them back.

Assuming this bank didn't blow up in his face, that was.

Oh god, what if it blew up in his face?

One more thing he didn't want to think about.

Hector's current meeting with the Rainlords seemed like it was nearing its end until a new subject was brought up.

'Before we adjourn, there is one more matter that I would like to discuss,' said Sentsia, looking straight at Hector. 'Since it seems that we will be staying at Warrenhold for the foreseeable future, I would like it if we could organize a more rigorous training and education system for the children here.'

Hector's brow receded.

'I have been concerned about that as well,' said Axiolis. 'As I understand it, each of the families have taken on the rather burdensome task of homeschooling all of our own children, and I fear that is not the most efficient use of our available talent.'

'You might be right,' said Izio. 'Perhaps we should appoint instructors for all of the families and organize a formal schedule.'

'That is what I was thinking,' said Sentsia. 'This is a serious matter. The children's education is perhaps more important now than it has ever been.'

'I agree,' said Axiolis.

'Indeed,' said Yovess.

'Perhaps we should also be searching for highly-qualified teachers to hire during these mission deployments,' said Sentsia."

"2060

'That may be asking too much,' said IzioI.

'It may,' said Sentsia. 'But it can't hurt to be on the lookout, at least, no? We can figure out how to actually bring such people here safely and agreeably later. I imagine it will largely depend on the instructor-candidates' circumstances, anyway.'

'If we intend to go that far,' said Mevox, 'then we should just consider the project to be the establishment of an entirely new academy.'

'This is sounding more expensive by the second,' said Yovess.

'If we want well-qualified personnel from the outside world, we'll have to pay them,' said Mevox. 'Unless you want to kidnap them. Which I wouldn't be entirely averse to.'

'I would,' said IzioI flatly.

'Yes,' said Sentsia. 'But I do think that a formalized ""academy"" is a good idea as well. In fact, I would like to put forth Silvia's name as one of the instructors. She has experience with teaching, and--'

As Hector listened to the reapers' discussion, he didn't feel the need to interject. It sounded like they had things pretty well handled. And the idea of establishing an academy here at Warrenhold?

He didn't hate it. In fact, he kinda loved it. The kids here deserved a quality education for as long as they were being forced to remain here.

Though, as a high school dropout, maybe it was weird to be having an opinion like that.

Oh well.

The meeting lasted for a while longer, and he didn't say a single word more until the reapers eventually got around to asking if they had his approval to pursue this academy plan. And he certainly wasn't about to refuse them.

And with that, they finally dispersed, but the reapers' enthusiasm for the topics discussed remained apparent, and Hector could hear them continuing to plan amongst themselves as they left."

"2061

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Once he was back in his room and alone with Garovel, Hector flopped onto his bed. His body and his mind felt equally exhausted after such a long day of training, meetings, and constant anxiety.

'Sentsia sure surprised me today,' said Garovel privately.

Hector didn't bother to open his eyes, but he knew what the reaper meant. 'Yeah...'

'I've hardly ever heard her speak, but she seemed quite full of ideas and the motivation to make them heard,' said Garovel. 'I wonder what changed.'

Hector was only half-listening now. 'Hmm.'

'Maybe she's grown comfortable enough around us to come out of her shell a bit.'

'Mm.'

'It's good, whatever it is. We'll need that kind of fire, moving forward.'

'Mmhmm.'

'Are you even paying attention to me, right now?'

'Yeah, of course I am.'

'So you think it'd be a good idea to make Leo the principal of this new academy the Rainlords were talking about, then?"

'Mm...' With effort, Hector's eyes unbolted themselves slightly, and he propped himself up on his elbows to look at Garovel. 'The fuck...?'

'Just checking,' said Garovel. 'You know I don't like it when you ignore me.'

'And you know I don't like it when you start spouting bullshit.'

'Heh. Well, in the event that our current plan for Leo doesn't pan out, it wouldn't hurt to have a backup strategy or two.'

'Uh-huh...'

'Obviously, I don't think he would be suited to being a principal, but then again, I'm not sure he'd settle for a job that doesn't carry with it a sense of importance.'

'Yeah, and I'm sure the Rainlords would just love that...'

'You seem surprisingly relaxed,' said Garovel. 'I thought you'd be more nervous for the meeting with Leo tomorrow.'

'I've been nervous all day long. I'm tired of it.'

'Well, that's one way to look at it, I guess. Want me to knock you out?'

'Don't think you'll need to...'

'Already drifting off, huh?'

'Mm...''

"2062

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

It felt like a bit of time passed as Hector teetered on the edge of sleep, sliding comfortably into its warm embrace, until Garovel's voice arrived again, still retaining the echo of privacy.

'Hey, uh, before you fall asleep, there's something I'd like your opinion on.'

'Mm?' was all Hector managed in response.

'It's something I've been conflicted about about for a while now. Ever since we were in Sair, actually.'

'Mhmm?'

'And it's... kind of a big deal.'

Hector's eyes slid open once more, but he didn't sit up to look at the reaper again just yet. 'What is it?'

'I've been putting this off for a while, since there have been so many other things that have been taking precedence. Repeatedly. And, uh... I'll be honest. Maybe I should've told you about this sooner. Try not to get upset with me.'

'Garovel. What is it?'

'Well, it's not the easiest thing to explain. Um. It has to do with the Rainlords.'

Hector decided to sit up now as he waited for further elaboration.

'You remember in Luzo, after the battle at Marshrock? When the Rainlords were discussing how to move forward peacefully?'

'Yeah?'

'Remember when Ismael Blackburn explained how someone had used Ibai's status as an aberration against them? Blackmailing them, essentially? And basically kicking off all of the events that ended up forcing the Rainlords to flee here from their ancestral homeland?'

'Uh-huh?'

'Do you remember the name of that person Ismael said was blackmailing them?'

Hector was struggling. 'Er... not really.'

'Well, it was a very powerful man named Parson Miles. He holds the rank of captain general in the Vanguard. That means he only takes orders from eight people: the seven field marshals and Sermung himself.'

'Okay...?'

'Zeff also has quite the beef with him, you may recall. He and Evangelina both claim that Parson killed Socorra Garza, the head of House Garza, in addition to ordering the capture of Zeff's family, which led to the death of Zeff's wife, Mariana.'

Hector didn't like where this was going. 'Why are you bringing all this up, right now?'

Garovel looked abruptly hesitant. 'Because... I've actually met Parson Miles before.'

"2063 -- CCVII.

Chapter Two Hundred Seven: 'In a time of crossings...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's eyes were wide. 'What do you mean you've met him before?'

The reaper shrugged. 'What do you think I mean? I met him while I was working with the Vanguard. Him and his reaper both. Her name's Overra.'

'And you're only bringing this up NOW?'

'Like I said, there's been a lot of shit going on since that meeting in Luzo, and I've been trying to figure out what I should do with this information.'

'Well, you should probably tell the Rainlords,' said Hector.

'Yeah, I'm not sure it's that simple, buddy.'

'Why not?'

'Because I'm mildly concerned that they'll try to use me to lure Parson Miles into a trap so that they can kill him. And that's not the kind of heat we need, right now.'

Hector's face twisted a little, confused. 'Why would they try to do that? It's not like you have any way of getting in contact with him, right?'

Garovel made no response.

Hector's jaw clenched. '...Right?'

The reaper's bony jaw opened, but it took him a few more moments to actually say anything. 'I might know of a way.'

Hector sighed and put his head in both of his hands.

'And there's another problem,' said Garovel. 'Parson and Overra, as I remember them, were pretty good people. So even though I understand the Rainlords' position, I'm not sure I want to help them ambush and murder the two of them. Assuming they even COULD, that is. Which is a whole other conversation, by the way.'

Hector still had no idea what to say.

'So, uh. As you can tell, I'm in a bit of an ethical pickle here. And maybe a philosophical one, as well.'

Hector raised his head a little. 'Philosophical? What do you mean?'"
"2063 -- CCVII.

Chapter Two Hundred Seven: 'In a time of crossings...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's eyes were wide. 'What do you mean you've met him before?'

The reaper shrugged. 'What do you think I mean? I met him while I was working with the Vanguard. Him and his reaper both. Her name's Overra.'

'And you're only bringing this up NOW?'

'Like I said, there's been a lot of shit going on since that meeting in Luzo, and I've been trying to figure out what I should do with this information.'

'Well, you should probably tell the Rainlords,' said Hector.

'Yeah, I'm not sure it's that simple, buddy.'

'Why not?'

'Because I'm mildly concerned that they'll try to use me to lure Parson

Miles into a trap so that they can kill him. And that's not the kind of heat we need, right now.'

Hector's face twisted a little, confused. 'Why would they try to do that? It's not like you have any way of getting in contact with him, right?

Garovel made no response.

Hector's jaw clenched. '...Right?'

The reaper's bony jaw opened, but it took him a few more moments to actually say anything. 'I might know of a way.'

Hector sighed and put his head in both of his hands.

'And there's another problem,' said Garovel. 'Parson and Overra, as I remember them, were pretty good people. So even though I understand the Rainlords' position, I'm not sure I want to help them ambush and murder the two of them. Assuming they even COULD, that is. Which is a whole other conversation, by the way.'

Hector still had no idea what to say.

'So, uh. As you can tell, I'm in a bit of an ethical pickle here. And maybe a philosophical one, as well.'

Hector raised his head a little. 'Philosophical? What do you mean?'"
"2064

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'It's an ethical pickle, because while I want to help the Rainlords get justice for their kin, I also don't want to betray someone whose misdeeds I've only heard about secondhand--someone I have no personal vendetta against, as well.' Garovel hovered across the center of the large bedroom. 'And it's a philosophical pickle, because even if we presume that telling the Rainlords the truth is the most ""moral"" thing to do, there's still the question of whether or not it is the ""best"" thing to do--in terms of achieving the most desirable long-term outcome, that is.'

Hector just groaned and lay back down on his bed.

'Hey, these are real problems that I'm grappling with right now, goddammit. Don't just lie there like a useless lump. Tell me what you think the right course of action is.'

'Didn't I already do that?'

'Really? So even after everything I just explained, you still think I should tell the Rainlords what I know?'

'Garovel... I don't fucking know.'

'Hector, I'm not expecting you to ""know."" I don't need you to tell me what to do. I just want you to give me your opinion. Help me make a decision. Y'know, like a friend would do?'

Hector took a long breath but didn't move. He tried to think. 'Okay, well, uh... I guess if we're talking broadly, then... yeah, I do think that the most ""moral"" thing is generally the ""best"" thing to do. Philosophically.'

'Yeah, sure, ""generally,"" I can agree with that. But what about in this specific case?'

'Do you really think keeping this information from the Rainlords will help you achieve a ""more desirable long-term outcome?""'

Garovel remained briefly quiet. 'Maybe.'

'And how would that work, exactly?'

'Well, I... I would tell them eventually. Just not right away.'

'Uh-huh...''

"2065

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'I feel like you're not appreciating the nuance of this situation,' said Garovel. 'The Rainlords are very emotional and vulnerable, right now. I could very easily imagine them trying to use this--to use US--against our will in order to pursue their revenge against Parson Miles. Does that possibility not concern you at all?'

'...You think they would, what? Take you hostage? To use as bait or something for this Parson guy?'

'More or less, yeah. Does that sound so ridiculous to you?'

'A little. I mean, the Rainlords are all about honor 'n everything.'

'Yeah. And we also witnessed some of them taking children hostage. Don't tell me you've forgotten that whole shitstorm, already.'

'I think you're worrying too much, Garovel. If you tell them, they'll understand.'

'That's very trusting of you, Hector.'

'No, it isn't. They already feel hugely indebted to us. To an annoying degree, even. They wouldn't do anything like you're suggesting.'

'I wish I could share your certainty.'

Hector exhaled heavily and had to sit up another time to look at his reaper directly. 'Alright, well. This isn't getting us anywhere. Give me the details. How do you know this Parson guy?'

'I briefly worked under his command.'

'...How briefly?'

'About ten years or so.'

'That is NOT brief, Garovel.'

'Eh. In reaper terms, it is.'

'How long ago was this?'

'Oh, uh... sixty years, maybe? Tough to recall exactly.'

'And what was the, uh... nature of your work?'

'Espionage.'

Hector's gaze hardened. 'For real?'

'I hated it,' said Garovel, 'but it was important work. We prevented a lot of deaths.'

'Where were you, er, operating?'

'Mostly in the eastern half of Eloa, but there were a few occasions when we traveled all over the world.'

'Why did you hate it?'

'Lots of reasons, really, but the main one was probably the lack of transparency. Working in intelligence for one of the most powerful organizations on the planet, you might think you'd know a thing or two about the state of the world, the goings-on of nations. But we never really did. We knew what we were told and had to take a lot on faith.'"
"2066

Hector found himself wondering something else--something he'd wondered on several previous occasions but never felt capable of asking about, for whatever reason. '...You had a servant, right?'

'Yeah.'

'Who were they? And what happened to them?'

Garovel took a moment to answer as he hovered back to the other side of the room. 'His name was Simon Karsh. He was another reason why I wanted to quit the Covert Intelligence Division.'

'What do you mean?'

'It's a long story.'

Hector crossed his legs and folded his arms, wanting to be at full attention now. 'Well, I'm interested.'

Garovel stared at him, then nodded. 'Alright, but you need to sleep soon. Tomorrow is a big day.'

'I haven't forgotten.'

The reaper took a second before continuing, perhaps considering where to begin. 'I met Simon through the Vanguard. I had been thinking about joining their ranks for many years, and I was already very well-acquainted with several reapers who were long-time members. I hadn't taken on a servant for over a century at that point, and it didn't really matter to me who they paired me with, so long as the person wasn't obviously a psychotic asshole. I wanted to keep an open mind. Foster a strong friendship. Build up to things slowly.

'Simon was about twenty-five when I revived him. He was the victim of a firebombing in Vantalay. And he was highly motivated to get revenge on those who were responsible for the attack that killed him. He was quite the soldier, you see. Very dutiful. Very serious. But it wasn't just that.

'In many ways, I feel as if he was what most reapers would consider to be an ideal servant. Already trained in combat. Well-educated. Quite knowledgeable of servants and reapers from the beginning. And incredibly charismatic--at least, when he wanted to be.'

"2067

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 1 of 12)~~

An ideal servant? That just made Hector even more curious as to why Garovel would've released him. He held his tongue, though, figuring the reaper was getting to that.

'I had high hopes for Simon--and so did many of our superior officers, I think. Even before completing the standard four years of training, he was often chosen for real missions, apprenticing under various veterans.'

Hector couldn't help himself now. 'So what happened, then?'

The reaper broke for a sigh. 'Simon was... Well, I could say he simply grew too arrogant and dangerous, and that would not be a lie. But it would also strike me as too dismissive. There was more to it than that.

'It was about six years in when our spy work first began, and he was incredible at it. Right from the start. Had a real aptitude for it. TOO much so, perhaps. Looking back on it now, I think his string of early successes might have caused more problems for him in the long-term than I realized at the time. For the longest time, he never really tasted failure. He was just THAT good right out of the gate.

'But it didn't last forever. Eventually, we did suffer a major loss. And because he'd never experienced something like that before, it just hit him that much harder. I'm not sure he ever fully recovered from that.'

Hector was reluctant to ask, but he felt compelled to. 'What exactly happened?'

'It was a mission in Palei. Infiltrating a weapons factory. Deep in Abolish territory. Extremely dangerous. I didn't want to take the mission, but that wasn't anything new. I'd tried to refuse many other missions previously, but he just went off and did them without me. And he'd succeeded every time previously, so why would he think this time would be any different? He had such confidence. It drove me crazy.'"
"2068

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 2 of 12)~~
'Why did the mission go badly?' said Hector.

'He went without me, so I don't know everything that happened, but my understanding of it was that his cover was blown from the very beginning. There was a huge information leak the previous day in a completely different country, and it compromised the identities of dozens of undercover operatives. So his whole team walked right into a trap.'

'Oh, man...'

'They were all captured, except for him. He just barely managed to destroy his own brain in time. Couple of their reapers were killed as well. I might've been one of them, had I been there.'

Hector's eyes went to the bed below him as he processed that.

'Oddly enough,' said Garovel, 'MY identity was never leaked, only his.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow. 'How could that be?'

'I think it was because of the way the Vanguard stores information. It's possible they do it differently now, but back then, they didn't keep records of servant-reaper pairings. They DID keep records of servants and reapers, but not together. Perhaps for this very reason. If one's identity is compromised, they didn't want the partner to automatically be compromised as well.'

'Huh.'

'It's particularly odd, because with undercover work, it's usually the reaper who presents the most risk of being outed. Our long lives make us much more likely to be recognized by enemy reapers. That was why he was able to go on so many missions without me. Bringing a reaper along was often considered an unnecessary risk, anyway.'

Hector supposed that made sense. If spy work was more about gathering information than combat, then reapers were probably a lot more valuable staying behind and relaying intel back to HQ as the servants discovered it.

That seemed pretty potent, now that he was imagining it. No need for coded letters or encrypted phone calls or anything like that. Just tell your reaper what you find as soon as you find it, and bam. Mission accomplished."

"2069

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 3 of 12)~~

'If I'm being perfectly honest,' said Garovel, 'Simon was always a bit mysterious to me. He was such a remarkable actor that I could almost never be sure of how he truly felt about any given situation, but this was one of the few occasions when the facade dropped, and I think I was able to understand him.

'Simon liked to play it cool. Be aloof. Detached. For the good of the mission, seemingly. But when he lost his team that day, he was inconsolable. I'd never seen him so demoralized. I think, deep down, he really did care about them like they were his family.'

Hector wanted to say something, but he didn't have the words.

'Looking back on it all now,' the reaper went on, 'Simon really was a hero in the most "classic" sense of the term. He was strong, smart, adaptable, compassionate, and had a strong sense of justice. And he had no real weaknesses. He was kind of perfect. To an infuriating degree, sometimes.

'But that loss changed him. I think the worst part of it for him was the realization that... it didn't matter how perfect he was. He could do his job flawlessly. He could make the best possible decision every single time with the information at his disposal. And it still wouldn't guarantee success. Everything could still go to shit for reasons that were completely beyond his control.'

Hector knew a thing or two about feeling that way.

"When I finally convinced him to quit the spy life and return to normal duty, I thought things would be better for him, but they never were again. I think he just stopped seeing people as people. I think they just became ""objectives"" to him. Or ""tools,"" even. Save this person. Cooperate with that person. It was all just mechanical to him. Where before he would only pretend not to get attached, now he genuinely never did."

"2070

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 4 of 12)~~

Hector could see the wisdom in not getting too attached to people, but he'd always considered it a complete impossibility. He'd never felt like he had any control over that sort of thing. Whether he grew to like or dislike someone--for him, that had always been something that just happened on its own.

And quite frankly, he had considered that to be a weakness within himself. An inability to control his emotions, to prevent himself from being vulnerable.

It was strange to imagine struggling with the complete opposite problem, but he supposed it made sense. Especially for a servant.

'It was a difficult decision to release him,' said Garovel. 'It always is, when it's a matter of mental instability. Even now, I wonder if perhaps I pulled the trigger too early, if perhaps I could have brought him back around.'

'W-was there a final straw?' asked Hector. 'Something unforgivable he did?'

Garovel's skeletal expression twisted a little. 'Not exactly. It was a combination of lots of little things. Overall callousness. The way he talked to me and his supposed comrades. I had seen it before, and I didn't want to wait until he went so far as to actually kill some innocent person.

'And I'll admit, releasing him without such obvious justification might've actually been too callous on MY part, not his. I had grown to hate him over the years.'

Hector didn't know what to say.

The reaper wasn't done, though. 'And while I'm being brutally honest here... My relationship with Simon--I do think it colored my decision to choose you as my next servant.'

That didn't exactly sound like a compliment, but Hector also felt like he kind of understood what the reaper meant.

'To say that you've exceeded all my expectations would be an understatement,' said Garovel, 'but I think you know that by now. Or at least, I hope you do.'

"2071

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 5 of 12)~~

Hector scratched his cheek, thinking on all they'd been through together in about a year of servitude. It was crazy to imagine that Garovel had been doing this kind of thing for millennia.

And abruptly, he found himself wondering something anew.

'...How many servants have you had in total?' Hector asked.

'You are the twenty-second,' said Garovel.

Hector's gaze drifted away from the reaper as he tried to wrap his head around that number. On the one hand, that felt like a lot, but on the other, taking Garovel's three thousand years of life into consideration, maybe it wasn't at all. That was way less than one per century.

'Now you're wondering who they all were and why I released them,' said Garovel.

'Er. Well. Pretty much, yeah.'

'I'm sure I'll get around to it eventually, but to be very blunt with you, I don't generally like talking about them. It's painful.'

Hector frowned. 'Did ANY of them have a happy ending?'

'Happy endings are a myth. They don't exist.'

Hector's eyes bugged out a little. 'Fucking...! Wow, Garovel!'

'What?'

'That's... just... super fucked up. You really believe that?'

The reaper shrugged. 'I'm not trying to be a downer here. But what do you want from me? I'm a grim reaper, okay?'

'Emphasis on the ""grim"" part, I guess.'

'Hey, I can be plenty uplifting when I want to be.'

'Maybe you need religion, Garovel.'

'Oh, fuck you. We are NOT having this conversation, right now.'

'I'm just saying. If you really don't believe happy endings exist AT ALL, then there might be something wrong with you. I mean, fucking hell, man, that's dark as shit.'

'It's not like I don't believe goodness exists. I just think it's fleeting--and therefore, that much more in need of protection.'

'Uh-huh...'

'Whatever. I don't have to justify myself to you. I'm the boss in this relationship.'

'Yeah, okay.'

"2072

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 6 of 12)~~

'Good, I'm glad you agree,' said Garovel with false pleasantness.

'Anyway, do you have any more questions about Simon specifically? Because we've kinda gotten off track.'

Hector thought about it. 'What was his ability?'

'Oh, that's actually a good segue back to Parson Miles, because Simon's ability was oxygen transfiguration.'

'How does that make for a good segue?'

'Because Parson had the exact same ability. It was actually why

Parson first took an interest in Simon, even though he wasn't who we reported to directly. Our actual boss was a man named Dominique Rohdri.'

'What was his rank?'

'General.'

'Hmm. What was YOUR rank?'

'The members of the CID didn't have proper ranks, really. Once we left, though, Simon was a captain.'

'So like Zeff?'

'Yeah.'

'Was he as powerful as Zeff?'

'I don't know,' said Garovel with a tinge of exasperation. 'We're getting sidetracked again.'

'Sorry. So this Parson guy went out of his way to spend time with you two?'

'Yeah. We got to know him and Overra decently well, I think. They seemed to like Simon.'

'Did they like you?'

'Hard to say. Especially after what I've heard about them from the Rainlords. Seems like they were a bit two-faced. Parson, for his part, always acted like a bit of a goober.'

That hadn't been the word Hector was expecting. 'A... goober?'

'A goofball? A silly billy? He was a weirdo. Had a thing for ice cream. Didn't seem to take his job too seriously and drove a lot of people nuts, including Overra.'

'Huh...'

'And yet he always seemed to get the job done. Toward the end of our working relationship, I got the feeling that he was more cunning than he let on. I never thought he was an evil son of a bitch, though, which is what the Rainlords make him sound like. In fact, despite not liking the CID itself, I actually kind of enjoyed working for him.'

'Hmm.'

"2073

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 7 of 12)~~

'So do you still think I should tell the Rainlords what I know about Parson?' said Garovel.

'I don't know. Didn't you say you had a means of contacting him?'

'Heh, well, I'm not sure I should burden you with that knowledge, Hector.'

'Oh, but it's okay to burden me all this other shit?'

'Well, yeah. You're my servant. You're supposed to help me carry things. Physically and psychologically.'

Hector just shook his head and sighed.

'If I tell you how we might be able to contact Parson, then you could go behind my back and tell the Rainlords without my approval.'

'...I wouldn't do that, Garovel.'

'I believe you, but I still think it's better not to put you in that position in the first place.'

'I mean, I'm kind of in that position already, aren't I? I could still go to the Rainlords with what you've told me, and they'd be super pissed at you.'

'Yes, they would. They might even try to torture it out of me. Do you want them to torture me?'

'...How bad would this torture be, exactly?'

'Hector.'

'I'm kidding. Obviously, I don't want anyone to hurt you, Garovel. But I highly doubt that the Rainlords would do anything like that.'

'You really have a lot of faith in them, don't you?'

'You don't? I mean, we've... we've literally been through hell together.'

The reaper gave a mild laugh. 'You make a fair point.'

'And if they somehow end up finding out later that you had this information all along, they'll hate your fucking guts for it, Garovel. And mine, too, probably.'

'Tch, you might be right.'

Hector gave a fake gasp. 'Holy shit, are you actually listening to me for once?'

'Excuse me, but I listen to you all the time. In fact, that's probably why we keep getting mixed up in so much crazy shit.'

'No, that's definitely your fault.'

'Agree to disagree.'"

"2074

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 8 of 12)~~

Hector exhaled a small laugh and lay back down on his bed. 'So you're going to tell the Rainlords what you know, then?'

'Yeah, I guess so,' said Garovel.

'Good.'

'I think I'll leave out the part about having a method of contacting him, though.'

'Garovel...'

'I'll tell them about that when I feel the time is right. I don't want to run the risk of them trying to launch some half-cocked attack on Parson. In their current state, I'm quite sure he would obliterate them.'

'They'll be really mad if they find out later that you kept that information from them.'

'Yeah, well. I don't see how they would find that out, but even if they did, I'd rather they be angry at us than dead.'

Hector still didn't fully agree, but he could see where Garovel was coming from. 'Is he really powerful enough to take down Melchor and everyone else single-handedly?'

'Well, I doubt he would be alone, but even if he was, I'm not sure. Captain generals are nothing to fuck around with. They're among the most powerful servants in the world.'

Another question occurred to Hector, and he had to ask it. 'Do you think Leo could beat him?'

'Again, that's hard to say. At these levels of strength, it all becomes a bit muddled. I think once soul-synchronization reaches a certain point, you start getting diminishing returns.'

'What do you mean?'

'Like, for example, a servant who's fifty years old will have WAY stronger soul power than a servant who's only one. But a servant who's a hundred and fifty years old won't have as large of a gap in soul power compared to someone who's a hundred.'

'Hmm.'

'There's still a gap, of course, but the bigger issue is how much you've honed your ability. And your overall combat competency, of course.'"
"2075

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 9 of 12)~~

'And how old is Parson?' said Hector.

'From what I was able to tell, he was at least a hundred, and that was sixty-ish years ago, so... do the math.'

'I see...'

'Oh, wait, you're terrible at math, aren't you? Maybe that was me asking too much.'

'I can do simple addition!'

'You sure about that?'

'Yes! You're saying he's at least a hundred and sixty!'

'Wow, good job.' The reaper almost sounded genuinely impressed, no doubt trying to enhance the obnoxiousness. 'I'm really proud of you.'

'Shut up,' laughed Hector. 'I'm not THAT bad at math. Agh.'

'Mm, I dunno. I recall an instance several months ago where I was telling you about how many languages I knew. I said three hundred, and then you pointed out that it wasn't very impressive, because I was three thousand years old, so that worked out to ""only like one new language every hundred years."" Those were your exact words, by the way.'

Hector's brow lowered as he thought back. 'I don't remember this at all.'

'Mmhmm. Three thousand divided by three hundred is ten, not a hundred. You added a zero there, buddy.'

'I'm sure that never happened. You would've roasted me if it had, and then I would definitely remember it.'

'The reason I didn't say anything at the time was because we were still getting to know each other, and I didn't want to hurt your feelings. But that's not a concern anymore, as I've come to realize just how much doing that brings me joy.'

'Well, I don't even recall what you're talking about, so no hurt feelings for you.'

'Damn.'

'But anyway, if soul power doesn't grow as quickly for older servants, does that mean that Melchor could fight Parson on an even level?'

'That's a very good question. And one that I do not have the answer for.'

'Really? Not even a guess?'

'I can give you a hard maybe.'

'Hmm.'"

"2076 -- CCVIII.

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 10 of 12)~~

'Oh, and regarding Parson vs. Leo,' said Garovel, 'I think even if Leo is a bit older--which I'm only ASSUMING that is he is--Parson would no doubt have a huge advantage over him as long as Leo isn't able to work with his reaper.'

'Oh, right.'

'But then again, Leo WAS able to capture Melchor and everyone else single-handedly, so it could be that he's got a few tricks up his sleeve that would net him a victory over Parson. The context of this hypothetical fight would play an enormous role.'

'Hmm.'

'In any case, you'd better get some sleep. All our preparations for tomorrow will be for nothing if you're too tired to think straight.'

'Okay.'

Chapter Two Hundred Eight: 'Go forth, and preside...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

By most standards, the trip south to Loxeville from Gray Rock didn't take much time at all, but it was still long enough for Hector's feeling of dread to build up over the course of it. As he sat in the back of the black SUV with Roman Fullister, Diego Redwater, and Melchor Blackburn, Hector couldn't help imagining the variety of ways that this meeting with Leo could potentially go wrong.

Aside from the four of them, there was also Matteo Delaguna, their driver and Hector's recent shadow. The young man hadn't said two words to Hector, but whenever he left Warrenhold, Matteo followed him as the Rainlords' designated bodyguard.

The reapers were all present as well, but they soon wouldn't be, apart from Melchor's reaper, Orric. No one wanted them around if a fight ended up breaking out. Hector was trying to convince himself that it wouldn't, but as they got closer and closer to Loxeville, he found himself resisting those attempts.

Leo just wanted a meaningful job. He just needed guidance. From someone he could believe in. And Hector had to be that person.

Oh, god..."

"2076 -- CCVIII.

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 10 of 12)~~

'Oh, and regarding Parson vs. Leo,' said Garovel, 'I think even if Leo is a bit older--which I'm only ASSUMING that is he is--Parson would no doubt have a huge advantage over him as long as Leo isn't able to work with his reaper.'

'Oh, right.'

'But then again, Leo WAS able to capture Melchor and everyone else single-handedly, so it could be that he's got a few tricks up his sleeve that would net him a victory over Parson. The context of this hypothetical fight would play an enormous role.'

'Hmm.'

'In any case, you'd better get some sleep. All our preparations for tomorrow will be for nothing if you're too tired to think straight.'

'Okay.'

Chapter Two Hundred Eight: 'Go forth, and preside...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

By most standards, the trip south to Loxeville from Gray Rock didn't take much time at all, but it was still long enough for Hector's feeling of dread to build up over the course of it. As he sat in the back of the black SUV with Roman Fullister, Diego Redwater, and Melchor Blackburn, Hector couldn't help imagining the variety of ways that this meeting with Leo could potentially go wrong.

Aside from the four of them, there was also Matteo Delaguna, their driver and Hector's recent shadow. The young man hadn't said two words to Hector, but whenever he left Warrenhold, Matteo followed him as the Rainlords' designated bodyguard.

The reapers were all present as well, but they soon wouldn't be, apart from Melchor's reaper, Orric. No one wanted them around if a fight ended up breaking out. Hector was trying to convince himself that it wouldn't, but as they got closer and closer to Loxeville, he found himself resisting those attempts.

Leo just wanted a meaningful job. He just needed guidance. From someone he could believe in. And Hector had to be that person.

Oh, god..."

"2077

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 11 of 12)~~

Loxeville was a quaint little town. Hector had researched it a bit online, just wanting to get a sense of the place. It had a population of about eight thousand, and it was quite a young community. Its founding mayor was even still alive. Its primary tourist attraction was the so-called ""largest egg on the continent,"" which sounded quite weird to Hector's mind, though it did pique his curiosity a bit. Apparently, it was a fossilized ""titanosaur"" egg.

Hector didn't know much about dinosaurs, but he kind of wanted to go see it. Maybe some other time. When the fate of the nation wasn't hanging in the balance.

The agreed upon location was technically not in Loxeville itself, but rather on the outskirts of town. They were hoping to avoid a fight, of course, but Voreese and Garovel had thankfully still picked a place where they wouldn't have to worry about innocent bystanders.

If all went according to plan, however, they would not be staying here for long.

The vehicle came to a stop at a dead end in front of an empty lot. There was a warehouse on one side of the street, but on the other was just an endless landscape of tall, lush grass. It wasn't raining, but the scent in the air was that of recent showers, and the dark clouds hanging low in the sky certainly looked like they might start watering the ground again at any moment.

Hector saw the man sitting there on the bench by the road, but it took him a second to recognize that it was Leo. The guy looked almost like a different person.

Leo was cleanly shaven, wearing a black suit and tie, and his black hair was perfectly coiffed. Gone were the dreadlocks and scraggly beard."
"2078

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 12 of 12)~~

When Leo saw him approaching, the man smiled and stood up. He hardly even glanced at the four other men following closely behind Hector.

""Whew!"" Leo shuffled quickly closer and offered Hector a handshake. ""You're not late, but all the same, I was beginning to worry you wouldn't show!""

Hector saw no reason to be impolite. He took the handshake. ""You clean up well, Leo.""

""Oh! Aha! Yeah, thanks! Figured I should try 'n make myself presentable, y'know. Demonstrate my conviction 'n whatnot.""

""I appreciate it,"" said Hector. He motioned to the men behind him. ""I believe you've already encountered almost everyone here, but... I suppose introductions are in order. Matteo, Roman, Diego, and Melchor.""

Melchor stepped up next to Hector but said nothing, only folded his arms. Orric clung to his back.

""Heh, yeah, uh."" Leo offered Melchor a handshake now.

Melchor just looked at it, then at Hector.

Hector gave the man a small nod.

Thankfully, Melchor decided to take the handshake.

They had all discussed at length how they should conduct themselves in front of Leo. Everyone here had agreed to play along with the tale of Hector being the leader of the Rainlords.

Hector had been surprised when Melchor volunteered to join him for this meeting. He'd wanted to ask the man to come along anyway, but he hadn't expected such enthusiasm from him. It had worried Hector, at first, because he thought Melchor might be hoping to enact some manner of revenge on Leo, but as they'd discussed their plans more, it seemed like Melchor was mostly just concerned with ensuring Hector's safety.

Which was flattering, to say the least--not to mention comforting. Having Darktide, of all people, watching out for him? That was arguably the main reason why Hector was able to feel relatively calm, right now."

"2079

~~The Valentine's Days Special -- (page 13 of 12, because I miscounted, realized it too late, and now I don't feel like going back and rescheduling 100 pages)~~

""Listen,"" said Leo, ""about before, I'm real sorry about attackin' you like I did.""

""You sucker punched me,"" said Melchor.

""Well, yeah, I kinda had to, dude. Knew you'd be a big problem if I didn't take you out first. I was outnumbered like a hundred to one 'r somethin', y'know.""

""In that case, I suppose I can just consider myself flattered,"" said Melchor. ""And you should consider yourself lucky that the Lord Goffe here wasn't present at that time."" He flashed Hector a quick smile.

Holy shit, Melchor, seriously?

Hector's face just tightened up. He couldn't really say anything, but he wanted to tell him to relax. That kind of heavy-handed praise wasn't necessary.

Leo laughed. ""You're right, man! Things could be a lot worse for me, couldn't they?!""

""Indeed. But I look forward to working together with you as comrades-in-arms under Darksteel's guidance."" Melchor gave another smile.

""Oh, ah, me too, dude!""

Wait a minute. Was Melchor enjoying this? What the hell was going through his head, right now?!

""Have you already heard about his encounter with the so-called 'God of the Underworld?'"

""Oh, yeah, Roman over there told me a bit about that, but he skimmed on the details. You wouldn't--""

Hector felt compelled to intervene. ""Ah--that's enough of that. Save the small talk for later, please.""

""Look, he's getting embarrassed!"" said Melchor.

""Oh, wow! I think you're right!""

The two men chortled in unison this time.

Hector just stared at them, wondering if this meeting was already spiraling out of his control. He half-expected Roman to jump in as well, but when he looked over at him, the man looked more flabbergasted than anything.

When their laughter settled, however, silence arrived and threatened to become awkward.

Hector maintained his focus, though. He didn't intend to let it get to him this time. If anything, he wanted to use this awkwardness to his advantage."

"2080

Part of Hector's plan here today was minimizing how much he spoke--if at all possible. He didn't want to be needlessly rude or obtuse, but at the same time, he wanted to avoid saying anything that might accidentally give away his true age or lack of leadership qualities.

So even though he wanted to prod Leo about where his reaper, Ericoros, was, Hector chose to hold his tongue for the time being. Ideally, the man would realize what Hector was waiting for on his own, as meeting Ericoros was one of the primary purposes of this rendezvous.

And it required a bit more staring, but Leo did indeed figure it out.

""Oh! Um!"" Leo reached behind him toward the bench that he'd been sitting on and retrieved a black box, about the size of house cat. ""Here you go! As requested!""

Hector received the box with both hands.

""Just, er, be careful with that,"" Leo added, taking a few steps back and raising his hands a bit. ""I'm sure you wanna check to make sure he's really in there, so... eh, you ready?""

Hector understood what he was getting at. He glanced at the others, then gave Leo a nod.

Leo flicked his wrist, and the box of solid boron annihilated itself from the top down.

Immediately, the reaper within bolted out of it, but Hector was ready with a soul-empowered hand and caught Ericoros in his grip.

The reaper struggled, wriggling like an eel, but without a physical body to work with, there was really no hope of getting away.

Ericoros remained quiet, though, which Hector found surprising. Given all prior experience with reapers, he fully expected this one to complain loudly and often about his current circumstances, but that didn't appear to be the case.

Hector looked to Leo again. ""Have you already explained the situation to Ericoros?""

""Ah--yeah. More or less.""

"2081

Hector and Garovel had discussed the problem of Ericoros at length in private. Without a doubt, this was the most difficult obstacle for achieving any kind of long-term solution with Leo here in Atreya. Ideally, they would be able to win the reaper's loyalty, but they both doubted that would be easy. In fact, if it was easy, then that would be ridiculously suspicious. How were they to ever arrive at a point where they could trust Ericoros?

Baby steps, was what they'd decided on. It would be very slow going, and the first thing to do was simply get to know the reaper better. Any attempt at convincing a reaper to change allegiances was bound to fail without first acquiring knowledge about them.

And of course, it could all still be for naught. The notion that Ericoros simply could not be convinced to join them, no matter what they said or did--that concerned Hector and Garovel greatly.

What would they do in that case? Keep the reaper prisoner indefinitely?

Or, of course... they could just let Ericoros release Leo.

That was far from the ideal outcome, certainly, but it would at least neutralize the threat that Leo might pose to them.

And there was still the matter of Sai-hee's hatred of the Rainlords. If they simply let Ericoros go free, who knows what he might tell her? What if Ericoros' freedom somehow ended up causing Sai-hee to attack Warrenhold?

Perhaps that was unlikely, but given their current knowledge of the situation, they weren't yet prepared to take that chance.

As Hector eyed the helpless reaper in his grasp, he knew how careful he had to be with everything that he said now. Impulsively, he wanted to apologize to Ericoros for the circumstances, but Garovel had warned him against doing that.

If he was supposed to be playing the part of an emperor-class servant, then he should not act so apologetic or accommodating. He should do as he had done with Leo himself. He should project both power and understanding."

"2082

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""It is good to finally make your acquaintance,"" said Hector.

Ericoros merely held his gaze and said nothing.

Well, that was fine. ""I look forward to getting to know you."" Hector went back to Leo. ""In the meantime, you wanted me to give you a job,

no?"

Leo perked up a little. "Er--yeah, dude! You already have something in mind for me?!"

"How does working for a homeless shelter sound?" said Hector.

Leo blinked a couple times. "Uh..."

It seemed like the man was giving him a window to elaborate, but Hector just waited for his full reaction.

"That's, er... not exactly what I was expecting," said Leo. "It's not really 'servant' work, is it?"

"It's 'human' work," said Hector. "And important, too."

"Yeah, man, I mean, sure. I'm just kind of wondering what you are getting out of it. Do you own this homeless shelter?"

"No, I don't. And it wouldn't just be one shelter. It would be multiple shelters, all over Gray Rock. We've made arrangements for you." Hector nodded toward Roman. "Or rather, he has."

Roman gave a small wave and a flat smile. Oddly enough, he was actually dressed like a normal businessman today.

"Ah..." Leo still seemed confused, though. "But, er, how does me working at a homeless shelter contribute to your overall plans for the future?"

Hector found that question somewhat surprising. He'd expected Leo to only care about whether the job sounded enjoyable to him personally, but after a moment, he supposed this response made sense, too. Leo seemed to be a rather skeptical guy by nature.

"For now," said Hector, "it probably won't contribute much at all. Placing you somewhere you appreciate is all that matters."

"Huh..."

Hector felt like he should give the man a bit more. "However... it's my hope that you might be able to foster a network of reliable contacts during your time in these places."

Leo's expression shifted with sudden understanding. "I see..."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Hector watched him closely. A lot depended on how Leo felt about this job offer.

Leo's nose twitched, and he gave an audible sniff. ""Maybe I'm just bein' paranoid here, but y'know... to me, it sounds a bit like you plan on exploitin' the underprivileged for your own political gain."" And he stared at Hector straight on.

Hector didn't look away. ""Why would you think that?""

""Well. Mainly just a gut feeling. A worry, I guess. I may not know all that much about this little country of yours, but I know that it's had some political trouble recently, no?""

""That's putting it mildly,"" said Hector with a bob of his head.

""Mmhmm. Then I guess I'm just concerned that you--a guy who seems to have come out on top after that whole mess--might be lookin' to exploit some less fortunate folks with your newfound influence. Know what I'm sayin'?"

""Sure, but how would a network of homeless informants be considered exploitation?"" said Hector.

""Depends on the nature of the 'informing' being done,"" said Leo.

""Seen this type o' thing before, daddy-o. Sometimes, when you invest so much effort into buildin' something, you end up forgettin' the human cost. You end up trappin' your own builders inside, ya feel me?"

Hector squinted at him and took a moment to consider his words. He felt like he understood what the man was getting at, but he wasn't sure. ""Are you worried that... such a network would make the problem of homelessness worse?"

""Mm, pretty much, yeah. When you've got power, you can throw someone who's drowning a lifeline, right? Seems like a good and noble thing to do, yeah? But then, if you feel like it, you can decide not to reel 'em into safety. 'Cuz maybe, for whatever reason, it's more beneficial for you if they stay out there in the brutal sea, while relying on you forever, unable to escape.""

"2084 -- CCIX.

Hector deliberated on what Leo had just said for a bit. And then, despite how much he was trying to maintain his composure, he couldn't help allowing a smile to creep onto his face, and a small laugh escaped his lips. ""You know,"" said Hector, ""I was a bit worried about offering you a position like this. Granting you responsibility over civilians. But now, after hearing that... I think you might just be perfect for it.""

Leo seemed confused again and blinked a few more times.

""It sounds like you really will have their best interests at heart,"" said Hector. ""That's exactly what I'm looking for.""

Chapter Two Hundred Nine: 'O, expanding venture...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The next three weeks were blessedly peaceful. Busy, perhaps, but peaceful. Hector became more accustomed to his routine as Lord of Warrenhold, and remarkably, many of his worries seemed to be lessening--if only a little.

By all accounts, Leo appeared to be quite comfortable in his new role. Roman and a couple others had volunteered to work with Leo temporarily to help him get acclimated, and incredibly, the plan to gain informants around Gray Rock was already bearing fruit. Hector was starting to receive miscellaneous reports about various things happening around the city. They weren't especially helpful yet, mostly just mundane rumors, but it was something.

Ericoros had thus far proved completely uncooperative. The reaper hadn't said a single word to Hector at all, although he'd apparently spoken briefly to Melchor when it was the man's turn to hold onto him. Ericoros had asked Melchor about Hector, wanting to know why someone as famous as Darktide was following him.

And Darktide, team player that he was, had apparently talked Hector up as being some kind of great man, worthy of trust and respect.

When Garovel had privately relayed that information to him, Hector felt more uncertain than ever about this whole thing. Getting Melchor to lie for him like that was absolutely ridiculous, but considering how deep into this they were now, what other option was there?"

"2084 -- CCIX.

Hector deliberated on what Leo had just said for a bit. And then, despite how much he was trying to maintain his composure, he couldn't help allowing a smile to creep onto his face, and a small laugh escaped his lips. ""You know,"" said Hector, ""I was a bit worried about offering you a position like this. Granting you responsibility over civilians. But now, after hearing that... I think you might just be perfect for it.""

Leo seemed confused again and blinked a few more times.

""It sounds like you really will have their best interests at heart,"" said Hector. ""That's exactly what I'm looking for.""

Chapter Two Hundred Nine: 'O, expanding venture...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The next three weeks were blessedly peaceful. Busy, perhaps, but peaceful. Hector became more accustomed to his routine as Lord of Warrenhold, and remarkably, many of his worries seemed to be lessening--if only a little.

By all accounts, Leo appeared to be quite comfortable in his new role. Roman and a couple others had volunteered to work with Leo temporarily to help him get acclimated, and incredibly, the plan to gain informants around Gray Rock was already bearing fruit. Hector was starting to receive miscellaneous reports about various things happening around the city. They weren't especially helpful yet, mostly just mundane rumors, but it was something.

Ericoros had thus far proved completely uncooperative. The reaper hadn't said a single word to Hector at all, although he'd apparently spoken briefly to Melchor when it was the man's turn to hold onto him. Ericoros had asked Melchor about Hector, wanting to know why someone as famous as Darktide was following him.

And Darktide, team player that he was, had apparently talked Hector up as being some kind of great man, worthy of trust and respect.

When Garovel had privately relayed that information to him, Hector felt more uncertain than ever about this whole thing. Getting Melchor to lie for him like that was absolutely ridiculous, but considering how deep into this they were now, what other option was there?"

"2085

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Regardless, Hector had a feeling that it was going to take some time to get Ericoros talking. He just wondered how long. Given the longevity of reapers, this shit could take years.

But oh well. There was no rushing something like this. For now, all they could do was try to show Ericoros the kind of people they were and what kind of operation they were running.

At this rate, though, they would soon need to come up with a more long-term solution for the reaper's captivity. They couldn't just keep handing him off between servants forever. Trapping Ericoros in a soul-empowered box seemed rather inhumane and counterproductive to the task of trying to win him over, but it might be necessary.

A few of the Rainlords had suggested that they shift some of the reconstruction effort to building a prison that could hold reapers, and Hector was considering it. Even if they didn't intend to use it for Ericoros, such a facility could certainly prove useful in the future.

In fact, he was a bit surprised that Warrenhold didn't already possess such a place, but after consulting Garovel and Voreese about it, he learned that it used to.

According to Voreese, the half-destroyed Star Tower was where the prison had been located.

Which brought up all sorts of questions to Hector's mind regarding Warrenhold's history. Was it merely a coincidence that, of all eight towers, the one with the prison in it had been the only one to incur such heavy damage? When had that tower been destroyed? And who had caused it?

Voreese didn't have any answers for him, unfortunately. She may have been the reaper of the original builder of Warrenhold, but until recently, she hadn't even visited in over a thousand years."

"2086

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The reconstruction effort overall was progressing in new directions as well. After completing work on the Entry Tower and moving most of their attention to the Bell Tower, some of the Rainlords began expressing an interest in the problematic lake that sat below Warrenhold. Specifically, they wanted to start draining it so that they could get a better look at the ancient buildings therein.

Hector was more than happy to give his approval, but it apparently wasn't going to be a quick process. There was simply too much water down there and too few people to work on it. Theoretically, a materialization user could just push the water up and out with gigantic buckets, but where were they supposed to move all that water? The surface? That was a hell of a climb up the cave's winding staircase--and then also through the Entry Tower's dozens of flights of stairs as well.

And if they tried to cut corners or get reckless with their handling of so much water in one trip, then there was a very good chance that it would spill and flood Warrenhold itself. There were far too many non-servants around to risk something like that.

Instead, they'd decided that the better location to deposit all the water was the underground river. They still had to trek up those winding stairs, but rather than going through the Entry Tower, they had to go through the bathhouses and into a long tunnel that eventually led out to the waterfall--the same one that could be faintly heard from Warrenhold's main plaza.

It was still a considerable distance to transport so much water, so they considered rigging up a high-powered pumping system in order to at least automate the process, but in the end, they figured that acquiring all the parts for a large enough contraption of that kind would be a needless expense. They resorted to simply using a materializer for the pumping job instead, and occasionally, that materializer was Hector."

He created a long iron tube and snaked it all the way up the side of the cave, through the bathhouse doors, and down the tunnel to the waterfall. He would capture the lake water at the opening of the tube and then push it all the way to exit with a moving inner wall of iron.

It wasn't terribly difficult, but Hector still found it to be a somewhat interesting form of training--both because of the sheer volume of iron and water involved and because so much of his work had to be done without visual reference. He had to rely almost entirely on his imagination. Moreover, the total travel distance of the tube was greater than his sphere of influence with materialization, so he had to keep walking back and forth as well.

Tedious was certainly one word for it, though.

It no doubt would've been much faster to drill down below the lake and simply let the water drain out on its own, but the big concern there was that, with so much water in need of removal, the amount of drilling required would be too dangerous. The structural stability of the cave itself might become compromised--not to mention the possibility of encountering volcanic gases. Reapers could phase through the rock and locate lava, since it emitted light, but gases remained invisible to them.

It was a shame, too, because one or two destruction users probably could've taken care of that job in a few days.

This did, however, get Hector thinking about the local environment a bit more. He was starting to wonder if he should try to recruit a geologist. Maybe not right now but eventually, perhaps.

On the subject of recruitment, however, one other person had recently gained Hector's attention: a woman named Madison Reach."

about how she was in hiding from a group called ""Andalero,"" but Hector hadn't really spared it much thought. As far as he was concerned, she fit right in with all these fugitive Rainlords, and if Roman wanted her to be protected, then Hector was more than happy to have her stay here.

It was only very recently, however, that she had introduced herself to Hector directly.

And boy, could that woman talk.

She was quite nice as well, expressing her gratitude for her accommodations repeatedly and enthusiastically. But she also had some suggestions, apparently, regarding the overall decor of Warrenhold. She even went so far as to ask if she might be granted some funding in order to help pursue her passion for interior design.

Hector had been at a loss for what to say to that.

""I'm thinking some nice rugs would go a long way to making a lot of these rooms more welcoming and, just, 'homely,' y'know? And goddess knows this place could do with a bit more light. I'm thinking some lamps to hang along the top of each tower. Help brighten up the ceiling in particular, which I think will improve the already-gorgeous view from the main plaza. Oh, maybe some nice banners to drape down the side of each tower would be good, too, but I imagine you would want those to be custom made, eh? Do you have an insignia or crest? I could look into--""

And she had just kept going. If not for the Lord Dimas Sebolt's timely arrival, Hector wasn't sure what would have happened.

""Perhaps you should give him some time to think about your proposals,"" Dimas had said.

""Oh! Um, sure!"" Her eyes had seemed to light up even more when she'd noticed Dimas there. ""You're probably right! I'll do that! And you'll keep me company while I await his response, won't you?""

""...Not the entire time, but yes. I would be happy to.""

And the way she had wrapped herself around Dimas' arm--that was perhaps the most surprising thing Hector had seen in a while."

"2089

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The relationship between those two had quickly become a popular subject of discussion around Warrenhld. According to Garovel, they were quite the passionate couple--to the shock of basically everyone who knew Dimas. ""Passionate"" was one word that Hector did not think of when trying to describe that man.

Reportedly, most of the ""passion"" seemed to be originating from Madison's end, but the fact that Dimas never rebuffed her open displays of affection was still a bombshell in its own right to the other Rainlords.

Diego Redwater appeared to be taking this development especially hard, though Hector wasn't entirely sure why.

Hector kind of wanted to ask Dimas about the whole thing directly, but he didn't really have the time, and it seemed a bit rude, besides.

On the matter of treasure hunting, there had also been considerable progress. Three teams had been formed and deployed to different locations across the world. As the head Rainlords had discussed, they each consisted of servants with little or no renown, and three support teams had also been formed to help them, consisting entirely of non-servants who were multilingual and knowledgeable in both telecommunications and cartography.

Roman had been generous enough to provide transportation and false documentation for all of them, but they were still expected to operate stealthily whenever feasible.

Despite the whole thing being his and Garovel's idea, Hector had been rather nervous about sending them all out on their own like that, but after speaking with the chosen team members and getting to know them a little better, his concerns abated somewhat. They all understood their objectives and were taking their roles very seriously--as one might expect from Rainlords.

Thus far, none of the teams had reported back with especially good news, but with only the general location and artifact description to go on, it was expected that these missions would take quite a long time to find anything--assuming there even was anything left to be found.

Hector just hoped that Emiliana's intel was solid."

"2090

All of those developments, however, paled in comparison to what happened with the banking project during these three weeks. The final name of it was the Darksteel National Bank, and it was now officially open for business.

That first week of operation had been especially insane.

As the Madame Carthrace had predicted, new customers came pouring in. Much of it could be handled online, but they'd also leased an office building in downtown Gray Rock specifically for the purpose of receiving new customers. And every time Hector visited that place, it was absolutely packed with people, oftentimes with waiting lines that extended all the way out the door and around the corner of the building.

His appearances there always turned into a bit of a circus as well, since basically everyone in the country knew his face at this point. All the attention was certainly overwhelming and uncomfortable, but he found himself being less concerned about his own feelings and more so about all the people waiting in line. According to the news, many of them didn't even leave once the Bank closed. They simply camped out overnight, waiting for the doors to reopen.

They ended up renting another building a few blocks away to help alleviate the problem, but it still persisted--now in two locations instead of one. Amelia was now considering upgrading the second building from a rent to a lease. As Hector understood it, a lease here in Atreya required at least a three-year commitment, which was why she was reluctant to go through with it. This initial surge of customers was obviously not going to last for three years, and Amelia was doubtful that they would need two buildings in such close proximity to one another.

But then again, people were traveling to Gray Rock from all over Atreya just to open an account at the Darksteel National Bank, so maybe it would be worth it. Or maybe they needed to open a branch in another city.

It was all a bit too complicated for Hector's inexperienced mind, and he was glad to have the Madame Carthrace in his corner."

"2091

Overall, things were looking up, but funding for the Bank was still a concern. It would take time to process all of the new customers and begin earning revenue from them. Hector fully intended to reinvest everything back into the Bank itself in order to keep growing operations, but in the meantime, he wanted to do everything he could to secure more immediate funding as well.

Which was where the other Atreyan lords came in. Prior to the Bank's official opening, he had already completed all of the postponed Gala meetings, so now he was working on an entirely fresh batch of lordly meetings.

Some meetings, he pursued himself--at the recommendation of his newly-formed Board of Advisors, which currently included Amelia and everyone whom she had handpicked. Now that the Bank was officially operating and getting tons of free publicity on the news, their hope with this new round of meetings was to appeal to the other Atreyan lords as potential investors.

And it was still very early to be getting too optimistic, but the Board seemed to be in good spirits. The more reserve funding the Bank had at its disposal, the more new customers they could accept. As Hector understood it, according to state regulations, any new bank had to possess enough reserve funding to cover the potential loss of every single customer's assets--up to two hundred thousand troa each.

Therefore, taking on too many customers too quickly was tantamount to fraud--which would probably cause the Bank to collapse before it even got off the ground. These regulations would only begin to relax if the Bank continued to operate for several years with consistently proven ""solvency""--meaning, never failing to repay its debts or meet its other financial obligations.

That was part of the reason why they were having to put so many applicants on a waiting list. So every time Hector was able to secure new investment from a fellow lord, that waiting list could have a huge chunk removed from it."

"2092

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

And besides all that, it was just good to have more domestic investors. The whole point of the Bank was to prevent foreign influence from taking over the nation, so any help that Hector could get from fellow Atreyans was a step closer to that goal.

For their part, though, the other lords often seemed a bit uncomfortable with the whole thing--in some cases, even when they agreed to invest millions of troa.

Hector couldn't be entirely certain what the source of their collective discomfort was, especially with how guarded many of them were in his presence, but he could imagine why they might be feeling a bit trapped by him.

With the current state of the economy and the very public commotion that the Bank was stirring up, there seemed to be a fast-growing cultural sentiment that helping Darksteel National Bank meant helping Atreya itself--and by logical extension, not helping Darksteel National Bank meant borderline treason. If the public found out about a lord's refusal to invest any troa at all, it wouldn't look good for them.

Hector felt kinda bad about that development. He hadn't intended to bully anyone into joining hands with him, but with the way some of these meetings went, it sometimes felt like that.

He didn't want to apologize unnecessarily, though. The purpose of the Bank really was to help Atreya, after all. It wasn't like he'd done anything wrong. And hopefully, all these lords would eventually be seeing huge returns on their investments.

On a more pleasant note, however, the Bank was also getting quite a few offers of investment on its own, without Hector having to go and meet with anyone personally. Business owners and lesser-known lords were apparently calling in every day, asking to get in on the action.

It was all just so very, very strange.

A few months ago, Hector would never have imagined that he might become a banker, of all things. And at the age of seventeen, too? What the hell kind of life was he living, exactly?"

"2093

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Hector had no idea what the future had in store for him, but in the back of his mind, he was immensely disturbed by the current level of comfort that he was enjoying. He was able to eat quite luxurious meals every day thanks to the passionate Rainlord chefs, and the supply team was able to get its hands on increasingly higher quality goods for everyone.

Technically, the job of managing supplies belonged to the castle's ""steward,"" which was the official title of Amelia Carthrace, but as she was often busy managing financial and legal matters with the Bank, the task of overseeing the supply team had largely fallen upon her recently-appointed secretary, a bespectacled Atreyan woman with dark hair and a face that fit in quite well with all these stern Rainlords around.

Her name was Mara Rogers, and while Hector hadn't interacted with her directly very much yet, he saw her around quite frequently. She only looked to be in her mid-twenties, but she didn't seem to be struggling much with her position, which he found impressive, considering she was basically managing the entirety of Warrenhold's day-to-day operations now.

So when a knock arrived at his door as he was preparing for bed after another long day, he couldn't be all that surprised when it turned out to be her.

""Lord?"" came Mara's voice from beyond the door. ""I know the hour is late, but might I have a few minutes of your time?""

Hector, already in his pajamas, looked at Garovel hovering there next to him.

'Well? Invite the lady in. I can't do it.'

Hector's expression flattened. Sometimes, he wondered why he bothered consulting the reaper at all. ""...Sure. Come in.""

She entered, still sharply dressed as usual and carrying a pen and clipboard. She remained near the open doorway. ""I wanted to speak to you on the matter of your chamberlain--or rather, your persistent lack thereof.""

"2094

Hector sat down on his bed. "It's not that I don't want a chamberlain," he said, "but it would be an unnecessary expense. I can take care of my own room. I'm not even here all that often, so it doesn't even get that messy to begin with."

"Your frugality is admirable, Lord, but a chamberlain would be able to provide you with many more services than just the cleaning of your bedchamber," said Mara.

That was news to Hector. It was true that he had only given the subject of castle staff a quick bit of research. "...Like what?" he decided to ask.

"A competent chamberlain could run your entire household for you," she said.

Hector cocked an eyebrow.

"I do not mean all of Warrenhold," she clarified. "I mean only you and your immediate family."

"...That's just me and my mother, then," said Hector. "I still don't really think it would be worth the expense, right now. Maybe in the future, when money is less of a concern."

"Begging your pardon, Lord, but in the future, you may have a wife and children to factor into the equation as well."

Hector did his best to not be taken aback by that statement, but it was hard. He didn't want to appear flustered in front of a staff member, but at the same time, what she'd just said struck him as so utterly inconceivable that he was struggling not to let it show on his face.

"And in such a case," Mara went on, "it would be ideal if your own chamberlain were already a long-serving and well-trusted person. They could have a significant impact on the lives of your children. And of course, if your wife happens to be a woman of means, then she may have personal retainers of her own who would be moving in and tending to your family as well. You might be a bit overwhelmed by them all, if you do not have any of your own. And forgive me if I am overstepping here, but I believe that such an imbalance between you and your wife could invite problems into your relationship that might otherwise have been avoided."

Hector just kind of sat there, blinking."
"2095

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Mara shifted some papers on her clipboard. "'I have some candidates in mind who I think would be a good fit for the position. And not to worry, I have only considered lowborn individuals. Anyone with ties to the aristocracy would be riskier regarding information leaks, which I know you are quite concerned about. And regarding money, I believe--'"

"'Ms. Rogers,'" said Hector. "'I... appreciate your diligence, but I have no plans to get married.'"

"'I was not under the impression that you did, Lord, but it is still good to be mindful of the future.'"

He had to admire her determination. "'...You really want me to hire a chamberlain that badly, huh?'"

Mara adjusted her glasses. "'I do, Lord.'"

Hector took a deliberate breath. "'Will doing so make your job easier?'"

"'Ah--'" She hesitated for the first time that Hector had seen.

"'Perhaps, yes, but I assure you, that was not my--'"

"'Fine. Show me your candidates.'"

For a moment, she just stood there, staring at him.

Hector glanced at Garovel, who had been chuckling beneath their conversation the whole time.

It took a while, but they went through the résumés of Mara's candidates and eventually chose three to interview. As they were wrapping up, Garovel decided to chime in.

'I like this woman,' he said. 'You should give her a promotion.'

Hector paused, for two reasons--the first being because he wasn't sure if Garovel was serious, and the second being because he'd actually been considering doing that himself. 'Do you really think so? Or are you just saying that?'

'When have I ever said something just to say it?'

'Only in every conversation we've ever had.'

'Promote her, dammit.'

Hector was watching her excuse herself and turn for the door. 'Are you sure? Because I will.'

'I bet you won't, you wimp.'

Hector gave the reaper a scrunched up expression, though accompanied by a smile. 'I'll do it right now.'

'Oho. Go on, then.'"

"2096

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Ms. Rogers,"" said Hector aloud.

She stopped in front of the door and looked at him again.

""...Seeing as the Madame Carthrace has essentially handed off all of her duties as the Stewardess of Warrenhold to you,"" he said, ""I would like to officially grant the position to you.""

Mara stared. ""I... sir, I'm not...""

Hector waited for her.

Still, she was faltering. ""I don't know what to say, Lord...""

""So... you want the job, then?"" said Hector.

She held her clipboard close to her chest and nodded fervently.

That made Hector smile. ""Good. I'll tell Madame Carthrace in the morning.""

""Ah... you have not already discussed this decision with her, sir?""

""No,"" said Hector flatly.

""I see..."

""Why? Think she'll be upset?""

""Well, you are giving her job and title to someone else without consulting her first, sir..."

Hector gave an admmissive nod. ""True. But she already has another job and title to spare, so I'm pretty sure she'll understand."" He lay back on the bed and closed his eyes. ""But if you're that worried about it, you could always just turn my offer down.""

""No, sir. I will gladly take it."" And there was a pause. ""It does come with a pay increase, doesn't it?""

""Yeah.""

""In that case, I am suddenly also certain that she will understand,"" said Mara.

That made Hector laugh a little, but his eyes remained shut, and he didn't move.

""I suppose I will let you rest, Lord. And thank you.""

""Keep up the good work, Ms. Rogers.""

""Yes, Lord.""

And with that, he heard her leave and close the door behind her.

Hector wedged himself beneath his bed sheets and was already half-asleep when Garovel decided to continue the conversation.

'Well, aren't you Mr. Cool?' the reaper said.

Hector rolled over. 'I don't know what that means, and I'm too tired to figure it out.'

'You're really taking to this whole ""Lord of Warrenhold"" thing.'

'Mm...'

'It's good. Weird, but good.'

"2097

The reaper let him go to sleep soon after that.

The next day was rather special, because Warrenhold would be hosting royalty. King William was visiting, unfortunately without the Queen, as she was still too busy and also believed that her attendance would turn the whole affair into a media circus.

So instead, Lynnette and Mehlsanz accompanied the King. The man's several other attendants were only allowed as far as the castle's main gate.

This would technically be Lynnette's second visit--the first being when she'd asked him at the Queen's behest to accompany her and Prince Meriwether to Sair all those months ago.

There was considerably more to see now, however, and her surprise was apparent even while they were still aboveground. The surface buildings of Warrenhold had been receiving a moderate degree of reconstruction as well, and now they all at least had four walls, a roof, electricity, and running water. They were nowhere near as impressive as the eight towers underground, though, and probably never would be, so when they started descending through the Entry Tower, the heightened amazement on all of his guests' faces put Hector in quite a good mood.

They of course made sure to provide everyone with an explanation of Warrenhold's anti-pest mechanism and its corresponding psychological effects. Ms. Rogers proved very helpful in that regard, since Hector still had a bit of trouble talking to Lynnette.

He wanted to get past that problem of his and soon, but it just wasn't that easy, apparently. Every rational thought in his brain was telling him that he didn't need to be afraid of talking to Lynn, that he'd already spoken normally to her before, that he'd been through way more difficult conversations with way more difficult people. Logically, it made no sense why he should still be struggling with her.

And yet he was, goddammit."

"2098

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Regardless, it was nice to show the three of them around. It was bit weird to see Mehlsanz traveling with two people who couldn't even see her, but the reaper didn't seem terribly upset about it.

'We have a fix for that, though,' Garovel told her. 'In part, at least.'

'A fix for what?' said Mehlsanz.

Garovel's skeletal grin seemed to widen. 'Hector, let's go talk to Roman.'

Roman and Gina had their own rooms in the Tower of Night, just below the master bedroom. They'd been coming and going from Warrenhold as they pleased, but lately, they'd been spending more time here than not. Roman had become fast friends with several prominent Rainlords, especially Diego Redwater.

Somehow, Hector wasn't surprised by that friendship.

Gina, by comparison, was more reserved around the Rainlords, Hector noticed. As soon as it became clear that she and Roman would be spending considerable time here, it had become her priority to ensure that Warrenhold had internet access--which was no small feat, since Warrenhold didn't have cable lines that she could create ethernet ports out of.

Hector wasn't too clear on the details of what she was working on, but apparently, she wanted to install some kind of super-extra high-speed fiber-thing. It sounded pretty difficult and expensive, but Hector decided to just leave it to her and the handful of like-minded young Rainlords she'd teamed up with.

Roman, Gina, Lynnette, and the King were all quite pleased to see each other again. For Hector, it felt like a lifetime ago that they had all been together in that underground bunker full of cars.

It was nice to see them all smiling and enjoying themselves.

Gina retrieved a box from beneath her corner desk and set it down in front of Lynnette. ""Here,"" she said. ""Take one. We've been collecting them.""

Lynn pulled out a pair of Hun'Kui-made goggles, obviously not sure what she was looking at."

"2099

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Gina took a pair for herself as well and donned it immediately. Her gaze fell instantly upon Mehlsanz. ""Unfortunately, this doesn't let us talk to them, but at least we're able to confirm with our own eyes that Hector and Roman here haven't been lying to us all this time.""

Lynnette's lone eye widened briefly, and then she put her goggles on, too. ""Oh my goodness...!"" A curt laugh escaped her lips as she stared at Garovel.

Garovel gave her a small wave.

""You didn't tell me they would be so horrifying-looking,"" said Lynn, ""but I guess they are reapers, so...""

""Oh,"" said Hector. ""Ah. What do they look like for you?""

""Umm... wait. What do you mean 'for you'?""

""They don't always look the same for everyone,"" said Roman.

""Oh..."" Lynnette still seemed a bit awestruck, and she turned to find both Mehlsanz and Voreese present as well. ""Well, I see skeletons in armor. With flaming skulls and long... dripping tongues.""

Voreese cackled inaudibly. 'That sounds pretty fuckin' gnarly!'

For a while, the conversation remained there as they all traded descriptions of what they saw. Gina saw reapers as hooded swordsmen, and the King saw them as spectral ghouls with glowing, bulbous eyes--and even Mara joined in as well, at Roman and Hector's insistence. She also saw reapers as skeletons, though hers were covered in blood and strips of rotting flesh.

Mara did not wish to put the goggles on again.

""Where did you get these things?"" said Lynnette.

""The Undercrust,"" said Roman.

When that did not answer the woman's question satisfactorily, everyone seemed to realize at once that this was going to turn into a long conversation. They decided to get breakfast together before going into it.

Even though she'd heard about it back at the Gala, Lynnette still looked mildly confused by the notion that there existed an entire civilization beneath the planet's surface, and she used this opportunity to ask more questions. The King also looked surprised, though perhaps less than Hector expected, which made him curious.

""...Did you already have some knowledge of the Undercrust, Your Highness?"" he asked.

""I wouldn't go so far as to call it knowledge,"" said the King, ""but I have read of such things in mythic tales.""

"2100

""I see,"" said Hector. There was something else he wanted to ask the King about, but not with everyone around like this.

""Truth be told,"" said Gina, ""we're still not entirely sure how these goggles work--or how they're made. We know that they're infused with ardor, but the process by which we might accomplish that feat for ourselves is still mysterious to us.""

""And even if it wasn't mysterious to us,"" said Roman, ""there could be more to it than just the infusion process. The Hun'Kui are a pretty interesting bunch. I've made a few solo trips back down to the Undercrust, trying to get to know them and their culture better. In theory, it seems like ardor-infused earbuds or headphones should allow you to hear a reaper's voice, but so far, I haven't been able to find anything like that. I'm also not yet sure why these goggles have become so widely used among the Hun'Kui.""

""What do you mean?"" said the King, still wearing his pair. ""Are they not being used for precisely this same purpose? To see reapers?""

""That's what I thought at first, too,"" said Roman, ""but the more time I spend down there, the less sense that makes to me. I haven't really seen that many reapers down there. They seem to be just as rare in the Undercrust as they are on the surface.""

Gina chuckled. ""You say they're rare, but we have three in this very room. And how many more are hanging around Warrenhold, right now?""

Roman put up his hands with a shrug. ""Yeah, okay, this castle is a bit of a reaper hot spot, but as far I've been told, there are less than a million reapers in the entire world. Maybe that seems like a lot, but it's really not, especially when compared to the billions of living people that they're supposedly watching over.""

'Shit,' said Voreese, 'you're making me feel guilty for not getting much reaping done, lately.'

"2101

That made Hector think. It was sometimes easy to forget how important reaping actually was. Alleviating the suffering of departed souls was a big responsibility, and it wasn't hard to understand why so many reapers chose to focus on that alone.

""But regardless of any of that,"" said Roman, ""I think the reason these goggles are so popular might just be because they're currently fashionable. I doubt they were developed purely for fashion, but it might be why they're so widespread among the Hun'Kui. Maybe I'll try to find an Undercrust reaper on my next trip and ask them what they think.""

Truthfully, Hector was actually a bit uncomfortable with Roman's recent solo trips to the Undercrust. He didn't want to doubt the man, but given everything that he'd personally experienced down there, it just seemed like such an incredibly dangerous thing to be doing.

But a useful thing, nonetheless.

Hector was certainly curious to learn more about the Undercrust, too, especially about its political climate. Thus far, Roman hadn't heard anything about anyone named Royo Raju or Malast making waves down there, but it wouldn't surprise Hector if that changed soon.

Their conversation continued for a while, and Roman gifted the goggles to Lynnette and King William. He made a point of warning them about how important these items were, about how problematic it might be if they fell into the wrong hands.

And perhaps Roman warned them a little too well, because after hearing that, the King decided to politely decline the pair that had been offered to him. Lynnette, however, kept hers and expressed her gratitude.

Those goggles would be a huge boon for her, Hector knew. He certainly still remembered how potent she had been back when they were rescuing the King from Abolish's clutches. Her main weakness in that fight had been the fact that she couldn't see the enemy reapers, but that wouldn't be a problem now."

"2102

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

The tour of Warrenhold continued and lasted much of the day, as the King wanted to meet all of the head Rainlords and talk to each of them for a while. Hector sat in on each one, mainly just observing and not saying much.

It seemed to go well, he thought. All of the Rainlords were appreciative of the asylum being granted to them, and the King was very welcoming and friendly.

His Majesty's primary interest seemed to be in Rainlords' plans moving forward. In every meeting, he asked about it. How long did they intend to stay in Atreya? Would any more of them be arriving? Where were the rest of their kin? What about their subjects in Sair? What were their intentions regarding Abolish? And the Sandlords taking over the Wetlands?

The King had a soft speaking voice, but he didn't pull his punches when it came to the subject matter of his questions. He could've just asked Hector all of these things, but he probably wanted to get his answers directly from the source.

Hector tried not to take it as a sign the King didn't trust his word. It was simply wise--not relying on only one person for all the answers to such an important subject.

That being said, though, the Rainlords didn't have that many proper answers for him to begin with. There was still so much uncertainty in their future, and they all knew it, even if they were reluctant to say so like Dimas and Zeff. Mainly, they told the King about their current efforts to rebuild their power so that they could ""eventually"" go reclaim their kin from the Vanguard and retake their territory.

It was nearly evening already by the time the King finished meeting with everyone.

And it would be on this day that Hector did something that he had never done before--at least, not on this scale. Ever since being informed that the King intended to visit, Hector had been thinking about what this evening might be like. And he of course made sure to warn the kitchen staff several days in advance.

He invited everyone in the castle to come eat together with him, and he hosted his first proper banquet in Warrenhold."

"2103 -- CCX.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Chapter Two Hundred Ten: 'O, engrossing revelry...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It wasn't nearly as luxurious as the Gala had been, but Hector didn't mind one bit. If anything, that level of opulence in his own home probably would've just made him uncomfortable. Good food and smiling faces--that was all Hector was looking for here.

And he got it.

Hector hadn't seen so many Rainlords laughing in one place since that visit to Luzo, just prior to the Siege of Marshrock. There had been quite a bit of merriment in their camp, thanks in large part to the Lord Salvador Delaguna. That giant man's boisterous laugh had been positively infectious.

Then the Blackburns had joined their entourage, and the tension between them and all the other Houses seemed to take precedence over everything else as they'd made their way to Dunehall. And then, of course, after being ambushed there and suffering so many horrible losses, the Rainlords as a whole had been in a seemingly constant state of grief, even while gritting their teeth and soldiering on.

So it was particularly good to hear Salvador laughing again. It wasn't as loud or as frequent as Hector remembered, but it was more than enough to help spread the cheer to the others in the banquet hall.

The Grand Hall of the Night, as it was apparently named according to Voreese, was the single largest chamber in the entirety of Warrenhold, and as its name suggested, it resided within the Tower of Night. It had become something of a ""common area"" for people to gather during lunch or dinner, but never had Hector seen it so packed like this.

Some people were eating outside in the main plaza or in one of the other tower's banquet halls, but Hector saw just about everyone present."

"2103 -- CCX.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Chapter Two Hundred Ten: 'O, engrossing revelry...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It wasn't nearly as luxurious as the Gala had been, but Hector didn't mind one bit. If anything, that level of opulence in his own home probably would've just made him uncomfortable. Good food and smiling faces--that was all Hector was looking for here.

And he got it.

Hector hadn't seen so many Rainlords laughing in one place since that visit to Luzo, just prior to the Siege of Marshrock. There had been quite a bit of merriment in their camp, thanks in large part to the Lord Salvador Delaguna. That giant man's boisterous laugh had been positively infectious.

Then the Blackburns had joined their entourage, and the tension between them and all the other Houses seemed to take precedence over everything else as they'd made their way to Dunehall. And then, of course, after being ambushed there and suffering so many horrible losses, the Rainlords as a whole had been in a seemingly constant state of grief, even while gritting their teeth and soldiering on.

So it was particularly good to hear Salvador laughing again. It wasn't as loud or as frequent as Hector remembered, but it was more than enough to help spread the cheer to the others in the banquet hall.

The Grand Hall of the Night, as it was apparently named according to Voreese, was the single largest chamber in the entirety of Warrenhold, and as its name suggested, it resided within the Tower of Night. It had become something of a ""common area"" for people to gather during lunch or dinner, but never had Hector seen it so packed like this.

Some people were eating outside in the main plaza or in one of the other tower's banquet halls, but Hector saw just about everyone present."

"2104

Rather weirdly, the King didn't want to sit in just one place while he ate, and he asked Hector to accompany him as they went around talking and eating with as many different people as possible. Lynnette moved to join as well, but the King told her to stay and relax with Roman and Gina. She seemed a bit reluctant to accept that order, but the man insisted, and she gave Hector a final lingering look before relenting.

Knowing how seriously she took her guard duty, that wasn't an insignificant gesture, Hector thought. She was trusting him to look after the King in her stead.

They'd been touring Warrenhold and meeting Rainlords the entire day, but the King had apparently not gotten his fill, because he went from table to table every few minutes. He would make introductions if he hadn't previously, then he would sit down and spark up a conversation, usually about history or medicine. Then he would politely excuse himself.

It was kind of amazing to witness, Hector felt. He'd always thought the King to be fairly charismatic, but seeing him now was something else. Granted, he hadn't really known King William all that well before, but still, Hector didn't recall him being this much of a conversationalist.

He decided to consult Garovel about it, privately. 'Was the King always like this?'

'Like what?' said the reaper, who was following close behind.

'Like, uh... er... actually, I'm not sure how to explain it...'

'Oh, do you mean how he seems to be channeling the God of Amicability, right now?'

Hector had to pause. 'God of Amicability?'

'I just made that up. It's not a real thing.'

'Oh... Well, shit, now I'm disappointed.'

The reaper chortled privately. 'Sorry.'

'But yeah, that IS what I was getting at,' said Hector. 'I never knew the King was so, uh... well, amicable is a good word, I guess.'

'Yeah,' said Garovel. 'He does seem a little different to me, too. In a good way, though.'

"2105

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'I'm glad he seems to be in such good spirits,' said Hector.

'I'm glad he's getting along so well with the Rainlords,' said Garovel.

'That, too.'

Hector listened to the King having a conversation with a member of House Garza, a young non-servant woman named Luciana Garza. They were talking about the history of her family.

Thanks to his daily routine of going around the castle and checking up on everything, Hector was finally getting to a point where he could remember all the Rainlords' names by their faces alone.

Luciana and her sister were the only two Garzas in all of Warrenhold, right now. Just like Diego Redwater, their House had been almost entirely captured at Rheinhal by one of the most powerful servants in the world, the Vanguardian Field Marshal Sanko.

And as Hector recalled, Luciana's sister was Elise, the non-servant woman who'd had the misfortune of ending up in Himmekel with him and the others. They weren't twins, but they looked incredibly similar to one another, with Luciana being only a year older.

Their mother, however, had not been captured by the Vanguard. She had been killed by Parson Miles, as confirmed by Zeff Elroy and Evangelina Stroud.

And knowing everything he did about them, Hector was a bit curious about their House's history as well.

Apparently, their hometown was a small place called Entierr. Their family wasn't nearly as large as some of the others, but they had played a famously important role during the Redwater Uprising. They were some of the best scouts and intelligence-gatherers on the continent, and without them, the Rainlords as a whole might very well have perished completely instead of just being pushed to the brink of extinction.

""In fact,"" King William was saying, ""I remember reading that House Garza's actions single-handedly saved the Rainlord bloodline.""

""Whoa, whoa, whoa,"" laughed Carlos Sebolt, who was sitting adjacent Luciana. ""That's taking it a bit far, I think.""

""I don't know,"" said Luciana, who was all smiles. ""I think there might be something to that.""

""Yeah, sounds pretty accurate to me,"" added Elise."
"2106

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""I remember reading an especially remarkable tale about a man named Benjamin Garza,"" said the King. ""Perhaps all of you here can speak to the veracity of it.""

""It's true,"" said Luciana.

The King laughed. ""You have not even heard the story yet.""

""Oh, but I have,"" she said. ""You're referring to the Tale of Nine Revivals, no?""

""How did you know?"" said the King.

""Every child of House Garza knows this story by heart,"" said Elise.

""We all know the heroism of our great, great grandfather.""

""I see,"" said the King. ""That is heartening to hear.""

""Please, do go on and tell it,"" said Luciana. ""We would be happy to check your version for errors.""

The King laughed again. ""Very well. I believe it begins rather harrowingly, yes? At the fortress known as Waterbreak, near the end of the Uprising?""

Both women nodded.

""All hope seemed to be lost,"" the King continued. ""The gates were broken down. The defenders were being overrun as the forces of the Mohssian Empire flooded into the castle. The famous Redwater Twins had perished months before, and by all accounts, this here was the last bastion of the Rainlords. The Empire sought their extinction.""

""Right so far,"" said Elise.

Given the heaviness of the subject matter, Hector would've expected the looks on everyone's faces to be a bit more somber, but it didn't seem to be fazing them at all.

""Benjamin Garza managed to escape from that madness through a secret underground passage,"" said the King. ""And with him, he brought thirteen children. Between them all, nine different Houses were represented. They were, each of them, the very last of their kin, and Benjamin went on to raise them all as his own. He became, in essence, the lone conduit through which the entirety of the Rainlords' legacy was preserved and passed on to the new generation.""

"2107

""Yeah, that sounds pretty accurate,"" said Luciana.

""You forgot the part where Benjamin slays a dozen enemy servants while carrying the children to safety,"" said Elise.

""That definitely didn't happen,"" said Carlos.

""It definitely did,"" said Elise.

""How could he possibly have carried thirteen children at once?"" said Carlos, still laughing.

""Easily,"" said Elise, glancing toward Hector. ""A powerful enough materializer wouldn't even need to use his hands for something like that.""

""Yeah, but as far as we know, he wasn't a materializer,"" said Carlos.

""Then, whatever, maybe he didn't physically carry them,"" said Luciana. ""Maybe he just cleared a path while they all ran together. Doesn't stop it from being any less amazing.""

""I'm not trying to say it wasn't amazing,"" said Carlos. ""Just a bit exaggerated, perhaps. It's also quite unlikely those thirteen children were genuinely the last of all our brethren. We have reason to believe that there were a few of us scattered elsewhere across the continent at that time.""

Luciana bumped shoulders with him. ""Oh, shut up, Carlos,"" she laughed.

""Yes, stop trying to spoil such a wonderful story,"" added Elise.

Carlos just shook his head and popped a couple grapes in his mouth.

""I see,"" said King William. ""So the veracity is somewhat contested, then.""

""Don't listen to him!"" said Luciana. ""If anything, I bet the story is underselling what really happened!""

The argument continued on for a little while longer, though everyone involved remained in good cheer. Soon, Hector and the King moved on to another table, then another, followed by still more after that.

Growing up, Hector had never really understood why so many people seemed to enjoy going to parties. To him, they were always horrible, nerve-wracking affairs where the only thing he wanted to do was not draw attention to himself. Even the Gala, despite how much he'd managed to enjoy it, had ultimately felt that way for him.

But this?

This was just pure fun."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Among so many of his friends and comrades like this, Hector didn't really feel nervous at all. Sure, he was getting a lot of attention, but that was pretty normal at this point, and he knew that the Rainlords weren't looking to silently judge him or anything. There wasn't an oppressive feeling that he had to prove himself in their eyes.

They were just happy to see him. And he, them.

And the longer the banquet went on, the more he realized this.

Warrenhold truly felt like a home to him now, more so than any other place he had ever lived.

After a while longer of enjoying the festivities, the King finally began to slow down a little. He grabbed a drink for himself at the bar, and he and Hector made their way out into the main plaza together for some only-slightly-fresher air.

The King wasn't the only one slowing down, however. The crowd was thinning, and Hector could see a few people dragging themselves or each other up to their rooms.

Until just the other day, there hadn't been any alcohol in Warrenhold at all. Hector just hadn't considered it a priority, and neither had Ms. Rogers, apparently. He'd heard a few complaints about it here and there, but he hadn't intended to bother doing anything about it until hearing that the King would be visiting. So Hector had finally asked Ms. Rogers to have some hard drinks shipped in for the banquet.

Heh. And now that he was witnessing the results of that decision, he wondered if the alcohol was the real reason for everyone's good cheer this evening.

He hoped that was only part of it and not the primary cause.

Hector and the King were pretty much alone now. The few others that dotted the plaza were either unconscious or barely so, and even Garovel had wandered off a while ago.

The King offered him his glass of gin. ""Want a sip? I promise not to tell anyone.""

Hector held up a hand in refusal. ""I don't really like alcohol.""

That caught the man's attention. ""You've had it before?""
"2109

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Hector wondered briefly if he should actually admit this, but he supposed there was no harm in it now. ""Yeah.""

""Ah,"" the King said. ""The prospect never occurred to me before, but could it be that you are one of those servants who is far older than he appears?""

Hector lost a bit of his mirth at that question. It reminded him of far too many other occasions where there had been much less enjoyment to go around. He considered his next words for a moment, contemplating if he should actually lie to the King of Atraya.

He didn't have the heart for it, he realized.

Instead, he explained about the sensitive nature of a servant's age.

""Are you saying that you cannot tell me your true age, then?"" the King asked.

""Ah... something like that,"" said Hector.

""How disappointing.""

""Sorry.""

""Are you sure you are not just making excuses for your past underage drinking?""

Hector squeezed his lips together and exhaled through his nose.

""Depends on if you plan to punish me for it.""

""Oh, I certainly plan that, yes. Your punishment shall be to tell me of this sordid event in excruciating detail. As your king, I command it.""

Hector scratched his head. ""Uh... okay, well... I don't know about 'excruciating detail,' since there's not really that much to tell, but... basically, I was with a few friends who I've since lost contact with... and, uh... I drank so much that I puked.""

""Ah. And you lost all affection for alcohol due to that one experience? Not that I wish to encourage your misconduct, but that seems a hasty conclusion to reach.""

""When I puked, it made one of my friends puke, too. But his puke landed on me.""

That made the King pause and stare at him.

""It was just, like, being hosed down with barf. Got all over me."" Hector's expression twisted as he recalled that horror from his middle school days. ""It went in my mouth.""

""In that case... I retract my previous statement,"" said the King. ""That is the worst thing I have heard in some time.""

"2110

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 1 of 8))
Hector couldn't help chuckling a little. ""It was a long time ago. But yeah, I still don't really care for alcohol.""

The King just took another swig of his gin, and the two of them approached the cavernous outlook at the end of the plaza.

The lake below was still largely the same, apart from a few sections near the stone stairs on Hector's left. Four large areas had been segmented off from the lake with giant walls of iron. No water remained in them, and the previously sunken buildings therein were now almost usable. They hadn't yet bothered to move any furniture or equipment into them, but they soon planned to. Once more of the sections of the lake were drained and more walls put up, the risk of a leak would be basically nonexistent.

They'd decided that draining sections of the lake was a better idea than draining the whole thing. A couple of the planners wanted to keep part of the lake intact.

As the silence drew out, Hector remembered that there was something that the King might be able to help him with.

""Your Highness, do you know anything about House Gaolanet?"" said Hector.

As he was bringing his glass up for another sip, the King's hand stopped. ""Your fellow Lords of Gray Rock.""

""Yeah. I haven't been able to find out much about them, other than a few names.""

""Yes. They are notoriously reclusive.""

Hector decided to just come out and say it. ""I have reason to believe that they've had knowledge of reapers and servants for several years, at least.""

King William was quiet a moment. ""That... would not surprise me, now that you mention it.""

""Why do you say that?""

""House Gaolanet has long had ties to the Agency of Foreign Affairs,"" said the King. ""However, I believe in recent years their role was relegated to little more than consultation.""

"2111

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 2 of 8))

""The Agency of Foreign Affairs?"" said Hector, trying to place the name. ""I don't think I've heard of that before.""

""Its role in the government is, on paper, to advise the Crown on matters of foreign policy,"" said the King. ""In practice, however, it has been more akin to a headquarters for espionage. And most importantly, the AFA played a large part in the assassination plot against the Queen. Behind the scenes, of course.""

Hector's eyes widened as he listened.

""I imagine that Helen, Prince David, or my Aunt Jezebel would be able to provide you with the details better than I, but my understanding of it is that the AFA has since been completely reworked and is no longer a threat to the Crown.""

""Uh. Well, that's good to hear, I guess.""

""But as I said, House Gaolanet's role in the AFA is a shadow of what it once was. They once held tremendous influence within it, but I think that may have also been before the AFA developed into such an espionage-heavy organization.""

Hector was still trying to wrap his head around all this new information. ""So... all the spy stuff came after the Gaolanets left?""

The King bobbed his head. ""That may be oversimplifying how it all transpired, but yes, I believe that speaks to the core of what happened.""

""Hmm.""

""Nine or ten years ago now--perhaps you will recall--there was an international incident between Atreya and Rendon. At the time, we had another government agency called His Majesty's Royal Intelligence Bureau, or the RIB. It was caught red-handed bribing a Rendon ambassador, and so Rendon demanded His Majesty the King--Helen's father--shut down the RIB or risk war.""

That story didn't ring a bell at all, but Hector supposed that wasn't so surprising, considering he would've been about seven years old.
"2112

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 3 of 8))
""Helen's father capitulated to Rendon,"" said the King, ""though not without considerable negotiation and concessions on Rendon's part. However, the RIB was not truly destroyed. It was merely folded up into the AFA in secret.""

""...That doesn't sound very legal,"" said Hector.

""Oh, no, it was perfectly legal. The King had full authority to do it and broke no laws. But yes, it was morally questionable without a doubt. And in retrospect? It was most likely an enormous mistake.""

""Because of the coup against your wife years later,"" Hector surmised.

""Yes, that was the main issue I was thinking of. But there was also the matter of the AFA itself. While its operations were greatly expanded by its absorption of the RIB, its original purpose also seemed to become lost in the shuffle.""

""Original purpose?""

""To help the Crown in matters of foreign policy. To provide wise and knowledgeable counsel.""

""Hmm.""

""The AFA became embroiled in so many secretive things that I believe there was no longer any one person who knew everything that it was doing--no one person who could advise the Crown, in other words.""

All this information was making Hector curious about something else.
""You sure seem to know a lot about this, Your Highness.""

The man smirked. ""Is that so surprising?""

""N-no, I just mean, uh. Er.""

""Heh. I am only, how you say, joshing you.""

Hector just pressed his lips together flatly.

""I am fully aware of my reputation,"" the King said. ""The man who stands by Helen's side and contributes nothing of value. A worthless king.""

""Whoa, whoa, I never said any of that. And I never thought it, either. What do you--?""

William held up his one hand. ""That is kind of you to say, but there was, and likely still is, a disconcerting amount of truth in that perception of me. Which is why I have been attempting to improve myself in these past months. To familiarize myself with the true workings of this nation and its history.""

Hector didn't know what to say."
"2113

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 4 of 8))
""As for House Gaolanet,"" the King went on, ""they are a rather mysterious bunch. The head of their family is Hanton Gaolanet.""

Hector had already been able to find out that much just from browsing public records. He knew where the Gaolanet estate was located as well, and he was wondering if he should pay it a visit sometime soon.

""I have met him many times over the years,"" said William, ""and yet, to say that I know much about him would be a gross exaggeration. He possesses a nobleman's manners, to be sure, but he does not speak often or carelessly. Or at least, that has been my experience with him. In fairness, I understand that royals are perhaps not the type of people whom most would wish to pour their hearts out to. I am certainly accustomed to dealing with individuals who wear 'masks,' so to speak.""

Hector considered the King's words for a moment. ""Was Hanton at the Gala a few weeks ago?""

""He was, though I am not surprised that you didn't notice. He is not a man to make a spectacle of himself, and he seems to only make the bare minimum of public appearances, and the rest of his family is not much different.""

""So then if I dropped in on them unannounced, they wouldn't be very happy with me.""

The King gave him a briefly wide-eyed look. ""At their home? Yes, I imagine they would be incredibly displeased by that. Most nobles would, Hector. I would not recommend such an action.""

""It was just a thought. I wasn't actually planning on it.""

William chortled. ""I know you must still be acclimating yourself to your newfound status, but if you wish for a meeting with the Gaolanets, I am sure you could simply have your people contact them and schedule one. I highly doubt the Gaolanets would refuse to talk to a national hero and fellow lord.""

""Er, I-I know,"" said Hector. ""I just. Uh. I wanna be careful, y'know?""

""Dropping in on them unannounced is being careful?""

""That was just a thought, I said!""

""Right.""

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 5 of 8))
Hector was reluctant to say more about his suspicions regarding the Gaolanets. He didn't want to go throwing accusations around, but he also felt like the King should be made aware of what else he and Garovel had learned.

But then again, maybe it would be better to wait until he had more to reveal.

Agh.

He decided to go for it.

""There's something else,"" said Hector. ""I should, uh... I should make it clear that I don't currently have any proof of this, but... I suspect that House Gaolanet has been somehow involved in multiple murders via poisoning.""

The King's brow rose. ""That is a serious accusation.""

""I don't know if they're the ones doing the poisoning,"" he clarified. ""They could just be caught up in the middle of something. But I do have evidence that the Vanguard was also involved.""

""The Vanguard? Involved in what way?""

Hector explained about the secret room that he and Garovel had found with Vanguardian documentation. He also explained that it had been long abandoned and that the name Pauline Gaolanet had been found at the scene.

The King shut his eyes and held his forehead. ""Pauline... Pauline... Pauline Gaolanet... Where have I heard that before...?""

The man really seemed to be concentrating, so even though it was taking a little while, Hector just waited patiently.

""Ah!"" The King's eyes shot open, and he snapped his fingers. ""Yes! I met her once. Years and years ago. Before I even met Helen. It was a marriage interview, as I recall.""

Hector just blinked at that news.

""Very peculiar girl,"" said William. ""I remember her piercing silver eyes, like she was attempting to look into my soul. Or she was on drugs. Honestly not sure."

Hector's expression scrunched up, but he also couldn't help laughing a little. ""Your Highness, uh..."

""What? It was true. She kept trying to predict what my next words would be. And she got very upset with me when I told her she was wrong.""

"2115

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 6 of 8))

""That, er... sounds like an interesting encounter,"" said Hector.

""Indeed,"" said the King. ""She made quite an impression on me. I'm surprised it took me this long to remember her.""

""How old were the two of you at the time?""

""Hmm. I believe I was twelve or thirteen, and she looked to be a year or two younger than me.""

Hector couldn't conceal his shock. ""Twelve?! For a marriage interview?!""

For a moment, the King just looked at him. ""Yes. The families often like to get a head start on such things. To be clear, however, I should mention that even if that meeting and everything thereafter had gone perfectly smoothly between Pauline and I, we would not have gotten married until the younger of us was eighteen. At the very earliest.""

Hector settled down a little. ""Oh... hmm.""

The King lowered his voice. ""...You are not very old as a servant at all, are you?""

Aw, shit.

Maybe he could still play it off as just being unfamiliar with royal customs?

Agh...

Hector elected not to say anything at all.

After a time, the King patted him on the shoulder. ""You may not believe me, but I find that comforting, strangely enough.""

Still, Hector didn't say anything. He merely eyed the man curiously.

""Though she may be almost three hundred years old now, I feel that Atreya is still quite a young nation at heart. Unlike certain others, she has not often been forced to fight to preserve her culture. Even during the Continental War, she was able to remain neutral. It is fitting that her national hero should be similarly young.""

The man had been right: Hector didn't believe him. He decided to keep holding his tongue, though.

The King had more to say, though. ""It seems that good fortune is finally being tested, however. I fear Atreya has entered an era of great difficulty.""

"2116

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 7 of 8))
Hector could certainly understand where the King was coming from, but that viewpoint also reminded Hector of something else. ""...Do you really think it was just 'good fortune' that kept Atreya peaceful all this time?""

""What do you mean?"" said the King.

""I think the Vanguard was watching over Atreya until relatively recently,"" said Hector.

The King held his hand up to his chin, thoughtful. ""I suppose that might make sense,"" he said. ""But if that was truly the case, then why did they stop watching over us?""

""That's what I'd like to know,"" said Hector.

""...And you think the Gaolanets might hold the answer,"" the King surmised.

""Yeah.""

Approaching footsteps drew both of their attention, and then Hector saw Lynnette there.

""Everything okay?"" she said. ""The two of you have been out here for a while now.""

""We are just fine, Ms. Edith. We were simply lost in conversation."" He gave Hector a smile. ""It seems I've found the Lord Goffe's company even more enjoyable than I expected.""

""Ah--uh, same here, Your Highness.""

""Well, alright,"" said Lynnette, ""I'm glad you've been having a good time, but it's getting a bit late, Your Highness. And you have several meetings in Sescoria tomorrow, don't you?""

The King's expression soured significantly. ""Hmm...""

Hector and Lynnette exchanged looks.

""No,"" said the King. ""I don't think I do have any meetings tomorrow.""

Lynnette seemed taken aback. ""Uh... I'm quite sure you do, Your Highness..."

""No. I'm canceling them. I think I will be staying here at Warrenhold for another day or two."" He looked to Hector again. ""That is, if it is alright with you.""

It took Hector a second to find his words. ""Oh. Um. Yeah. Of course. You're welcome to stay as long as you like, Your Highness.""

""Wonderful!""

Mouth hanging open, Lynnette was apparently speechless."
"2117 -- CCXI.

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 8 of 8))
Chapter Two Hundred Eleven: 'A grounded blade...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There was no arguing with the King, it seemed. The man had made up his mind, and after receiving permission from the Queen, Lynnette Edith ended up staying at Warrenhold as well. The King's personal attendants seemed a bit upset by the sudden change in plans, but their displeasure quickly vanished once they realized that they would be receiving the next three days off, along with free lodging at The Blue Star--one of the most prestigious hotels in the nation.

As for herself, Lynnette didn't particularly mind staying. It was unexpected, sure, and she'd been planning to spend most of the weekend with her family, but after one phone call, they were very understanding.

Just another perk of having such a royalist family. When the King or Queen made a request, all was forgiven.

But boy, this place was quite a bit crazier than she'd expected. And these Rainlords... she found herself increasingly fascinated by them.

In recent months, she'd gotten accustomed to strangers acting warily or uncomfortably around her, thanks to the unremovable half-gauntlet on her left arm, but these people weren't afraid of her at all. If anything, they seemed more intrigued by the gauntlet.

She wondered if she had Hector to thank for their behavior. Had he told them all about her situation beforehand? Or were the Rainlords just like this all the time?

It was almost a problem, actually. Many of them were so interested in talking to her that it became difficult to stick by King William's side. It bothered her at first, but the King kept telling her to relax.

So she did. Or tried to, at least.

Thankfully, she could always find him and Hector together. The King had not been exaggerating when he said that he enjoyed Hector's company, apparently."

"2117 -- CCXI.

((The For-No-Reason-In-Particular Holiday Special -- page 8 of 8))
Chapter Two Hundred Eleven: 'A grounded blade...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There was no arguing with the King, it seemed. The man had made up his mind, and after receiving permission from the Queen, Lynnette Edith ended up staying at Warrenhold as well. The King's personal attendants seemed a bit upset by the sudden change in plans, but their displeasure quickly vanished once they realized that they would be receiving the next three days off, along with free lodging at The Blue Star--one of the most prestigious hotels in the nation.

As for herself, Lynnette didn't particularly mind staying. It was unexpected, sure, and she'd been planning to spend most of the weekend with her family, but after one phone call, they were very understanding.

Just another perk of having such a royalist family. When the King or Queen made a request, all was forgiven.

But boy, this place was quite a bit crazier than she'd expected. And these Rainlords... she found herself increasingly fascinated by them.

In recent months, she'd gotten accustomed to strangers acting warily or uncomfortably around her, thanks to the unremovable half-gauntlet on her left arm, but these people weren't afraid of her at all. If anything, they seemed more intrigued by the gauntlet.

She wondered if she had Hector to thank for their behavior. Had he told them all about her situation beforehand? Or were the Rainlords just like this all the time?

It was almost a problem, actually. Many of them were so interested in talking to her that it became difficult to stick by King William's side. It bothered her at first, but the King kept telling her to relax.

So she did. Or tried to, at least.

Thankfully, she could always find him and Hector together. The King had not been exaggerating when he said that he enjoyed Hector's company, apparently."

"2118

His Highness had been different, of late. Where before, the man had acted so reserved and hardly even visible in comparison to the Queen, now he was full of life and enthusiasm in virtually everything he did.

And he seemed increasingly given to making spur-of-the-moment decisions, as well.

Lynnette had started noticing this behavioral shift a while ago, but here at Warrenhold, it was more obvious than ever. This whole trip still struck her as a bit strange, honestly.

It wasn't her place to question these things aloud, of course, but given the turbulent times currently facing the nation, she felt that she should be on the lookout for any and all possible warning signs. That was why, at first, she'd had the dreadful thought that perhaps King William had decided to stay at Warrenhold a bit longer because he wanted more time away from the Queen.

Thankfully, however, that worry was promptly obliterated when she noticed the King talking to the Queen over the phone for over two hours straight before finally going to sleep. She'd only intended to check on him, not eavesdrop from the other side of his door, but that was exactly what she'd ended up doing.

And now she was confident. They definitely were not having marital problems.

Never in her life had Lynnette ever gone so quickly from feeling relieved to annoyed. It had been like listening to an adolescent couple talking over the phone for the very first time.

It did get her thinking, though. If the King wasn't trying to get away from his wife, then what exactly was the point of spending so much time here? Obviously, he was enjoying himself, but was that really all it was?

She considered just asking him directly, but for some reason, she found that difficult. She had a pretty good rapport with the Queen, but she'd never really found the opportunity to build anything similar with the King. It felt somehow improper to question His Highness like that, especially with so many people around.

At length, however, on their third day at Warrenhold, she finally came up with a workaround to that problem.

She could just ask Hector."

"2119

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

With as much as he'd been talking to the King in the past two days, Hector probably knew him better than she did now.

...Wait, really?

Yikes.

Was that a testament to just how much Hector had been talking to the King? Or a testament to how much she hadn't been?

Probably both.

Regardless, it bothered her.

When everyone was having breakfast together, Lynnette saw her opportunity. While the King was engrossed in a conversation with a giant Rainlord, she grabbed Hector by the arm and pulled him aside.

""I need to ask you something,"" she whispered. ""Has His Highness told you anything about why he decided to extend his stay here?""

Hector's eyes looked like they were trying to escape from his head.

Lynnette was just confused. ""What's wrong?""

Hector didn't say anything. His gaze went to her hands, which were still holding his arm.

She took the hint and decided to remove them. ""Ah... Sorry, do you not like to be touched?""

Still, he remained silent, though at least the expression on his face had returned to normal.

She honestly had no idea what he was thinking at all, anymore. Had his poker face evolved since he'd been out of the country? Granted, she'd never really been the best at reading people's emotions, but she at least recalled being able to tell when he was uncomfortable before.

""Hector?"" she prodded. ""Did you hear what I asked?""

""...The King,"" said Hector.

And that was it, apparently.

""Yes,"" she said slowly, nodding her head. ""Did you hear the rest of what I asked you?""

Hector just looked at her a moment. Then he shook his head.

Lynnette took a deep breath. ""His Highness. Did he tell you why he decided to extend his stay here? At Warrenhold?""

There arrived more silence as Hector stared at her blankly again.

She was trying to be patient and not succeeding. ""Hector...""
"2120

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""...Supporting the Queen,"" said Hector.

Well, that was something at least, but Lynnette was still confused.
""What?""

""...Staying here. He's supporting the Queen. Is what he told me.""

""Okaaay... but how does that work, exactly? How is him staying here supporting Her Highness?""

Again, Hector was silent.

Lynnette just waited this time. She felt like he was probably trying to tell her. He would manage to do it, eventually.

Hopefully.

""...The King said... that he has more freedom than the Queen, right now. Because she's so, er, busy. Everyone's watching her every move. Trying to, uh, read her intentions. Politically.""

As she considered what she'd just been told, Lynnette turned back to the sight of King William sitting there, smiling and laughing in the middle of a bunch of Rainlords.

She felt like she understood. It was true that the media's interest in King William was significantly less than that of the Queen. It wasn't nonexistent, of course, but comparatively speaking, he definitely had more flexibility. With only a little bit of cloak and dagger, they'd managed to make it all the way here to Warrenhold without alerting any reporters.

But Lynnette had to wonder if Hector didn't have something to do with that, too. His relationship with the media was probably just as volatile as the Queen's, if not even more so--especially with that new bank of his attracting so much attention.

Unlike the Queen, however, the Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold never gave interviews.

And Lynnette could practically taste the saltiness of the media over that fact.

As much as they loved him, they also seemed to resent him. Lynnette remembered a few months ago--before she and Hector had gone off to Sair with Prince Meriwether--the reporters had been crawling all over this place. But now, they were all gone. They'd all given up by now."

"2121

Of course, that had also made things easier for the King. It would've been quite obnoxious if they'd had to go through an army of cameras and microphones at Warrenhold's front gate.

"So the King is hoping to build a strong relationship with the Rainlords for the Queen's sake," said Lynnette.

"...Probably," said Hector. "But... I think he also just really likes spending time with them."

"Yeah, that's pretty clear. They're a wealth of historical knowledge, which is obviously relevant to his interests."

Hector just nodded and said nothing more.

Lynnette was not surprised by this.

By the look of it, however, the King was still quite deep into a conversation with the giant Rainlord. They didn't seem like they would be wrapping up anytime soon.

Which left her and Hector just standing there together. Observing. In silence.

Should she try to come up with another topic of conversation? It certainly didn't seem like Hector was going to.

Agh, and why the hell was that, anyway? From what she'd seen in the past few days, he didn't seem to be having much trouble starting conversations with other people, anymore. She'd watched him get along perfectly well with loads of different Rainlords by now.

And okay, sure, maybe they were a special case for him since they'd all apparently been through so much together. Fine.

But he was also getting along super well with the King, and those two definitely hadn't been through that much together--certainly not more than Hector had been through with her, at least.

Why was it only with her that he was still going all quiet?

What sense did that make, huh?

What possible... reason... could there be...?

Hmm?

No.

No, that was ridiculous. There was no way.

What kind of arrogant thinking was that, anyway? The idea that Hector might be...?

No.

Impossible.

Right?"

"2122

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

But what other reason could there be? If Hector was acting normally with everyone except her, then...?

These questions were not helping the atmosphere at all.

Lynnette was suddenly feeling so intensely uncomfortable that she was beginning to wonder how Hector could stand there looking so calm and collected.

Wasn't he supposed to be the awkward one here? What, was he just accustomed to it now or something?

No, she must've just been overthinking it. Hector was a lord now. If anything, he was probably looking down on her.

No, wait, he wasn't like that. She knew that much about him, didn't she? What the hell was going through her head, right now?

Her brain was just trying to come up with excuses for why Hector... for why Hector...

Agh, she could hardly even articulate it to herself.

This was absurd. She was a member of the Queen's Guard. She was the White Sword of Atreya. How could she allow herself to be getting flustered over such a trifling thing? Was she a child?

She recalled the Queen teasing her about this very subject. And she recalled Hector running away from a conversation soon thereafter. And she also recalled Hector telling her later that it had been because of an upset stomach...

And now...

Wow.

She felt really stupid all of a sudden--and for contradictory reasons, somehow. It seemed obvious that Hector felt some sort of way about her, and yet, it also didn't. Like she was just being full of herself, expecting something when she shouldn't.

Well...

It might've been true that, for all the composure that Lynnette tried to exhibit outwardly, she didn't really have much experience with... this sort of thing.

She'd experienced a couple brief crushes in middle and high school, perhaps, but she'd never pursued them or even given them much real thought. She hadn't had the time. She'd known since she was ten years old that she wanted to join the Queen's Guard. Well, okay, back then it had technically been the King's Guard, but still. She had devoted herself utterly to that end."

"2123

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

While her time in high school certainly hadn't been as irregular as Hector's, it would be inaccurate to say that it had been normal. Unlike many other countries, Atreya didn't have any military academies that Lynnette could have enrolled in, so instead, she had often missed school in order to attend various ""training regiments.""

That was the only term that really suited them, because they were all so different--both in subject matter and in general quality of instruction. Karate, jujitsu, wrestling, swimming, endurance training, cross-country running; and then, of course, there were all the different types of weapons training--swords, firearms, pole arms, knives--even bow hunting and nunchakus, briefly.

She had dipped her toe into just about everything she laid her eyes on in the last ten years. That was not to say that she was truly proficient in all of those things, however. A single weapon could be studied for decades without ever achieving mastery over it or its kind. She had primarily just wanted to expand her martial knowledge base while searching for a discipline that she felt suited her best.

Firearm training was a no-brainer. Lynnette was of the opinion that every woman should know how to handle a basic pistol, at the very least. There was no greater equalizer between the genders than that, she felt. So, of course, she had ended up devoting considerable time to learning the in-and-out of many different types of guns.

However, nothing else had ever resonated with her quite as well as swords did. There was just something about them that she loved. Perhaps it was the myriad of ways that they could be used. Some were small; some were huge. Some were for slicing; some were for poking. Some were elegant; some were beastly. And there was an artistry to them, both in their use and in their craftsmanship. Not to mention their history."

"2124

Were she to look back on that first encounter with Abolish at Belgrant Castle, when she had fought Desmond Grantier and met Hector for the first time, Lynnette might have liked a gun on her waist instead of her sword--or preferably, in addition to her sword--but back then, the regulations of the Queen's Guard did not allow for the carrying of firearms. Such weapons were only to be distributed by the Master of the Royal Armory after receiving permission from either the Steward of Belgrant Castle or the Queen herself.

Lynnette had always thought that to be a rather insane policy, but rules were rules. She'd heard that the intent behind it was to make the Queen's Guard appear friendlier to the general public and not like some sort of hit squad, but even so, Lynnette was only too glad when the Queen had finally changed that rule. Now everyone in the Guard had to carry their assigned service rifle with them whenever they were on duty.

Not that it mattered terribly for Lynnette, now. This aberration gauntlet of hers was far deadlier than just about any gun she had ever seen.

Regardless, all of this was to say that Lynnette Edith had experienced a rather abnormal school life, even when compared to the other members of the Queen's Guard. Most of them were sons or daughters of lesser nobles, and they had received their training from more formal sources.

Assuming they actually had received training, that was. For a few of them, that had been quite questionable.

Thankfully, however, ever since she'd been promoted to the Queen's personal bodyguard and become the White Sword of Atreya, Lynnette had gained enough clout to actually go around and ensure that all Guardsmen truly were qualified for the positions they occupied. That certainly hadn't earned her any new friends, but she didn't much care. She'd already been on fairly bad terms with most of them, anyway.

Which was, perhaps, another reason why she didn't have much romantic experience."

"2125

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

And so, with her mind currently swirling with uncertainty, Lynnette felt simultaneously as if she should say something to Hector and also as if she was incapable of doing so.

Was this really happening, right now? Well, no, it actually wasn't, judging from the way Hector wasn't even paying attention to her at the moment. He was still just observing the King, calm as could be. He probably wasn't giving her presence a second thought.

In fact, now that she was thinking about it, he'd been that way during most of this visit--focusing on the King so much, never really talking to her.

If she were an insecure person, she might've suspected that he was purposely avoiding her.

Yeah. If she were insecure.

Very much if.

...He was definitely avoiding her, wasn't he?

That jerk.

Ugh, what was wrong with her? Her head was all over the place. She needed to organize her thoughts. And her feelings, apparently.

Was she really flustered? Why? For what purpose? Because of Hector? He was three years younger than her. And he was a lord now. Oh, and he lived way out here in Gray Rock. How would they even be able to...? Long distances were... She didn't know if...

Wow, she was getting ahead of herself.

Did she even like Hector in that way?

Honestly, did she?

She just kind of stared at the ground as she thought about that. All the excuses in her mind, while still present, took a back to seat to that one, singular question.

And she didn't have an answer.

She liked him as a friend, certainly. She liked him as a friend a lot. He might've been one of her favorite people, truthfully.

But...

Beyond that?

It was just... hard to picture. This whole time, it had been, she realized.

She couldn't really imagine herself and Hector being together romantically.

Was that... bad?

Because it didn't seem good."

"2126

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Lynnette was only growing more uncomfortable by the minute. If Hector really did harbor such feelings for her, then she had no idea what she should do. What if he actually asked her out on a date? Should she turn him down? But he was so nice... and... the last thing she wanted to do was hurt her friend's feelings.

But maybe that would be even worse? Pitying him like that? Wouldn't she be the one looking down on him, in that case? The very opposite of what she'd been worrying about a minute ago?

Agh! Why was this shit so stressful?!

""Everything alright?"" came a familiar voice, making Lynnette snap to attention and see the King standing there in front of the two of them.

When the hell had he walked over here? Dear goddess, had she been that lost in thought just now? Even Hector was looking at her with apparent concern on his face.

""Yeah, everything's fine,"" said Lynnette. She was a bit surprised at how calm she was able to make herself sound.

The King gave her a lingering look but said nothing more of the matter. After another moment, he smiled and placed his lone hand on Hector's shoulder. ""Well, in any case, I had an idea. You are still concerned about House Gaolanet, no?""

Hector gave a hesitant nod.

""Then, I say the three of us pay their estate a visit,"" said the King.

Hector's eyes widened a little. ""Uh. Didn't you tell me that was a bad idea?""

""Ah, yes, well, perhaps you misheard me,"" said the King.

Hector's brow depressed a little. ""I'm pretty sure I didn't, Your Highness. You said that dropping in on them unannounced would be really impolite and upset them.""

The King's smile broadened. ""I am not proposing that we go there unannounced. I will give them ample warning... of an hour or two.""
"2127

Lynnette felt compelled to interject. ""Your Highness, I'm not sure that would be wise.""

""Oh, don't be a stick-in-the-mud, Ms. Edith.""

Lynnette just kind of blinked as she tried to comprehend the fact that the King, of all people, had said that to her.

Hector spoke up again. ""So if we called the Queen and told her of your intentions here, then--""

""You would be needlessly bothering her,"" the King said. ""She is incredibly busy with matters in Sescoria.""

""...And you don't think she'd be worried about the danger that you'd be putting yourself in?"" said Hector.

""Danger?"" said King William. ""What danger would that be?""

""Well, there's the whole thing about how I suspect House Gaolanet might be murdering people..."

""And I am being accompanied by two of the nation's most powerful warriors,"" said the King. ""Besides, do you honestly believe that the Gaolanets would harm their rightful king? How would that make any sense at all?""

""...I don't know,"" Hector admitted, ""but that's also kinda the problem. We don't know that much about them.""

""I have to agree, Your Highness,"" Lynnette added.

The King took a deep breath. ""Listen, you two. There are times when bold action is necessary. We have here one such occasion. If we allow this opportunity to slip by, if we play it safe and take our time, then we will be giving the Gaolanets the chance to prepare. And they have a long history of skillful concealment. If we do not catch them unawares, then I fear the truth of things will remain forever in the dark.""

Lynnette exchanged flat looks with Hector.

""Call the Queen,"" he said.

""On it."" And Lynnette whipped out her special-issue cellphone.

The King just groaned.

It took a bit of time for the end-to-end encrypted signal to go through, but soon enough, Lynnette had the Queen on the line and was explaining the situation to her."

"2128 -- CCXII.

<""I see,""> came the Queen's voice after having been put on speaker.
<""Hmm."">

The three of them just waited for her to think it over. The King looked like he wanted to say something, but if he did, he kept it to himself.

<""William...">

""Yes, darling?""

<""Why do you wish to go personally?"">

The King held his hand to his chin for a moment, apparently considering his next words carefully. ""I have three reasons,"" he said. ""The first is that, if the request for a meeting comes from me, the Gaolanets will not be able to refuse or delay. If it comes from Hector, they might turn him down, reschedule, or otherwise give him the runaround.

""Secondly, it would be disrespectful to House Gaolanet if I sent someone in my stead. We do not have proof of their wrongdoing, and they may in fact be perfectly innocent. For the moment, I believe they are still deserving of honor and courtesy as a noble House of Atreya.

""And my final reason, is that I genuinely do wish to meet with Hanton Gaolanet. Knowing all that I do now, of servants and reapers and the wider world they inhabit, there are many questions I would like to ask that man, because I suspect he may have answers--or at least, an interesting perspective.""

For a time, the Queen was silent, until at length, she said, <""Very well. You have convinced me. Lynnette, Hector. Please take good care of my husband."">

Chapter Two Hundred Twelve: 'A nest of Elders...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Gaolanet's estate struck quite an imposing figure in the twilight of the evening. According to the research Hector had done, this place was called the Sparrow's Roost, and seeing it now, Hector could understand why. It sat atop a tall hill overlooking much of Gray Rock.

And the birds.

They were all over the place--perched atop the front gate, in the trees, in the bushes, and on the various surrounding buildings."

"2128 -- CCXII.

<""I see,""> came the Queen's voice after having been put on speaker.
<""Hmm."">

The three of them just waited for her to think it over. The King looked like he wanted to say something, but if he did, he kept it to himself.

<""William..."">

""Yes, darling?""

<""Why do you wish to go personally?"">

The King held his hand to his chin for a moment, apparently considering his next words carefully. ""I have three reasons,"" he said. ""The first is that, if the request for a meeting comes from me, the Gaolanets will not be able to refuse or delay. If it comes from Hector, they might turn him down, reschedule, or otherwise give him the runaround.

""Secondly, it would be disrespectful to House Gaolanet if I sent someone in my stead. We do not have proof of their wrongdoing, and they may in fact be perfectly innocent. For the moment, I believe they are still deserving of honor and courtesy as a noble House of Atreya.

""And my final reason, is that I genuinely do wish to meet with Hanton Gaolanet. Knowing all that I do now, of servants and reapers and the wider world they inhabit, there are many questions I would like to ask that man, because I suspect he may have answers--or at least, an interesting perspective.""

For a time, the Queen was silent, until at length, she said, <""Very well. You have convinced me. Lynnette, Hector. Please take good care of my husband."">

Chapter Two Hundred Twelve: 'A nest of Elders...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Gaolanet's estate struck quite an imposing figure in the twilight of the evening. According to the research Hector had done, this place was called the Sparrow's Roost, and seeing it now, Hector could understand why. It sat atop a tall hill overlooking much of Gray Rock.

And the birds.

They were all over the place--perched atop the front gate, in the trees, in the bushes, and on the various surrounding buildings."

"2129

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

They had decided not to bring any of the King's attendants with them, so Lynnette was the one driving. The central courtyard was so large that the car was necessary to traverse it, and as they passed giant bird statue after giant bird statue on their way toward the main house, Hector was beginning to see a pattern. Even the large water fountain at the end of the road was of a flock of birds mid-flight.

The five of them exited the vehicle, along with the four reapers who accompanied them.

Apart from Hector, King William, and Lynnette, the final two members of their party were Matteo Delaguna, who accompanied Hector whenever he left Warrenhold, and Diego Redwater.

Hector still wasn't quite sure why Diego had decided to tag along, and he suspected that Diego didn't know, either.

They'd been somewhat concerned about bringing someone with such a famous last name, but Diego promised to be discreet. Apparently, that meant wearing sunglasses and a fedora.

Matteo, whom Hector still didn't really know all that much about, was wearing a butler's uniform for some reason.

The Gaolanets' own butlers were waiting for them on the steps of the main entrance, and one of them took their car for them as they proceeded into the enormous mansion.

Beyond the most minimal pleasantries, no words were exchanged.

Hector had to admire the building's architecture a bit as they walked. He didn't recognize the style at all. There were so many hard angles in the woodwork. The front hall's ceiling rose to a very high apex, and metal bars hung halfway out from the walls near the top. Some of the ceiling's windows were open as well, and after a moment, Hector noticed more birds hanging out up there.

Geez.

It was a wonder there weren't white poop stains all over the floor's jet black limestone, Hector thought."

"2130

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

As they proceeded on, it soon became clear that this place was even bigger than Hector expected. It couldn't rival Warrenhold or Bosliat Palace, certainly, but there could easily be hundreds of people living here comfortably. Maybe not in just this one building, but across the entire estate? Definitely.

Hector decided to consult Garovel. 'How many souls can you sense around here?'

'Quite a lot,' the reaper said privately.

Another question occurred to Hector, and he realized that it was something he'd been wondering about for a while. 'Can you pick out reapers in a crowd? Like, do their souls have a different aura to them or whatever?'

'Not exactly,' said Garovel. 'As far as my senses go, reaper souls and normal are identical. However, it is sometimes possible to tell when one is nearby based on context clues. Usually regarding movement. If the soul is flying, for instance. That's usually a good indicator--though not always, of course.'

'Hmm.'

'Another indicator is when I sense a soul that's very ""floaty."" That one's less conclusive and requires me to really concentrate, but it can work. When normal humans walk, they bob up and down a little--or side to side, sometimes. But reapers just float.'

Hector found that odd. 'You can't sense a person's legs moving? I remember you saying before the body is like a vessel that the soul conforms to the shape of. Or something like that.'

'Yes, but movement is a bit... blurrier, I guess. And my ability to sense souls is not exactly like sight. It's not a perfect analogy.'

The party arrived in a spacious chamber with a gigantic rug that filled it almost entirely. There were several sofas and chairs along the walls, though the largest grouping of them sat in front of an enormous fireplace at the far end of the room.

""Please, sit and make yourselves comfortable,"" said the head butler. ""My lord shall be with you shortly.""

They congregated near the fireplace, which was only meagerly alight at the moment. No doubt, it could've held a roaring bonfire, if necessary."

As they waited, the King and Diego struck up a conversation, but they spoke softly enough that Hector couldn't really make out what they were saying.

While the relative silence drew out, Hector's mind returned to Garovel. 'So, uh... you really can't tell if the Goalanets have any of their own reapers around?'

'That, I cannot,' said Garovel, again with the echo of privacy. 'The souls all seem pretty normal to me.'

'And no aberrations, right?'

'Not that I can tell,' said Garovel, 'but those are difficult to sense at all until they're right in front of me. Then they're obvious as shit.'

'Oh yeah. Hmm.' Then a thought struck him, and he knew at once that he had to ask one more question. 'Hey, what do reapers look like to you?'

Garovel regarded him for a moment with that hollow gaze of his. 'Care to guess?'

Hector's mouth flattened. 'Not really.'

'You sure? Honestly, I've been wondering when you would ask me that for the longest time. Seems a shame to just come right out and tell you.'

'Garovel...'

'C'mon, just take one guess. It'll be fun.'

Hector mulled it over for a second. '...Giant pandas,' he said for no particular reason.

'What? No. Why would you guess pandas, of all things?'

'I dunno. It was just the first thing that popped into my head.'

And somehow, the reaper looked positively disgusted with him. 'What about my personality or my history made you think that I would see my fellow reapers as giant pandas?'

'Garovel, I really didn't think about it that much.'

'I can tell.'

'Hey, you never said my guess had to make sense.'

'Doesn't matter. Your guess sucked so hard that I want a do over. Take another crack at it.'

Hector had to hold back a sigh. 'This is getting annoying...'

'Guess one more time. And think about it a little harder.'

'I don't want to know that badly, Garovel.'

'Guess. Again. As my servant, I order you.'

'Wow.'"

"2132

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Think about it carefully,' said Garovel. 'I bet you can get it right.'

Hector's eyes drifted over the room another time, looking for an excuse to leave this conversation, but everyone was still just waiting for Hanton to arrive. 'I really don't know, Garovel. Could you give me a clue or something?'

'Hmm, alright. What do I like to do best?'

'Uh...' As Hector thought about that, only one answer came to mind.

'Fuck with me?'

'Yes, exactly!'

He was still confused, though. 'How is that a clue?'

'If I told you that, I'd be giving it away.'

Hector shook his head. 'I don't understand. Do you see reapers as, like, visible manifestations of sarcasm or something?'

'That's an interesting thought. What would sarcasm look like, exactly?'

'Hell if I know. I give up. Just tell me already, please.'

'Okay. Well. Don't be mad.'

'When you say that, it makes me want to get mad.'

'The truth is, it was a trick question.'

'Are you fucking kidding me?'

'Nope. Heh heh.'

Hector didn't even know what to say and stared blankly at the crackling fireplace.

'Reapers all see each other the same way. We don't see a bunch of weird personalized shit like you dirty corporeals do. We just see normal human beings, albeit with a slightly ethereal tinge to them.'

'...That's it?'

'Mmhmm.'

'...You're an ass.'

'I know. But I had to spice it up, right? It's kind of a boring reveal, y'know?'

'Whatever.'

'Though, I suppose there IS one aspect to it that's slightly less boring, if you're interested.'

'I'm not.'

The reaper laughed. 'C'mon, don't be like that. It's kinda neat. I promise.'

'Right, because you're so trustworthy.'

'No need to be hurtful. Here, I'll just tell you. No games, this time.'

'Oh, boy, lucky me.'"

"2133

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'Our appearance is based on what we looked like when we were alive,' said Garovel.

And Hector waited, but when Garovel said nothing more, he had to say, 'Um... so what? That's exactly as boring as I imagined.'

'No, but if you think about it, isn't it curious how reapers are able to perceive a physical likeness that we have no personal frame of reference from?'

'...I guess so.'

'Your lack of enthusiasm for this ancient mystery is very disappointing, Hector.'

'I mean, what's so mysterious about it? You can apparently see light even though you don't have eyeballs, so... this shit seems pretty easy to believe compared to that. Maybe your physical likeness, as you imagine it, is just preserved in your soul or whatever. And then that gets projected onto what other reapers see.'

'Alright, Mr. Fun-Killer. Geez. Just rip my heart out and stomp on it. That's fine.'

Hector exhaled a laugh under his breath. Then he heard the door behind him open, and everyone in the room turned to look.

""Good evening, all. I am Hanton Gaolanet."" The man's voice was a wondrous thing, deep and smooth as butter. There were a few silver streaks in his otherwise brown and feathery hair, and his white suit with dark red stripes was certainly eye-catching. ""Welcome to my home. You, especially, Your Highness.""

The King was already standing to greet him. ""Thank you for having me, Hanton. And I do apologize for the short notice.""

""Not at all. It is a pleasure to host royalty."" The man glanced in Hector's direction before returning to the King. ""But you have made me curious? Is this purely a social visit? Or is there some matter in particular that you wish to discuss?""

""Purely social,"" said the King with a smile. ""I know how irregular this is, but I have come to think that, now more than ever, it is important for the nobility of this country to spend time together. Strengthen our bonds, if you will.""

""I see."" Hanton returned a smile of his own as his pitch black eyes lingered on the King for a long moment."

"2134

While the two men were exchanging pleasantries, Hector had to consult Garovel again. 'What do you think? Sense anything weird about him?'

'Not in the slightest,' the reaper said privately. 'But I didn't sense anything strange about Malast, either, and we both know how that turned out.'

'You're not seriously suggesting that this guy is another fucking god, are you?'

'Of course not. I'm just telling you to stay on your toes.'

Hector appreciated that reassurance, but he also couldn't completely put that concern out of his mind, either. There was just something about Hanton. As he observed the man, Hector kept trying to figure out what this strange feeling was in the back of his mind. It wasn't soul pressure. It was just... unease. A feeling like something obvious was being missed.

He hated it.

The King began making introductions. ""This is my bodyguard for the evening,"" he said, motioning to Lynn, who was standing by his side now. ""The White Sword of Atreya, Lynnette Edith.""

""I have heard of you, of course,"" said the Lord Gaoalanet, shaking her hand. ""It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance, young lady.""

""Thank you, sir. It is good to meet you as well.""

""And over here,"" said the King, motioning to Diego, ""this is my new manservant, Dietro.""

Diego stepped forward without missing a beat and shook Hanton's hand. ""It is an honor, sir.""

Hanton's gaze lingered on him. ""Quite.""

Hector was a bit surprised by how easily the King and Diego had pulled off that lie. Had they discussed it beforehand?

""And finally,"" said the King, ""we have the young Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold, Hector Goffe, and his man, Matteo.""

Hector stepped up for his turn to shake Hanton's hand, as did Matteo immediately thereafter. He returned his gaze to Hector with another smile. ""What good fortune. When the King sent word of his arrival, I had no idea that you would be accompanying him, Lord Goffe.""

"2135

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""It was a bit of a surprise on my end, as well,"" said Hector. ""But I hope it's not too much of an inconvenience. There are a few things that I'd like to talk to you about.""

""Ah."" Hanton's smile diminished somewhat. ""Looking for more investors for that bank of yours, perhaps?""

Hector wasn't surprised that this man knew about all the visits he'd been paying to the other Atreyan nobles. ""No,"" he said plainly.

""Oh?"" said Hanton, looking around at the others before settling back on Hector again. ""Then perhaps you could enlighten me as to the motive behind your visit.""

Hector glanced toward the King, who was just observing with a raised brow. Perhaps it was a bit soon to just launch right into the heart of the conversation, but Hector didn't want to waste the opportunity, either. ""I was wondering... if House Gaolanet has ever had any relationship with an organization called the Vanguard.""

For a time, it was quiet enough to hear a pin drop. It seemed as if even the flames in the fireplace stopped crackling.

Hector observed the man closely, and still, he was feeling uncomfortable for some reason.

Hanton's expression remained exactly the same. ""Why do you ask?""

Hector tilted his head. ""Why don't you answer?""

""Several reasons,"" said the Lord Gaolanet. ""I am not in the habit of simply giving out information about my family. Confirming or denying anything, without reason, is typically unwise, I feel. I hope you will not think my caution suspicious.""

""I am certain Lord Goffe did not mean to offend,"" said the King.

""Offense was not taken, Your Highness,"" said Hanton, eyes still on Hector. ""I only wished to clarify my position.""

Hector thought carefully. On the one hand, he didn't want to just come right out and start talking about reapers and servants. If this guy genuinely didn't have prior knowledge of them, then Hector would just be carelessly spreading some rather sensitive information.

But on the other hand... this guy had to know about them already, didn't he?

Agh, what was this weird feeling about? Why wasn't it going away?"
"2136

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""The reason I'm asking,"" said Hector, ""is because it is relevant to the security of the nation.""

""I see,"" said Hanton. He turned to William. ""This hardly seems like the subject matter that one would encounter during a 'purely social' visit as you claimed earlier, Your Highness.""

""I said I was here for purely social reasons,"" said the King. ""I said nothing about the young Lord Goffe's reasons.""

Hanton did not look pleased. ""A distinction without a difference. This hardly seems appropriate, given the hospitality that I have--""

The man kept talking, and the King kept responding, but Hector was only partially listening.

In a background thought process, he was still trying to pinpoint the source of this persistent unease that he was feeling. There was something about Hanton's presence...

There was some kind of... emptiness to it.

And then, thanks to the Scarf of Amordiin, Hector realized what the problem was.

He'd been thinking metaphorically about the feeling of emptiness. It was actually literal.

While Hanton was still talking to the King, Hector stepped forward and placed his hand on the man's chest. And he felt it there, too. The texture of his suit's cloth was as clear as day.

But Hector pushed forward anyway, and his hand went through Hanton's body.

Everyone stopped.

Hector swished his hand back and forth like there was no resistance. Like it was just thin air.

Because it was.

That was what had been bothering him. Even though he could see Hanton with his eyes, even though he could feel the man's hand when he shook it, Hector hadn't been able to sense the shape of Hanton's body with the Scarf of Amordiin. The air in the room flowed right through Hanton like he wasn't even there.

With half of Hector's arm stuck through his chest, Hanton looked around at his speechless audience before settling on the Lord Darksteel again. ""My, my... this is rather awkward, now isn't it?""
"2137

Hector wanted to say something, but each question that popped into his head felt like it might betray something about himself--some critical lack of information or understanding. And with whatever was happening right now, Hector thought he should keep his cards close to his chest for the moment.

The King was apparently less reserved, however. ""What is happening here? Hanton?""

""My apologies, Your Highness,"" said the Lord Gaolanet, still not bothering to move away from Hector. ""This is not how I envisioned this conversation going.""

""Hanton, please explain this situation,"" said the King.

""I am afraid I must refuse,"" said Hanton. ""In fact, I believe it would be for the best if everyone here simply forgot that this ever happened.""

""What do you--?"" The King did not finish.

An overwhelming sensation washed over Hector, heavy and unlike anything he had ever felt. An invisible blanket, perhaps. Smothering him. Weighing him down. Slowing him down. His thought processes. Suffocating him. Shutting down his mind.

Or at least, that was what it felt like for his frontmost thought process.

Because of the others, in the back of his mind, Hector was still perfectly aware that nothing was happening to him. His body was fine. The room was unchanged. Nothing was truly altered, except perhaps for the way that Hanton was staring at him.

Hector looked around at the others in the room, suddenly worrying for them. They were all still there, seemingly unharmed, but none of them were moving even the slightest bit. The King's mouth was still half-open, stopped in the middle of a word.

Lynnette, Diego, Matteo--even the four reapers were frozen in midair. Garovel, Melhsanz, Yangéra, and Ernivoc. All stuck there. Silent. Unmoving.

Hector tried to stay calm, but it was difficult. If anything happened to them--

""Do not be alarmed,"" came Hanton's voice again. He had finally moved away from Hector's immediate grasp and was walking toward the same door through which he'd entered earlier. He stopped and turned to face Hector again. ""I have no intention of hurting them. It would be no end of trouble if such famous individuals were to disappear.""

"2138

This was a lot to take in. Hector knew he had to remain calm and think carefully. He had no idea what this man was capable of. Attacking him seemed unwise, especially since the guy's ""body"" wasn't even real.

This didn't seem like the power of a servant, but he didn't want to just assume that Hanton Gaolanet was another god, either. He needed information.

Hector recalled what Hanton had said just before everyone else had stopped moving. ""Are you trying to erase our memories?""

""That was the plan, yes,"" said Hanton. ""I chose to spare you, however, because I wanted to talk first.""

Hector squinted at him, anger rising. He could still feel the oppression of his frontmost thought process. ""Don't lie to me, Hanton. You're already on thin ice, and I'm not in a very forgiving mood, right now.""

Immediately, Hector felt the oppression in his mind vanish, and he watched Hanton take a single step backward, though the expression on the man's face was unchanged.

The others all remained frozen where they were, however.

""So you really are that dangerous,"" said the Lord Gaolanet. ""I thought it was perhaps some fluke that you were able to resist me--that you might not be aware of my attempt to penetrate your mind. But I see now that I was wrong. I apologize for underestimating you, Lord Goffe.""

Hector made no response. He merely kept staring at him.

""Tell me,"" said Hanton. ""How were you able to see through this illusion? I am certain that I covered all of your senses completely. Even your reaper should not have been able to tell the difference.""

""...If you're still hoping to talk this out,"" said Hector, ""then I suggest you release my companions. Now.""

""Ah..." Hanton deliberated silently for a moment. ""You are quite intimidating. I will grant you that. But I am not convinced that you can truly harm me. You do not even know where my real body is.""

""...Do you want me to come looking for it?"" said Hector."
"2139

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 1 of 14))~~
Again, Hanton fell briefly quiet. ""I am not seeking a fight here, Lord Goffe.""

""Neither am I. You're the one taking hostages.""

""I told you that I do not intend to harm them.""

""And you've already lied to me once.""

""You misunderstand. I am only concerned with keeping the presence of my family a secret. We have no quarrel with you. We are a peaceful flock. We merely wish to be left alone.""

Hector took his time considering his next words. If that was really true, then what about the trail of poisonings that had led him here? Should he bring that up now?

He felt like he'd gained ground in the conversation, but he also didn't want to push his luck while everyone was still locked in some sort of... mind prison or whatever the hell it was.

""Okay,"" Hector said slowly, ""but if secrecy is so important to you... then why are you one of the most famous families in the country?""

""The degree of privacy we require is not something that can be obtained without considerable wealth. And wealth, unfortunately, is accompanied by                      notoriety--and in the case of my ancestors, noble lineage as well.""

Ancestors, huh? Hector didn't know if he could trust that new sliver of information, but he took note of it nonetheless. ""...And what is the reason you require that much privacy?""

Hanton deliberated for another moment. Then he exhaled a long breath. ""It seems that if we are to resolve this situation without violence, then I must show you the truth."" His expression darkened. ""But I warn you, Hector Goffe: if word of what you are about to see ever reaches the outside world, then I will hunt you down and extract my toll--if not from you, then from those you care about. There will be no place in this world that is safe from me. Any pain that I suffer as a result of your indiscretion in this matter, I will visit upon you tenfold. This, I vow.""

Well, goddamn. Hector wasn't sure what to say to that."
"2140

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 2 of 14))~~

""Do you understand me?"" said Hanton.

""...Yeah, I understand you,"" said Hector.

""Good."" Hanton turned, and the doors behind him flung open on their own. ""Then follow me.""

""And my companions?""

""I say again: no harm will come to them. But if you are still so concerned, then bring them with you. I am sure you are capable of that without my help, no?"

He certainly was.

In an instant, Hector clapped full suits of iron armor around everyone and added his soul to them. He didn't know if his soul would help protect them from whatever telepathic horseshit Hanton was capable of, but he figured it wouldn't hurt.

Hector pulled them all closer on mobile platforms beneath their feet, and for the four reapers, he made soul-empowered iron orbs to capture them and put them in orbit around himself. The orbiting was probably unnecessary, but at this point, it was a force of habit.

Hanton was waiting for him in the hall--and staring with wide eyes.

For good measure, Hector decided to add a few decorative flourishes to everyone's armor, helping to distinguish them at a glance. Diego's helmet got stubby horns; the King's helmet got a crown; Matteo's pauldrons got spikes; and Lynn's faceguard was given a T-shaped eye slit. And he may've added a few embossed swirls for everyone's breastplate, gauntlets, cuisses, and greaves.

Yeah, that looked a little better.

As he moved to catch up with Hanton, Hector decided to armor himself up as well, making sure to let the Scarf flow freely as always.

"There is no need for this intimidation," said Hanton. "We will not attack you."

"I wasn't trying to intimidate you," said Hector, the metal of his helmet accenting his voice. "But it never hurts to be prepared."

"Indeed..." Hanton frowned and started walking again.

Hector and his armored entourage followed. He concentrated as much as he could on what the Scarf could tell him. He pushed for its limit, trying to sense as far away as he possibly could--around corners in the intersection ahead and even through the cracks beneath the doors in the hallway.

Some of those doors weren't even real, he realized. And that intersection ahead? There were only two other paths, not three.

More illusions."

"2141

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 3 of 14))~~

Hector wondered briefly what the point of such subtle deception was, but it wasn't hard to think of a reason. This place would be a hellish maze for any normal person to navigate. For any invaders, in other words.

They walked for a long while, and Hector wanted to ask Hanton where they were going. Where were all the people that Garovel had sensed earlier? Had they been illusions, too? He supposed that wouldn't be surprising.

At length, he finally sensed something that wasn't just another empty room or corridor.

In a distant chamber at the limit of the Scarf's range, Hector sensed a hulking shape, something not immediately recognizable to his imagination. It was the size of a truck. And it was breathing. He could sense the flow of air in and out of its mouth.

No.

Its beak. Yeah. And the way the air moved around its body--those were feathers, weren't they?

A giant bird.

Hector didn't know what to think.

Hanton led him to the room that the bird was waiting in, and sure enough, the man showed him inside.

To his eyes, the enormous bird was invisible, but Hector knew exactly where it was. And this room. It looked like any other, but he could sense that the ceiling was fake. It was actually one big window, currently sitting half-open--perhaps in case the bird wanted to fly away.

""As a show of good faith,"" said Hanton, ""I will now show you my true form.""

Hector held his tongue.

The way in which the bird became suddenly visible to his eyes was as if a paper veil were being quickly burned away.

There arrived a briefly silent intermission.

""...You are not surprised?"" said Hanton--or the human projection of him, rather.

""No, I am,"" said Hector. Sure, he'd sensed it coming at the last minute, but that didn't change the fact that he still had about a billion questions. ""What are you, exactly?""

"2142

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 4 of 14))~~

""I am a Wrobel,"" said Hanton, still speaking from the illusion's mouth while the bird merely observed him. ""The few of you who already know of my kind also call us Sparrows. I find that term acceptable, if you prefer it.""

""...You're not a servant,"" Hector surmised.

""No. I am not.""

""Are you a descendant of one, though? An ancient mutation user, maybe?""

The bird's giant head twitched at that question. Its darkly red-and-brown plumage bristled slightly, and it stood up fully, briefly revealing talons the size of Hector's entire body.

'A common and very crude question,' came another voice.

And Hector was bewildered, because that had definitely been in his mind, and Hanton's mouth hadn't moved at all.

But then, Hanton's human body wasn't actually real, was it? Therefore, the ""voice"" that Hector thought he had been hearing with his ears--that hadn't been real, either.

That huge Sparrow there was the real Hanton Gaolanet. Hector understood that, and yet it was still somehow difficult to come to terms with.

Perhaps Hanton could tell that Hector was confused even through his armor, because the human illusion vanished into thin air, and only the Sparrow remained.

'Why is it that servants always wish to trace the origins of our noble race back to themselves?' said Hanton.

Sounded like he'd touched a sore spot. ""That wasn't my intention,"" said Hector. ""I'm just trying to understand why there's a giant, talking bird in front of me.""

'Hmph.' Hanton's plumage flared up again, and he looked away from Hector.

Was he... pouting?

Maybe it was just a result of the Sparrow's head shape. A trick of the eyes, in some sense. Despite being so large and probably having a wingspan comparable to that of a commercial airplane, Hanton didn't actually look like a bird of prey.

Rather, he really did look like a plump, little sparrow that had just been scaled up to gargantuan proportions. His beady eyes, short beak, and fat head made him look... oddly cute, honestly.

Hector didn't let that distract him, however, from the fact that this guy was dangerous as shit."

"2143

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 5 of 14))~~

""...Would you care to share a bit of your origin story with me, then?"" said Hector.

'Do you know the origin story of servants?' said Hanton. His tone wasn't one of genuine curiosity, but rather one of a counter argument. 'Or how about that of the entire human race?'

""Alright, no need to get so defensive. I was just curious.""

'I was not being defensive. I was enlightening you about your own biases.'

That rubbed Hector the wrong way, and he wanted to make a retort, but he focused on maintaining his composure, instead. Allowing himself to get pissed off wasn't going to be productive.

But what was?

Now that he was standing here in front of this giant and surly bird, what was he supposed to say? For whatever reason, Hanton wasn't saying anything now, so how was this conversation supposed to progress?

From the sound of it, Hanton didn't actually know for sure that his race wasn't descended from an ancient mutation user, but bringing that up again would obviously be unwise.

He wanted some kind of context, though.

""What can you tell me about your race's history?"" he asked.

'That we are peaceful.'

""Yeah, you already said that.""

'We were once persecuted and hunted to the brink of extinction.'

Hector wasn't exactly surprised to hear that, but it did make him curious. ""With powers like yours, it seems to me that you could take over half the world, if you wanted.""

'...I suppose I should have assumed that you would know of that,' said Hanton. 'No doubt, you have long been a student of ancient history.'

Wait, what?

'I was not attempting to deceive you again,' the Sparrow said, sounding suddenly more conciliatory. 'That is a period of our history which we have grown to regret. It is a thing we would prefer not to think about.'

Huh?

Hold on just a minute here.

Hector kept his poker face, but what the fuck kind of assumptions had Hanton just made about him, exactly? How old did Hanton think he was?

And more importantly... the Sparrows really did try to take over half the world at some point? When the hell did that happen? Sure, he hadn't paid much attention during history class in school, but he was fairly certain that he would've remembered it if one of his teachers had ever told him that a race of gigantic super-birds had once attempted to conquer humanity."

"2144

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 6 of 14))~~

Hector was reluctant to say anything more now. If he picked the wrong thing or phrased it the wrong way, then Hanton might realize his mistake.

'I assure you,' said Hanton, 'the only thing we care about now is maintaining the peace of this small haven that we have created for ourselves.'

""...How many of you are here?"" Hector asked.

'Five.'

""So few?"" Hector cocked an eyebrow. ""My reaper sensed many souls earlier.""

'Ah, yes, well... we employ numerous humans here. And my children often make multiple avatars for themselves to play around with.'

Avatars, huh? So that's how they thought of their human illusions. ""Do your employees know the truth about you?""

'Some, not all. Those who have been with us the longest, who have gained our trust.'

""And I guess you just wipe their memory if they ever find out accidentally, eh?""

Hanton made no response.

Another thought occurred to Hector, and even though it didn't seem immediately relevant to the situation, he just had to bring it up. ""The King mentioned... that he once had a marriage interview with a girl named Pauline Gaolanet some years ago.""

'Ah. Yes...'

""...What was the plan there? I'm assuming she's a Sparrow, too, right? Why would you try to have her marry a normal human?""

'That was... a delicate situation.'

""How so?""

'In her youth, Pauline was quite the little troublemaker. She created an avatar identical to my own and visited Joseph Belgrant to organize a marriage interview with his son, William.'

Hector's eyes widened, and he glanced at the still-frozen King in his suit of iron armor. ""She really wanted to marry him?""

'It was a game to her. A childish one. She did not understand the full implications of her actions.'

""But she understood well enough to fool Joseph Belgrant?""

'What can I say? She has always been a bit too clever for her own good.'

Somehow, Hector couldn't help snickering a little. ""You must've been relieved when it didn't work out.""

'Oh, you have no idea.' Surprisingly enough, Hanton actually seemed to share a bit of Hector's amusement."

"2145

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 7 of 14))~~
After that, however, a lull arrived in the conversation.

Hanton thus far seemed largely agreeable, and Hector felt like they could probably come to terms here.

But the more he thought about it, the less certain he became.

No matter how well they managed to get along, the well-being of Garovel and Lynn and everyone else was paramount here. And there was still the matter of the poisonings, of course. As long as Hanton was holding hostages, it didn't seem like a good idea to broach that subject.

""...I want you to release your hold over my companions now,"" said Hector.

'And I want you to keep my family's secret,' said Hanton.

""I can agree to that,"" said Hector.

'The question is: can I trust you to keep your word?'

Hector leveled a stare right into Hanton's beady eyes. ""Yes. You can.""

'You are a national hero. I would like to believe you.'

Hector could hear a contradictory point coming.

'...But I hardly know you. I require more convincing.'

Hector sighed. ""Even if I tried to tell someone, who would believe me?""

'Hmm, I fear many people would. If you were truly of a mind to do so, with your credibility, you could convince all of Atreya of our existence.'

""What would be the point? You could just go wipe all their memories, anyway.""

Hanton was quiet again for a time. 'Perhaps I should not tell you this, but... in the interest of building trust between us, I will.'

Hector just tilted his head, waiting for elaboration.

'Given the current state of your associates, I am sure that my abilities seem rather impressive to you. And frankly, they are. You are right to fear me.'

Hector's expression flattened a little.

'However, I am not without my limits. Manipulating minds and souls, projecting illusions, concealing myself. These things all have their tolls. Wiping so many memories would be an impossible feat. News of our existence would doubtlessly spread far faster than we could ever hope to contain it.'

"2146

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 8 of 14))~~

""Well, Atreya doesn't know much about servants and reapers, either,"" said Hector.

'Yes, but if that were to change, no one would come to hunt you down,' said Hanton.

Hector wasn't quite so sure of that, but saying as much didn't seem like it would be very useful at the moment. ""Who do you think would come to hunt you down?""

'There are several groups who might appear. The Morgunovs, the Andanatt, the Bloodmen, the Potrzask, the Andalero--and certainly the Old Wardens, if they still exist. And perhaps others, as well.'

Wow, that was a lot. ""Why would they all want to hunt you?""

'Some would want to study our biology via dissection. Some would wish to sell our biology, instead. And others might simply harbor old grudges.'

Agh. Hector wanted to ask exactly how long ago these ""old grudges"" were, but that would probably give away too much information about his age, wouldn't it? But then again, maybe he already knew all he needed to about that. Hanton had called their attempt at conquest ""ancient history,"" so it was a fairly safe bet that it was at least a thousand years ago, Hector figured.

""...You really think anyone has been holding a grudge against your kind for that long?"" asked Hector.

'Hmph. Reapers have long memories.'

""That, they do. But the world moves on, and so do reapers.""

'Do they really? That is what they may claim, but I do not trust their words--nor should you, even if you are their thrall.'

""...I won't try and argue that,"" said Hector. ""They can certainly be deceptive. But these reapers with me are worthy of your trust.""

'Ah. You vouch for them, do you?'

Impulsively, Hector almost just said yes right away. But the way Hanton had said that... and the way Hanton was looking at him now...

He reconsidered his response. Vouching for Garovel was one thing. But the other three reapers? Could he honestly say that they were all so trustworthy?

Hmm."

"2147

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 9 of 14))~~

""...Actually, no,"" said Hector. He brought forth Garovel's orb and dematerialized it to reveal the reaper. ""This is the only one I can honestly vouch for. The others... while I do trust them, I still don't really know them that well yet.""

'...I see,' said Hanton. 'And what of the other humans? Would you vouch for any of them as well?'

Hector didn't take quite as long to deliberate about that. Sorry, Diego. Sorry, Matteo. ""Lynnette and King William,"" he said, bringing their suits of armor forward.

'I find that somewhat surprising,' said Hanton, ruffling his feathers for a moment. 'Do you truly believe that you can trust royalty, of all people? They can be treacherous in a manner of their own. As a fellow student of history, I am sure you are aware of that as well.'

Hector wondered how they had gotten onto this subject, but it was something he had actually thought about before. ""I understand why you would say that,"" said Hector. ""The most famous royals throughout history--or the most infamous ones, I guess--typically had a reputation for... treachery, like you said. But you're talking about outliers. Exception case.""

'Oh? Are you saying that royals are deserving of our trust by default, then?'

""...Of course not. But I don't think they're inherently untrustworthy, either. I think that... almost any ruler's success or failure can be determined by how much support they have. Not from the general public, necessarily, but from those close to them. Those who really do support them. Real cooperation beats fear every time.""

'Mm. I agree to an extent. There is some truth in what you say. Royalty will not be royalty for very long if it must constantly worry over daggers in the back.'

""...Exactly.""

'But what makes you think a Belgrant is worthy of your trust?'

The way Hanton said that caught Hector's attention. A Belgrant? Not ""the King"" or ""His Highness?"" Just a Belgrant?

Hector was suddenly reminded of the tale that King William had told him at the Gala. The tale of his ancestor, Charles Belgrant."

"2148

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 10 of 14))~~

""...It sounds like you're harboring some resentment for the Belgrants,"" said Hector.

'Resentment, no. It is more akin to a general wariness.'

""And why is that?""

'It is a rather long and old story,' said Hanton.

""...It wouldn't have anything to do with a man named Charles, would it?""

The Sparrow shifted his body a little and bristled his feathers. 'How much do you know about Charles Belgrant?'

Hector didn't feel like answering that. ""How much do you?""

'Hmph. He swindled my ancestors.'

Wait, seriously? Charles managed to trick a group of psychics? Or were they just telepaths? Or were those the same thing? Hector wasn't too sure.

""How did he pull that off?"" Hector asked.

'First, he gained our trust. He aided us during a time when we were having difficulty maintaining our concealment.'

""Hmm."" The conversation was getting off track again, but Hector also felt that if he didn't inquire further now, he might never get another chance. ""What kind of aid did he provide?""

'He was in possession of an artifact that could, supposedly, predict the future.'

Hector blinked. ""Are you serious?""

'That is how the tale goes. Do not ask me if it is true. I have no idea.'

Holy shit. Could there really be an artifact like that? Even Rasalased had only ""kind of"" been able to predict the future. But then again, perhaps that just meant that it was actually possible.

The more he learned about this Charles character, though, the more Hector felt like he shouldn't take the stories about him at face value. Charles could've had some other kind of ace up his sleeve and just been lying about the artifact to make himself seem more powerful than he really was.

Heh.

What kind of idiot would do a thing like that, though?

Oh, man...

""...If he really had something like that, then why didn't your ancestors just take it from him and wipe his memory?""

'My noble brethren would never resort to thievery,' said Hanton.

Mm, Hector wasn't so sure he believed that, especially if the Gaolanets were still bitter about it all these years later. Maybe they couldn't take it from him for some reason. Maybe Charles had been able to resist their weird mind powers, too."

"2149

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 11 of 14))~~

""Okay, so after gaining their trust, how did he 'swindle' your ancestors?"" said Hector.

'He used their abilities to help him gain political power--and even to help create this very nation. And during that time, he promised them that, once he was crowned king, he would appoint them to various influential positions, thereby ensuring the continued protection of our kind in this newly established kingdom.'

Charles had wanted to become king himself? That hadn't been part of the story. ""But the Gaolanets were already nobles back then, weren't they?""

'Yes, but the Mohssian Empire was faltering, and so too was our influence within it.'

""Hmm. You still haven't told me how he swindled you.""

'With my ancestors' support, he intended to become the very first King of Atreya. But as I am sure you know, that never came to pass, now did it? And the reason for that, if the tale is to be believed, was absolutely absurd.'

Hector just listened.

'He had a change of heart,' said Hanton. 'Charles simply stopped pursuing his ambition. After years of supporting him, he gave up halfway and helped Domitrus Lumenbel to be crowned king, instead. Complete madness.'

That didn't sound that crazy to Hector, honestly.

'Supposedly, he became convinced that Domitrus would be a better king. And all of his promises to us went unfulfilled and forgotten.'

Hector supposed he could understand why that would upset them, but at the same time, he couldn't help thinking that it was rather petty on the Gaolanets' part, especially considering that they obviously did gain political power later on. He remembered King William telling him about how the Gaolanets were a big part of the AFA.

With the way this whole conversation was going, Hector's opinion of these Sparrows wasn't improving much. Or at all, really. While he appreciated Hanton's willingness to talk, pretty much everything the guy said made Hector's doubts increase in one way or another.

At this point, Hector almost would've preferred it if Hanton attacked him. At least that would've simplified things."

"2150

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 12 of 14))~~

Well, whatever. Right now, the only thing Hector really cared about was making sure everyone made it out of this place alive. He could figure out how to deal with Hanton later.

""In any case, I'd like you to release my friends now,"" said Hector.

'Very well,' said Hanton. The giant bird disappeared again, and the human illusion reappeared and began speaking with a seemingly real voice again. ""However, I still do not wish for them to see my true form. Nor do I intend to reexplain everything that I have already told you. As far as they will remember, we all enjoyed a perfectly pleasant and uneventful meeting.""

Hector furrowed his brow. ""So I have to tell them the truth myself, is what you're saying.""

'That choice will be up to you, of course. Tell them whatever you like. I cannot stop you.'

Yeah. Nevermind how difficult it'll be to explain that they all have false memories. It seemed clear that Hanton was hoping Hector would decide to just keep this entire encounter to himself.

Hector was not pleased. ""If you're just going to replace all of their memories, then what was the point of asking me to vouch for any of them?""

""I never claimed that there was any great reason. I was merely curious as to what you truly thought of them.""

Hector had stop himself from scowling. Even if Hanton couldn't manipulate Hector's thoughts directly, the Sparrow could obviously still play mind games.

But again, Hector held his tongue. He just waited for everyone to be freed.

And kept waiting.

An awkward silence arrived before Hanton broke it.

""...If you would not mind removing their armor, then I shall release them all in unison.""

As a matter of fact, Hector did mind removing their armor. ""Why?""

""They were not wearing it when they arrived. They will notice that something is amiss if they are suddenly wearing it when they return to consciousness.""

Hector's eyes narrowed slightly. Currently, Garovel was the only one not covered in soul-empowered iron. So instead of dematerializing everyone else's protection, he remade Garovel's orb and brought the reaper back into orbit around him with the other three.

""What are you doing?"" said Hanton."

"2151

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 13 of 14))~~

""You're already replacing their memories, right?"" said Hector. ""Just include the metal in there, too.""

Hanton stared at him for a long moment. ""...And how would I justify such an inclusion?""

Hector shrugged. ""Feel free to get creative.""

Hanton's illusory face tightened. ""I told you that their new memories are supposed to be uneventful.""

""That sounds like your problem,"" said Hector. ""And one of your own making, as well.""

""You are being unreasonable.""

""I don't think I am.""

There was more silence, and the air was noticeably tenser this time.

Hector knew he was pushing it, but frankly, he didn't trust Hanton very much. And most of all, he wanted to know if Hanton could affect the others' minds even through the soul-empowered iron. Acquiring that knowledge was crucial.

The Lord Gaolanet sighed and cast his eyes down to floor. ""...I cannot release them while you are shielding them with your aura.""

Aha. And his 'aura', huh? Hmm.

""But you already knew that, didn't you?"" said Hanton, frowning at him.

Hector elected to say nothing.

""If you truly wish for me to release them, then you must allow me to,"" said Hanton.

And again, Hector found himself doubting the Sparrow's words. ""Is that so? It seems to me... that if you aren't able to access their minds anymore, then whatever you've done to them should eventually just wear off on its own.""

Hanton was quiet.

""Well?"" pushed Hector. ""Are you going to tell me I'm wrong?""

""If I did tell you that, what would you do?""

""Why do you ask?""

Hanton scowled. ""You are not wrong. The effects will wear off in about an hour. Perhaps less, considering how long we have been talking.""

""You know, if you really want me as your ally, then continually trying to deceive me is not a good strategy."" Yeah. That was pretty hypocritical of him, Hector knew. But then again, it wasn't technically wrong, either. He didn't consider his own strategy to be 'good.' Sure, it hadn't blown up in his face quite yet, but he certainly wouldn't recommend it to others."

"2152 -- CXIII.

~~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 14 of 14))~~
Chapter Two Hundred Thirteen: 'The Lords of Gray Rock...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hanton lowered his gaze. ""I apologize for the omission.""

Hector could sense the shape of the invisible bird making a similar gesture.

There was a decision to make now, Hector knew. If he didn't need Hanton to release them anymore, then the power dynamic of their conversation had suddenly shifted. No doubt, that was why Hanton had been holding back that little piece of information this whole time.

Hector didn't want to get too confident, though. Hanton could still be-- and probably was--hiding other things from him, things that could potentially shift things back in the Sparrow's favor. Hector wanted to be careful, but at the very least, he now felt that he was in a position to ask the question that he'd been wanting answered since the beginning.

""...Did you run the Vanguard out of Atreya?"" said Hector.

Hanton's human illusion looked up at Hector and then remained perfectly still. His true body, however, was shifting beneath its shroud of invisibility.

The Lord Gaolanet was taking a while to answer, but Hector just waited.

""Yes,"" Hanton finally said.

""Why?"" said Hector.

""That is a rather long story.""

Hector materialized an iron chair for himself and sat down. ""I don't mind.""

""I... do not currently have time for this, Lord Goffe. I have other matters to attend to. Perhaps you can return at a later date, and we can finish this conversation then.""

""And what if I return, only to find that you're no longer here?"" said Hector.

""I would not flee over something so trivial,"" said Hanton.

""I wonder about that.""

For the first time, anger flashed across Hanton's illusory face. ""Why are you so interested in the Vanguard, Lord Goffe? Please do not tell me that you have been taken in by their lies.""

"2152 -- CXIII.

~((The National Puppy Day Special -- page 14 of 14))~
Chapter Two Hundred Thirteen: 'The Lords of Gray Rock...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hanton lowered his gaze. ""I apologize for the omission.""

Hector could sense the shape of the invisible bird making a similar gesture.

There was a decision to make now, Hector knew. If he didn't need Hanton to release them anymore, then the power dynamic of their conversation had suddenly shifted. No doubt, that was why Hanton had been holding back that little piece of information this whole time.

Hector didn't want to get too confident, though. Hanton could still be-- and probably was--hiding other things from him, things that could potentially shift things back in the Sparrow's favor. Hector wanted to be careful, but at the very least, he now felt that he was in a position to ask the question that he'd been wanting answered since the beginning.

""...Did you run the Vanguard out of Atreya?"" said Hector.

Hanton's human illusion looked up at Hector and then remained perfectly still. His true body, however, was shifting beneath its shroud of invisibility.

The Lord Gaolanet was taking a while to answer, but Hector just waited.

""Yes,"" Hanton finally said.

""Why?"" said Hector.

""That is a rather long story.""

Hector materialized an iron chair for himself and sat down. ""I don't mind.""

""I... do not currently have time for this, Lord Goffe. I have other matters to attend to. Perhaps you can return at a later date, and we can finish this conversation then.""

""And what if I return, only to find that you're no longer here?"" said Hector.

""I would not flee over something so trivial,"" said Hanton.

""I wonder about that.""

For the first time, anger flashed across Hanton's illusory face. ""Why are you so interested in the Vanguard, Lord Goffe? Please do not tell me that you have been taken in by their lies.""

"2153

That was not the response Hector had been expecting, and he exhaled half a laugh. ""If that's what you're worried about, then don't be. I'm... fairly skeptical of the Vanguard.""

Hanton blinked a few times, and his posture shifted, as did that of the invisible bird. Then, after a moment, Hanton's human form disappeared again, the Sparrow's true body became visible once more. 'You... you are?'

""Yeah,"" said Hector.

'I must say... I am quite relieved to hear that, Lord Goffe.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow beneath his helm, not sure what to make of Hanton's sudden change in tone. ""I take it that Sparrows aren't on very good terms with the Vanguard, then.""

'Oh, on the contrary, many of my kind work with them.'

It was Hector's turn to blink. ""Really?""

'Indeed. It is quite the symbiotic relationship. We are very capable assistants in a variety of fields, especially regarding propaganda and intelligence work.'

Hector could certainly believe that. ""And what do you get out of it?""

'Ah. I do not get anything. To be clear, I do not work for the Vanguard and never have. My brethren, however, get the Vanguard's brand of ""protection"" for their efforts.'

""And what brand is that, exactly?""

'Our abilities are deemed too volatile to go unmonitored. My kin, therefore, rarely enjoy the same level of privacy and freedom that my family does. Unlike us, they are ""caged birds,"" one might say. Little better than pets.'

Hmm. Hector sympathized, but he could also understand where the Vanguard was coming from on this one. The ability to manipulate people's minds was no fucking joke. The potential for abuse there was just ridiculous. ""I can see why you wouldn't want the Vanguard sniffing around Atreya, then.""

'Yes. However, if ""sniffing"" was all that they had been doing, we could have dealt with that easily enough--as we had been, for generations.'

""You're saying they escalated their work here?""

"2154

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Indeed,' said Hanton. 'If left unchecked, they would have sunken their claws into Atreya as they have done countless times before in other nations.'

With the evidence of what happened in Sair still quite fresh in his mind, Hector found it hard to argue with what Hanton was saying here. But he mistrusted the Sparrow's words, nonetheless. He decided to play devil's advocate a little. ""If the Vanguard had been here, then I doubt Abolish would've been able to take over the country the way it did.""

'Ah, yes, Abolish. The catch-all excuse that the Vanguard likes to bandy about at every conceivable opportunity. Perhaps what you say is true, but first and foremost, we should consider what actually happened, no? Abolish was driven out of Atreya, and peace was restored.'

Hector kept his expression still, but he didn't much care for how Hanton was portraying those past events. ""Are you aware of the contributions made by a man named Harper Norez?""

'I am, of course. I understand that his role was pivotal, but let us not fool ourselves. That man is an outlier. He is hardly even a member of the Vanguard at all. As I have heard it, he aided us in spite of the Vanguard, not because of it.'

""...What were you doing during the Abolish occupation, by the way?""

Hanton fell quiet again.

""Abilities like yours would have been a big help,"" said Hector.

'I am no warrior,' said Hanton. 'I was working to drive Abolish out of Atreya in less direct ways. Ultimately, however, my efforts proved fruitless when you accomplished the task long before I could.'

""What 'less direct ways' are you referring to?"" said Hector.

'Gathering intelligence,' said Hanton. 'Especially with regard to their funding and planning.'

""And once you had finished gathering all of this intelligence, what would you have done with it?""

'Sabotage their operational support behind the scene. A direct confrontation was impossible, but weakening them until they had no choice but to leave was still a viable pursuit. Until you came along and crushed them all, of course.'"

"2155

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Did you learn anything useful about Abolish while you were gathering intel?"" said Hector.

'Nothing that you do not already know, I imagine. They intended to lead the nation into war with Rendon and were actively suppressing the media.'

""I can't help thinking that you could have simply made yourself invisible and frozen all their minds without them ever realizing you were there.""

A long breath escaped from the nostrils on the Sparrow's beak. 'You sound like my daughter.'

""She wanted to intervene?""

'Indeed. I fear she soon would have, had you not resolved the matter when you did.'

""...So why'd you stop her?""

'It was simply too risky. I will admit that, yes, that plan might very well have worked. But if, for whatever reason, it did not, then it would instantly spell the end of my House. If the Abolishers noticed us--or goddess forbid, took one of us captive--then the revelation that independent Sparrows are nesting here on Atreyan soil would bring far more attention and trouble to this country than a handful of psychotic murderers in the palace could ever create.'

Hector was doubtful. ""More trouble than a war?""

'Yes! You may not believe me, but yes. A war would not be the end of the world, Lord Goffe. Wars can be very short--and even bloodless. If Abolish left after starting one, I am confident that I could have ensured a swift peace thereafter.' Hanton paused. 'Unless, I suppose, the Vanguard decided to stick their noses in our business again. That would have complicated matters.'

""So let me get this straight. You think... that if word got out about your presence here, then... a bunch of people would show up to capture you?""

'Or kill us, yes. While relatively few know of my kind, those who do are generally very powerful.' Hanton's huge body shifted a little, and he leveled a beady-eyed stare at Hector. 'And I tell you now: if they do ever come for us, we will not go quietly.'

"2156

Hector could feel a sudden heaviness in the air. It wasn't quite the same as that of oppressive soul pressure from an extremely powerful servant, but there was a similarity there, nonetheless. This felt somehow more concentrated on his mind, like the weight didn't extend to the rest of his body.

It also felt different from earlier, when Hanton had been attempting to freeze his thoughts like everyone else. This seemed less deliberate.

More emotionally charged, perhaps.

Whatever this was, it made Hector curious. ""I thought you said that you weren't warriors.""

The weight in the air promptly vanished, and the Sparrow's posture appeared more relaxed again. 'We are not,' said Hanton. 'But so long as I still draw breath, my children will never be enslaved by the Vanguard or anyone else. All who would seek to harm my family will come to know firsthand why my ancestors were so feared in their time. And though I would prefer to avoid it, you are no exception, Lord Goffe. I do not care how powerful you are.'

Unlike some of the other things Hanton had said, Hector could actually believe that. And he could respect it, too. ""I understand,"" he said steadily.

Hanton said nothing.

And in the ensuing silence, Hector felt as if there was one question that he could hold back no longer. Maybe this was a bad idea. Maybe he should keep his mouth shut. But he just had to ask it now. ""...Have you been poisoning people in Gray Rock in order to keep your secret from getting out?""

The giant bird shifted his feathers again. 'No. Why would you ask such a thing?'

""Because a case of serial poisonings is what led me to you,"" said Hector.

'Hmm.' Hanton paused, perhaps simply to think. 'That is very strange. But you have witnessed my abilities. What need would I have to poison anyone?'

Hector had to admit, that was a fair point."
"2157

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'What made you think that this trail of poisonings led to my family?' said Hanton.

Hector considered whether to answer that or not. He couldn't see much harm in it, but he was still reluctant, perhaps because he'd already been fairly forthcoming and didn't wish to overplay his hand. ""Why does that matter?"" he asked.

'I want to know if you might simply be mistaken or if someone is attempting to frame us.'

Hmm. Were those the only two possible options? Off the top of his head, Hector could think of at least one more in which Hanton was guilty and lying about it.

But he didn't want to say that. All he had was a name in a ledger. That was evidence of a connection but not proof of wrongdoing.

'...Does this have something to do with the Vanguard?' said Hanton. 'Is that why you asked about our relationship with them?'

Actually. Wait just a second here.

Hanton could actually be telling the truth here, couldn't he? Hector suddenly felt like a bit of a dumbass, because those two questions just now had caused him to think of a good reason why the Gaolanets were very unlikely to be responsible for the poisonings.

The Vanguard had been run out of Atreya almost a decade ago, right? So, essentially, the basic theory was that the Gaolanets had been poisoning the Vanguard's informants in order to cripple their information network.

But there had been a poisoning only about a month ago. In fact, that case was what had put Hector and Garovel onto this trail in the first place. So if the Gaolanets were responsible for that poisoning, too, then what the hell had their motive been? The Vanguard wasn't even here, anymore.

He supposed that line of reasoning still didn't exonerate Hanton and his family entirely, but it was a decent strike in their favor, he felt.

Agh, so then who else could be behind these goddamn poisonings? Could they really be unrelated?

Man, Hector felt like kind of an asshole all of a sudden, like he should've thought of all this before even coming here."

"2158

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'I suppose your silence is answer enough,' said Hanton. 'I hope that you continue to maintain a healthy skepticism of the Vanguard going forward.'

""...You really don't like them, do you?"" said Hector.

'They are an invasive species. They pretend they are not, but they are. Once they have you in their clutches, they will never let you go.'

Hector immediately thought of Garovel, who used to work for the Vanguard and managed to leave it just fine. But then he thought of Mehlsanz. And the Rainlords. He didn't think he could just dismiss Hanton's perspective as wholly wrong.

Hector mulled over his next question carefully. While he was more inclined to believe Hanton now, he still wasn't prepared to let the Goalanets off the hook yet entirely. ""How did you finally convince the Vanguard to leave Atreya?""

'I am... reluctant to say, but I suppose there is no sense hiding it. Once we were able to locate where the Vanguard was operating out of, my daughter, being her usual self, decided to take rather drastic action. She walked right into their base and told them all to leave.'

Hmm. Well, that tracked with what he'd found in that abandoned house. It had been Pauline's name there, not Hanton's. ""It was just that easy, huh?""

'We can be very persuasive.'

""Mm. Then why'd you wait so long to do it? The Vanguard had been monitoring Atreya for ages, hadn't they?""

'Up until that point, we believed the Vanguard were content with merely monitoring the country. When we discovered that they intended to increase their presence here... well. My daughter made a dramatic decision. I am merely grateful that it did not bring ruin down upon us.'

""Did she erase all their memories?""

'She replaced them with ones of utter frustration and futility in their work here. Which was not far from the truth, frankly. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that she ""exaggerated"" their memories, instead.'"

The more he learned about this bird lady, the more Hector was curious to meet her.

Hanton was not yet finished. 'However, in the interest of full disclosure, she also... may have been spurred to action by another factor.'

""Oh?"" said Hector.

'I had recently been dismissed from my position as the Director of the Agency of Foreign Affairs,' said Hanton. 'She was incensed by this decision and was perhaps looking for some manner of retribution.'

Hector was confused. ""How did that qualify as retribution?"" A thought occurred to him, and he blinked. ""Are you saying that the Vanguard was involved in the AFA?""

'No, but it was trying to acquire influence in our government. I had long been an obstacle to that endeavor. And not just me, in fact. That has been House Gaolanet's mission for centuries. The preservation of this kingdom's sovereignty in the face of overwhelming foreign power.'

It sure sounded noble when Hanton described it like that. Hector had to wonder if it was really so simple, though.

But it did make a degree of sense. After all he'd seen and done during his time outside the country, Hector had thought it was a bit strange that Atreya and the nations around it could be so insulated from what was going on in the world. The Vanguard had clearly played a part in that to some extent, but it seemed evident now that House Gaolanet had been a factor as well.

Hector was still full of questions. There was so much more he wanted to ask Hanton, especially about how the Sparrows conducted themselves--if they abided by any kind of rules or ""code"" regarding the usage of their abilities.

But it was at this time when a knock arrived on the double doors behind him, and without even waiting for a response from Hanton, they opened."

The butler who had showed everyone into the building earlier appeared. This time, he had very little of his prior composure, eyes wide with urgency. ""Lord, I--!""

The man stopped moving entirely at the sight of so many suits of armor standing there--one being Hector with iron orbiting around him. For a moment, the man stood so still that Hector thought Hanton might have frozen him, too.

Hanton, however, did not seem fazed by the new arrival. 'I do not wish to be disturbed, Jessup. Can this wait?'

Jessup twitched back to attention, then cleared his throat and steadied himself. ""I do not think so, Lord."" He didn't seem particularly surprised that his master was a giant bird who could speak directly into his mind. ""It is the news, sir. There has been... an unthinkable development abroad. I am honestly at a bit of a loss how to explain...""

'If it is so important, then speak, man. Quickly now.'

""Five different wars have just broken out within the last hour, Lord.""

Hector wasn't sure what he'd just heard.

And neither was Hanton, apparently. 'What did you say?'

""Five nations,"" said Jessup, walking over to the corner of the room where a large television was sitting. ""Without warning, they each began invading one of their neighbors.""

What the hell?

Jessup wasn't done, though, even as he was presumably searching for the remote control. ""They are calling it a coordinated assault, Lord. They are calling it the outbreak of a second Continental War.""

Chapter Two Hundred Fourteen: 'The encroaching Storm...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Even as he was staring at the screen and listening to the report,

Hector could hardly believe his eyes or his ears.

Could this really be happening? Maybe the reports were exaggerated. Maybe everyone was just freaking out. Overstating things.

A second Continental War? Now, of all times? Why? How?

Everyone knew about the Continental War. Or, the first one, at least. How strange it was, to think that they might have to start making that distinction now. It wouldn't just be the Continental War, anymore. It would be the First Continental War.

Insanity."

"2160 -- CCIV.

The butler who had showed everyone into the building earlier appeared. This time, he had very little of his prior composure, eyes wide with urgency. "'Lord, I--!'"

The man stopped moving entirely at the sight of so many suits of armor standing there--one being Hector with iron orbiting around him. For a moment, the man stood so still that Hector thought Hanton might have frozen him, too.

Hanton, however, did not seem fazed by the new arrival. 'I do not wish to be disturbed, Jessup. Can this wait?'

Jessup twitched back to attention, then cleared his throat and steadied himself. "'I do not think so, Lord.'" He didn't seem particularly surprised that his master was a giant bird who could speak directly into his mind. "'It is the news, sir. There has been... an unthinkable development abroad. I am honestly at a bit of a loss how to explain...'"

'If it is so important, then speak, man. Quickly now.'

""Five different wars have just broken out within the last hour, Lord.""

Hector wasn't sure what he'd just heard.

And neither was Hanton, apparently. 'What did you say?'

""Five nations,"" said Jessup, walking over to the corner of the room where a large television was sitting. ""Without warning, they each began invading one of their neighbors.""

What the hell?

Jessup wasn't done, though, even as he was presumably searching for the remote control. ""They are calling it a coordinated assault, Lord. They are calling it the outbreak of a second Continental War.""

Chapter Two Hundred Fourteen: 'The encroaching Storm...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Even as he was staring at the screen and listening to the report, Hector could hardly believe his eyes or his ears.

Could this really be happening? Maybe the reports were exaggerated. Maybe everyone was just freaking out. Overstating things.

A second Continental War? Now, of all times? Why? How?

Everyone knew about the Continental War. Or, the first one, at least. How strange it was, to think that they might have to start making that distinction now. It wouldn't just be the Continental War, anymore. It would be the First Continental War.

Insanity."
"2161

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

It had been well over a hundred years since the great war that had spanned the entire Eloan continent. Hector may not have been a very good student, but with how much schools had focused on that subject and how much the war had influenced books and movies and television, it was impossible to be completely ignorant of it.

His understanding was that the First Continental War had been the result of several decades of build up, wherein many countries formed military alliances due to a pervasive fear of being attacked by one or more of their neighbors. And when one of them finally did get attacked, it created a chain reaction of war declarations that consumed all of Eloa.

The first aggressor had infamously been the nation of Dozer--though, it might've been called something else at the time. Hector wasn't too sure on that part.

Knowing what he did now of Abolish, Hector might've expected Dozer to be one of the aggressors this time as well, but according to the news report, that wasn't the case.

The five invading nations were Ostra, Corrico, Kavia, Calthos, and Vantalay. There were currently only four nations on the defense, because Ostra and Corrico were attacking Melmoore in unison from the north and south, respectively. The other three defending nations were Hoss, Sair, and Czacoa.

The one that stuck out the most to him, of course, was Sair.

The Rainlords were not going to be happy about that. It was still way too soon for them to head back there, and he felt like they knew that, but...

They were going to be super fucking pissed off when he got back to Warrenhold, weren't they?

""Hanton,"" said Hector, only half-conscious of what he was saying, ""please tell me this news report isn't real. That's it's just another one of your illusions...""

'If only that were so,' the Sparrow said grimly. 'I could never have come up with an illusion like this. And if I had, I would not have considered it believable.'"

"2162

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Jessup flinched suddenly. ""Ah! Lord, I nearly forgot! I apologize, but there was something else! With everything happening so quickly, I--'

'What is it, Jessup?'

""It is Lady Pauline, Lord! As soon as she saw this report, she disappeared!""

Hanton's massive wings flapped suddenly, and his avian body popped up off the ground briefly. 'What?!'

""O-of course, it is not so unusual for her venture out on her own without warning, but given the circumstances, I thought--""

A low rumble escaped from Hanton's huge form, creating a sound unlike anything Hector had ever heard before. Was that a growl? Could birds growl?

Hanton settled himself. 'Thank you for telling me, Jessup. I shall retrieve her. Lord Goffe, I am afraid I really must insist that we conclude this meeting here. There is more I would discuss with you, but my daughter takes priority.'

""I'll help you look for her,"" said Hector.

The Sparrow's head reared back a little. 'A kind offer, but an unnecessary one. My children and I are psychically bound. Even if I do not know her exact location, I will always know in which direction I must go in order to find her.'

""Uh... I see,"" was all Hector could think to say.

Hanton gave a mental sigh. 'On the matter of secrecy, I ask that you tell no one of us, but I also understand that I may be placing you in a difficult position by doing so. For now, please do what you think best. I shall visit your Gray Warren soon so that we may speak again.'

And without waiting for Hector's answer, the Sparrow shifted his posture and then launched himself off the ground, creating a wind so furious that it pushed Hector in his full armor back a step and caused all the decorations in the room to tremble in place.

Hector watched as Hanton flew up through the half-open ceiling and then disappeared entirely. He couldn't tell if that was because of Hanton's invisibility or if he'd simply been flying that fast."

"2163

Hector looked over to Jessup, whom he'd shielded from the wind with a quick wall of curved iron. He dematerialized his work, and the man was standing there, hands out in front of his face but eyes wide open.

""...You okay?"" said Hector.

The butler required another moment to find his composure again.

""Ah--yes, sir. Th-thank you for... whatever you just did.""

""Sure thing.""

There wasn't much point in sticking around, so Hector moved to leave, and Jessup offered to guide him back to the entrance. Hector didn't really think he needed the help, but he accepted, anyway. A part of him wanted to wander around the Gaolanet's estate and see if he could find any other Sparrows to talk to, but he figured he should get back to Warrenhold.

His small army of iron-clad human statues followed close behind, and he could tell that they unsettled Jessup. He tried to reassure the poor guy, but he wasn't sure how much it helped. The butler kept asking--rather shakily--if there was anything else he could do before Hector left, such as providing refreshments, but Hector politely declined.

By the time he made it all the way back to the car, everyone was still frozen. Since he still didn't actually have a driver's license, he decided to wait. It wouldn't be long now.

Hopefully.

He pulled out his phone to check the news, but there wasn't much to go on yet.

The more he thought about it, the more easily he could believe that Calthos had attacked Sair. As he recalled, the Abolishers who attacked Dunehall had, supposedly, been biding their time in Calthos beforehand; and he remembered the Sandlords being concerned about tensions with that country, too.

He'd also gotten a brief update from Asad about two weeks ago regarding the state of things over there. The Sandlords had been working hard to keep the peace, and the Vanguard showed no signs of leaving anytime soon, apparently trying to court Abbas Saqqaf."

"2164

met him, of course, having witnessed him take down the Salesman of Death single-handedly with that crazy suit of mechanized armor.

Was Abolish really attacking again so soon, though? Even after losing Ivan?

Oh, wait, perhaps it was precisely because they'd lost Ivan. They probably wanted to get him back, didn't they? And it certainly made sense to attack while the Rainlords were gone.

Aw, fuck, Ivan being set free was the last thing he wanted to imagine, right now. The conversation he'd had with the Salesman of Death was still burned into his mind, and somehow, he doubted that Ivan would just forget about him and leave him alone.

Hector had already intended to keep a close eye on Sair moving forward, but now that seemed more important than ever.

Honestly, though, after what he'd seen Abbas do, Hector was fairly confident that the Sandlords would kick the shit out of Abolish. And with the Vanguard there as well? According to Asad, the one they called Iceheart was in charge of operations in Sair right now, and while Hector didn't know much about him, he knew that the guy was a Field Marshal.

Hector might've liked to meet him, but supposedly he was some kind of ultra hardass. What would you expect from someone named Iceheart, though?

As he mulled the news over again in his head, he began to wonder if he shouldn't actually be more concerned about the war between Vantalay and Czacoa.

One of the treasure hunting teams that they'd dispatched from Warrenhold had been sent to Ridgemark, a coastal city in Vantalay. According to their early reports, they hadn't made any progress in tracking their target artifact down, and a war certainly wasn't going to make it any easier for them."

"2165

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Perhaps it would be best to recall that team and send them somewhere else. It was a shame that so much time will have been wasted, but it was better safe than sorry.

The biggest worry of all was no doubt if Atreya would somehow get drawn into this larger conflict. At the moment, that didn't seem likely, since there were only nine nations involved in total, but Hector had a feeling that more would be joining in soon. He didn't consider himself to be very knowledgeable when it came to geopolitics, but he doubted that all the other countries in each region were just going to sit back and watch.

'...H-Hector?' came a silent and familiar voice.

'Garovel,' he said calmly. 'Welcome back.'

'What... what the hell happened?'

Before Hector could even answer, the others all began to stir as well. He didn't annihilate all of his iron immediately, but he did bring the orbiting to an end and made holes for the reapers to let them out. He wasn't sure if they would feel safer inside their iron confines, so he felt that this was a decent compromise.

As expected, everyone was terribly confused.

And Hector, being the only one who could explain, did not have a very easy time of it.

""What in lakefire are you talking about?"" said Diego Redwater.

""Check your phones. News of the war is all over the internet.""

""H-hold on,"" said Diego. ""I mean, that's--agh, that's insane, too, but I'm still trying to wrap my head around the part where you met a giant telepathic bird.""

Hector sighed. ""I know how it sounds. But that's why you have a gap in your memories, and that's why you're wearing armor, right now. I made it and infused it with my soul in order to shield your minds from him. The effects took a while to wear off.""

'And where is this Sparrow now?' said Diego's reaper, Yangèra.

Hector did his best to explain again.

This continued for a bit longer, with even the reapers apparently having trouble understanding what he was saying, until at length,

Lynnette chimed in.

""He's telling the truth,"" she said. ""I remember as well. I couldn't speak or move, but I saw and heard everything just as Hector did.""

Wait, what?"

"2166 -- CCXV.

""I thought it was the same for all of you, but apparently not."" Lynnette held up her half-gauntled hand, though it was currently somewhat concealed beneath a glove. ""I can only imagine that this thing somehow interfered with Hanton's abilities.""

Hector stared at her in disbelief.

Everyone else was apparently speechless as well.

She took the opening to keep talking. ""Honestly, is it so difficult to believe? This is Hector we're talking about. Do you think he'd make something like that up?""

Diego tried to scratch his neck, but his armor was in the way. ""Er... hmm.""

Hector was grateful for his own armor as he felt his face grow hot with embarrassment.

""In that case, I should very much like to meet Hanton again,"" said King William. As he spoke, however, his gaze continued to search up and down at his own armor. He hadn't actually mentioned anything about it yet, but he seemed somewhat transfixed by the suit Hector had made for him.

""Well, he said he would drop by Warrenhold soon,"" said Hector.

The King perked up at that. ""Ah, is that so? Then perhaps I have reason to extend my stay again!""

Hector could hear Lynn sighing inside her helmet.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifteen: 'O, flittering interloper...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

It felt good to fly. The wind beneath her wings was the most natural thing in the world. She could hardly believe that her siblings used to fear this so much when they were younger. Birds afraid of flying? How absurd.

No doubt, it had been due to the consistently terrifying stories that their father used to tell them about... well, everything. He'd obviously been trying to instill a wariness of the outside world in his children.

And Pauline Gaolanet couldn't help resenting him a little for that. He'd always made her out to be the troublemaker of the group, but to her mind, she was the only normal one in the family. Living in constant fear--that was abnormal."

"2166 -- CCXV.

""I thought it was the same for all of you, but apparently not."" Lynnette held up her half-gauntled hand, though it was currently somewhat concealed beneath a glove. ""I can only imagine that this thing somehow interfered with Hanton's abilities.""

Hector stared at her in disbelief.

Everyone else was apparently speechless as well.

She took the opening to keep talking. ""Honestly, is it so difficult to believe? This is Hector we're talking about. Do you think he'd make something like that up?""

Diego tried to scratch his neck, but his armor was in the way. ""Er... hmm.""

Hector was grateful for his own armor as he felt his face grow hot with embarrassment.

""In that case, I should very much like to meet Hanton again,"" said King William. As he spoke, however, his gaze continued to search up and down at his own armor. He hadn't actually mentioned anything about it yet, but he seemed somewhat transfixed by the suit Hector had made for him.

""Well, he said he would drop by Warrenhold soon,"" said Hector.

The King perked up at that. ""Ah, is that so? Then perhaps I have reason to extend my stay again!""

Hector could hear Lynn sighing inside her helmet.

Chapter Two Hundred Fifteen: 'O, fluttering interloper...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It felt good to fly. The wind beneath her wings was the most natural thing in the world. She could hardly believe that her siblings used to fear this so much when they were younger. Birds afraid of flying? How absurd.

No doubt, it had been due to the consistently terrifying stories that their father used to tell them about... well, everything. He'd obviously been trying to instill a wariness of the outside world in his children.

And Pauline Gaolanet couldn't help resenting him a little for that. He'd always made her out to be the troublemaker of the group, but to her mind, she was the only normal one in the family. Living in constant fear--that was abnormal."

"2167

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

She knew perfectly well that her father would chastise her later for what she was currently doing, but she was honestly quite tired of listening to him. Did he really have their family's best interest at heart?

Well, yeah, he probably did, actually.

She would've liked to use his incompetence or his lack of care as an excuse for her decision to go to Sescoria right now, but even she had to acknowledge how unfair that would be. Her father was no fool, and he meant well. Of course he did.

But she was already in her thirties, and she still felt aimless in her life. Sure, Sparrows had slightly longer life spans on average than humans did, but that was no justification at all, as far as she was concerned.

With as much as her father talked about maintaining their freedom and privacy, Pauline couldn't help feeling like she was sorely lacking in both, most of the time.

Even now, she could sense that he was already beginning to chase after her.

At least she'd managed to get a good head start. Flying at her top speed, it wouldn't take long to reach Sescoria at all, and she knew exactly where she wanted to go.

Bosliat Palace. Or Belgrant Castle. Wherever the Queen was.

More than anything, Pauline wanted to know how that woman was reacting to the news of a supposed second Continental War. What would she do? Anything at all?

Maybe not. 'Wait and see' was a perfectly viable plan, especially considering none of the countries in question were their neighbors.

Pauline wasn't eager to participate in a war, by any means, but she did think it was better to know in advance if one was coming their way. Surely, even her father wouldn't be able to protest that logic.

Oh, what was she thinking? Of course he would be able to. Somehow."
"2168

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The capital of Atreya was already coming into view. This was one of the reasons Pauline loved flying so much, the sights from the air. Humans could build such remarkable things with their fidgety little fingers, couldn't they? She might've been jealous if not for her ability to make up the difference with her mind.

They were fun to observe, humans. In her youth, she'd often played with them without her father's knowledge. It was so tempting to toy with their minds a bit. Many times as a chick, she hadn't been able to resist that temptation, but she knew better now that she was older. Humans often appeared helpless against the power she could wield.

But that wasn't so. Not entirely.

Humans were dangerous, if you weren't careful. And maybe even if you were.

It was easy to look down on them. To think that her intelligence made her superior. But intelligence was a fickle thing. In some ways, she felt that the humans were much smarter than her kind. They cooperated better, for one thing. And they seemed to understand the necessity of risk in pursuit of greatness.

Her kind could definitely learn a thing or two from them.

She spotted Bosliat Palace and reached out with her mind, searching for the Queen.

Ah, yes, there she was in her office. Perfect.

This was not Pauline's first visit. She'd made this trip several times before, though not as often as she might've liked.

She knew that it was rude to eavesdrop, of course--and that in this case, it might even be illegal--but her intentions were pure, and that was what really mattered, wasn't it? She only wanted to help, and besides, no one would ever know she was here. Her ability to conceal her presence even from reapers meant that she probably wouldn't even have to bother wiping anyone's memories."

"2169

Memory manipulation was a tricky thing to pull off, anyway. It was hugely useful, of course, so her father had made sure she learned how to do it at a very young age, but she'd never liked using it, even in her more reckless days.

It felt wrong, in a lot of ways. She was taking something that didn't belong to her. Sure, they wouldn't miss it as long as she did it correctly, but that didn't change the essential nature of the act. Thievery.

She much preferred just remaining invisible. No mess to clean up afterward. Or guilt to deal with.

Of course, a Sparrow's ""invisibility"" was not truly so. That, too, was a mental trick. They weren't manipulating light or altering the physical composition of their bodies. Instead, it was simply a matter of tweaking the ""perception"" of their presence.

That was why it worked even on reapers. It didn't rely on fooling anyone's eyesight. It was about fooling their mind. And reapers--even if they didn't have physical bodies--still had minds.

It wasn't that hard, either, especially with all the practice she had. It didn't matter how many people were looking at her. As long as she could touch their naked minds, the simple desire to conceal herself was all she required to make it so. As easy as flipping a switch that controlled a thousand light bulbs.

Cameras, however, could still be a problem. She wouldn't be able to block the perception of someone watching television five hundred miles away, and she couldn't alter a camera's perception of her, either.

She could, however, simply avoid them.

A Sparrow's eyesight was certainly remarkable, but it was more than just that. When she concentrated, she could see through eyes that were not her own. She could listen with ears that did not belong to her. She could touch with fingers she'd never had."

"2170

A mind was, among other things, a vessel for interpretation. Physical senses funneled into it and needed to be understood. Ultimately, it was just information.

Therefore, it was possible for her to sneak a peek at that information for herself, to reinterpret it with her own mind simultaneously with the person who was actually receiving it. It could be a bit messy, since there was so much information being received, but all she really needed to focus on was sight and hearing--and occasionally touch and smell, if she wanted.

That simplified matters greatly. Not worrying about other senses like taste, balance, or proprioception meant that the amount of information she received was greatly reduced. Plus, other senses could be a bit difficult to reinterpret.

Every mind was distinct in one way or another. Perhaps that was because of the soul. Or perhaps it was the opposite. Perhaps that distinctness was what generated the soul.

Whatever the case, it made each mind slightly different, which meant that each one required a slightly different reinterpretation in order for her own mind to understand.

That was also why reading thoughts directly was so hard--if not impossible. People may have interpreted information from their senses in slightly different ways, but people crafted their own thoughts in very different ways.

It was like the difference between a combination lock that required three numbers versus one that required twenty. It was theoretically possible to discern the pattern, but it was far too impractical to be useful.

She'd learned that at a young age, too.

But reinterpreting senses was certainly manageable, and after years of practice, sight and hearing were by far the easiest. So much so, in fact, that she could now do it on an enormous scale.

Sescoria may have been far from the largest city in the world, but its population density was the highest in the nation, and in this area around Bosliat, there were thousands of people. Pauline could see what they all saw, hear what they all heard. And it wasn't overwhelming, either. Mildly difficult, perhaps, but certainly not overwhelming. With a bit of effort, her mind could collect all of that information, reinterpret it, organize it, and even convert it into a mental map for herself."

"2171

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 1 of 24?!))~~

Unfortunately, even with all of those advantages at her disposal, the royal palace was still quite the danger zone as far as cameras were concerned. Even on normal days, there were likely to be visitors taking pictures or videos in front of the main gatehouse, and on days like today--days when huge news gripped the nation--reporters with camera crews were everywhere.

And even if those weren't problems, there was also the ever-growing threat of security cameras. When she was young, those hadn't been nearly so prevalent or obnoxious, but these days, she had to be mindful of them all the time.

Yes, she could sense the security guards who were observing the video feeds and thereby prevent them from seeing her on screen, but that didn't stop the footage from being recorded. If someone decided to go back and watch that footage while she wasn't around to alter their perception, then they would see the giant bird there as clear as day.

Wiping the footage was technically possible, if rather tricky, but even if it wasn't, that could arouse suspicion, too. The absence of security footage was just as likely to be noticed. It was far better to simply avoid the cameras entirely, but that was also growing more and more difficult as time went on. The humans did love improving their technology, didn't they?

No doubt, this was one of the main reasons why her father insisted on maintaining a reclusive lifestyle. How many times had he told her about another instance of a Sparrow being outed in some other country? He never missed an opportunity to make his children even more fearful of the outside world.

Pauline was of a different opinion, however. She felt that they should meet these challenges head on. Hiding away at home wasn't going to prepare them for anything. The looming threat of technology was scary, sure, but that was exactly why they needed to stay informed about how it was developing."

"2172

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 2 of 24?!))~~

Thankfully, her father at least seemed to partially agree with her on that point. He made a habit of keeping up with the latest technological developments in a variety of fields, and the number of online tech blogs and journals that he followed was reaching a level bordering on absurdity.

Pauline, of course, much preferred to see the technology for herself. There were too many rumors and exaggerations on the internet for her taste, even from supposedly credible sources. Making outrageous claims about their works-in-progress was just one tactic that people used to procure investment--or goddess forbid, government funding.

Those ones were typically the most egregious, in her experience. Tech companies who wanted to make money off of the government always seemed to take delight in the extra bureaucratic bloat that allowed them to squeeze every last troa that they possibly could out of their governmental liaisons.

That was another reason why Pauline quite liked Queen Helen, actually.

Well, the new Queen Helen, at least--the Queen Helen that had returned from abroad and retaken the country from the Abolish halfwits who'd chased her out.

Before that whole ridiculous circus, Pauline hadn't thought very highly of the Queen at all. In fact, she'd kind of despised her. Pauline had thought her ill-suited to the task of ruling a nation, never taking care to foster a strong base of political support for herself. The woman would always just do things as she saw fit, and sure, some of those things were basically good decisions, but they also alienated people who could have probably been her allies with a bit of compromise and persuasion. Thankfully, she seemed to have matured over the last year.

Honestly, at the time of the late king's passing, Pauline would've most liked to see Prince David take the throne. That man had always been able to play the game.

When he felt like playing it, that was."

"2173

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 3 of 24?!))~~

She sometimes wondered what would've happened if, somehow, Prince David's father had chosen him for succession. Pauline would've certainly been pleased, but there was a fair chance that Prince David would've simply abdicated and ruined the whole thing, anyway.

It had all happened in such slow increments over the years, but with the benefit of hindsight, the last decade had been an absolute mess for this nation.

If only her father hadn't been removed as the Director of the Agency of Foreign Affairs. To Pauline's mind, that seemed to be the inciting incident that allowed all of these other things to follow.

If only Hanton Gaolanet had remained an advisor to King Martinus III.

Even now, nine years later, Pauline still wasn't sure why that had happened. Her father rarely spoke of it. And as she wasn't one to shy away from awkward questions, she had of course tried--multiple times by now--asking him about it directly, but he never really gave her a straight answer.

He just told her that Martinus had stopped listening to him, that their relationship had been damaged beyond repair.

Pauline hadn't really understood how that could be the case. Her father could manipulate minds. Surely, if there'd been a problem like that, he could've simply made Martinus forget about it.

But apparently not. Her father told her that things weren't always so simple. That relationships were complicated.

And that some memories couldn't be erased.

She'd pressed him for more details, of course, but he hadn't provided them.

In a broad sense, her father was obviously correct. There were certain types of memories that Sparrows could not remove from a person's mind. In general, the older a memory was, the harder it was to wipe away. Memories over time became a tangled web of interlocking images, ideas, emotions--and perhaps more. Removing all of that was incredibly complicated. If you missed any part of it, the smallest fragment of the memory, then the whole thing could be regrown, one day. Randomly, perhaps. The entire memory could rush back to the person in an epiphany-like moment--or deja vu, even.

But Pauline didn't think that was what her father had meant.

Because there was one other type of memory that was very difficult to get rid of. The type that was deeply etched into the mind, usually by way of powerful emotion."

"2174

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 4 of 24?!))~~

Pauline had to wonder what exactly had transpired between her father and the late king, but she doubted she would ever find out. With one of them dead and the other an impenetrable fortress of secrets, there was little hope.

She put it out of her mind.

Her mental map was revealing a handful of safe zones around Bosliat's inner buildings. There were surveillance cameras all over the rooftops, but they primarily targeted the areas around the skylight windows. She wasn't trying to break into the royal palace, so it was simple enough to stay outside their view as she fluttered closer.

The Queen's mind was in the Royal Office at the top of the Royal Tower, the palace's centermost turret. That building was, rather understandably, the most heavily surveilled, but Pauline didn't need to get that close, so she landed gingerly on a much safer tower several dozen meters away. Plus, this spot shaded her from the bright sun, thanks to the tall roof in front of her.

She concentrated, focusing on the Queen.

Who was with her? What was she seeing? What was she hearing?

Several people were there. The images and sounds coalesced in Pauline's mind.

""--should not keep delaying, Your Highness,"" came the voice of a short woman in front of the Queen's desk. ""The people will want to hear from you.""

""I will delay as long as I please. This matter, while grave, is of no immediate importance to Atreya. I will not act in haste when there is no need.""

""With respect, Your Highness,"" came the voice of a bearded and bespectacled man standing farther away, ""I do not think that my esteemed colleague here is suggesting that you should present the public with a detailed plan of action this very evening. She merely meant that it would help put the people's hearts at ease if they were to hear a few words of encouragement.""

"2175

""Perhaps,"" said the Queen. ""Or perhaps making a statement when I have nothing of substance to say would only serve to unsettle the public further. I imagine many would see it as an admission that I do not know what to do.""

""I believe you may be overthinking it, Your Highness,"" said the same man from before.

Wait a minute. Pauline recognized him. That was Arthur Vollier, eldest son of the wealthiest man in the nation, Domitrus Vollier. So he was serving as an advisor to the Queen now, was he?

""It does not need to be a complicated matter,"" Arthur went on. ""A short, simple statement to clear the air and ensure the people of your attentiveness to the situation. That is all it would be.""

""My attentiveness? You believe the people might be questioning my attentiveness?""

""I do not see why you are trying to pick a fight,"" said Arthur. ""This would be an easy way to score points with the general public. Points which you may soon be in need of, no?""

A rather weighty period of silence arrived, until another voice broke it.

""Arthur, what do you mean by--?""

""Enough,"" said the Queen. ""I will only address the nation when I see fit to do so. And I believe this meeting has gone on for too long, already. Everyone is dismissed.""

Well, she seemed stressed.

Understandable, Pauline supposed.

When the advisors were all gone, only two minds remained. The Queen and her reaper.

Pauline was not surprised. The Gaolanets had known that the Queen was a servant for many months now. Her father had learned of it shortly after Abolish had been routed. The Queen's grand return to the capital had been cause for celebration, and every lord in the nation had attended the subsequent banquet.

Every lord, that was, save the newest one.

The young Lord Hector Goffe of the Gray Warren had been notably absent from that event, though only a handful of people had even been aware of his newly granted title at the time."

"2176

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 6 of 24?!))~~

Her father had been very reluctant to meet with Lord Goffe for some reason, but Pauline hadn't been able to curb her curiosity and had actually visited the Gray Warren once already.

Sadly, the entrance didn't lend itself well to stealthy infiltration--which was no doubt the point--so she hadn't been able to see the underground fortifications with her own eyes.

But she hadn't needed to enter it in order to realize that there was most definitely something very strange about that place.

For one thing, she couldn't sense inside it. She wasn't sure how that was even possible. Had Hector Goffe actually infused the entire castle with his ""soul power"" or whatever it was that servants used? That notion seemed utterly ridiculous to her, considering how enormous that underground barrier seemed to be.

And for another thing, she'd felt incredibly uncomfortable while she was near that place. Some unexplained sensation in the back of her mind pestered her the entire time she was there, and though she couldn't tell what the cause of it was, she knew for a fact that it was no natural thing. Some kind psychic security system? Or a warding mechanism, perhaps?

Whatever the explanation, she hadn't been keen to go back there a second time. She might've disagreed with her father a lot of the time, but this was one of those instances where she could very much see the wisdom in his type of thinking.

That place was dangerous. Whatever the hell was going on there, she was no longer curious enough to find out. Compared to that, the royal palace's security cameras were positively comforting.

'You may want to listen to your advisors on this one,' said the reaper with the Queen.

""Hmph. What makes you say that?""

'Because the outbreak of a second Continental War would be a very serious matter.'

""You think I do not know that?""

"2177

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 7 of 24?!))~~

'On the contrary,' the reaper said, 'I think you know it very well, and it scares you.'

""I did not ask for your opinion.""

'Ah. Well, if I am bothering you so much, then you should be glad, because I suspect that Harper and I won't be able to stick around for much longer.'

There was notable silence.

Pauline was confused. Harper? Her father had mentioned that name to her. A member of the Vanguard who was currently protecting the Queen. So did that mean this reaper wasn't the Queen's partner, but Harper's?

""...Have you received orders from your superiors?"" the Queen asked.

'Not yet, but if this war continues to escalate, then it's a virtual certainty that we will get the call quite soon.'

""I see...""

Oh.

Hmm.

Pauline had little love for the Vanguard, but that was still unsettling news to hear. According to her father, this Harper fellow seemed like quite the valuable warrior--and possibly even trustworthy, as well.

Extremely high praise from Hanton Gaolanet.

The idea that the kingdom might soon be losing one of its most valuable protectors...

Pauline was glad that she'd thought to come here today. This was exactly the kind of thing she wanted to know about as soon as possible.

'If you have any lingering questions for me,' said Harper's reaper, 'you should ask them soon. This may very well be the last time we speak for quite a long while.'

There was more silence, and Pauline could see the Queen staring at an assortment of papers on her desk. What did they say? The woman's eyes weren't really focusing on them, so they were difficult to read. Was that Prince David's signature?

""What do you make of Intar's role in all of this?"" the Queen asked.

'Ah, yeah, that is the big question mark. Intar isn't technically at war with anyone right now, but it maintains quite good political and economic relations with several of the involved nations.'

"2178

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 8 of 24?!))~~

""If Intar decides to step in, it would completely change the war,"" said Queen Helen.

'Most certainly,' said the reaper. 'Conventional wisdom would say that, at the moment, Intar could probably end the war single-handedly, if it really wanted to. Wouldn't be pretty, but it could. The war is still relatively small.'

""Mm. Conventional wisdom, is it? Then do you perhaps have some unconventional wisdom for me?""

'Heh. Well, Intar may be the most powerful nation on the continent--or perhaps even on the planet--but it is also in the midst of an ideological war of its own, right now. Between interventionists and pacifists, of all things.'

""Yes, I have heard as much,"" said the Queen. ""Do you think the pacifists are influential enough to prevent Intar from joining the fight?""

A long pause arrived. 'As a reaper, this is where I would usually say something non-committal. You know. About how the world is complicated and difficult to predict and blah blah blah. But honestly, I'm tired of doing that all the time. I could be wrong, obviously, but to be quite frank with you, Your Majesty... I don't think Intar will send a single soldier to anyone's aid.'

""I appreciate your candor, but what makes you sound so confident?""

'Years of immersing myself in modern Intarian culture. The majority of Intarians won't see this as their problem. Which, in fairness, it isn't. Plus, the Intarian Congress has been in a state of complete deadlock for nearly a decade now. They can barely pass even the simplest of legislation. Unless that somehow changes, I don't see them suddenly agreeing to go to war on some other country's behalf.'

""I see.""

'And of course, there's the Vanguard as well. We generally try to stay out of politics, so even though we have a significant presence in Intar, our higher-ups don't hold much influence with the government there. In fact, I imagine the politicians there will believe that they don't need to intervene, because the Vanguard will take care of it. As usual.'

"2179

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 9 of 24?!))~~

""Is that bitterness I hear?"" said the Queen.

'Perhaps a bit. More and more, I've begun to feel that Intar is exploiting the Vanguard's goodwill so that they don't have to bother protecting their own borders and allies.'

""How can that be? I was under the impression that the Vanguard does not participate in conflicts in which Abolish is not involved.""

'Mm, yeah, that's the intention. On paper. But in practice, how do you know Abolish isn't manipulating a conflict from behind the scenes? Not all Abolish sects are as overt in their actions as the one that came here. It's foggy, at best. And a sufficiently motivated Vanguardian officer might very well use that as justification for sending troops to ""investigate"" a conflict which is exhibiting no obvious signs of Abolish involvement.'

""How worrisome...""

'Yeah.' A beat passed. 'But in fairness, I should also mention: it's not like such suspicions are completely unfounded or otherwise indicative of corruption on the Vanguard's part. Over the last few decades, there have been plenty of instances where Abolish has been caught trying to stealthily stoke civil unrest and incite violence.'

""That is not more comforting,"" said the Queen. ""In fact, dwelling on that possibility sounds like a recipe for paranoia.""

'Oh, absolutely. I don't envy my superiors' positions at all.'

Pauline could sense her father's presence quite strongly now from the east. She exhaled through her nares and prepared herself for the inevitable argument.

The Queen and the reaper were not done talking, however. Pauline must've missed something while she was distracted, because their conversation seemed to have shifted topics slightly.

'It is particularly frustrating, considering how wealthy Intar is. It shouldn't be relying on a force of only a few thousand servants for all the heavy lifting.'

""Does Intar not commission its own servants?"" the Queen asked.

""Those without ties to the Vanguard?""

"2180

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 10 of 24?!))~~

'I've never met any of them personally,' the reaper said, 'but yes, as I understand it, the Intarian military does retain a few of its own servants, still.'

""Only a few?"" said the Queen. ""Surely, such a large nation would have more than that.""

'Maybe three hundred years ago. These days, though, the Vanguard has a bit of a monopoly on that type of manpower in Intar.'

""Why is that?""

'Many reasons, I imagine--but all of which result in one reoccurring problem. That being, it is very difficult to control people who wield such power.'

""Ah.""

'In order to work for the Intarian Armed Forces as a servant, you must pass number of ""loyalty tests."" And you must also agree to live under constant observation.'

""...I find that very odd. Any normal military would offer enormous benefits to such valuable officers.""

'Oh, I'm sure they get paid quite handsomely. But the IAF takes the rule of law extremely seriously when it comes to servants. Which is wise, in my opinion. Historically speaking, servants and reapers who don't possess a deep respect for something higher than themselves--like the law, for instance--are often the ones who pursue the path of violent rebellion and conquest.'

Pauline's head twitched as she suddenly realized that her father was right there behind her. She'd gotten so caught up in the last bit of that conversation that she hadn't even noticed him landing.

She turned and looked at him. She waited, but he didn't say anything.

That was weird.

Why wasn't he saying anything? Wasn't he mad?

Hey, maybe he wasn't. Maybe he was pleased.

And maybe that was wishful thinking.

She checked on the Queen again.

""--sounds like you are victims of your own success,"" the woman was saying with a surprising amount of amusement in her voice.

'Heh. Perhaps. The Vanguard has bailed Intar out so many times that it does seem like they've begun to take our presence for granted. I'm not sure whether to be happy or sad about that.'

"2181

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 11 of 24?!))~~

""Might you have any insight for me regarding Steccat, as well?"" the Queen asked.

'A bit, perhaps. I am not nearly as confident in my appraisal of that country as I am with Intar, however. Harper and I often travel to Steccat to visit a couple of his adopted children, but the Vanguard has comparatively little presence there.'

""Is that so? But is there not a Vanguardian Field Marshal who is known as the Hammer of Steccat?""

'There is, yes. Field Marshal Kane. But I did say ""comparatively."" And while Kane does have fairly strong ties to that country, so does Sai-hee.'

""Ah.""

'Her people's presence there creates something of a bubble, through which reliable information is difficult to come by.'

""I thought she had a preference for peacekeeping.""

'She does.'

""Then that should ease the flow of information, no?""

'In trade and culture, perhaps, but not in matters of state. They're a rather reclusive bunch, those Steccati aristocrats. They like to hide behind their art and speak little of politics. Or, perhaps, they just don't care.'

Pauline was not surprised to hear that in the slightest. Steccat was the haven of another group of Sparrows, and according to her father, they were even more influential in their country than the Gaolanets were here in Atreya.

'All that being said, though, I doubt Steccat will be getting involved in the war, either. As you said, Sai-hee DOES like her peace. It would surprise me if Steccat decided to jump in without direct provocation.'

""I see...""

Pauline had to agree with the reaper's assessment, though for different reasons. If her brethren in Steccat were anything like her father, then they would doubtless be wanting to avoid conflict as well.

'I suppose it's good that two of Eloa's three juggernauts are probably not going to get involved in the war,' the reaper went on, 'but I unfortunately can't help feeling like their isolationism will actually serve to make things worse in this instance, not better."

"2182 -- CCXVI.

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 12 of 24?!))~~

"If that is truly the case," said the Queen, "then perhaps their isolationism is precisely the reason why the invaders have chosen to act now."

'I fear you may be right about that,' the reaper said. 'The timing does seem a bit convenient to me. And that may also mean that whoever orchestrated all of this has been biding their time for quite a while.'

"Well, I cannot imagine that such a coordinated set of offensives could have been a spur-of-the-moment decision."

'True enough. It just concerns me that our opponent may be more than a simple opportunist.'

"...Our' opponent?" said the Queen.

'Our, as in the Vanguard's.'

"Of course."

A knock arrived at the Queen's door, and she bade them enter. It was an attendant, informing the woman that a number of the local lords around Sescoria had arrived at Bosliat, wishing to speak with her. The woman stood up from her desk and moved to receive them in another part of the palace.

Pauline wanted to keep listening, but her father's voice finally arrived in her head.

'That is enough, my dear,' he said with discomforting calmness. 'It is time we return home.'

Chapter Two Hundred Sixteen: 'Thy sharpening edge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

By the time they made it back to Warrenhold, more unsettling news was arriving.

The four defending nations of Melmoore, Hoss, Sair, and Czacoa had all formally declared war against their invaders. Additionally, the three nations of Lyste, Naos, and Yena Maria had collectively declared war on Vantalay.

And most recently, the nation of Dozer--which had already been at war with Korgum before this whole thing kicked off--had declared war on Lyste.

That last bit of news seemed to have a particularly negative impact on all of the reapers present.

Hector could understand why. It all but confirmed that Abolish was somehow behind these invasions. Or if they weren't, then at the very least, they were trying to take advantage of the chaos.

And that prospect, while unsurprising, didn't seem much better."
"2182 -- CCXVI.

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 12 of 24?!))~~

"If that is truly the case," said the Queen, "then perhaps their isolationism is precisely the reason why the invaders have chosen to act now."

'I fear you may be right about that,' the reaper said. 'The timing does seem a bit convenient to me. And that may also mean that whoever orchestrated all of this has been biding their time for quite a while.'

"Well, I cannot imagine that such a coordinated set of offensives could have been a spur-of-the-moment decision."

'True enough. It just concerns me that our opponent may be more than a simple opportunist.'

"... 'Our' opponent?" said the Queen.

'Our, as in the Vanguard's.'

"Of course."

A knock arrived at the Queen's door, and she bade them enter. It was an attendant, informing the woman that a number of the local lords around Sescoria had arrived at Bosliat, wishing to speak with her. The woman stood up from her desk and moved to receive them in another part of the palace.

Pauline wanted to keep listening, but her father's voice finally arrived in her head.

'That is enough, my dear,' he said with discomforting calmness. 'It is time we return home.'

Chapter Two Hundred Sixteen: 'Thy sharpening edge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

By the time they made it back to Warrenhold, more unsettling news was arriving.

The four defending nations of Melmoore, Hoss, Sair, and Czacoa had all formally declared war against their invaders. Additionally, the three nations of Lyste, Naos, and Yena Maria had collectively declared war on Vantalay.

And most recently, the nation of Dozer--which had already been at war with Korgum before this whole thing kicked off--had declared war on Lyste.

That last bit of news seemed to have a particularly negative impact on all of the reapers present.

Hector could understand why. It all but confirmed that Abolish was somehow behind these invasions. Or if they weren't, then at the very least, they were trying to take advantage of the chaos.

And that prospect, while unsurprising, didn't seem much better."
"2183

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 13 of 24?!))~~

Just browsing the internet on his phone, Hector noticed that a lot of media attention was being given to the still-undeclared nations of Intar and Steccat. There appeared to be considerable international pressure on them to get involved, and just about every news outlet was anticipating them to issue an official statement about their position very soon.

The reapers, however, all seemed to think that neither of those giants would join the war.

'It might be different if Intar and Steccat were enemies,' Garovel explained privately. 'In such a case, they would each be feeling the pressure to support their allies against one another. But they're not enemies. They're on pretty good terms, last I checked.'

And many of the other reapers around Warrenhold had more things to say about this subject. The persistent reaper chatter in his head was at an all-time high. It got so bad, in fact, that a lot of the servants decided to leave the main area and go hang out in the lower caves just to get away from all voices in their heads.

Hector, for his part, could just kind of tune them out if he wanted, but he felt like he had to listen as best he could. Whatever decision they eventually arrived at would be enormously important to all of their futures.

Overall, the Rainlords were pretty clearly in a state of confusion and anger. They needed time to sort their thoughts out. The war between Sair and Calthos was obviously their greatest concern, but there was no consensus among them regarding what they should do about it.

Some, unsurprisingly, wanted to depart immediately and go join the Sandlords in battle this very moment, but thankfully, there were many voices in opposition to that idea--more voices than Hector might've expected, actually."

"2184

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 14 of 24?!))~~

Hector sat with Lynn and the King of Atreya while they observed the commotion in the Grand Hall of the Night. They couldn't hear the reapers talking, of course, but there were plenty of corporeal Rainlords discussing the subject as well. The other non-servants apparently had plenty to say, too.

After a while of chaos, the heads managed to gain everyone's attention by standing together in the middle of the chamber and rising up on a giant platform of ice made by Zeff.

From there, the debate became more formal and organized. The heads split everyone up into two sides, and they cleared the middle of the Grand Hall to make space for speakers to come forth and present their arguments. None of the selected speakers were reapers, presumably so as not to exclude any of the non-servants.

Hector listened carefully to each person who spoke. The crowd listened, too, though they were occasionally more vocal whenever someone made a point that they agreed or disagreed with.

He obviously agreed with those who were calling for everyone to stay, to have patience, to leave the fighting to the Sandlords for now; but he had to admit, he did find some of the arguments from the other side somewhat compelling.

They had a responsibility to their subjects, they said. The people of Sair were living in fear, they said. The Vanguard couldn't be trusted, they said. And as Rainlords, whether the danger came from Abolish or the Vanguard or anything else, it didn't matter.

""The rain fears not the torch,"" they said.

Hector wished he could say that he completely disagreed with that sentiment. He wished he could say that it was foolish. But honestly, if he were in their position, he wasn't really sure what he would do. And if they did decide to go, he was tempted to go with them, even though he knew he probably shouldn't."

"2185

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 15 of 24?!))~~

In fact, now that he was thinking about it, he'd been in their position, hadn't he? More or less? When Abolish had taken the capital and planned to destroy the town of Harold. Hadn't he wanted to do something just as reckless as this?

Garovel had stopped him, of course, but they'd still ended up doing something pretty damn reckless anyway with their plan to ""kidnap"" the King.

In retrospect, that plan probably would've gone to absolute shit, if Lynn hadn't showed up to help him out when she did.

Agh. He was torn.

And so were the Rainlords, it seemed. Even after it was time for dinner, no agreement had been reached. Food was prepared and served, and everyone ate together in the Grand Hall while the debate just kept going. Speaker after speaker, counterargument after counterargument.

It was going to be a long evening.

After another few hours, when Hector could see that many of the participants were beginning to tire, a familiar woman stepped into the center to speak.

It was Nere Blackburn, Hector realized after a moment, making his heavy eyelids perk back up again. She hadn't said anything all night long. Her reaper, Sentsia, was hovering beside her.

""Perhaps we can arrive at a compromise,"" said Nere. Her voice was rather flat, lacking the passion of most of the previous speakers, but perhaps that wasn't surprising, given the late hour. ""Instead of committing ourselves fully to either attacking or staying behind, we could send a team to monitor the situation in Sair and report back.""

A few whispers and mutters ran through the crowd of listeners.

""We have already dispatched two other teams abroad,"" said Nere. ""What would be the harm in sending one more?""

Hmm. It didn't sound like the worst idea in the world, Hector thought."
"2186

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 16 of 24?!))~~

Apparently, the other Rainlords thought similarly. It took a little while longer of debate, but soon enough, an agreement was reached between the two sides, and the crowd of listeners finally began to disperse from the Grand Hall.

The heads, wanting to continue discussing the details in private, moved to the conference room higher up in the Tower of Night. Hector sat in on that meeting as well, curious to know who they might choose for this mission to Sair.

The two teams that they had dispatched on treasure hunts had each consisted of three lesser known servants and one reaper for guidance. However, the reason they hadn't dispatched one more team to find a third treasure was because some of the heads hadn't been fully confident in the remaining candidates' suitability.

The heads' collective standards appeared to be quite high, and there had been various concerns that kept getting brought up, ranging from the candidates' levels of fame to their levels of maturity. Even the trio that they'd sent to Vantalay had almost not made the cut.

Which reminded Hector of an earlier thought he'd had.

""Ah--excuse me for interrupting,"" he said, standing up from his chair at the end of the long conference table.

The heads and their reapers all looked at him, perhaps a bit surprised since he'd been quiet this whole time.

""I was thinking that maybe we should recall the team we sent to Ridgemark in Vantalay,"" said Hector.

There was a brief silence.

""That was the team of Blackburn triplets, was it not?"" said Salvador Delaguna, eyeing the family's representatives seated across from him.

""Yes,"" said Horatio Blackburn. His cousin, Nere, sat next to him, and his reaper, Yovess, hovered behind him along with Sentsia.

'The decision ultimately falls to you, then,' said Mevox, Salvador's reaper. 'Personally, I'm inclined to agree with our Lord Darksteel here. The risk in Vantalay has obviously been compounded to a greater degree than we could have anticipated, and if we bring them back now, we could instead dispatch them to Sair. Or elsewhere, if we prefer.'

"2187

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 17 of 24?!))~~

'Is Sair any less dangerous than Vantalay?' said Sentsia. 'It seems a bit premature to say that.'

Axiolis chimed in next. 'Maybe so, but we have already decided that a team must be sent to Sair, regardless of the danger. This is not the case for Vantalay. It is less a matter of risk and more a matter of necessity. To my mind, the mission in Ridgemark is unnecessary, given all we have learned today.'

Sentsia was silent a moment as everyone looked at her, waiting for her response. 'Your reasoning is sound,' she said. 'However, the Ridgemark team has been there for over two weeks now, and their last report was a rather optimistic one. It seems a shame to waste that progress.'

Zeff Elroy leaned forward in his chair. ""What 'progress' has there been, precisely?""

'They have heard rumors of the artifact in question among the locals.' Sentsia leveled her gaze toward Hector now. 'They also mentioned that the Tuning Orb of Karugetti has been lighting up more frequently.'

Hector's eyes widened a little, and he couldn't help glancing at Garovel.

The Tuning Orb Of Karugetti was one of the few objects he'd managed to snag from Himmekel, the Paradise Vault. He hadn't even known the name of it when Garovel told him to pick it up during his battle with that worm, and he might've even forgotten about it entirely if Garovel hadn't reminded him of it just prior to dispatching the two teams.

According to Garovel, the Tuning Orb of Karugetti was an item that could locate ardor-infused materials. Or something. Apparently, it was a little weird and unreliable. The whole time he'd been in possession of it, Hector had never once seen it light up like Sentsia had just said, even in the presence of the Scarf of Amordiin and the Shifting Spear of Logante that he'd given to Mr. Easton."

"2188

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 18 of 24?!))~~

He also remembered grabbing a mirror during the worm fight, but sadly, Hector had no idea what happened to it. He must've dropped it at some point in all the confusion. He didn't recall having it during the rather bumpy ""flight"" back to Warrenhold from Rathmore's Gate, so he figured that it probably hadn't even made the trip back to Atreya in the first place.

""If they are getting close to their target,"" said Horatio, ""then I would like to give the boys more time. Perhaps another week, and then we can reassess their progress. If it seems as if they have hit a wall, then I will recall them.""

Evangelina Stroud folded her arms. ""Like Mevox said, it is your decision. If you truly have faith in that silly little frat party of yours, then so be it.""

Hector remembered the Lady Stroud being one of the two most vocal opponents to sending the Blackburn triplets to Vantalay. And her stance had not been without justification, either. Those three dudes had been... an interesting bunch, to say the least.

'Well, ""faith"" may be a strong word for it,' said Sentsia, 'but if nothing else, I think this is a good opportunity for them to prove themselves. When it comes down to it, they are reliable.'

""For their own sake, let us hope so,"" said Zeff. He'd been the other opponent.

Horatio nodded. ""It's settled, then. The Ridgemark team will stay on task for one more week."" He breathed a long breath and settled deeper into his chair. ""Which means that they cannot be assigned to the Sair team.""

Grumbles of acknowledgment rolled across the conference table, and the discussion returned to exactly the same place it had been before Hector interrupted.

After a while, Hector began to have trouble keeping his eyes open. It seemed like the heads were going to keep discussing this well into the morning, if they had to.

Not having anything else to say, Hector decided to leave them to it. He wasn't about to argue with whoever they ultimately chose for the job, anyway."

"2189

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 19 of 24?!))~~
He wanted to check on Ericoros.

The problem of Leo was far less threatening than before, but Hector knew that he couldn't just move on. He'd tried to speak with Ericoros multiple times over the last three weeks, but the reaper had only recently even begun to respond to him at all.

Mainly, Hector wanted to hear Ericoros' thoughts on Leo. He wanted to know about their relationship from Ericoros' perspective. Of course, he also wanted to know more about Sai-hee, but he felt that asking the reaper about her would only serve to create more distrust, not less. Given everything Leo had told him about Ericoros' sense of loyalty to her, it seemed likely that Ericoros would not respond well if Hector ever gave off an impression that of wanting to disrupt or otherwise harm her operations.

Regardless, convincing the reaper that he could be trusted was quite a tall order. Frankly, Hector wasn't sure if it was even possible. The starting point seemed clear enough, sure: he had to get to know Ericoros better. But what came after that? What would he do if he came to conclusion that Ericoros simply couldn't be swayed? Or trusted?

That seemed like the most likely outcome, in fact. The more Hector tried to imagine himself in Ericoros' position, the more convinced he became that the reaper's plan would be to say whatever it took to get himself released and then just bail.

Which, of course, Hector could not allow. If Ericoros managed to escape, the threat thereafter was immense. No doubt, he would return to Sai-hee and tell her all about Leo and the Rainlords and Hector, and then who knows what she would do?

Hector knew how careful he had to be, which was why he only trusted a handful of people to look after Ericoros when he wasn't doing so himself. Oftentimes, the chosen person was Melchor Blackburn, and today was no different."

"2190

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 20 of 24?!))~~

Hector grabbed some late night snacks from the kitchen on the first floor, then made the trek all the way back up the Tower of Night and across one of the interconnecting nightrock bridges near the cavern ceiling. His destination the Star Tower, which could only be entered from the top floors, because the bottom half of the structure was still missing.

The restoration effort had not yet made any progress on the Star Tower, as it was the most daunting project by far. The other towers just had to be renovated and updated, but the Star Tower's foundation had to be completely rebuilt.

How the Star Tower was managing to hang there in midair like that with only its connection to the rocky ceiling to support its weight, Hector still had no idea. A part of him thought that it would collapse any day now. And why anyone would choose a room in the most unstable tower in all of Warrenhold, Hector also wasn't too sure about.

But that was exactly what Melchor had done. For whatever reason, the man known as Darktide preferred this place.

Hector had been meaning to ask him about that decision. Maybe he'd do that today, too.

From the inside, though, he supposed the Star Tower didn't feel that unstable. The stone floor felt perfectly solid under his feet, if a bit uneven due to the dangling building's slight tilt. There were large cracks in the halls as well, but the area with nightrock was of course perfectly pristine. The special material crafted by Stasya Orlov in an age long past did have the ability to regenerate itself, after all.

Melchor's chamber was within the Star Tower's large subsection of nightrock. Hector knocked on the hefty stone door, though the act was done more out of courtesy than need, since he knew that Melchor and Orric would have sensed his approach long beforehand.

""Come in, Lord Goffe,"" came Melchor's familiarly penetrating voice."
"2191

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 21 of 24?!))~~
Hector opened the door and observed the scene before him.

Melchor sat cross-legged on a large rug in the middle of the floor. Had he been meditating? Perhaps not. Ericoros was in his right hand, and Orric floated behind him.

The man's tilted bedroom was a sparse affair. A bed, a lamp, one bookshelf, and one cardboard box summed up the entirety of its furnishings. A couple pillows here, a blanket there. That was it. The man didn't have a television or even a computer, despite those implements having been made available to everyone who wanted them.

Hector wasn't even sure if Melchor had a phone. He never saw the man using one. But he must've, right? For emergencies, if nothing else.

""Welcome,"" said Melchor with a faint smile. ""We were just discussing the nature of captivity.""

Hector cocked an eyebrow. ""That so?""

""We have all had experience with it at one time or another,"" Melchor went on. ""It gives one a certain opportunity for reflection that the hustle and bustle of normal life tends to take for granted."" He looked to Ericoros. ""Wouldn't you say?""

As usual, the reaper remained silent.

""Lost for words again, hmm?"" Melchor's gaze returned to Hector. ""Apologies, my lord. He seems to grow a bit shy whenever you are around. I'm sure he doesn't mean any harm by it.""

Hector had to consciously avoid reacting to that. Melchor was probably just teasing the reaper, but that word choice had still taken Hector by surprise. Shy, huh?

Ericoros, for his part, was a bundled up form of glowing and only-vaguely skeletal energy. Whenever reapers were being held or holding onto someone themselves, their usual appearance slowly shifted and condensed into something a bit more spherical.

""You may find it difficult to believe, but Ericoros here has actually been quite talkative lately,"" Melchor went on. ""All things considered, I would say that he is taking his admittedly difficult circumstances in stride.""

"2192

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 22 of 24?!))~~

Hector closed the door behind him as he stepped into the room, not yet sure what he wanted to say--if anything.

In some ways, Melchor's attitude still surprised him. It had been weeks now, but Darktide had never really eased up with this performance of his, pretending to be subordinate to the Lord of Warrenhold.

And for the life of him, Hector wasn't sure why. At this point, Hector was confident that Melchor Blackburn was the absolute last person who needed to keep pretending. Having observed Melchor sparring with a few different people now, Hector was of the opinion that Melchor probably could fight Leo on even footing, if he really wanted to. In fact, with Melchor having access to hyper-states and Leo not, the battle might even be in Darktide's favor.

So why was he still bothering with this whole charade? Hector appreciated it, of course, since he certainly wasn't looking for a fight to break out among potential comrades, but it was hard to deny that Melchor seemed to take a certain delight in the deception being played here.

'Do you have new orders for us, Lord?' said Orric. Melchor's reaper had been quite obviously on board with it, as well.

Hector wasn't as surprised by that. Most reapers seemed to have a mischievous streak in one form or another. ""No. Just thought I would drop by.""

'Ah. Well, it is always a pleasure to see you. In fact, it's a pleasure to see just about anyone around here, sometimes. But I suspect that's why Melchor chose this place for his sleeping quarters.'

That remark piqued Hector's interest, and he regarded Melchor another time. ""You like the isolation of the Star Tower?""

Melchor bobbed his head to the side briefly. ""Oh, I don't know if it's that, exactly."" He scratched his scruffy chin. ""I've always had a soft spot for unloved things.""

"2193

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 23 of 24?!))~~

""Hmm,"" hummed Hector. ""Then does that mean you'll stop liking this place after it gets renovated?""

""Heh, perhaps,"" said Melchor. ""I guess we'll find out.""

Would we? Even if the renovation continued to proceed as smoothly as it had been over the last few weeks, Hector figured that it would probably still be a while before they reached the Star Tower.

Considering how much more work it needed done and how low of a priority it was when compared to some of the others, the Star Tower might very well be the last one to get worked on.

Would Melchor still be staying at Warrenhold by then? Would any of the Rainlords?

Those questions bothered him, but Hector didn't want to dwell on them too much. With Ericoros here, he felt like he couldn't just ask whatever he pleased. He had to choose his words carefully.

""Ericoros,"" said Hector. ""Have you spoken to Leo at all yet?""

Still, the reaper said nothing.

'Hey, now,' said Orric, sounding genuinely perturbed. 'The Lord Goffe asked you a question. Don't be rude.'

Hector held up a hand. ""It's fine."" He already knew that Leo had been trying to speak to Ericoros and that it hadn't been going anywhere. Hector would've liked to get a bit more information from the reaper's side of things, but this silent treatment was going to continue for a while longer yet, it seemed.

Certainly, Hector could understand why the reaper was reluctant to say anything to him. Hector was an unknown quantity in Ericoros' eyes. If Melchor really had managed to converse with him--and Hector wasn't entirely sure of that, either--then that was probably because Ericoros had at least heard of Darktide before.

Hector was beginning to feel like Ericoros was doing more than just silently judging him this whole time. Perhaps the reaper was waiting for him to try something. To try to torture or coerce him in some way--or maybe to use that weird ability that could compel people to talk. Obviously, Hector couldn't do the latter, but even if he could, he felt like that would seal Ericoros' opinion of him for good."

~~((The 7th Anniversary Special -- page 24 of 24?!))~~

As for Leo himself, Hector felt like the guy had been making some real progress. Thus far, Leo had been performing his new job with enthusiasm--so much so that Hector even had to tell him to relax a bit and taking things a bit slower.

That had devolved into a minor argument, with Leo seemingly questioning Hector's commitment to the homeless problem, but they'd hashed it out before it became too serious.

Another time, Leo had also grown a bit irritated when Hector asked if he had made any new friends, and Leo had taken that as an implication that Hector was already seeking to exploit said new friends.

That one hadn't turned into an argument, but it probably could have.

Certainly, Leo was not the easiest guy in the world to work with, but his heart appeared to be in the right place, at least.

Hector had to wonder if that was enough, though. According to Roman, Leo had been a victim of some type of mental manipulation, much like the people of Babbadelo and Himmekel had been.

In retrospect, that was probably no coincidence. Leo had been the guardian of that territory in the Undercrust. It made sense that Ettol--or whoever was behind it all--would've wanted to neutralize Leo before sowing the seeds of all that chaos that had unfolded down there.

Which was a whole other subject that Hector had been thinking about.

Clearly, that had been Ettol's objective. To create chaos. That made him sound like an agent of Abolish, but the way he'd gone about it didn't seem like their typical method of operation. And the presence of Malast had obviously been an enormous factor, too. Had Ettol caused that whole mess in hopes of leading someone--anyone--to the God of Boredom?

Garovel seemed to think so, though the reaper also believed that the so-called Supreme Will also played a role in things, as well."

And now there were these Sparrows who could manipulate minds as well. Were they in some way related to Ettol? Hector intended to ask Hanton Gaolanet about that the next time they spoke, but he had a feeling that even if the Sparrow did know something, he wouldn't be inclined to reveal it.

The notion that the Sparrows might be able to assist with this whole Leo situation had crossed Hector's mind, but he didn't much care for the multitude of different ways in which he could imagine that going horribly wrong. And while it was certainly tempting, thinking that Hanton might be able to just fix everything for him with a simple 'mind tweak' or whatever, it also seemed... like a pretty fucked up thing to do to someone, regardless of the reasoning behind it.

'Lord Goffe.'

Hector's eyes perked up. He hadn't allowed himself to become so lost in thought that he stopped paying attention to those in front of him, but a protracted silence had drawn out while he considered what else he might be able to say or do here tonight.

All such concerns were shoved to the back of his mind, however, when he heard Ericoros address him for the very first time since they'd met.

'I do have one question,' the captive reaper said.

""I'm listening,"" said Hector.

'What is the overall objective of this little empire of yours?' said Ericoros.

And there arrived more silence, heavier than before as Hector thought about his response carefully. His ""little empire,"" huh? Why was Ericoros asking about that kind of thing now? It was a bit late, wasn't it? Three weeks of cold, silent observance--and now this?

Well, whatever. Hector had pondered that question for himself many times, already. Maybe he hadn't fully articulated it to anyone else yet, but he didn't think it was that difficult to answer.

""It's pretty simple,"" said Hector. ""The protection of civilians and the preservation of knowledge.""

"2196

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Again, Ericoros said nothing.

Hector waited for him, though. Surely, the reaper had something to say in response, right? He must've just been taking some time to think.

...Right?

No. The answer to that was no.

Hector could see why Leo had warned him about Ericoros being difficult to deal with.

Orric, however, decided to chime in now. 'Ericoros, do you have a request that you would like to make of Lord Goffe?'

Hmm?

Still, though, Ericoros remained silent.

Hector was abruptly uncertain. A request? He looked between Melchor and Orric, hoping for an explanation.

'C'mon, now,' Orric prodded. 'Isn't there something about all this news of war that has been bothering you?'

Hector had to ask. ""What are you talking about?""

'Apologies, Lord,' said Orric. 'I didn't intend to keep this from you for so long, but everything just worked out so beautifully that I wanted to enjoy the simple secrecy of it for a bit.'

'You really never told him?' said Ericoros.

'Of course not. Why would I lie about something like that?'

'Hmph.'

Hector was lost, but he remained patient.

'The truth is,' said Orric, 'Ericoros and I happen to be very old acquaintances.'

Hector blinked. ""Is that right?""

Orric returned a nod. 'That is one of the reasons why Melchor and I have been so happy to look after him for you all this time. We had a lot of catching up to do.'

""To be clear,"" added Melchor, ""I had never met Ericoros before. These two knew each other from a thousand years ago and hadn't spoken since.""

'More like two thousand,' said Orric.

""Why were you keeping that a secret?"" said Hector.

'To manipulate me, I suspect,' said Ericoros. 'To try to use our old friendship as a means of gaining my trust.'

'Ah, so you DO admit that we were once friends, then?'

Ericoros just growled."

"2197

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'I wasn't trying to manipulate you,' said Orric. 'If anything, it's rather bold of you to assume that supposed manipulation would be enough to make me trust you.'

'What?' said Ericoros.

'We're at an impasse, old friend.' Orric shook his skeletal head. 'As things currently stand, I honestly don't know if there is a way forward from here. We Rainlords are an untrusting bunch by nature--and lately, even more so.'

'Hmph. What is your point?'

'My point, old friend, is that this stalemate is not going to change anytime soon, so there's no harm in making your request of Lord Goffe. The worst he can say is no.'

Hector would not be distracted, however. ""Before that, Orric, answer my question. Why did you keep your past relationship with Ericoros a secret.""

'Ah...' Orric's hollow gaze lingered on Hector for a moment, then glanced back toward the other reaper. 'As I mentioned, it was not my intention to hide it from you for so long. But perhaps I was afraid that you would no longer allow me to speak to Ericoros, if you knew.'

Hector made no reaction. He could see that Ericoros was watching him again, so after another intermission of silence, Hector simply said, ""Ask.""

The reaper took his time. '...There is a certain place in Vantalay that I am concerned about. A village called Miro.'

Vantalay? That was obviously no coincidence.

Hector wasn't surprised that Ericoros had caught wind of their missions abroad. No doubt, there was plenty of loose talk about them going on all over Warrenhold, and in order to keep that secret from Ericoros, Hector would've had to imprison the reaper completely, which he didn't want to do.

It was a bit of a risk, of course, but the whole point of this difficult situation was to build a rapport with the reaper, to let Ericoros see exactly the kind of people that Leo was getting involved with. And imprisoning him wouldn't accomplish that."

"2198

'I know that asking you to protect Miro would probably be overreaching,' said Ericoros, 'but if you could at least send someone to check on it, I would be grateful.'

""...What is this place to you, exactly?"" said Hector.

'It is where Leo grew up. And where he and I met.'

""I thought Leo was born in Kahm,"" said Hector. Roman had mentioned Leo telling him that. It was a small detail, but one that Hector had wanted to remember since it seemed like something that could end up becoming important.

'Yes,' said Ericoros. 'He was born there, but he spent much of his young and adolescent life in Vantalay. He and I both grew to love Miro during our time there. No doubt, it has changed considerably since then, but I would see it kept safe during this war, if possible.'

Hmm. That was a new detail. ""So you've been with Leo since he was a teenager?""

'That's right.'

It was somehow difficult to imagine. After constantly being made aware of how bad their relationship was, how Ericoros would release Leo's soul as soon as he had the chance, Hector had trouble picturing their relationship in different, happier circumstances. How much had the passage of time compounded their problems with one another?

Could that happen to Garovel and him?

Hector didn't even want to think about it. But then, perhaps not thinking about it... would be what allowed it to come to pass. He needed to be attentive, didn't he? Even for things like this. No, especially for things like this.

""...How long ago was this?"" asked Hector.

And Ericoros hesitated.

Understandably so. It was a more important question than it perhaps seemed, Hector knew. He'd essentially just asked for Leo's age as a servant. Hector wondered if Ericoros would tell him the truth--or anything at all, for that matter.

But at length, Ericoros finally said, 'It was 223 years ago.'
"2199

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

It was useful intel on Leo, to be sure, but that wasn't really why Hector had asked. ""And you're still attached to this place after 223 years?"" said Hector.

'...Yes,' was all Ericoros said.

Hmm. He had to be careful how he responded here. ""Why is your affection for Miro so strong?""

'I told you, already. It is where Leo grew up.'

""That's not good enough,"" said Hector calmly. ""Convince me that you're not trying to make me send my people into a trap.""

'A trap? How would I...?' Ericoros drifted off, perhaps realizing on his own.

Hector waited in silence. It was true that the team in Vantalay could probably check on this village easily enough, but what if it was a key location for Sai-hee's forces? What if the Blackburn Triplets ended up being taken hostage and tortured for information? What if they revealed Ericoros' whereabouts?

Admittedly, it was an extreme hypothetical scenario, but Hector didn't want to underestimate Ericoros' capacity for cunning.

'Well,' the reaper finally said, 'you can ask Leo if I'm telling the truth or not. He won't lie to you.'

Hector had his doubts about that as well, but he kept them to himself. ""I'm asking you,"" he said. ""I do sympathize, but 223 years is quite a long time to hold on to feelings of affection for a place. I'm sure you've lived elsewhere over the years, no? Why not ask me to send people to any of those places? What makes Miro so special?""

Ericoros gave an inaudible sigh. 'I see you have the paranoia of an older servant, as well...'

Hmm? Oh.

Hector kept his poker face, though he could see Melchor cracking a smile.

'If you must know,' said Ericoros, 'Miro was a village that suffered numerous tragedies during our stay there. A flood, a plague, constant attacks from cannibals. Our trials there forged a bond with the villagers that we shall never be able to forget.'

Stone-faced, Hector still had to blink a couple times. ""...Cannibals?""
"2200 -- CCXVII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'That's right,' said Ericoros. 'A string of unrelated misfortunes led to the further misfortune of a famine. And a famine led to cannibals.'

"I see," said Hector. He remembered Garovel telling him a similar story regarding a now-extinct Hahl of Sandlords in Sair. The notion of eating human flesh was certainly repulsive, but at least servants could regrow body parts. In that respect, he could imagine a moral argument for resource efficiency being made.

He doubted that was the kind of cannibalism that Ericoros was referring to, though.

'Though the friends we made there are gone,' Ericoros continued, 'their descendants remain. Our last visit was more than thirty years ago now, so there may not be many there who remember Leo personally, but the stories about his deeds have survived from generation to generation.'

Hector supposed that he would just have to ask Leo about this story. If Ericoros really was lying, though, then he didn't think it would be so easy to prove it.

'Please, Lord Goffe. Please send your team to check on Miro for me. I would like to know that it is safe.'

Hmm. And what if it wasn't safe?

"...I'll think about it," said Hector.

'Thank you.'

Chapter Two Hundred Seventeen: 'Thy confounding colloquy...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

What an absolutely insane day it had been. Lynnette still hadn't really processed it all. Honestly, she was ready to retire to her guest room and plop down on the wonderful bed she'd been sleeping in the past few nights, but the King was still chatting it up with the Rainlords like there was no tomorrow. Perhaps he was trying to make up for lost time, due to that big debate they all had earlier.

Telepathic birds and a second Continental War. The world was much stranger than it was yesterday.

She'd spoken to the Queen earlier over the phone, but only briefly. No doubt, Her Highness was having a hell of a day, herself. The woman had told Lynnette that information was still coming in but that Atreya would be pursuing a plan of neutrality for the time being--and that she should remain vigilant in her role as the King's bodyguard.

Lynnette didn't think she would be getting to that bed for a while yet."
"2200 -- CCXVII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'That's right,' said Ericoros. 'A string of unrelated misfortunes led to the further misfortune of a famine. And a famine led to cannibals.'

""I see,"" said Hector. He remembered Garovel telling him a similar story regarding a now-extinct Hahl of Sandlords in Sair. The notion of eating human flesh was certainly repulsive, but at least servants could regrow body parts. In that respect, he could imagine a moral argument for resource efficiency being made.

He doubted that was the kind of cannibalism that Ericoros was referring to, though.

'Though the friends we made there are gone,' Ericoros continued, 'their descendants remain. Our last visit was more than thirty years ago now, so there may not be many there who remember Leo personally, but the stories about his deeds have survived from generation to generation.'

Hector supposed that he would just have to ask Leo about this story. If Ericoros really was lying, though, then he didn't think it would be so easy to prove it.

'Please, Lord Goffe. Please send your team to check on Miro for me. I would like to know that it is safe.'

Hmm. And what if it wasn't safe?

""...I'll think about it,"" said Hector.

'Thank you.'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

What an absolutely insane day it had been. Lynnette still hadn't really processed it all. Honestly, she was ready to retire to her guest room and plop down on the wonderful bed she'd been sleeping in the past few nights, but the King was still chatting it up with the Rainlords like there was no tomorrow. Perhaps he was trying to make up for lost time, due to that big debate they all had earlier.

Telepathic birds and a second Continental War. The world was much stranger than it was yesterday.

She'd spoken to the Queen earlier over the phone, but only briefly. No doubt, Her Highness was having a hell of a day, herself. The woman had told Lynnette that information was still coming in but that Atreya would be pursuing a plan of neutrality for the time being--and that she should remain vigilant in her role as the King's bodyguard.

Lynnette didn't think she would be getting to that bed for a while yet."
"2201

""Um, hi there,"" came an unfamiliar voice, making Lynnette turn to see a blond woman standing there.

""Hello...?"" Lynnette felt like she recognized her, but she couldn't put a name to her face.

""I'm Madison."" She extended a dainty hand. ""Madison Reach.""

Lynnette blinked. The movie star? Sweet Cocora, it was her!

""Hehe. You've heard of me, I take it?""

Uncertain, Lynnette managed to nod and shake Madison's hand.

""Whew, that's a relief! I was starting to get a little self-conscious, you know. You wouldn't believe how many of these Rainlords have no idea who I am! The nerve, am I right?""

Lynnette had no idea what to say. What the hell was this woman doing in Warrenhold of all places?

""Oh, um, I'm not bothering you, am I?"" said Madison with sudden puppy dog eyes.

""Ah--no, you're not,"" said Lynnette stiffly.

""Whew, good. You're a little intimidating, you know that? Not as intimidating as some of these other folks around here, but you're up there. A few months ago, I probably would've been too scared to talk to someone like you.""

Lynnette just kind of nodded again. What the hell was happening, right now? She glanced over at the King, who was still happily conversing with that one red-haired Rainlord who talked a lot.

Madison just kept going. ""Honestly, I think it's my boyfriend's influence. I mean, yeah, I've always been what you might call a social butterfly, but thanks to him, I feel like I've ascended to a new level of butterfly-ing. He's a real introvert. And kinda scary. But like, in a hot way, y'know? Anyway, talking to him has given me some insight into people who are the strong, silent type. Before, I would just, kind of... avoid you guys. But now I see how wrong that was! You guys are great! I bet we could be good friends!""

Lynnette wondered if this was what Hector felt like all the time."
"2202

Another voice arrived, this one more immediately familiar. ""Madison, are you cornering my friend over here?""

Lynnette turned and saw Gina approaching now.

""I have no idea what you're talking about,"" said Madison with that movie star smile of hers.

""Uh-huh,"" said Gina. ""Listen, Lynnette is no one to mess around with. This is the White Sword of Atreya you're talking to.""

""Yeah, I know,"" said Madison. ""I've heard the Rainlords talking about her. And it's pretty obvious that she's the bodyguard for Mr. Kingy over there.""

Lynnette had to pick her up on that. ""That's His Majesty King William, to you,"" she said.

""Ooh, excuse me,"" said Madison. ""That's a bit of a mouthful, though, don't you think?""

Lynnette just glowered with her one eye.

""Okay, okay,"" giggled Madison. She took a step back and put up her hands in apologetic defense.

""I told you you shouldn't mess with her,"" said Gina. She came over to stand next to Lynnette and purposely bumped into her. It was a friendly gesture, of course, lacking in power, but Lynnette hardly budged at all, while Gina practically bounced off of her. ""Holy crud. Have you put on some extra muscle?""

""...A little,"" said Lynnette. She'd been regimenting her nutrition and exercise more strictly, lately. She didn't have much free time to spare on full-blown bodybuilding, nor did she want to take it that far, but she was pleased with her modest results.

Gina took the liberty of feeling up her arm and torso. ""Damn, that white cape of yours hides it well, but you're built like a brick under there, aren't you?""

""It's a cloak, not a cape."" And Lynnette frowned and furrowed her brow. ""And I am not shaped like a brick, thank you very much. It's not my fault that you have the body mass of a twig."

"Okay, wow--I meant, like, a brick in terms of the solidness of your muscles, not in the shape of your body. Geez. No need to get personal. I'm sensitive about being so tiny, I'll have you know."

"2203

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

"Oh, is that right?" said Lynnette, and she returned the favor by giving Gina's upper arm a quick squeeze. "Hmm."

Gina didn't back away. "Don't say a word. I already know."

"I wasn't going to say anything."

"Then don't think anything, either."

Lynnette just laughed. It was true that compared to her, Gina really was just skin and bones. "Are you sure you're getting enough to eat?"

"I've always been a light eater," said Gina. "It's hard to make myself eat more. I don't like feeling too full."

"Mm," hummed Madison, who had wandered closer again to help with the apparent body inspections, "sounds like a pretty good problem to have."

"Yeah," Lynnette agreed, "I wouldn't say that out loud too often, if I were you. You're liable to make your fellow women resent you."

"I--ah... hmm."

Madison held an index finger up to her own chin while she poked and prodded Gina's face and neck. "If you exercised more, I bet you'd build an appetite faster."

Gina groaned. "I hate exercising..."

"That's the wrong mindset," said Lynnette. "There are lots of different types of exercise. I'm sure you could find something you enjoy."

""And when you start seeing results, you'll enjoy it even more,"" added Madison, still prodding.

Gina finally batted Madison's hand away. ""Agh, you're both into fitness?""

Madison gave a light shrug. ""Well, I haven't had much else to do lately, so..."

That was something Lynnette wanted to know more about. ""Why are you here, by the way?""

""Oh, that's a long story,"" said Madison, ""but, um, well--""

And with Gina's approval and occasional assistance, Madison explained her unique circumstances. She was in hiding from something called ""Andalero""--a mysterious group of highly influential people whom she had apparently pissed off badly enough to want her dead. Roman had rescued her in Steccat and brought her here to Atreya--and ultimately, to Warrenhold."

"2204

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Lynnette found all of that rather hard to believe, but then again, after a few more moments of thinking about it, she supposed that sounded exactly like something Roman Fullister would get mixed up in. He often played things off like they were unintended, like he had never planned to do anything crazy, but by now, Lynnette knew better. This was the same man who snuck into Belgrant Castle dressed as a guardsman and jumped into the middle of a fight with Abolish.

Which was to say nothing of the time that she and the Queen had spent with him in Korgum, searching for military aid. Looking back, it seemed insane to her now that she had gone into that war zone as a normal human person, without the enhancements that were now afforded to her by the aberration gauntlet on her arm.

Oh, how little she'd understood, back then.

""So you still have no clue why the Andalero group was trying to kill you?"" said Gina.

""Not at all,"" said Madison.

Gina made a doubtful face. ""You sure about that?""

Madison tilted her head. ""Uh. Yeah. Why? You think I'm lying?""

""No,"" Gina laughed, ""but I was thinking that, maybe, you'd talked to a certain tall Rainlord about it and learned something.""

""Oh. Well, yeah, I told Dimas about it, but he didn't say anything. Should he have?""

Gina shrugged. ""I don't know, but... how long ago did you tell him?""

""A few weeks ago now. Like as soon as we started dating.""

""Maybe you should remind him,"" said Gina.

Madison squinted. ""Why? Gina, are you trying to imply something here?""

""Mm, kinda. It's just a hunch, though. Andalero wanted you dead for overhearing them talk about something, right?""

""Yeah. Some kind of ""black song"" in a place called Ridgemark. I think it was a code for a meeting or something that was supposed to happen there, but beyond that, I have no idea.""

""Ridgemark is a city in Vantalay,"" said Gina. ""And Vantalay is one of the five countries that just started the Second Continental War.""

Madison's face paled a little."

"2205

""Now, that might just be a coincidence,"" said Gina, ""but if I were to think up some reasons why someone might've been trying really hard to assassinate you after overhearing something so seemingly benign... well, a planned war doesn't seem outside the realm of possibility.""

Madison's eyes hollowed, and her mind seemed to be elsewhere.

Lynnette was growing more confused by the minute. This famous actress was involved in the war?

""I've been trying to look into Andalero, too,"" said Gina, ""but the internet is only so useful. It might be better to ask Lord Dimas about it. I'm not so good at in-the-field investigations, but if anything, the Rainlords seem to prefer that."

Madison regained herself and eyed the various Rainlords around the Grand Hall. "'You might be right,'" she said. Then her gaze settled back on Gina. "'But why are you asking me to talk to Dimas? You seem pretty close with the head honcho, yourself. Why don't you just ask him?'"

Gina tilted her head. "'The head honcho?'"

"'Yeah,'" said Madison. "'Don't act like I'm more influential around here than you are. I've seen you talking to him a bunch of times.'" She glanced at Lynnette as well. "'You, too, actually.'"

Lynnette tried to think. "'Are you referring to the King?'"

"'What? No. I... though, well, I guess he would work, too, if you wanted to talk to him. I was talking about Lord Goffe.'"

Lynnette watched Gina's mouth open, then close again.

"'You two seem way closer to him than I am,'" said Madison.

Lynnette and Gina exchanged looks with one another. Somehow, they both wore knowing expressions on their faces that were simultaneously mixed with utter uncertainty. In that silent moment between them, it felt like a thousand words were exchanged.

"'Ah...'" tried Gina.

What was she going to say? Lynnette had no clue.

Gina scratched her cheek. "'I... I guess you have a point.'"

"2206

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

"'Yeah, I know I do,'" said Madison, like she was saying the most obvious thing in the world and didn't understand why they needed it explained to them.

Staying here over the last few days, meeting all these Rainlords, and seeing how they all treated Hector--it hadn't escaped Lynette's notice what was going on. Roman and Gina had provided a bit more context and detail to her in private, but by that point, she wasn't terribly shocked by it all.

Hector was not the same person she'd left in Sair a few months ago. She'd heard about some of his exploits, though even now, she wasn't sure how much she believed, and it seemed almost rude to ask him about it directly, especially with so many people and reapers around who could overhear.

She was under the impression now that the so-called Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold was in a bit of a difficult position. He was obviously being very careful in how he spoke and how he presented himself. He dressed more sharply and was often followed around by that Rainlord bodyguard of his.

Which was to say nothing of this whole banking situation. It wasn't just the Rainlords putting mountains of pressure on him, Lynnette knew. The people of Atreya and their economic crisis were arguably even worse, in that regard.

It was hard not to worry about him. At a glance, he seemed to be handling everything pretty well, but he'd never been one to wear his emotions on his sleeve. And within the last year, he'd skyrocketed to perhaps the second most famous person in the country. She didn't envy his position politically, right now--and she was certain that many other people did.

Gina seemed somewhat lost for words, so Lynnette picked up the conversational slack.

""Well, how about we agree to talk to Hector about it, and you agree to talk to Lord Dimas?"" she said."

"2207 -- CCXVIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Madison smirked. ""Ooh, you call him Hector, huh? I guess you really are close, then, aren't you?""

Lynnette gave a small shrug. ""We've been through a lot together. He wouldn't want me to start addressing him as 'lord' anything.""

""Hmm,"" mused Madison. ""In that case, should I start calling him Hector, too?""

Lynnette and Gina exchanged looks again.

""I'm sure he wouldn't mind it,"" said Lynnette, ""but I get the impression that the Rainlords probably would. And you're more concerned about not pissing them off, aren't you?""

""Ah..."" Madison lost a bit of her enthusiasm. ""Good point...""

Chapter Two Hundred Eighteen: 'The incendiaries of the dark stream...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul Blackburn was enjoying himself, as were his two brothers. They'd never even left Sair before, but in these last few months, their whole lives had changed.

Not entirely for the better, of course, but such things were inevitable.

The Blackburn Triplets had learned years ago from Cousin Ibai that one's outlook on life could make even the worst situation much more bearable. And similarly, they'd learned from Cousin Melchor that honoring their ancestors and their kin didn't mean that they had to display their sorrow and determination to the entire world.

It was enough to keep those things in their hearts.

They knew their mission. They knew the importance of it. The last thing they wanted was to neglect their task and let everyone down.

But that didn't mean they had to be all uptight and stuffy about it, either. Ridgemark was a remarkable place, and Vantalay, a remarkable country. Seeing the sights and taking in the local culture were valuable experiences, too--and part of their intelligence-gathering mission.

Just because they were spending much of their time gambling, shopping, talking to fine ladies, and sampling extravagant cuisine didn't mean that they weren't still on task."

"2207 -- CCXVIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Madison smirked. ""Ooh, you call him Hector, huh? I guess you really are close, then, aren't you?""

Lynnette gave a small shrug. ""We've been through a lot together. He wouldn't want me to start addressing him as 'lord' anything.""

""Hmm,"" mused Madison. ""In that case, should I start calling him Hector, too?""

Lynnette and Gina exchanged looks again.

""I'm sure he wouldn't mind it,"" said Lynnette, ""but I get the impression that the Rainlords probably would. And you're more concerned about not pissing them off, aren't you?""

""Ah..."" Madison lost a bit of her enthusiasm. ""Good point...""

Chapter Two Hundred Eighteen: 'The incendiaries of the dark stream...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul Blackburn was enjoying himself, as were his two brothers. They'd never even left Sair before, but in these last few months, their whole lives had changed.

Not entirely for the better, of course, but such things were inevitable.

The Blackburn Triplets had learned years ago from Cousin Ibai that one's outlook on life could make even the worst situation much more bearable. And similarly, they'd learned from Cousin Melchor that honoring their ancestors and their kin didn't mean that they had to display their sorrow and determination to the entire world.

It was enough to keep those things in their hearts.

They knew their mission. They knew the importance of it. The last thing they wanted was to neglect their task and let everyone down.

But that didn't mean they had to be all uptight and stuffy about it, either. Ridgemark was a remarkable place, and Vantalay, a remarkable country. Seeing the sights and taking in the local culture were valuable experiences, too--and part of their intelligence-gathering mission.

Just because they were spending much of their time gambling, shopping, talking to fine ladies, and sampling extravagant cuisine didn't mean that they weren't still on task."

"2208

The seaside city of Ridgemark was a veritable metropolis of luxury. In many ways, it reminded Raul of Rheinhal, only much larger and with an oceanside view.

But then again, from what he'd heard, Rheinhal might well have been leveled by Sanko since his last visit, so perhaps that comparison wasn't even remotely accurate, anymore.

It was a bitter thought, that.

He knew that his family was partly to blame for the loss of Rheinhal. If they hadn't kidnapped the Elroy children and thereby divided the Rainlords' forces, that battle might have gone quite differently--especially if House Blackburn had joined the fight, as well.

It was a shame upon his family.

One that he and his brothers hoped to somehow rectify.

If they could discover more about the Vanguard's operations, if they could locate their captured brethren--the Houses Redwater, Garza, Merlo, Stroud, and Zabat--surely, then, their honor could be redeemed.

Surely, then, the Rainlords of Sair might truly be united as one again.

They just needed information.

And if anything, Ridgemark seemed like the place to find it. The city was absolutely awash with people from all over the world. Even the news of war seemed to have hardly put a dent in the city's feverish energy. If he hadn't been stationed here a couple weeks before the news arrived, he might not have even thought anything had changed.

But there were differences, to be sure. They were simply quieter, probably too subtle for the average tourist to notice. A few more guards here. Some back alley meetings there.

And the reapers. They were everywhere.

Without a doubt, there was a major force of servants operating somewhere in this city. Raul, Adan, and Esai had begun the arduous task of trying to identify as many servants as they possibly could--without being noticed, of course. Remaining hidden among the crowds was far more important than gaining intel on random enemies. In hindsight, it had certainly been the correct decision to leave their own reapers behind."

"2209

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Surprisingly and frustratingly, it had thus far proven rather difficult to confirm which side all the servants in the city belonged to. Whoever they were, they were keeping a low profile while their reapers scoured the city.

That information alone, however, suggested that it probably wasn't Abolish, as they had a tendency to be rather loud and obnoxious wherever they went, but that was no guarantee. Raul had heard of certain Abolish sects with more self-control than the typical rabble.

But then again, given Ridgemark's reputation as a land of debauched excess, self-control seemed like a thing unlikely to be found here. Indeed, the triplets' strategy was to not employ that very much at all.

Mid-morning, Raul found his brother Adan sitting at yet another slot machine, chatting happily away with the rather buxom brunette in a sequined dress who was sitting at the adjacent machine.

The woman did a double take when she noticed Raul approaching, which made Adan turn to look at him.

""Hey! Mornin', bro. Sleep well?"" Adan's bright smile had charmed many a woman over these last few weeks.

But of course, Raul had the same smile, himself. ""Oh, yeah, man. Like a log."" He slapped his hand down on his brother's shoulder and turned his attention to the woman next to him. ""And who is this gorgeous creature you're talking to? Introduce me, bro!""

""Bro, no way. I found her first.""

Raul ignored him and put his hand forward. ""I'm Raul. Great to meet'cha.""

She still seemed a little awestruck by the sight of them both there, but after a moment, she smiled and shook his hand. ""I'm Carla.""

""Ooh, are you Intarian?"" said Raul.

""You could tell?"" she said.

His smile widened. ""An educated guess, based on your name and that beautiful complexion of yours.""

That earned a dainty blush from her.

Adan stood up and wrapped his arm around Raul's shoulder, still all smiles as usual, though. ""So what brings you here, bro? Anything I can help with?""

"2210

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Ah, yeah,"" said Raul, ""the reason I was looking for you was because I thought we could get breakfast together--and maybe have some bro talk.""

""Oh! Bro talk?""

""Bro talk.""

""Hmm. Yeah. It has been a while since our last bro talk, hasn't it?""

""Yep.""

Adan's easy smile didn't change, but Raul knew that look in his green eyes. He understood. Of course he did. They all knew what bro talk meant.

Raul had received new orders late last night from his reaper all the way back in Atraya. No doubt, Adan and Esai had received the same orders from their own reapers as well, but they had yet to discuss them among one another.

With so many reapers about--and potentially hostile servants--they had to be careful with what they said aloud. Thankfully, it was no difficult adaptation for the Blackburn Triplets to speak in code. They'd been doing it in various forms ever since they were little boys terrorizing Marshrock together.

Adan turned to Carla, his smile having become abruptly more apologetic. ""I'm sorry, darling, but my less handsome brother here is right. Bro talk is a sacred tradition in our family. I'm afraid our lovely conversation will have to end here.""

Carla looked bewildered, yet also somewhat amused. ""I see...""

Raul wasn't about to let that jab slide, however. ""Bro, we have the same face. No matter how you slice it, we're equally handsome.""

Adan shook his head. ""Bro, bro, bro... truly spoken like the youngest and most naive of us. Handsomeness is about more than just the structure of your face, my dude. It's also about how you carry yourself. It's about having a deeper, inner dignity and projecting that outwardly in everything that you do.""

""And do you suppose that your 'deeper, inner dignity' is negatively affected by all the bollocks you talk?"" said Raul.

""I sure hope not,"" said Adan."

"2211

Carla's machine interrupted their conversation, lighting up and playing triumphant music. She'd barely even been paying attention to the thing, but she'd just won big, it seemed. Not the jackpot, perhaps, but certainly still cause for celebration. The excitement on her face was obvious, and the brothers were eager to congratulate her--though Adan's expression was noticeably relieved, probably because he'd been momentarily worried that she actually had scored the jackpot just now.

Adan was probably the least proficient gambler of the Triplets, despite spending the most time in the casino. He preferred the slots over things like blackjack or video poker, since he didn't have to concern himself with odds or strategy, and that disposition of his lent itself well to the task of information gathering. He could just plop down next to someone and start chatting them up without having to focus on the game he was playing.

Raul did notice, however, that Adan had been favoring this particular group of machines, lately. When he'd asked why, Adan had told him that the jackpot had caught his eye.

And indeed, the Revenant cruiser sitting on a glass-encased platform in the middle of all the slot machines was hard to miss. It was a handsome motorcycle, the latest model according to the information sticker on the side, but Raul knew that wasn't why Adan was interested in it. They'd all heard that rumor a while back about the Lord Goffe's affection for motorcycles. No doubt, Adan was hoping to win it and gift it to him in order to earn the Lord of Warrenhold's favor.

Thus far, none of the Triplets had had much interaction with the guy, but if they performed well on this mission, then who knows? Perhaps that would change. Earning reputation among their Rainlord brethren was important, too, of course, but right now, the real prestige came from working with the man who'd saved everyone not once, but twice. The mysterious hero of both Dunehall and Capaporo."

"2212

Among the Rainlords, rumors about Lord Goffe only seemed to be growing, and honestly, Raul had a hard time believing a lot of them. Apparently, he'd slain a fifty foot worm single-handedly and won the loyalty of the Bull Leech.

They hadn't known the man's moniker before that disastrous fight in Capaporo went down, but they certainly knew it now. That was one of the first things that the Rainlords had done upon arriving at Warrenhold: find out who the hell Leo was. According to the intel Raul had heard on the subject, the nickname was a result of Leo's reputation for incredible stubbornness and parasitism.

Not the most comforting bit of information Raul had ever heard.

But if Lord Goffe had truly managed to acquire the aid of someone like that... well...

Raul wasn't the only one impressed, that was for sure.

Carla's sudden winnings must have reordered her priorities, because she soon excused herself to go cash out. Adan tried to get her number before she left, but she turned him down.

Adan's shoulders slumped a little as they picked their way through the crowded casino floor. ""Damn, dude, I really thought she was into me.""

""You came on too strong, bro. It's good to go after what you want, but sometimes, you've gotta just leave things to fate. Now, even if you're lucky enough to run into her again, you've probably ruined your chances.""

""Hmph.""

""If you'd played it cooler, like me, you could've at least maintained an air of maturity and mystery.""

""Yeah, yeah...""

They didn't need to discuss their next destination. They both knew where they would find Esai. Being keenly aware of one another's whereabouts at all times was critical to the mission, and they would always text each other first if they were venturing somewhere else solo. Sticking together didn't really help them blend in so well, but caution was often warranted in this place."

"2213

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

When he was on his own, Esai was almost always at the pool. Supposedly, it was because he loved swimming so much, but they all knew the real reason.

Not that Raul could blame him. It was a beautiful day outside, and beautiful days attracted beautiful women.

Ridgemark was a far cry from the perpetually cloudy skies of Luzo, to be sure. In his twenty-four years of life, rarely had Raul Blackburn even seen bikini-clad women in person like this.

He liked the view so much that, somehow, his feelings almost looped back around to disliking it. Was this really part of the mission?

Eh, of course it was.

Blending in was a vital part of gathering information. En route to Esai, Raul recognized a few gorgeous faces and had to stop and say hello. Adan didn't seem to mind.

Eventually, however, he and Adan did make their way over to Esai and pulled him away from the pool. Together, the three went to have breakfast in one of the casino's several restaurants. They ate well, as usual. Their funds for this mission had been rather generous. Sentsia told them to spare no expense and do whatever it took to get the job done. She was the one who made it clear to Raul how important this mission and the future ones like it would be toward the goal of reclaiming House Blackburn's lost honor.

Something had changed about that reaper, Raul thought.

But she wasn't the only one.

After all they'd been through, the whole House was in a strange mindset, right now. A feeling of quiet danger permeated everything, a feeling like standing at the precipice of a cliff. They could fall. They could jump. They could flee. They could fly. What would it be?

""So,"" Esai was saying with a mouthful of blueberry pancakes, ""either of you guys managed to bag any hot babes, lately?""

In this instance, a ""hot babe"" was part of their code. Esai was asking if they'd found any new leads on the artifact that they were searching for."

"2214

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Not me,"" said Adan, leaning back in his seat. ""Been rejected more times than I can count, bro. I did meet a few uggos, though. More than a few, actually.""

""Bro, that's pretty rude,"" said Raul. ""All women are beautiful.""

""Yeah, yeah. You know what I mean, though.""

In fact, he did. Adan was talking about servants now, not just women specifically. He must've clocked a few more of them since yesterday. Oftentimes, servants were difficult to identify, but there were a few telltale signs here and there. Most obviously, the reapers. They tended to spend the most time around their servants, so if you just kept an eye on them, the servant could eventually be deduced via process of elimination.

Some reapers were smarter about that than others, though, so it was no guarantee. The Triplets' own reapers had warned them about that tactic. If a reaper suspected they were being observed by their enemies, they could deliberately hang around a normal person in order to throw off any spies.

Which was what they were now, Raul knew. Spies.

""Hmm."" He took a sip of his orange juice. ""Maybe we should try searching for some small town honeys, instead.""

""Oh, bro, I would be so down for that,"" said Adan. ""A nice, wholesome girl might be just what my wounded heart needs, right now.""

Esai chuckled. ""Maybe you could take her back to meet Ma.""

""That's the dream,"" said Adan.

""Sounds like a plan, then,"" said Raul.

That was confirmation, as expected. They'd all received orders to check out the town of Miro. Their objectives were merely to observe the place and report back on the status of the town, but Miro wasn't all that far from Ridgemark. It was possible that they might find clues about this mysterious artifact there."

"2215

Now that the decision was made, there was no point in wasting time. They wolfed down the rest of their breakfast and headed out immediately. Raul had plugged Miro's location into his phone last night, and they could go straight there in the cherry red sedan they were renting.

With any luck, they would be back in Ridgemark before nightfall. That was where the really good intel probably was. As much as he was enjoying his time in the lap of luxury, he was also beginning to feel a little impatient. They'd been in Vantalay for two weeks now, and yet they hadn't even been able to confirm if all those reapers haunting Ridgemark were with the Vanguard.

And that was more important to Raul than some magical artifact of dubious existence. He might've been more excited about that part of the mission if they knew what the damn thing was capable of--or even a physical description of it for that matter--but all they had to go on was a name.

The Sword of Unso.

Oh, and supposedly, it could be found in ""a sunken cave near the two-toned rock.""

That little detail had somehow proved even less helpful than it sounded. Prior to their arrival in Ridgemark, the Triplets hadn't even been sure what a two-toned rock was, but now they knew. Oh, boy, did they know.

Half the bloody rocks in this region were of two colors. Because they'd been painted. It was a cultural thing. The locals did it to honor the ""eternal dichotomy of Order and Chaos."" That was a big aspect of one of the religions around here, apparently.

Thankfully, the locals at least didn't bother to paint every tiny pebble in the country. It was only for sufficiently large boulders, at least the size of a grown man. And yes, they even painted those underwater. The diving industry here was booming, thanks to all the casinos and tourism."

"2216

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 1 of 10))~~

Esai had gone diving in search of the ""sunken cave"" several times over the last two weeks, but he'd all but given up on it by now, because he'd simply found too many. There was an enormous network of underwater caverns up and down the coast. Esai seemed to think that many of them were manmade, though he wasn't sure what their intended purpose had been.

Theoretically, the Tuning Orb of Karugetti should have been immensely useful here, but that damn thing only ever seemed to work whenever it felt like working. That, and they still weren't even sure what the different colors meant. Sometimes the little orb between the two metal prongs would glow blue, sometimes red, sometimes green, sometimes nothing. If only it had come with an instruction manual.

One time, however, the Tuning Orb led the Triplets to an ardor-infused rifle that someone had stashed inside a storage locker in the Ruby 88 Hotel & Casino. They left the weapon where they'd found it, of course, as they didn't have much use for it, nor did they wish to alert whoever it belonged to; but that did at least confirm that the Tuning Orb really could work.

They'd also kept an eye on that rifle for a few days, even going so far as to set up a tiny camera to observe the locker. They'd discovered that it belonged to one of the casino's dealers, a bald man with black-rimmed glasses, and they'd since removed the camera and shifted some of their observational focus to him. They'd found out his name easily enough from the tag on his uniform, but the reapers back in Warrenhold hadn't been able to do anything with that information.

Raul wasn't terribly surprised. In all likelihood, the guy was an undercover servant using an alias. They'd found several other such suspicious people all over the city, but the Ruby 88 and the hotels immediately around it seemed to be something of a hot spot."

"2217

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 2 of 10))~~
En route to Miro, the three brothers were uncharacteristically quiet.

Despite their typically jovial dispositions, Raul could tell that his brothers were a little on edge, today. The sudden change in their orders was abnormal enough on its own, but it had also been accompanied by a rather vague warning to be wary of traps.

They decided not to approach Miro in the same way that they had approached Ridgemark. If there was any chance at all that they were heading into an ambush, then trying to hide in plain sight was not the right strategy. An ambush implied that the enemy might possess intel on them, so they might just be recognized on sight and attacked immediately.

That didn't seem likely, of course, given House Blackburn's reclusion over the last thirty years, but they wanted to exercise extra caution, nonetheless.

But they couldn't just sneak into the town, either. If there were any reapers around, three unfamiliar souls skulking in the shadows would arouse immediate suspicion.

Raul pulled the car over in order to let Adan and Esai out. Miro was still a few miles away, but they weren't heading directly toward it. Their task was to find good vantage points from which to observe the town at a distance.

He bumped fists with each of them before they left. They both had a pair of binoculars in the survival kits they took with them, and their wilderness training from when they were younger would surely be helpful if things got bad, so Raul wasn't worried about them.

He took a breath as he watched them disappear into the thick forest that flanked both sides of the road.

He didn't start the car back up yet. His task now was to wait for them to get into position. They would text him when they were ready.

So Raul was left with considerable time to himself, waiting in the driver's seat of the rental car with nothing but his thoughts.

That old wilderness training kept popping into his head for some reason. Perhaps it was the sight of all these trees. Various elders of the Blackburn household had served as their instructors, but the trip with Uncle Ismael and Cousin Ibai was, without a doubt, the most memorable one."

"2218

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 3 of 10))~~

That had been the first time in which Raul and his brothers had really gotten to know Ibai. Right away, they could tell how different he was. Raul knew now that Ibai must have already been in his twenties by that point, but it didn't feel like a memory with someone eleven years their elder at all. Ibai had always treated them like peers. Like equals.

But he wasn't. Without even realizing it, they'd learned so many new things from him by the end of that trip.

And Ismael.

Agh.

Thinking about him hurt. Raul had loved him as much as he'd loved his own father--maybe even more, terrible as that was to admit.

The Triplets had loved to play pranks, and that trip had certainly been no different. But Ismael had never gotten upset at them for it. In fact, he actually seemed to enjoy them.

One time, they filled his water bottle with coyote urine. The look on the man's face when he drank from it--Raul could hardly remember anything funnier than that.

They'd expected to get punished severely for that one. Time out. An ass whooping, maybe. But no. Ismael just laughed. And hard, too. And then he cried, for some reason.

Raul hadn't understood why at the time, but in retrospect, he wondered if that didn't have something to do with Ibai, also. As he understood it, Ibai had been even more of a little hellion in his day than the Triplets had. Perhaps to Uncle Ismael, that prank was tame by comparison.

But when they saw him crying like that, their attitudes toward the man shifted dramatically. They'd never seen a grown man break down in such a way. It was confusing and saddening. Esai tried to comfort him.

Then Ismael shoved the bottle in Esai's mouth and made him drink, too.

Even to this day, Raul had never laughed so hard in his life."

"2219

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 4 of 10))~~

He'd been thinking about that little camping trip a lot, lately. The lessons learned during it hadn't been especially relevant so far in Vantalay, thanks to the many luxuries of Ridgemark, but this was still the first time that he and his brothers had gone anywhere for this long without constant supervision.

That, and he just missed Ismael and Ibai.

Ismael had been like a father to the entire House, in many ways. Despite House Blackburn's rather large head count, that man had always tried to make time for everyone--even to a fault, perhaps. Raul remembered trying to compete for his attention with children from the other branch families.

However, in an odd way, Raul also felt a little guilty about missing Ismael so much.

House Blackburn hadn't suffered nearly as many casualties during the Abolish attack on Dunehall as some of the other Rainlord families, but among those few had been the Triplets' own father, Lucio Blackburn.

The Triplets were something of a special case within the House. Their parents, Lucio and Aria, were non-servants. In terms of the overall family hierarchy, they were fairly low. ""Uncle"" Ismael hadn't actually been their uncle directly, but rather the uncle of most of House Blackburn.

Normally, that wasn't an issue. Those with higher ""status"" within the family like Melchor or Horatio never treated those with lower status differently, and in the everyday life, the disparity was all but nonexistent.

But when it came to choosing servants for reapers... well, that was another story.

With so many members of the family and so few loyal reapers to go around, Raul could appreciate that it would not be an easy decision to make, choosing which child among the many can become an immortal, superpowered warrior. Rather than trying to work out some vague, supposedly ""meritocratic"" system for deciding, it was simpler to just give that ""privilege"" to the branch families with higher status."
"2220

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 5 of 10))~~
Of course, it was debatable whether servitude truly was a privilege. In many ways, the Rainlords regarded it more as a responsibility. A duty. It certainly had its perks, but did those outweigh the downsides?

There was a reason why there weren't very many truly old reapers left within the family. It was widely known that Rainlord reapers had a higher mortality rate than others who took servants. That was one of the great obstacles to recruiting new reapers to their side, in fact.

So perhaps it was understandable that those of lower status in the House's hierarchy weren't clamoring for that privilege. Loyalty to their kin was one thing, but it was quite another to allow their children to be ""killed"" and then subjected to the will of beings whom they couldn't even see or talk to directly.

And additionally, it was arguably better to further narrow down which parents would have to take on the difficult task of raising children who would eventually be granted superpowers. Their education, training, and moral conscientiousness were that much more important when so much strength might one day be at their fingertips.

So it was highly irregular for the Triplets to have been chosen. Normally, the reapers themselves would take their pick from the higher status children, of which there were many, but the identical nature of the Triplets had apparently sparked an immense curiosity among the reapers.

After all, the most famous Rainlords who had ever lived were the Redwater Twins. Identical brothers with identical abilities. Perhaps the reapers had been hoping for the three of them to manifest the divine Water Dragon ability as well.

Raul had actually been chosen first, as a kind of trial run. Sacrificing three reapers was an enormous commitment of the family's resources. Adan and Esal would only receive reapers of their own if Raul manifested a powerful enough ability.

And lo and behold, he did."
"2221

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 6 of 10))~~
For this reason, Raul was about ten months older than his brothers as a servant. Considerable time had been needed for him to not only manifest his ability, but also to develop it to a perceptible and manipulable degree, because for quite a while, Raul's ability to alter friction had been extremely weak and difficult to use.

And living a life of relative isolation in Luzo, not venturing out into the world very often at all, Raul had thus far found no opportunities to achieve emergence. He couldn't even imagine what that might feel like.

But in the end, the elders of House Blackburn agreed that this could one day become a remarkable power. It was an alteration-type, after all.

Unfortunately, even now, Raul wasn't sure when that day would be. The rarity of this power meant that no one in the House could instruct them in its usage. Alteration-types were usually like that, apparently. Unless you had a teacher with the same or very similar ability, learning to hone it was quite a slow process. In fact, for those first few years, some debate persisted among the House's reapers about whether their ability truly was friction and not something else, like particle vibrations or pressure manipulation or even gravity control.

This was also why the Triplets had been able to go on that camping trip with Ismael. Raul hadn't realized until relatively recently just how much special treatment he and his brothers had been given over the years. Even this very mission, dangerous though it was, might qualify as an example.

It seemed clear to him now why there had been tension between Ismael and his father Lucio--as well as between Lucio and some of the House's other non-servant parents. The man had been sandwiched between abnormally high expectations from his elders and quiet resentment from his peers.

No doubt, that turmoil had influenced how Lucio had treated his sons."
"2222

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 7 of 10))~~

Raul wished that he'd understood that about his father sooner. He might not have been so bitter towards the man all throughout his teenage years.

And now, it was too late. Lucio Blackburn was dead, killed by falling debris, apparently. Raul hadn't even seen it happen. The Triplets had only been informed of it by Horatio, who'd led one of the teams that sifted through the rubble for missing people.

He was sad, of course.

But not sad enough, he thought.

Perhaps that was a strange thing to chastise himself for. What was the appropriate level of sadness that he should feel at the death of his father? Trying to quantify emotions was a foolish endeavor, surely.

But... it wasn't that simple, was it? He couldn't ignore the fact that he was more broken up about Ismael's death. The proof was self-evident.

He was a bad son.

Maybe if he'd loved his father more, been more attentive, he would've been there when it happened. Maybe he would've even saved him.

He rubbed his forehead, then his eyes, trying to clear his mind. The mission. Focus on the mission. Just because there was downtime didn't mean he should allow himself to get distracted.

He waited, keeping eye on the narrow road. It remained empty the whole time. He hadn't seen a single vehicle this entire time, he realized.

Sure, this wasn't exactly a main road or anything, but it was still the primary means of reaching Miro from Ridgemark, one of the largest cities in Vantalay. Shouldn't there have been more traffic?

Hmm. Didn't bode well, did it?

The first text finally arrived. Esai was in position. Shortly thereafter, a text arrived from Adan as well. They were both ready.

Raul still had to wait, though, for them to observe the town and give him the go ahead. If there was anything obviously wrong with Miro, they would be able to give him a heads up."

"2223

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 8 of 10))~~
His brothers were certainly taking their time. That meant, at least, that there was nothing as obvious as smoke or annihilated buildings. A part of Raul had been worried about that.

Before the next text could arrive, however, Raul spotted another vehicle on the road, approaching from the direction of Miro.

It was a large truck, an eighteen wheeler, but it bore no markings that Raul could see. No company logo, even.

He caught a glimpse of the driver as it passed.

Maybe Vantalay was just different, but that didn't look like a typical truck driver to Raul. Skinny, harsh facial features and piercing eyes. No sunglasses or hat, despite the sunny day today.

And what was that truck transporting?

Right now, Vantalay was at war with four different countries. Lyste, Czacoa, Naos, and Yena Maria. According to the news and various people Raul had talked to over course of their stay in Ridgemark, battles had broken out all across Vantalay's borders. The only reason that the region around Ridgemark had thus far been spared was because the terrain rendered the city quite easily defensible from an assault by sea. The high cliffs on which Ridgemark was perched allowed only two paths for incoming ships to approach, and even then, they would still have to deal with the massive amount of artillery that the city had defending it as well.

Taking Ridgemark wouldn't be impossible, Raul thought--Uncle Melchor would've told him that only a fool would consider any location to be truly impregnable. But at the very least, it would require either an enormous commitment of resources on the attacker's part or saboteurs on the inside. The Triplets had been lucky enough to get into the country before the borders were shut down, but Vantalay's enemies obviously wouldn't have it so easy.

It therefore made sense that Ridgemark would want to ship in as many resources from domestic locations as possible, rather than relying on its ports too heavily. Foreign agents were much more likely to arrive by sea or air.

But even despite all that, Raul still couldn't help being suspicious of that truck. Something about it bothered him."

"2224 -- CCXIX.

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 9 of 10))~~

If Miro was sending crops or some other product to Ridgemark, then shouldn't it be in trucks with some kind of company logo on them? It was important for branding--and free advertising, besides.

Who would use an unmarked truck and why?

Bah.

He was overthinking it. The truck probably just belonged to an independent contractor. Or to a company that valued discretion for some reason. It could've been empty, for all he knew.

He shifted in his seat and tried to relax. All this waiting was getting to him. He'd never been the most patient person. He and his brothers were all like that. Human interaction was their bread and butter, and whenever they had to go without it for very long, they got antsy.

But he wasn't a child, anymore. He couldn't keep using that as an excuse. Professionalism had to come before his whims and wishes.

His phone dinged.

Finally, another text. From Adan this time. Hmm? It was only one word.

slaves

Raul's eyes held on that word for a long moment, widening slowly at the dreaded realization. Slaves?

He awaited clarification, but he had a feeling that he already knew everything that he needed to.

It was a group text, so Esai had seen it, too. His response was not comforting. It, too, was only one word.

yes

A rare scowl formed on Raul's face as he began texting back.

Chapter Two Hundred Nineteen: 'A lord's decision...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector was going to be sad to see the King leave. After multiple extensions to the man's stay here at Warrenhold, it seemed that he was finally going to return to Sescoria today.

He would miss Lynn, too, of course, though that parting would also be accompanied by a sense of relief. As much as he enjoyed being around her, it was a bit exhausting to have his attention constantly split on her. These last few days, he couldn't help devoting an entire parallel thought process to just her."

"2224 -- CCXIX.

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 9 of 10))~~

If Miro was sending crops or some other product to Ridgemark, then shouldn't it be in trucks with some kind of company logo on them? It was important for branding--and free advertising, besides.

Who would use an unmarked truck and why?

Bah.

He was overthinking it. The truck probably just belonged to an independent contractor. Or to a company that valued discretion for some reason. It could've been empty, for all he knew.

He shifted in his seat and tried to relax. All this waiting was getting to him. He'd never been the most patient person. He and his brothers were all like that. Human interaction was their bread and butter, and whenever they had to go without it for very long, they got antsy.

But he wasn't a child, anymore. He couldn't keep using that as an excuse. Professionalism had to come before his whims and wishes.

His phone dinged.

Finally, another text. From Adan this time. Hmm? It was only one word.

slaves

Raul's eyes held on that word for a long moment, widening slowly at the dreaded realization. Slaves?

He awaited clarification, but he had a feeling that he already knew everything that he needed to.

It was a group text, so Esai had seen it, too. His response was not comforting. It, too, was only one word.

yes

A rare scowl formed on Raul's face as he began texting back.

Chapter Two Hundred Nineteen: 'A lord's decision...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was going to be sad to see the King leave. After multiple extensions to the man's stay here at Warrenhold, it seemed that he was finally going to return to Sescoria today.

He would miss Lynn, too, of course, though that parting would also be accompanied by a sense of relief. As much as he enjoyed being around her, it was a bit exhausting to have his attention constantly split on her. These last few days, he couldn't help devoting an entire parallel thought process to just her."

"2225

~~((The National Jelly Bean Day Special -- page 10 of 10))~~

He hadn't intended to think about her so much, of course, but when she was within such close proximity all the time, he could sense her presence with the Scarf of Amordiin even when he wasn't looking directly at her.

That had to be a new level of creepy. Staring at someone without actually staring at them. He hated himself for being so preoccupied when there were so many other things going on, but it was all but impossible to stop.

He supposed he should just be grateful that he could concentrate on multiple things at once. Though, he did wonder if the ease of his multitasking was actually making it worse. It gave him an excuse. He wasn't really letting himself be distracted, right? He had attention to spare, right?

Nevermind the fact that Zeff noticed a drop in his combat performance during their sparring sessions.

Thankfully, the Lord Elroy didn't seem to pick up on the cause. Instead, he attributed the drop in ability to the fact that Hector had missed a few training sessions due to the King's visit. Zeff didn't appreciate that much, but he also seemed to understand the importance of the King's time here.

That first meeting between Zeff and King William had been an interesting one. Zeff had been his usual stern self as he tried to express his gratitude for allowing his kin to stay in Atreya during this difficult time, while King William mainly just seemed interested in asking questions about Rainlord history. The King had a lot of questions about trees, for some reason.

Admittedly, Hector had been a bit distracted at that time, himself. Lynn had been talking to him directly--which somehow required more than just one parallel thought process from him.

""So when are we going to spar?"" she'd asked, poking him in the shoulder."

"2225

The prospect of training with Lynn again had certainly crossed his mind, but there were multiple reasons why he wasn't eager to give that a go. And frankly, he was a bit surprised by her apparent enthusiasm. ""Ah... you really want to fight?"" he'd asked.

""Of course! It'll be fun to gauge each other's progress.""

Hector had nodded at that point. It did seem fun. In theory. ""But, uh... the problem with that is... well, most of my 'progress' has been in the usage of killing techniques.""

Lynn had just kind of stared at him for a time, her expression as unreadable as always. ""So... you're saying that you think you can pierce this purple shield of mine, is that it?"" And she summoned the violet shadow, making it bubble up from her gauntlet and hover in front of his face.

He hadn't seen her make that kind of shape with it before. It was like bubbles connected together by a blanket, constantly rolling over one another. Boiling, perhaps. It was a little gross-looking, honestly, but kinda cool, too, in its own way.

He hadn't been sure how to respond to her question, though. Would it have been too cocky to say that he was confident that he could pierce it? He hadn't thought so, but he hadn't wanted to upset her, either.

She'd ended up a little upset with him, anyway, though. ""Well? You were implying that you were worried about killing me, weren't you? That means that you think you can pierce this thing, doesn't it?""

""Ah... well, er..."" Agh, why had she looked at him like that? Was she actually mad? Or just messing with him? What should he have said?

They were interrupted when Ms. Rogers arrived to inform him of some rather mundane but necessary banking paperwork that the Madame Carthrace was in need of.

And now, on the last day of the King's visit, Hector had nearly forgotten that conversation, but Lynn apparently had not."

"2227

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Above ground and in the middle of a rocky clearing, Hector and Lynn stood by themselves, a good distance away from the recently constructed buildings. They had a handful of spectators, including Garovel, the King, Matteo and his reaper, as well as Roman and Gina.

Hector scratched the back of his head. ""...Is this really necessary?"" he whispered.

""Yes!"" Lynn exclaimed.

He should've known that it was already too late to back out, he supposed.

Lynn drew her sword and pointed it at him. ""How's your swordsmanship? Have you honed it at all?""

""As a matter of fact... no, I haven't."" Hector just gave her a flat look.

Lynn seemed briefly disappointed. ""Well, that's okay. I can give you a few more pointers later. First, show me your most powerful stuff.""

""...I don't think that's a good idea. ""

""Oho. Big words, Lord Goffe.""

""That's not what I--""

""C'mon. I can take it."" She began closing the distance between them.
""Show me before I get mad.""

He sighed. ""Alright, fine, but before this goes any further, let's do a test. I don't want to risk--""

The violet shadow lashed out at him, and he narrowly sidestepped it, ending up with a scratch across his chest instead of a hole through it.

""Good dodge,"" said Lynn. ""Little slow, though.""

Hector's expression hardened. ""Aren't you being a bit too aggressive for just a sparring match?""

""Yeah, well, maybe I'm working out some frustration."" She twirled her sword in her hand. ""Besides, you can heal, so what difference does it make?""

He could tell for certain, now. She was definitely annoyed.

But increasingly, so was he.

""Let's do a test, first,"" Hector said again. ""We can see how well your shadow--""

""Mm, don't feel like it."" She bolted toward him and swung her sword wide."

"2228

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

It was an obvious strike, far more obvious and flashy than Hector remembered her attacks being. She probably intended for him to block it, as a kind of warning attack.

So he did. A suit of iron armor clapped around his whole body instantaneously, and he caught the blow with Haqq's shield.

""See?"" she said. ""I'm holding back. I didn't coat my blade in my shadow.""

She wasn't aware of the properties of Haqq's shield and probably thought it would be as easy for her shadow to cut through as his iron was.

Hector didn't feel like correcting her.

Lynn pulled her sword back and relaxed a little. ""Nice armor, though. You couldn't make that so quickly before, could you?""

""Er. Yeah. Listen, just--hold out your shadow for a bit. Away from your body.""

""Like this?"" Lynn launched a long string of purple out from her hand and let it hover there.

Hector ""loaded"" up an iron bullet in a parallel thought process. ""Yeah, that'll--""

Her shadow twitched and leapt toward him at a right angle.

He stepped out of the way, having expected her to try something again. The shadow bent in midair and tried to skewer him another time, but it splashed against his shield.

Lynn had gotten behind him. ""Don't you think this scarf of yours is a liability? I could just grab it, you know.""

Thanks to said Scarf, however, Hector had sensed her there beforehand. He'd been able to tell from her movements and posture that she wasn't trying to attack him, so he hadn't done anything to repel her, instead wanting to know what her intentions were. It seemed like she'd just wanted to spook him, though.

He didn't turn around to face her. ""Do you really want to spar?"" he said through the metallic tinge of his helmet. ""Or do you just wanna keep trying to sucker punch me?""

""Heh, I'm just testing your reactions. You don't think our enemies will take it so easy on you, do you? It's important to keep your guard up,

Hector.""

Ugh, she was reminding him of Zeff all of a sudden."

"2229

""What's with the silent treatment?"" said Lynn. ""This is supposed to be a friendly bout, you know.""

What the hell was she saying now? She really didn't understand what an awkward situation she was putting him in, did she? And had she forgotten that the King was watching this, as well? That just compounded things.

In a parallel thought process, he was focusing only on what the Scarf was telling him. Since they were outside, the wind played a bit of havoc with Scarf--in both a good and bad way. It ""blurred"" things a little in his mind, but it also extended the range of what he could sense by quite a bit. The treeline in the distance was fairly clear to him, at least in terms of general shape, whereas Lynn's figure was faintly ""smeared.""

He could still sense her movements with immense precision, however. He noticed her posture shift suddenly, her arm raise, and the aberration shadow extend from her hand. She was about to attack him again.

So he materialized an iron platform beneath her feet, taller than himself and with enough force to pop her high up into the air like a bouncy ball.

It took her a second to get her bearings, but she caught herself on a swirling bed of violet shadow, landing in front of him. Hector had been prepared to catch her with an iron slide, but he could tell with the Scarf and with his own eyes that it wouldn't be necessary.

""Ho ho!"" said Lynnette with a smile as the purple dissipated around her. ""That was fast! Good job.""

Hector frowned, though she wouldn't be able to see it through his helmet. ""Lynn, this is a bad idea...""

""Why?""

""I tried to tell you--""

""Well, there's your problem,"" said Lynn. ""Don't tell me. Show me."" And she lunged toward him again, her white cloak wreathed in smoldering purple.

Y'know what? Fine, he decided. Maybe there was a safe way that he could show her."

"2230

Just as he'd done before, Hector launched Lynn up on an iron platform--but he didn't stop there, this time. He materialized more blocks of iron in midair and added velocity states to them. He knocked her to and fro, ping ponging her back and forth with increasing speed. Over and over and over again, not letting up.

The shadow would protect her from injury, he knew, but it wouldn't prevent knockback--or at least, not by much. He could neutralize her completely so long as he kept her pinned down and disoriented.

Unsurprisingly, however, she seemed to grow quickly irritated with this strategy, and the purple shadow exploded out of her in all directions, catching the iron blocks before they could hit her and reorienting herself into an upright position.

Hector exhaled heavily and dematerialized the last of his blocks. He supposed he should've known that it wouldn't be that easy. And judging by the look on her face, he'd only served to piss her off.

With the shadow surging around her, she seemed almost as if she were stuck in a massive purple tree. But of course, she was in control of it, and she wasn't allowing the shadow to dissipate this time, either. She kept it out, bubbling and swirling around her, as she dove headlong toward him again.

Weirdly enough, though, this was now reminiscent of that fight with a worm. Lynn's shadow wasn't quite so large, of course, and she wasn't trying to kill him--at least, in theory--but this sight of a hulking, amorphous body lunging toward him was certainly familiar.

A flurry of purple tentacles shot out in advance, trying to flank Hector from both sides.

That would be a lot of shit to dodge. He could try, and with the Scarf, he might even be able to do it. But he had an idea he liked better.

He'd do the exact same thing again. But bigger."

"2231

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

He raised another iron platform beneath Lynn, just as fast as before but the size of a small house by itself. She and her shadow went flying, and Hector followed up again, too. Giant blocks in midair, ping ponging her back and forth. The shadow struggled and flailed, trying to grab on to each block, but they were too large to catch.

He heard Lynn scream in frustration, which was almost enough to make Hector stop, until he saw her shadow flex and focus into a dozen different blades.

Still toppling through the air, Lynn started slicing through the blocks of iron instead of trying to catch them. The iron slabs parted around her, allowing her to right herself again amid a storm of swirling purple blades.

Lynn was taking angry breaths. ""That. Was. Extremely annoying, Hector.""

""Good job breaking through,"" he offered her.

She scowled. ""Don't condescend to me.""

Hector tilted his head. ""I wasn't.""

She steadied her breath, then reeled her shadow in as she walked closer. ""Hector... I don't understand. I've been training like mad since you've been gone. I've sparred with Harper Norez dozens of times now. I'm sure he was taking it easy on me, but I'm far stronger than I was before we went to Sair. But you... you're able to just toy with me like that..."

Ah.

Suddenly, Hector felt a little bad. He hadn't really considered things from her perspective. And he should've. Agh.

Too self-absorbed, as usual. Shit. What an idiot, he was. And he still didn't even know what to say to her.

""How did you improve this much?"" asked Lynn. ""No offense, but I'm confident that I could've whooped your ass before.""

In spite of the previous tension, Hector couldn't help chortling at her bluntness. ""Yeah, you probably could've...""

""Right? So what the hell changed so much?""

He wondered how to explain. ""Well, uh... lots of things, I guess.""
"2232

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Lynn's expression flattened. ""Be more specific. This is serious. I want to know if there's anything else I can do to grow stronger, too. I don't know if you've noticed, but the world just got a whole lot more dangerous, and the kingdom could come under attack again at any time.""

""Okay, well... do you know what emergence is?"" said Hector.

She thought for a second. ""Roman mentioned that, once. In Korgum. It's how servants can increase their ability by leaps and bounds, right?""

""Yeah.""

""You're saying you achieved emergence in Sair?""

""Well, in the Undercrust, actually. On the way back from Sair."" On second thought, had he achieved emergence in Sair, too? With all the fighting he'd gotten involved in, it was a bit difficult to remember, but he didn't think so.

""And that's it?"" said Lynn. ""Emergence has created this much a gap between us? Roman's power grew in Korgum, but still... this seems like too much of a jump compared to that. Because you were holding back on me, weren't you?""

""Ah... well, I also achieved emergence when I fought Harper. And you and I haven't sparred since before that, so...""

"Hmm," was all she said.

"And there's my training with Lord Elroy, too," said Hector. "That's been... unbelievable helpful, honestly. He's taught me tons of things about how to use materialization more intelligently."

"I see..."

"And then, there's also, um..." He stopped himself. This was Lynn he was talking to, but would it really be okay to just tell her? He glanced toward Garovel, who was still observing with the King and the others. 'Can I tell Lynn about the Scarf?' he asked.

The reaper took a moment to respond. 'No,' he said privately. 'It's better if no one knows.'

'But we can trust her, can't we?'

"2233

'It's not about trust, Hector. Telling her would just be an unnecessary risk. How would it help anything, if she knew?'

'Because... then she'd... I don't know...'

'Exactly.'

'She wants to get stronger, Garovel. And items like this could help her.'

'You are NOT about to give the Scarf to her.'

'What? No, I mean... if she's just... if she becomes aware that items like this exist in the world, then maybe she'll...'

'Maybe she'll what? Go hunt them down? She's rather busy protecting the Queen and her husband.'

'Sure, but still...'

The reaper gave a silent sigh. 'If you want to tell her about magical artifacts, then fine. Just don't go into detail about the Scarf specifically.'

He could be satisfied with that. 'Okay.'

Lynn was staring at him expectantly, perhaps already guessing that he was conversing with Garovel.

He dematerialized his armor and unconsciously reached into the Scarf to rub his neck. ""I can't really... go into detail, but let's just say... there are certain objects in the world which are similar in nature to that aberration gauntlet of yours.""

She blinked. ""Similar in what way?""

""As in, they harbor supernatural powers,"" said Hector. ""You were there when I told the Queen about the Undercrust--and Himmekel, too. There was a lot of crazy treasure there, and I suspect there's even more, elsewhere in the world.""

""H-hold on,"" said Lynn with furrowed eyebrows and a raised gauntlet. ""On top of everything else, you're telling me that you've also gained an item of power comparable to this thing?""

Hector gave her a shrug. ""Pretty much.""

She looked incredulous.

His mind went to the Shard and also the Tuning Orb of Karugetti. ""More than one, actually."" Then his mind went to the Moon's Wrath, and he frowned. ""I lost one to a giant worm, though. That... sucked.""

""Hector, I need more details.""

He shook his head. ""Can't.""

""Why not?""

Impulsively, he wanted to panic, but then he realized there was a perfectly acceptable scapegoat standing right over there, and he pointed. ""Garovel won't let me. Blame him.""

'Argh, great!' said Garovel privately. 'Thanks for that, O brave Lord Darksteel!'

'No problem.'

"2234

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Lynn put her goggles on to look at Garovel directly. ""Does he not trust me with sensitive information?""

""He said it's not about trust, but just minimizing risk,"" said Hector.

""Hmph."" She returned her gaze to Hector.

He noticed her lone eye fall upon the Scarf of Amordiin.

She squinted at him. ""Is this item--?""

Hector's own eyes bulged as he realized what she was about to say, and he clapped an iron muzzle around her mouth. ""No, no,"" he said, shaking his head urgently. ""No guessing. Never know who might overhear.""

She touched the muzzle with her hand, perhaps in disbelief that Hector would've actually done such a thing to her, but before she could get too mad, Hector annihilated it again.

Then she just stared at him. She was free to talk now, but for whatever reason, she was choosing not to.

Hector tried to hold eye contact, though it was difficult. He remembered Garovel telling him that a lord shouldn't apologize carelessly, so he was hesitating to do so now, but the more seconds transpired and the more time he had to reflect on what he'd just done... the more he came to realize that, yeah, that was kind of a fucked up thing to do someone.

""Ah... sorry about that,"" he eventually said.

Lynn's stern expression didn't change, but she averted her eye from him, at least, looking around again.

What he wouldn't give to know what was going through her head, right now.

Thankfully, the two of them were far enough away from their observers that they most likely couldn't be overheard, especially with this much wind, but he still had to wonder what they were all making of this situation.

""...Who, exactly, were you worried might overhear my 'guess?'" said Lynn.

That was a good fucking question, considering what he'd just been thinking about. He did have a good answer to it, though. ""A giant, invisible bird,"" said Hector.

Lynn blinked at him. After a moment, she seemed to understand and nodded. However, the frustration in her face did not completely diminish. ""Hmph. Out of context, that would be one of the dumbest answers I've ever heard.""

It was Hector's turn to blink. Was she...? Was she pouting?"
"2235

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Hector was at a loss. He couldn't tell if she was genuinely upset or just playing around. Or maybe a little of both? He'd never seen her act this way before.

""It's very discomfoting,"" said Lynn as she looked around another time, ""thinking that one of them might be watching us, right now without our knowledge.""

""Yeah... but I think the underground portions of Warrenhold are pretty safe from them. The entrance alone would be a tight fit for their huge bodies. Plus, they'd have to make it through the entirety of the Entry Tower.""

""Hmm. But they could still be above ground with us, right now, couldn't they?""

Hector nodded. ""I'm actually expecting Hanton to show up any time now. He said he would visit Warrenhold.""

""Oh yeah..."" Lynn scratched her cheek. ""But you can sense them somehow, can't you? How close do they have to be for you to pick up on their presence?""

Hector frowned at her, knowing that he couldn't tell her that.

Lynn smacked her lips. ""Right. Details.""

In the end, they decided to keep sparring for a while longer, though it was a bit more relaxed this time. They resorted to basic swordplay, with Lynn providing instruction more than competition. She was even gracious enough not to cut any of his limbs off--which honestly surprised him a little.

The observers pulled up some chairs and fetched lunch for everyone, and it wasn't long before they were paying more attention to their own conversation than they were to Hector and Lynn.

At length, however, an interruption arrived.

The wind picked up briefly, and the spare thought process that Hector was using to monitor the Scarf's intel suddenly noticed a distant fluctuation in the air.

A large, blurry shape was gliding toward them on the northerly wind. When Hector looked toward it, he saw nothing with his eyes, so even though he hadn't been able to sense it with perfect clarity, he knew at once that it was a Sparrow."

"2236

Hector took precautions. He instantly made soul-empowered iron suits for everyone, and pulled Garovel close to him in an iron orb, informing the reaper of the situation privately.

Everyone else was surprised as well, especially as some of them were still eating, and a sudden iron helmet didn't make that task easier. But thankfully, Hector didn't have to explain what was going on, because the cause revealed himself.

'There is no need for that,' arrived Hanton's voice. His avian visage melted out of thin air--or appeared to, at least--as his enormous talons touched down on a large gray boulder mere meters away from Hector and Lynn. 'I assure you, I come in peace.'

""Happy to hear it,"" said Hector. ""But peace isn't maintained through goodwill alone.""

That left a momentary silence in its wake.

Hanton's beady eyes moved to the group of onlookers farther away. 'King William. I assume that the Lord Goffe already informed you of my true nature the other day. I hope my appearance does not come as too much of a shock to you.'

The King was already stepping closer, apparently unafraid. ""I would be lying if I said it set my heart at ease, but nonetheless, I am glad to see you here now.""

'Alas, I fear we have much more to discuss now than me and my family.'

""You're right."" The King pulled back the faceguard of his helmet.

""Come. Join us while we finish eating.""

'I will. Thank you.'

From there, the meeting became a bit less tense than the first one with Hanton, but Hector remained on edge. Clearly, the King wanted to be diplomatic here, and that was great, but Hector still didn't know the full limit of what Hanton might be capable of. If Sparrows could pause people in their tracks and wipe their memories, there was no telling what other ways they could manipulate minds.

He earnestly hoped that Hanton could be trusted, but he intended to remain vigilant as he listened to their conversation."

"2237

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 1 of 18))~~

""This is not the first time you have played advisor to the King of Atreya,"" said William, a whiff of a smile on his face.

'Yes,' said Hanton. 'I was once quite close with your father-in-law.'

""I remember it vividly,"" said the King. ""When I was a teenager, just beginning to dip my toe into matters of the royal court, you were a star. And one that burned quite hotly, as I recall.""

Hanton ruffled his russet feathers but said nothing.

""Many in the court were jealous of your relationship to Martinus,"" said the King. ""I remember it even being said that, at one point, your influence was comparable to the King himself--for that was how much he seemed to trust you.""

Still, Hanton remained quiet.

""It makes one think,"" the King went on. ""With abilities like yours, it must have been a trivial matter to obtain that relationship with him.""

'That was not the way of it,' said Hanton. 'Martinus and I had been friends since we were both children.'

""Ah, and am I to believe that was a coincidence? The Gaolanets have been a noble Atreyan House for many years. Gathering intelligence and advising the Crown has been your family's role throughout this nation's history.""

'Yes. That is also true.' And Hanton made no further comment.

The King eyed the last bit of his tuna melt for a moment, as if trying to decide whether or not he wanted to eat it. ""The thing I find most intriguing, however, is the timeline of events."" He leveled his gaze back up at the giant bird. ""In one form or another, House Gaolanet advised the Crown for the better part of three centuries. That was, until about ten years ago. And now, here we are. Within just the last year, Atreya has experienced not one but two crises--the likes of which this country has never seen before.""

"2238

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 2 of 18))~~

'Are you looking to blame us for Atreya's ill fortune in these matters as well?' said Hanton.

""I don't know,"" the King said. ""Blame seems unproductive at this juncture, but the coincidence does strike me as strange, nonetheless. Because, well, the way I see it, there are only three possibilities. First, it truly is all a coincidence. Second, House Gaolanet is somehow responsible for these horrible events. Or third, the opposite. Perhaps it is precisely your absence as royal advisors that has been the damnable catalyst.""

Hanton's avian head reared back a little.

Everyone else seemed a bit perplexed as well.

Hanton made a noise that Hector didn't recognize--a kind of rumbling chirp from deep within the giant bird's chest. A laugh? 'My daughter would be ecstatic to hear you even mention that last possibility.'

""Ah, Pauline. How is she doing, by the way?""

'As spirited as ever. Or perhaps even more so, if you can believe it.'

""I can. My memories of her are few, but I can. In fact, I'm surprised she didn't accompany you here.""

'Oh, she wanted to. Thankfully, she still listens to me, from time to time.'

""I should like to meet her again,"" said the King.

'Truly, Your Highness?'

""Yes.""

'Then... I suppose that can be arranged. Another day, of course. I fear we are beginning to get sidetracked.'

""Of course.""

As Hector kept listening, a part of him was in quiet awe of this conversation--of the King, in particular. That was the first time that Hanton Gaolanet had referred to him as ""Your Highness"" so far. Maybe Hector was reading too much into it, but that struck him as significant.

""Before we move on to more current matters, however,"" said the King, ""I would like to know more about your falling out with Martinus.""

'Ah...'

""Why did he strip you of your position?""

"2239

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 3 of 18))~~
'What have you heard?' said Hanton.

""You wish to comment on rumors and speculation?"" said the King.

'It may help me to contextualize my response.'

""Very well..."" The King took a moment to think. ""I have heard that you and Martinus butted heads rather strongly on the matter of militarization. And to be quite blunt with you, I have heard that you were quite the warmonger, which was what ultimately made him decide to relieve you off your advisory role."

'Ah.'

Hector found that a little surprising. Thus far, Hanton Gaolanet hadn't struck him as the warring type at all. From their previous conversation, that seemed like the last thing that Hanton would want.

Unless he'd been lying, of course.

'The truth, then, may confuse you,' said Hanton. 'Militarization is not a simple process--or even easy to define, necessarily. There are many methods of waging war, and not all of them involve building tanks and munitions factories. On the whole, I was actually AGAINST militarization. Martinus was much more interested in pursuing it than I was.'

""Excuse me?"" said the King. ""Are you trying to claim that it was Martinus who was the warmonger, not you?""

The Sparrow paused for a long sigh. 'Well... yes. While I would not say that I opposed every aspect of militarization, the basic sentiment is the same.'

The King's expression spoke of doubt, and he shook his head. ""Pardon me, but that flies in the face of virtually everything that I have heard about both him and you.""

'Oh? I am relieved to hear that, then. Because that, too, is as I intended it.'

The King was certainly no longer alone in his apparent confusion now. ""What in the world do you mean by that?""

'After Martinus fired me, I... took fairly dramatic action. It would have been a problem if the rest of the world perceived the King of Atreya as an aggressor.'

"2240

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 4 of 18))~~

""What did you do, exactly?"" asked the King.

'In short? I redirected perceptions of his policies and ideals onto myself. Since I was already ousted from his inner circle, I could be safely regarded as an outlier whose opinion no longer held any power.'

""Yes, but how did you do that?""

'Oh, it was not easy. The endeavor consumed my life for several years. Following members of the royal court, tweaking their memories, their perceptions. It was a constant project, and it pushed me to the brink of exhaustion. I was sure that I had missed some, but if you really had no inkling as to Martinus' true views, then perhaps I did a better job than I thought.'

""You freely admit to tampering with the minds of your fellow lords?"" said William.

'Do I ""freely admit"" it? You say that as if to accuse me of some crime. As far as I am aware, there are no laws in this nation regarding the erasure of memories or the use of telepathy.'

The King just returned a frown.

'Perhaps there should be,' said Hanton. 'I will leave that matter to Your Highness' wisdom.'

King William shook his head and sighed. ""If the other lords knew of this...""

'It would be enormously problematic, yes.' Hanton's marbled eyes went briefly to Hector. 'But we are past the point of dancing around difficult truths, I feel. You must decide for yourselves whether my actions were unjust.'

Hector had some questions of his own, now. ""Why didn't you just manipulate King Martinus' mind directly? Why go through so much trouble working on the people around him? And was it really necessary to take the flack for his views upon yourself? Why not just erase them entirely and avoid blaming anyone?""

'Mental manipulation is an imprecise art,' said Hanton. 'If it were as simple as you were making it out to be, then yes, I would have had a much easier time and been able to avoid many sleepless nights.'

"2241

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 5 of 18))~~
That was... actually kind of a relief to hear, Hector felt. The Lord Gaolanet's powers were terrifying enough already. It was nice to know that he had his limitations.

""Could you elaborate on this 'art' of mental manipulation?"" said King William. ""What difficulties did you run into, specifically?""

Hanton took a moment to think. 'If I am being perfectly honest with you, Your Highness, I would rather not share that information with anyone. I believe I am already taking quite a large risk in telling you as much as I am.'

""I understand that concern,"" said the King with a nod and a brief glance at Hector, ""but I feel that I must press you on this, nonetheless, Lord Gaolanet. Amicable though this meeting may be, we are still in the nascent stages of building trust between us. Sharing sensitive information such as that would go a long way toward improving our relationship, I think.""

Hanton was briefly quiet again, and his eyes returned to Hector. 'And do you feel that way as well, Lord Goffe?'

""...Yeah, I do,"" said Hector. ""Your abilities are quite... frightening to the imagination. A better understanding of how they work might dispel some of the unease about them."" Or it could make them worse, Hector thought, though, he kept that to himself.

Hanton sighed. 'Very well, then... Where to begin?' He took another pause for deliberation. 'Generally speaking, the older a memory is, the more difficult it is to erase. When a memory--or any idea, really--has time to become entrenched in the mind, it invariably acquires emotional connections. This is what is commonly referred to as ""sentimental attachment."" Typically, that term is used to express an emotional connection to physical objects, but the concept is essentially the same. This persistence of ideas can make the task of mental manipulation prohibitively difficult, if not impossible.'

"2242

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 6 of 18))~~
""So this was why King Martinus was resistant to your manipulation?"" said King William. ""You wanted to change something in him that was too old?""

'I... suspect that was the reason, yes, but I do not know for certain.' Hanton ruffled his feathers. 'That was the first time I had ever attempted to influence him telepathically. All throughout our childhood, I never once tried it. He was my friend. Even if he would never find out about it, I still felt that doing that to him would have been a betrayal.'

William held his one hand up to his chin, thinking. ""Then are you saying that there could have been a different reason why he resisted you?""

'Well, yes. Some people are simply resistant by nature. Or even... immune.' He eyed Hector again. 'I know not why.'

He didn't know? Hmm. Hector considered that morsel of information a bit further. During that first encounter with Hanton, Hector had gotten the impression that it was his ability to think in parallel thought processes that allowed him to ignore the Sparrow's attempts to freeze his mind, but considering what Hanton had just said, Hector couldn't imagine that the blessing of Focus was particularly common. He'd be surprised if someone had even heard of it, much less possessed it.

Hector had to ask. ""How many people have you met who were immune to your telepathy?""

'Including you? Only four.'

Hector tried not to seem so surprised, but it was difficult. ""Over the course of your entire life?""

'Yes. People who are merely resistant are less rare. Regardless, cautionary tales regarding such individuals have been passed down through my family's generations. It is a foolish Sparrow indeed who disregards that possibility and instead tries to solve every problem with such an invasive method. One might even argue that it was precisely such carelessness that caused the downfall of my ancestors.'

"2243

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 7 of 18))~~
Hector supposed he could understand Hanton's wary nature a little better now. At any time, Sparrows could stumble upon someone who could expose them, someone who could threaten their entire way of life.

Someone like Hector.

He didn't know whether to be more worried or less by this information. If nothing else, it certainly provided Hanton with motivation to want Hector out of the picture.

'But in any event,' Hanton went on, 'I feel we have spent long enough dredging up the past. Let us speak on more pressing events now.'

""Very well,"" said the King. ""I can only assume you are referring to this new continental war going on.""

'Yes. Thankfully, it does not currently involve Atreya, but I fear that could change if adequate measures are not taken.'

William's posture stiffened. ""What measures would that be?""

'Well, first things first. If, for whatever reason, Atreya did somehow end up joining the war, I think it should be clear which side we would wish to be on.'

""The defending side, of course,"" said the King.

'Yes. Whatever other politics might be at play, we simply cannot work with any of the nations that instigated this conflict. The military invasion of another sovereign land is too great of an obstacle on moral grounds alone. The public would never support it--and rightly so. In the long-term, such an alliance would risk destabilizing Atreya from within, which is to speak nothing of whatever the immediate consequences of winning or losing the war might be.'

""You are getting a bit ahead of yourself, no?""

'I am, but that is also the point. To have forethought regarding our more immediate decisions. A lack of adequate forethought has historically been the great folly of statesmen. They make judgments that seem sound in the short-term, perhaps on the promise of riches, only to later find that things have spun wildly out of their control. I believe this could be one such instance, if we are not careful.'

"2244

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 8 of 18))~~
""The 'promise of riches?'" said the King. ""Why do I get the feeling that was not a random example you were giving?""

'Naturally, if the aggressing nations come to Atreya seeking aid or allyship, then make no mistake: they will make their offer as sweet as can be. They may promise us the moon--and possibly even deliver it. That is how important these negotiations can be. When the tide of a war is beginning to shift, foreign help can become the difference between victory and defeat.'

""As we well know,"" said Lynn, drawing everyone's glance.

It was rare for her to speak up like that during a formal meeting between lords, Hector knew. She must've felt quite strongly about that point.

'...Yes, I suppose you do,' said Hanton. 'And much the better. That experience and the wisdom that came with it will be invaluable in the days to come.'

Lynn said nothing further and merely held the Sparrow's gaze with her one eye.

The King was visibly pensive again. ""Returning to the point you were trying to make previously: what 'measures' are you recommending be taken?""

'In the interest of ensuring that we do not get unintentionally tangled up in this mess, it would be wise to reevaluate every Atreyan ambassador currently deployed to each of the warring nations.'

""Ah..."

'Sometimes, the individuals appointed to these positions are... shall we say... not given as much consideration as perhaps they should be. Double-checking those choices now would certainly not hurt.'

""That can be arranged,"" said the King. ""Anything else?""

'Yes. Informants. They are now more valuable than ever. This is perhaps the biggest reason why competent and trustworthy ambassadors are important.'

The King blinked. ""Are you saying we should employ spies in the middle of this war?"

'I understand that it would be a rather large commitment of resources for a nation as small as ours,' said Hanton, 'but I do believe it would be worth it.'

"2245

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 9 of 18))~~

""Would that not run the risk of worsening the situation?"" said the King. ""I highly doubt that these nations will appreciate us sticking our noses in their business. Not to mention, these are war zones you're talking about. Sending anyone to them, trained or not, would be playing with fire.""

'Your concern is understandable, but with the right agents, that should be a non-issue. Those with proper espionage training will know the importance of avoiding exactly what you are talking about. It is a harsh reality, but spies know what they are signing up for. If they are caught, the likelihood of rescue is virtually nonexistent, because their homeland cannot risk acknowledging their mission.'

The King just frowned.

'Even in this modern age, there are many political prisoners all over the world for this very reason. Many of them will die in captivity unless their governments manage to strike deals for them--which is unlikely when those governments cannot confirm their association to them without inviting war.'

""You are not making your recommendation sound any more appealing,"" said the King.

'I am simply telling you the truth. Sugarcoating it would do us no favors. Skilled spies are an invaluable resource, Your Highness, and if ever there was a time to make use of them, it would be now.'

The King exhaled a long breath. ""Do you have anyone in mind for these tasks?""

'Well... it pains me to admit it, but yes. My own children would be well-suited to such missions.'

Everyone was surprised to hear him say that.

'Believe me--I do not make that recommendation lightly. Knowing the danger as well as I do, I have been instructing my children for years in the finer points of discretionary operations. They are all highly qualified.'

There arrived a period of persistent silence."
"2246

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 10 of 18))~~
When no one else said anything, Hanton decided to continue.
'Additionally, we Wrobels have our own network of contacts to call upon. Our brethren who are also in hiding could prove enormously beneficial in the gathering of intelligence. To that end, only my family will suffice.'

""I see,"" said the King. ""That does sound quite helpful. I will speak to my wife about this matter for you. I will make no promises, however. This is quite an important position you are seeking to occupy.""

'I understand. And thank you. Allow me to say one final thing in the vein of self-promotion. In matters of espionage and intelligence-gathering, trust can be a difficult and very sensitive issue, but in the end, the results will always speak for themselves. Given the chance, we will not disappoint. I assure you.'

The King smiled that familiar smile of his. ""I admire your confidence.""

'Thank you.'

The King's postured shifted somewhat. ""That being said, this all seems like a rather large endeavor for just a handful of individuals. As I recall, you do not have that many children. Even if the Queen grants your request, I imagine that we will still have need of other agents. Might you have any recommendations to that end?""

'I do,' said Hanton. 'A number of individuals come to mind. I will draft a list for you.'

""That would be appreciated.""

The giant bird paused, beady eyes shifting briefly between listeners.
'There is... one man I wish to recommend above all others. His list of accomplishments was unlike any I had ever seen during my time as Director of the Agency of Foreign Affairs. However, there is one major problem.'

""Well, don't leave me in suspense,"" said the King.

Hanton still seemed reluctant. 'He is one of those unfortunate individuals I mentioned earlier. A political prisoner.'

"2247

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 11 of 18))~~

""What is this man's name?"" the King asked.

'His true name is Donald Elias, but the alias he used while undercover was John Wright.' Hanton allowed a beat to pass, perhaps in thought. 'To be clear, his capture was not his fault. He was meeting with Intarian agents who were also undercover, but their operations were already compromised. When the authorities arrived and apprehended them, Donald was caught up in their mess and imprisoned along with them.'

'Hmm,' mused Garovel privately to Hector. 'Elias, huh?'

The conversation kept going, however, and Hector didn't have the opportunity to inquire further. Perhaps he could've talked to Garovel in a parallel thought process, but he didn't want to split the reaper's attention. It would be better to just ask later, if he could remember.

'It has been over fifteen years since then,' said Hanton, 'but Donald was of such incredible caliber as an agent that there is a very good chance that even to this day, his captors still do not know that he is an agent of Atreya, not Intar.'

""And who are these captors of his?"" said the King.

'The VMP. The Vantalay Military Police.'

At that, Hector's poker face faltered a little, though thankfully no one was looking at him. Vantalay, of all places? Really?

The King was nodding. ""That is indeed a major problem, then, as you said. Are you truly suggesting that we should attempt to parley with their government in order to secure his release? And after all this time, no less?"

'I admit, the situation is difficult. And after fifteen years in a foreign prison, he is unlikely to be the same man he once was. But all the same, I wanted to at least bring it to your attention. The man was the finest spy I have ever known.'

The King made no response."

"2248

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 12 of 18))~~

'I will of course defer to the Queen's judgment,' said Hanton. 'I may be allowing sentimentality to interfere with my reasoning. Donald was a good friend, which was rare in our line of work, and his imprisonment was one of my greatest regrets.'

""Is he a Wrobel, too?"" said the King.

'No, he is a normal human.'

""Does he know of your secret?""

'No. Or at least, I do not believe so.'""

""What action are you hoping for my wife to take on this matter?""

'To be quite frank with you, I am not entirely sure. If I had a clear plan of action that I thought would work, I would have formally spoken about it years ago in the royal court. I suppose I am merely hoping that the Queen or one of her ambassadors is able to take advantage of the chaos that is currently embroiling Vantalay and... ""shake something loose, "" let's say.'

""I see. What else do you know of Vantalay? Anything that might help?""

'Ah. Vantalay has been a rather volatile nation for over half a century now. You already know of the Vanguard and Abolish, yes? It frequently changes hands between them. Today, it is difficult to tell who truly holds power there. And even disregarding those two forces, Vantalay is still fraught with many dangers, not the least of which is terrorism. Only a handful of the major cities can be regarded as safe, and that is largely due to the private security forces employed by certain companies that operate there. They have a vested interest in maintaining tourist appeal.'

Hector was paying even closer attention now than to anything else that had thus far been said.

Hanton was far from done. 'It is a divided nation in many respects. Though its government has enacted many socialistic policies over the years, the aforementioned companies have maintained enough influence to resist the enforcement of such legislation. The country has been going through quite a long-standing ""economic civil war,"" of sorts.'"

"2249

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 13 of 18))~~
""That sounds like quite the mess,"" said the King. He broke for sly grin. ""Which is saying something, coming from the likes of us.""

That earned another laugh from Hanton in that low-yet-chirpy cadence of his. 'Indeed. There have been many occasions over the years when I would not have been surprised if Vantalay had simply fractured into multiple smaller nations.'

""If it is so bad there, then how has the government maintained sovereignty for so long?""

'Because it is an ideological war as much as it is an economic one,' said Hanton. 'Much of the public supports the government. But a similarly large number of them support the companies as well. They do employ many people, after all--and provide better protection in their territories than the government does. But the companies also control considerably less land, which makes that job much easier. It is a complicated situation.'

""I see.""

Hector had to to interject and ask a question of his own. ""How do you know so much about Vantalay?""

'While I may no longer work for the government as an intelligence operative, keeping abreast of world news has always been a hobby of mine. I didn't tell you anything that you couldn't have learned from publicly available resources.' He allowed a beat to pass. 'Assuming you had been keeping up with said resources for the last thirty years or so.'

The King chortled. ""And this is merely your 'hobby,' is it? I fear you will only end up making the rest of us look like fools if you continue to undersell yourself, Lord Gaolanet.""

Hanton returned another laugh of his own. 'Your ability to weave together a compliment is something I have always admired about you, Your Highness.'

""Heh. In any event, might you have any information for us that is not publicly available?""

Hanton took another moment before responding. 'That would require me to have informants in Vantalay, Your Highness.'

""I am aware,"" said William. ""So? Do you?""

"2250

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 14 of 18))~~

'Well,' said Hanton, 'I may have caught wind of a peculiar rumor regarding Vantalay's reason for invading Czacoa. But it is only a rumor, Your Highness. You should not consider it fact.'

""Let's hear it,"" said the King.

'Mm, very well. Supposedly, the Vantalayan government felt that the Czacoan government was poaching their most valuable citizens and so decided that simply conquering Czacoa through military action would fix that problem.'

""Ah...""

'Again, I cannot speak to truth of this claim. As far as I am aware, the Vantalayan government has yet to make an official statement regarding its reasons for declaring war.'

""I see. Thank you for the information.""

'You are welcome. And if we may return to the subject of Donald Elias, there is more I would say.'

""I'm listening.""

'I cannot be sure, but it may be better to try to parley with the companies for his release. Even if he is not currently in their possession, they may have a means of acquiring him for us. But of course, meeting with them openly might also serve to irritate the Vantalayan government.' Hanton gave a deep sigh. 'But then AGAIN, the government there is quite busy with the war, so perhaps it would be easy to negotiate with the companies unnoticed.'

""You are presenting me with many options,"" the King observed, sounding mildly exasperated.

'An advisor's role is not to decide for you, Your Highness.'

""Heh. Eloquently said.""

Hector's attention was abruptly diverted when the Scarf informed him that his recently appointed Stewardess of Warrenhold, Mara Rogers, had ascended the steps of the Entry Tower and was now approaching their group at a noticeably brisk walk. He made some soul-empowered armor for her as she got close, which seemed to surprise her quite a bit, as she stopped in her tracks."

"2251

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 15 of 18))~~
Hector excused himself from the meeting table and stood up to walk over to her.

""Lord!"" she whispered urgently. ""This is--! What did you--?!""

""Sorry,"" he said, ushering her farther away from the others. ""It's for your own protection."" He nodded sideways toward Hanton. ""Against that guy.""

Her wide eyes stuck on the Sparrow sitting there, and she said nothing.

Hector wasn't sure how good a Sparrow's hearing was, so he kept leading Mara all the way back to the double doors of the Entry Tower.

She was still staring when they got there, however.

""Ms. Rogers?"" pushed Hector.

""Y-yes, Lord?""

""I assume you came up here to tell me something.""

""Ah! Yes, Lord."" She leaned in closer and lowered her voice even further. ""Word has just come in from the team in Vantalay. And it is grave news, sir. They are reporting a humanitarian crisis. They've discovered a location where human trafficking is being conducted.""

Well, shit.

One question came to mind first. ""Is it the town of Miro?"" he asked.

""Yes, Lord. It is.""

Of course it was. Had he even needed to ask?

'Hector,' came Garovel's private words.

The reaper was still encased in iron and orbiting around Hector's body. Hector had left a small hole in it when he first made it--not for air, of course, but rather so that Garovel would be able to overhear their conversation with Hanton. Without doing so, the soul-infusion would have blocked all telepathic thoughts from reaching him.

Hector hadn't been too concerned about leaving an opening for Hanton's abilities, because the suits of iron armor that he'd made for everyone else obviously weren't air tight, either, and they'd still provided mental protection.

'What?' said Hector.

'As much as I would like to ignore this problem, we can't,' said Garovel. 'For multiple reasons, that is.'

'Yeah, I think you're right...'

"2252 -- CCXX.

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 16 of 18))~~
Mara was not done talking. ""The report mentioned one other thing.

Apparently, the team was also able to identify someone there named 'the Killer of Krohin.' Do you know who that is, Lord?"

Hector shook his head.

"Neither do I," she said, "but the Rainlords do. The Blackburns are already talking about sending reinforcements to Vantalay."

"Who are they talking about sending?"

"The Lord Melchor Blackburn, I believe."

Hector's eyes widened.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty: 'O, makeshift stratagem...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Thankfully, the meeting between Hanton and the King did not last much longer. Perhaps they could tell that Hector had other matters to attend to now but nonetheless still felt obligated to keep an eye on King William. Whatever the case, Hector was grateful that he could get back down into Warrenhold and meet with the Rainlords directly about the report from Vantalay.

The details he learned were even less encouraging than those provided to him by Mara.

As one might've expected, this "Killer of Krohin" was a famous member of Abolish. Not in the same league as Ivan, perhaps, but still potent enough that the Rainlords felt that they would have to send someone of incredible strength in the event that a battle broke out.

There was discord, however.

Not everyone agreed that reinforcements should be sent at all. A strong constituent of Rainlords wanted to simply abort the mission and call the Triplets back to Warrenhold.

And indeed, Hector could see the wisdom in that decision. Whatever the Sword of Unso might be capable of, it probably wasn't worth this level of risk. There were other locations they could send the Triplets.

But this crisis in Miro was a problem. This was exactly the kind of thing that Hector had been worried about. And now there was Donald Elias to worry about, too? Suddenly, Hector had several reasons to keep this mission active.

Agh.

What a mess."
"2252 -- CCXX.

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 16 of 18))~~
Mara was not done talking. ""The report mentioned one other thing. Apparently, the team was also able to identify someone there named 'the Killer of Krohin.' Do you know who that is, Lord?""

Hector shook his head.

""Neither do I,"" she said, ""but the Rainlords do. The Blackburns are already talking about sending reinforcements to Vantalay.""

""Who are they talking about sending?""

""The Lord Melchor Blackburn, I believe.""

Hector's eyes widened.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty: 'O, makeshift stratagem...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Thankfully, the meeting between Hanton and the King did not last much longer. Perhaps they could tell that Hector had other matters to attend to now but nonetheless still felt obligated to keep an eye on King William. Whatever the case, Hector was grateful that he could get back down into Warrenhold and meet with the Rainlords directly about the report from Vantalay.

The details he learned were even less encouraging than those provided to him by Mara.

As one might've expected, this ""Killer of Krohin"" was a famous member of Abolish. Not in the same league as Ivan, perhaps, but still potent enough that the Rainlords felt that they would have to send someone of incredible strength in the event that a battle broke out.

There was discord, however.

Not everyone agreed that reinforcements should be sent at all. A strong constituent of Rainlords wanted to simply abort the mission and call the Triplets back to Warrenhold.

And indeed, Hector could see the wisdom in that decision. Whatever the Sword of Unso might be capable of, it probably wasn't worth this level of risk. There were other locations they could send the Triplets.

But this crisis in Miro was a problem. This was exactly the kind of thing that Hector had been worried about. And now there was Donald Elias to worry about, too? Suddenly, Hector had several reasons to keep this mission active.

Agh.

What a mess."

"2253

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 17 of 18))~~
Hector was considering sending Leo, but would that really be wise? Leo seemed to be making progress and fitting into his new job rather well. It seemed a shame to disturb that relative peace so soon after finding it. Plus, this mission was supposed to be covert. Sending someone as powerful as Leo--or Melchor, for that matter--would increase the risk of drawing attention to their operations.

Not to mention, sending Leo without Ericoros' help could also prove problematic. Sure, Leo was strong, but any servant without a reaper would be significantly handicapped. The Triplets didn't have their reapers with them, either, but they were working undercover.

Could Leo do the same?

Hector was having a hard time imagining that. Leo? Being stealthy?

No, if he sent Leo to Vantalay, then he should expect things to escalate to full-blown combat. Leo's attachment to Miro was too big of an issue, as well. It would probably turn into a huge fight to free the town.

But maybe... that would be for the best?

They were talking about human trafficking here. Hector could hardly imagine a more worthy reason to pick a fight. Trying to be stealthy at this point--what would that accomplish, exactly? How could they possibly rescue Miro without a fight?

Maybe through negotiating with the government? Or those influential companies that Hanton mentioned?

Eh... that seemed like a foolish hope, honestly. Maybe it was a bit premature to be thinking that, but Vantalay was in a state of chaos, right now. Did the government have time to worry about a single town?

And hell, it was unlikely that this problem was afflicting just Miro. Something like human trafficking? It was probably a regional problem, at the very least.

'That, or it's government-sanctioned,' said Garovel privately. After a long evening of listening to heated discussions in the Grand Hall of the Night, everyone had finally retired to their chambers, but Hector and Garovel were still talking about it."

"2254

~~((The Totally-Not-Random May 1st Special -- page 18 of 18))~~
'Sanctioned?' said Hector. He didn't want to humor the notion that the government itself could be behind the human trafficking going on in Vantalay, but he wasn't so naive as to think it impossible. 'Really?'

'Sure,' said Garovel. 'Vantalay is one of the invading nations in the war. I can't say I have much faith in their moral values, at the moment.'

Hector frowned as he took a deep breath. And not for the first time that evening, he asked the reaper, 'So what do we do?'

Garovel was silent, perhaps not caring to repeat that he didn't know.

This stalemate was getting them nowhere. Hector needed to say something to push the conversation forward, even if he already had a fair idea of how Garovel would react.

'Maybe I should go to Vantalay myself,'

'No,' the reaper said flatly with no discernible surprise. He'd been expecting that suggestion, hadn't he?

'I know it's not exactly ideal, but--'

'It's a bad idea, Hector.'

He shook his head. 'I'm not saying it isn't, but I can't let Melchor go, either. He's the most reliable warrior in Atreya, right now. If he leaves, this war gets a whole lot scarier. Leo gets a whole lot scarier.'

'You are a stabilizing force in this country, Hector. And not just in terms of the economy. In terms of Leo as well. You leaving would be much more dangerous for Atreya than Melchor leaving. Hardly anyone even knows he's here.'

'That's just public perception, Garovel. I'm talking about actually protecting the country from potential invaders. Or from Leo. Melchor is way more valuable in that regard than I am. No question. We NEED him to stay. And the attention he would draw in Vantalay...'

'Hector. While you're not as famous as him internationally, you're nuts if you think no one would notice you suddenly showing up there. And we have to consider the greater context of the continental war. Above all else, we can't allow this mission to look like an act of aggression from Atreya. YOU would represent Atreya. Melchor would not.'
"2255

'I could take steps to conceal myself,' countered Hector. 'In fact... that's something I was already thinking about doing here in Atreya, even before the war started.'

'What are you talking about?' said Garovel.

'We've got loads of servants here in Warrenhold now, and some of them are getting pretty antsy, right?'

'Yeah, and?'

'And I'm known for wearing a full suit of metal armor when I'm out on patrol,' said Hector. 'Sure, everybody in Atreya knows my face at this point, but I don't have to actually show it in order to still show up in the media.'

'...You're talking about letting someone else wear your armor?' said Garovel.

'That's right. Maybe even more than one person. I could leave tons of backup armors behind, just in case.'

The reaper was hesitant. 'Yeah, okay, that might work for the media, but it won't work with Leo. He listens to you, not the person wearing your armor.'

'Well, I could just tell him what I'm doing. Part of this is for his and Ericoros' sake, after all. Keeping it a secret from them would be dumb.'

'And you think he won't want to go to Vantalay with you?'

'That... I don't know. If I tell him to stay, though, then I think he will. Like you said, he listens to me.'

Garovel sighed. 'None of this addresses the core concern of remaining hidden while in Vantalay. You represent this nation, Hector. If anyone recognizes you while you're there, your actions could inadvertently destroy Atreyan neutrality.'

'I get what you're saying. That's really important. But I could wear a disguise while I'm there. It would be a lot easier for me to keep a low profile than it would for Melchor.'

'There are other candidates. It doesn't have to be either you or Melchor.'"
"2256

At that, Hector had to shake his head. 'I'm not so sure that's true, Garovel. If I'm going to win any amount of trust from Ericoros on this, then... I need to go personally. To show him how serious I am about it.'

'Maybe, but that's a huge gamble,' said Garovel. 'Even if the mission succeeds in every conceivable way, there's no guarantee that it would move Ericoros' heart--or that we could trust him if he claimed that it did.'

'But it would be a big step in the right direction,' said Hector. 'I know it's a risk, but I can't just sit on my ass and expect Ericoros to fall in line. I've gotta do something to prove myself, and how many other opportunities do you think we'll get? Especially with how stubborn reapers are? Another chance like this might never appear, Garovel.'

'Okay, first of all, that's stereotyping, and I resent the implication. And second of all, the problem isn't that it's ""a risk,"" in the generic sense of the term. If you slip up, it's not just YOU that you're putting in danger. It's all the citizens of Atreya. Can you really tell me that you're okay with that? Especially when we could just send someone else? Impressing Ericoros isn't that important, Hector. In fact, doing something so reckless might even have the exact opposite effect on him.'

Agh.

Hector sat down on the edge of his bed. That was a really good point, he felt. As much as he wanted to keep arguing with Garovel, it was difficult.

Was there even a good decision to be made here? It seemed like both options came with huge downsides.

'And besides,' Garovel continued, 'the Killer of Krohin is no joke. That motherfucker is internationally famous for a reason. In the event that you had to fight him, you shouldn't assume that you could handle it.'

Hector breathed and tried to be rational. 'How much do you know about this guy?'

"2257

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'I don't know much more than what you already overheard the Rainlords mention earlier,' said Garovel.

Indeed, the Killer of Krohin had been a big subject in the Rainlords' discussions that evening.

Apparently, his real name was Thaddeus Croll, and the ""Krohin"" part of his moniker referred to a city in Lyste that had been slaughtered at his hands. It was unclear, however, if the Killer was single-handedly responsible for every death or if he had merely been the one to issue the order. Either way, the man's reputation was for his utter barbarism and mercilessness.

The Rainlords had also said that the Killer was famous for using blades of all kinds, supposedly being deadly with virtually any type of sharp object.

That seemed an odd descriptor for a servant, Hector felt. Perhaps whatever the man's ability was didn't lend itself very well to conventional means of combat. Like integration, maybe.

'Not much more is still more, Garovel.'

'Well, it's just some old rumors. Who knows if they're true or not? And giving you false information could be just as bad or worse than giving you no information.'

'I'll keep that in mind, then. Tell me.'

Garovel took his time answering. 'Okay... ah... do you remember when I told you about my last servant? Simon?'

Hector blinked. Oh shit. 'Yeah?'

'Remember how I told you that Simon's entire team walked into an ambush and got killed?'

Hector could see where this was going. 'You're saying Thaddeus Croll was involved in that?'

'Like I said, it's just an old rumor. I don't know for sure. I didn't go with Simon on that mission, and he hated talking about it. But yes, I think it's likely that he was involved.'

Hector wasn't sure how to respond. He could see why Garovel was reluctant to tell him about it, though. Fuck."

"2258

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'Which means,' said Garovel, 'that the Killer of Krohin is at least sixty years old as a servant by now--probably more, if he was involved in such a deadly operation even back then. I think the Rainlords are right to believe that Melchor is the safest person to send against such a foe.'

And there's no telling who else might be in Vantalay, right now. It's a big country. I doubt Croll is the only major threat there. The Triplets have already reported seeing scores of reapers haunting Ridgemark.'

Hector rubbed his forehead. 'When you tell me all that, I feel like we shouldn't send Melchor alone.'

'Of course. The Blackburns intend to send a supporting team with him.'

Hector eyed the reaper. 'I know. That's not what I mean.'

Garovel paused. 'You think we should send another one of our best fighters with him?'

'Melchor is our best check against Leo,' said Hector. 'If Melchor leaves, then Leo becomes a much bigger threat to Atreya. Unless...'

'We send both of them?' said Garovel.

Hector gave a reluctant nod.

'Your reasoning makes sense, but... that also sounds like a disaster waiting to happen.'

'All of our options sounds that way, right now, Garovel. Hell, even if we pull the Triplets back and do nothing, that could piss off Ericoros and potentially Leo.'

'Hmm.'

'Maybe we should even send a third or fourth strong fighter, too,' said Hector. 'Someone powerful enough to directly assist Melchor in case Leo goes out of control again.'

'This is getting messy.'

Hector bobbed his head to side a little. 'Well... you're not wrong about that.'

--++--++--

It seemed like things were going start moving very quickly very soon, but for the moment, the Triplets still had some downtime to work with.

And they were spending it in Ridgemark.

They didn't want to make a move on Miro by themselves, but they could still pursue the Sword of Unso in the meantime."

"2259

It was hard to look at Ridgemark the same way, though. The utterly miserable and inhumane conditions in Miro lingered in Raul's mind. Knowing that there was such suffering taking place within such close proximity of the city left a bad taste in his mouth, even as he filled it with another extravagant meal.

He didn't have much of an appetite. And his two brothers were much the same, he noticed. The three of them were all lingering over their half-eaten dinners, prodding their food or staring at it while obviously lost in thought.

He'd never seen slavery in person before.

He knew, however, that the term ""slavery"" lacked certain important context and could, in truth, refer to very different circumstances to what one might imagine. He remembered how the reapers of House Blackburn had made a point of teaching all of the family's young servants--and even non-servants, indirectly--about slavery throughout history. Their Arman ancestors had fought against the slave-hordes of the Lyzakks, after all. The subject was very near to their hearts, on a cultural level, even if the practice was comparatively rare in the modern day.

In the ancient world, slavery had often been used as a form of legal punishment. It provided criminals with a path to redemption, if they agreed to become a slave for a designated period of time to the person whom they had wronged. Steal from a shop owner? You could pay him back through slave labor.

And slave owners, supposedly, were held legally responsible for the well-being of their slaves. Physically abusing them was outlawed and could even result in the early termination of their slave-contracts.

Raul could understand such practices, especially since those people didn't enjoy the same level of prison infrastructure as they did today. Hell, a part of him could even see that system as being, in some ways, better than simply throwing criminals in a box and leaving them to rot. The opportunity for penance was invaluable as a means of reintegrating criminals back into civilized society.

It made sense to him.

But not all slave trades had been conducted that way, of course. Far from it, in fact."

"2260

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

The slavers that had taken control of Miro were perhaps the worst kind. The kind associated with Abolish.

Raul had only observed the town for a few hours, at most, and he hadn't even gotten that close. He'd found a vantage point atop a rocky cliff and spied on the inhabitants with binoculars. But in that short time, he'd witnessed public beatings and people being branded like cattle. He'd seen groveling and weeping in the streets. And he'd seen forced labor as well. A large field of orange trees sat on the western edge of the town, and a handful of people were being forced to pick the fruit.

It didn't seem like slave labor was their chief motivator, however. The number of slaves they had on the job was small when compared to how many were being tormented in the rest of the town.

No, Raul suspected that they were mainly being rounded up and shipped off to be sold elsewhere. And indeed, those suspicions soon turned out to be accurate when he witnessed a big truck being loaded up with people who had been freshly branded by their captors.

Kidnapping for the purpose of the slave trade obviously had enormous historical precedence as well, but as far as Raul knew, the practice had all but disappeared in the modern day. Most forms of slavery today were variations on wage slavery. Not this.

Only real monsters could get away with this.

Esai broke the silence of their dinner, stirring Raul from his thoughts. ""If they're still branding them, then the take over must have been pretty recent.""

Neither Raul nor Adan responded.

They were in the privacy of their own hotel room, but Esai was still purposely leaving some identifying words out. No mention of Miro, nor what the ""branding"" specifically referred to. Perhaps it was an unnecessary precaution, but you never did know who might overhear, even in places of seeming seclusion."

"2261

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Esai's gaze didn't lift up from his meal, though he didn't seem like he intended to eat the rest. ""There's a chance that they won't stick around for much longer,"" he said.

""More than just a chance,"" said Adan.

Raul knew what they were getting at. The slavers were traffickers. As soon as they'd moved the residents of Miro, there would be no reason to stay. And the reinforcements from Warrenhold still needed time to organize. Even if they got on a plane right now and made the flight today--which was unlikely--they might still miss their window to rescue the remaining townsfolk.

And those Abolish bastards might get away.

But their reapers had made it clear. This mission wasn't about getting involved in the problems of the local residents. They weren't on a mission to stomp out injustice or protect the innocent. They were just here to observe. To gather intel. And locate the Sword of Unso, if possible.

Raul understood that. Esai and Adan did, too. They had priorities. And reinforcements were on the way. They could just wait. They could go diving, looking for that ""sunken cave near the two-toned rock"" again. If all three of them went together, maybe they'd actually find it this time.

Raul heard himself say something. ""What if...?"" He didn't finish the sentence, but he suddenly had his brothers' undivided attention.

""What if what, bro?"" Adan urged.

Raul struggled for the right words. It was a dumb idea, still half-formed in his mind. ""What if... we just... delay some stuff?""

His brothers eyed him steadily, then glanced at one another.

""Harassment,"" summarized Esai.

""They won't like that,"" observed Adan.

""Who won't?"" inquired Esai.

""Everyone,"" answered Raul. ""Going against the grain.""

""Yeah, bro, true,"" concurred Adan.

And there was silence.

""So should we do it?"" said Esai.

""Hell yeah, bro,"" they both said."

"2262 -- CCXXI.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-One: 'Fears not the torch...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, it sure did suck, not having access to his undead strength or endurance at times like this. Sure, at least the recuperative ""hangover"" later wouldn't be nearly as bad, but it sure would've come in handy during all this hiking.

Raul hadn't realized just how rugged the terrain was. These wooded mountains weren't even that big. The Wares Mountains back home easily put them to shame. But Raul's only interaction with those giants had been occasionally looking at them on the horizon.

As he put one foot in front of the other and tried not to dwell on how heavily he was breathing or how much he was sweating, he found himself wondering if perhaps that pride in his homeland had blinded him to the difficulty of this task.

Maybe just a tad.

The little mountain here wasn't tall, but it was certainly steep. The road below was one of only two paths in or out of Miro. The other one was on the opposite side of the town. Adan and Esai were handling it. Raul would have to make do on his own.

He stopped to catch his breath. The sun was almost finished setting, already. He had a flashlight in his bag, but even so, this wasn't going to get any easier at night.

Not to mention, the longer he took, the more likely it was that one more truck full of slaves would make it out of Miro.

He had to block the road. And preferably, he had to make it look like a natural occurrence. If the enemy realized they were being sabotaged, everything would become more complicated.

And god knew, things were complicated enough already.

He finally pulled out his flashlight and shone it up ahead, searching the jagged rock faces there.

Hmm. No clear path for him, it seemed. He'd have to climb straight upward if he wanted to keep going this direction.

Well, maybe he didn't need to. Maybe this was high enough."
"2262 -- CCXXI.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-One: 'Fears not the torch...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, it sure did suck, not having access to his undead strength or endurance at times like this. Sure, at least the recuperative ""hangover"" later wouldn't be nearly as bad, but it sure would've come in handy during all this hiking.

Raul hadn't realized just how rugged the terrain was. These wooded mountains weren't even that big. The Waress Mountains back home easily put them to shame. But Raul's only interaction with those giants had been occasionally looking at them on the horizon.

As he put one foot in front of the other and tried not to dwell on how heavily he was breathing or how much he was sweating, he found himself wondering if perhaps that pride in his homeland had blinded him to the difficulty of this task.

Maybe just a tad.

The little mountain here wasn't tall, but it was certainly steep. The road below was one of only two paths in or out of Miro. The other one was on the opposite side of the town. Adan and Esai were handling it. Raul would have to make do on his own.

He stopped to catch his breath. The sun was almost finished setting, already. He had a flashlight in his bag, but even so, this wasn't going to get any easier at night.

Not to mention, the longer he took, the more likely it was that one more truck full of slaves would make it out of Miro.

He had to block the road. And preferably, he had to make it look like a natural occurrence. If the enemy realized they were being sabotaged, everything would become more complicated.

And god knew, things were complicated enough already.

He finally pulled out his flashlight and shone it up ahead, searching the jagged rock faces there.

Hmm. No clear path for him, it seemed. He'd have to climb straight upward if he wanted to keep going this direction.

Well, maybe he didn't need to. Maybe this was high enough."
"2263

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Raul searched around for any large, loose boulders. He spotted a couple candidates, though they were stuck into the ground more deeply than he would've liked, and it was also difficult to tell if they alone would be enough.

He'd never started a landslide before.

Hmm. Yeah, those rocks wouldn't do the job, he decided. He might have to use more of his power than he first thought.

In that case, this could get very tricky. If he wasn't careful, he could easily kill himself here. If he lost his footing, he would go tumbling down the side of this mountain along with everything else and probably end up buried alive or simply crushed to death.

Well, this was characteristic of plans that were made on such short notice, he supposed. High risk. There would be no telling how long it might take his reaper to locate his corpse way out here in the wilds of Vantalay. Hell, depending on how the war developed, that could take years.

So he didn't want to slip and fall. He needed to make sure that he could maintain solid footing.

Perhaps his alteration power over friction could solve that problem for him, too. This awkward, uneven ground added some uncertainty to the equation, but he felt like he could manage it.

Hopefully.

He positioned himself with his back against the rocky wall that he'd found. He checked directly above his head, wanting to make sure there were no obviously loose boulders up there that would fall and crush him, and when he was satisfied with where he was standing, he crouched down, and dug his fingers into a patch of dirt at his feet.

He needed to two things. First, he needed to create a kind of ""increased friction bubble"" for himself--something to prevent the ground directly beneath him from moving.

Secondly, he had to decrease the friction just about everywhere else."
"2264

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

A sudden thought struck him, and Raul hesitated.

He pulled his right hand out of the dirt and grabbed his phone out of his pocket. He texted his brothers, informing him that he was in position and waiting on them.

If they were to be discreet, then it would be best if both roads were blocked simultaneously. Two landslides happening at the same time might instead seem like one incident. Which would be less suspicious.

He didn't bother to articulate all of that in his text just now, but he doubted he would need to. They'd understand.

So he waited a bit longer for word from his brothers. They were taking a while, which was unsurprising. They had farther to go than he did.

He pulled out his binoculars and spied on the town. This wasn't a very good vantage point compared to the one he'd used earlier in the day, but it let him see a few of the buildings at least. He could see a handful of apparent guards on duty.

Hold on.

Was that someone using binoculars, too?

They turned this way.

Raul turned off his flashlight.

The guard was still looking in this direction. They weren't using binoculars equipped with night-vision, were they?

He hunkered down a bit lower, enough to let the treeline block his line of sight.

Hmm. These Abolishers were more vigilant than he thought. The Killer of Krohin had a reputation for brutality, not competency, but perhaps in this case, they went hand-in-hand. You couldn't maintain such notoriety without at least a little bit of the latter, Raul supposed.

The text arrived from his brothers. They were in position, too. Good.

He was tempted to pop his head up another time and look toward Miro again, but he resisted. He sent his response text, telling his brothers to go ahead, and then dug his fingers back into the dirt.

He tried to go deep with his friction. He needed to shift a lot of ground. Moving the topsoil would be easiest but probably not enough."
"2265

Nothing was moving yet, so he pushed harder, removing more and more friction. His ability was a bit difficult to work with insofar as it doesn't offer much mental or visual feedback for him. Was it working? Was it not? Friction could be a little obtuse, at times.

But then, all at once, the earth shifted and heaved. The entire side of the mountain fell away from him in the darkness, taking trees and boulders with it. The rumbling roar was so loud and intense that he certainly would've been knocked off his feet if he hadn't already been crouching.

Dirt and rock and splintered wood flew up in all directions, creating a cloud over the road below.

For a time, Raul just kind of stared.

Well, it worked. Better than he'd expected, honestly. It was a bit hard to tell through the darkness and the debris, but the blockage on the road was maybe a quarter-mile long or so. At least.

Not too shabby.

And the mountain. Wow. It looked like it had been sheered clean by a giant razor. Now that he'd released his power, he stepped off of his safe little island and set foot on the smooth, sloping rock that was left.

It was almost slippery now. He'd have to be careful going back down.

Oh crap, he hoped he'd parked the rental car far enough away. He hadn't expected the landslide to be quite so huge. Perhaps he'd underestimated his own power a bit. Well, he supposed that would make sense, considering his family's isolation all these years. Training was one thing, but testing his capabilities out in the field like this was quite another.

He was all but surfing by the time he made it down to the bottom of the slope. He used his ability to help slow his descent, making sure not to be too abrupt, lest he throw himself off balance and topple forward face first.

He'd made that kind of mistake many times as a teenager."

"2266

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 1 of 14))~~

He started toward the direction of the car. He sent another quick text to his brothers, informing them that he was done. Thankfully, the reply arrived soon thereafter. They were heading back to the car, too. It would take them a bit longer to get back to it, so he'd have to wait for them again.

First, he had to find the thing, though. With all the dust and debris everywhere, he was becoming increasingly worried that the car really had been a victim of the landslide.

He kept searching.

A sudden noise acquired his attention from the direction of Miro, and he turned to look. It was difficult to tell through all the lingering particles in the air, but he thought he could see headlights in the distance, and as he listened more intently, he realized it was an approaching truck.

He hunkered down again.

This was both good and bad, Raul thought. He'd managed to prevent another truck from leaving Miro, so that was great. But now they were close. There were probably hostiles in that truck, as well as slaves.

And the rental car was still nowhere to be seen.

He tried to pick up his pace as he sent off a warning text to his brothers, telling them to be wary of enemies in the vicinity.

Gah. There was so much debris. Uprooted trees, shattered boulders, splintered wood--everywhere he looked, there were more things to be careful of. If he tripped and injured himself, he couldn't regenerate.

He heard yelling behind him, then turned to see specks of light moving over the top of the wrecked land. Flashlights, most likely. Nothing to panic about. He had a good distance on them.

Then he saw a pair of blackbirds high up in the night sky. Despite the darkness, they didn't blend in, instead having ethereal auras around them that made them glow in that all-too-familiar way.

Reapers, no doubt."

"2267

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 2 of 14))~~

They were far away but not that far. And Raul was all alone out here. If the reapers hadn't sensed his soul already, they soon would.

He needed to pick up his pace. He concentrated and stamped the uneven ground with his foot. A path ahead of him appeared in the ground as the topmost layer of wreckage slid away, down a gentle slope in the direction of the car.

The path that he'd just created for himself wasn't steep, but he knew perfectly well how dangerous it would be to walk on it haphazardly. With as much friction as he'd removed, it would be like ice now.

But of course, Raul had considerable experience with this tactic.

He dove straight onto the path and went flying down it, feeling the evening wind rush past him. He kept his balance perfectly. He could go much faster than this, if needed, but as the speed increased, so did the accompanying risks, and he wasn't yet convinced that such drastic measures were necessary.

When he looked back, the reapers were little more than specks in the distance.

Excellent.

He still had no idea where the rental car was, but the fact of the matter was that he and his brothers didn't actually need it. With their power, they could make it back to Ridgemark in no time on their own.

The ground began to even out as he arrived at the edge of the landslide, but Raul hardly slowed at all. He extended his friction-reduced path onto the flat pavement of the road and just kept going, though he did start pumping with his legs as if he really was ice skating in order to help maintain his speed.

Still skating, he whipped out his phone to text his brothers another time. It was a shame that they had to abandon their vehicle, but oh well. Helping those poor folks in Miro was more than worth the lost money."

"2268

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 3 of 14))~~

If he'd known how big the landslide would be, he could've saved the car. That was a result of his own lack of field experience, Raul knew. Hopefully, the project leaders back in Warrenhold wouldn't be too upset at him for allowing such a waste.

His brothers were taking a while to respond to his text, Raul noticed.

The road ahead was straight and clear, so he turned around and started skating backwards. He pulled out his binoculars again.

It was too far and too dark. He couldn't make anything out.

He allowed the friction on his path to regather, and his pace slowed.

""C'mon,"" he said under his breath. ""Respond, bros.""

He waited.

It seemed like that was all he was doing, lately. Waiting on his brothers. He normally didn't mind. They were one unit. Always had been. That unity was what made them effective.

But this was agonizing.

They knew that they were supposed to send confirmation. This wasn't carelessness on their part. And the text looked like it had gone through. He typed it out a second time and sent it again, just in case.

He was fully stopped now, just standing there in the middle of the road, continually checking the binoculars in vain. He watched the clock on his phone, growing more tense with each passing second.

Three minutes went by without word. Then five. Then eight. Ten.

This was certainly too long. No one was chasing him, it seemed, but given the seriousness of the situation, with hostiles having been in the vicinity, ten minutes of silence was cause to start thinking the worst.

Which he was. Had they been captured?
Finally, a response arrived.

ok

ok

Relief washed through him. Both of them had answered, almost in unison. Another text from Adan came through.

meet up comprised. need new location. closer by Raul's prior sense of relief diminished as quickly as it had come. And another text arrived, this time from Esai.

agreed

And a set of latitude and longitude coordinates appeared.

Raul's green eyes went hollow as he stared at the screen."

"2269

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 4 of 14))~~

Those texts weren't from his brothers. Or if they were, then they were being sent under duress.

Raul knew this because he had discussed the subject of secondary rendezvous points with them before the mission. There should have been no need to send coordinates. They both should have already known where to go.

Damn those Abolish snakes in lakefire.

They were trying to lure him into a trap. No doubt, if he actually went to those coordinates, he would soon find himself surrounded.

He checked those coordinates anyway, making sure that he didn't accidentally head toward them, and then started skating his way back to Ridgemark.

He put his phone away. There was one other thing he needed to confirm.

Oh, boy, he wasn't looking forward to this conversation.

'Arumoro,' he called.

'Raul,' came his reaper's private response from all the way back in Warrenhold.

There was no dancing around it. '...Have Adan and Esai been captured?'

'Why in damnation are you asking that?!' yelled Arumoro, no longer in the echo of privacy.

Raul explained.

'You did all that without permission?'

'We needed to buy time for our reinforcements to arrive,' said Raul.

'You still should have told us about it!'

'You would have just forbidden us from doing it.'

'You're damn right we would have!'

Raul's expression remained steadfast in the darkness. 'I don't regret it. And neither do they, I'm sure. The operation was successful. Abolish won't be able to move anyone out of Miro for a while.'

The reaper sighed at him.

'Would you mind yelling at me later?' said Raul. 'I need you to confirm for me that Adan and Esai are actually captured and not just lost or dead.'

Arumoro growled at him, but said, 'One minute.' And presumably, he went to go talk to their reapers."

"2270

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 5 of 14))~~

The forest was beginning to thin, and the taller hotels of Ridgemark were coming into view. Despite his lack of access to undead vigor, Raul still wasn't even breaking a sweat.

He meant what he'd said about not regretting his actions. But he also wondered how long that landslide would truly last. There were obviously servants there in Miro. Depending on what abilities they had, removing the blockages might be trivial for them.

But they had to be spooked now, also. Even if they did manage to clear the roads, they might think twice about trying to move any more slaves. The Triplets had wanted to make their dual landslides look like a natural occurrence, but perhaps it was better for the hostages this way.

Or maybe he was just trying to rationalize his failure away.

Arumoro returned with the news he'd been expecting. 'They are indeed captured,' he said, speaking privately again. 'However, their captives haven't frozen their heads yet, because they're trying to figure out who they are.'

Ah. That was good news.

Partially.

'...Are they being tortured?' said Raul.

'Yes.'

Raul's jaw clenched. His brothers could handle it. They were servants. Part of what made torture effective was the threat of death. Without it, Adan and Esai would be all but impossible to crack.

But the pain that they were going to go through...

And other forms of torture existed, too, of course. It depended on how creative their captors were.

'Also, it's unclear if Abolish realizes that they're servants yet,' said Arumoro.

'They should at least suspect as much,' said Raul. 'It would've been difficult for non-servants to cause those landslides.'

'Yes, well, this is Abolish. They might be morons.'

Considering how they had tried to trap him, Raul doubted that. And he didn't think a bunch of idiots would have been able to successfully capture his brothers."

"2271 -- CCXXII.

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 6 of 14))~~

'I think it would be a mistake to underestimate these enemies,' said Raul.

'I'm not underestimating anyone,' said Arumoro. 'I'm just trying to be optimistic.'

Raul found that amusing. 'Heh, really? That must be hard for you.'

'Extremely.'

Raul wiped his mirth away again. 'I assume Adan and Esai are unable to destroy their own brains?'

'Yeah. I asked. And their reapers would've already started regenerating them by now if they could.'

Then the Abolishers were indeed being cautious. They must've had his brothers tied up or otherwise bound such that they couldn't move much. Destroying their own brains wasn't the easiest trick to pull off with their power, but they did have compact explosives in their bags. They must have not been able to use them in time. Unfortunately, a simple knife or gunshot wound to the skull was not damaging enough to constitute regrowing the brain from scratch.

'This a real mess you've gotten yourselves in,' said Arumoro.

Raul understood why the reaper felt that way, but frankly, he disagreed. It was far from ideal, true, but in the end, the mission hadn't really changed. There were just two more people in need of rescue, now.

And he was a Rainlord.

This was nothing to be growing demoralized over. It was just providing more motivation.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Two: 'O, inimical ambassador...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The tension in Warrenhold was much more noticeable over the next few days. The Rainlords were uneasy with all of these sudden developments, and Hector couldn't blame them. The team they dispatched Sair was quick to start sending back news, and while it wasn't necessarily bad, it wasn't good, either.

Apparently, the fighting on Sair's eastern border was already incredibly fierce. Iceheart was thankfully still there and supporting the Sandlords' defense of the nation, but on Abolish's side, there were two men causing problems who were called Bloodeye and the Man of Crows."

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 6 of 14))~~

'I think it would be a mistake to underestimate these enemies,' said Raul.

'I'm not underestimating anyone,' said Arumoro. 'I'm just trying to be optimistic.'

Raul found that amusing. 'Heh, really? That must be hard for you.'

'Extremely.'

Raul wiped his mirth away again. 'I assume Adan and Esai are unable to destroy their own brains?'

'Yeah. I asked. And their reapers would've already started regenerating them by now if they could.'

Then the Abolishers were indeed being cautious. They must've had his brothers tied up or otherwise bound such that they couldn't move much. Destroying their own brains wasn't the easiest trick to pull off with their power, but they did have compact explosives in their bags. They must have not been able to use them in time. Unfortunately, a simple knife or gunshot wound to the skull was not damaging enough to constitute regrowing the brain from scratch.

'This a real mess you've gotten yourselves in,' said Arumoro.

Raul understood why the reaper felt that way, but frankly, he disagreed. It was far from ideal, true, but in the end, the mission hadn't really changed. There were just two more people in need of rescue, now.

And he was a Rainlord.

This was nothing to be growing demoralized over. It was just providing more motivation.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Two: 'O, inimical ambassador...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

The tension in Warrenhold was much more noticeable over the next few days. The Rainlords were uneasy with all of these sudden developments, and Hector couldn't blame them. The team they dispatched Sair was quick to start sending back news, and while it wasn't necessarily bad, it wasn't good, either.

Apparently, the fighting on Sair's eastern border was already incredibly fierce. Iceheart was thankfully still there and supporting the Sandlords' defense of the nation, but on Abolish's side, there were two men causing problems who were called Bloodeye and the Man of Crows."
"2272

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 7 of 14))~~

It was worrisome news, to be sure, but Hector still had a fair amount of confidence in the Sandlords--and the Sunsmith, Abbas Saqqaf, in particular. He'd been the only person to actually witness that man take down the Salesmen of Death, so perhaps it was only natural for no one else to share his opinion on this.

Hector didn't bother trying to convince anyone else. He was still new to this whole ""superhuman war"" business, so he figured it wasn't really his place to be tossing his inexperienced opinions around, no matter how strongly he felt about that.

However, just because he wasn't worried about Sair being conquered by Abolish didn't mean that he wasn't concerned about the situation there at all. According to their team's reports, the intensity of the fighting there was causing the Vanguard to send more and more resources there, which meant that once this conflict was over, they would probably have an even greater foothold in the region than before.

Assuming Abolish didn't win, that was.

Needless to say, that notion was also troubling the Rainlords immensely. Thanks to this war, their hope of reclaiming their land was beginning to look further away than ever.

And of course, the news from Vantalay hadn't helped anyone's nerves, either.

Two of the Blackburn Triplets captured. What a rotten development.

After hearing about that, there was no way in hell that Hector could have possibly prevented Melchor Blackburn from departing immediately. He abandoned that notion entirely.

But he hadn't allowed Melchor to go alone.

Leo had indeed gone with him, as well as Evangelina Stroud and Diego Redwater.

Hector had been worried about that conversation with Leo, but when Hector explained the situation to him, Leo had agreed almost immediately. It seemed that Ericoros hadn't been exaggerating when he talked about how much the town of Miro meant to both of them."

"2273

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 8 of 14))~~

There were, however, some delays. All of the people making the trip were fugitives in one form or another, so they couldn't just waltz through airport security without any concerns. Leo already had his own fake credentials and passport taken care of, but Roman Fullister had been gracious enough to lend a hand for the others. The Rainlords had a few of their own people who could craft those kinds of things for them--as they had done for the previously deployed teams--but Roman's assistance let them get it done in half the time.

The actual trip to Vantalay was still a problem, though. While the region around Ridgemark wasn't technically a no-fly zone, there were barely any planes going to it. The general sentiment among the Rainlords was that it was too dangerous, so instead, the reinforcement team flew to Palei first, then took a boat the rest of the way.

By now, they should have arrived, but they had yet to report any progress on the liberation of Miro. Hector certainly didn't mind them taking their time. He'd made sure to tell them that it would be ideal if they could somehow manage to free the town without drawing too much attention, and they all seemed to agree with that opinion, even Leo.

But Hector wasn't really expecting that to happen, quite frankly. He was expecting the mission in Vantalay to turn into an absolute shitstorm. He just hoped for a positive overall outcome.

This whole thing was so strange. Being so invested in events that he wasn't even participating in. Events that were taking place thousands of kilometers away.

Sure, on some level, it was nice to not be in imminent danger himself, but he was finding this far more anxiety-inducing. Sending people he cared about into danger was horrifying, even when he was confident that they could handle themselves.

He fucking hated it."

"2274

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 9 of 14))~~

And there was more bad news as well. Harper Norez was no longer in the country. As expected, the man had been recalled by the Vanguard. He hadn't specified where he was being sent to--or perhaps he hadn't been allowed to specify--but Garovel seemed to believe that it was Melmoore.

Harper's reaper, Darsihm, had told them during the Gala that Harper's direct superior officer was one Captain General Frederick. And since that little revelation, Garovel had learned quite a bit more about that person.

Fen Frederick was the man's full name, and he was widely known as the Surgeon Saint. He had a reputation as being something of a miracle worker. Supposedly, he had saved countless lives that were previously believed to have already been lost. Where other doctors failed, the Surgeon Saint somehow found a way.

Or so the claims went.

It seemed pretty weird that such a famous man of medicine would ascend to the third highest rank in the Vanguard, beneath only the Field Marshals and High Commander Sermung himself. And apparently, the guy performed life-saving surgeries all the time, despite all his other responsibilities.

'They say,' Garovel had told him, 'that Frederick always seeks out the bloodiest war zones in the world, not just to put an end to the fighting there, but also to provide topnotch medical care for the people with the most urgent need of it. I've told you before about how I think saints are overrated, but... after all I've heard about this guy, it's hard not to admire him. Even the Rainlords seem to like him, and their love for the Vanguard is at an all-time low, right now.'

Hector could only imagine what a doctor who had studied medicine for two hundred years or more would be capable of. If circumstances were different, Hector might've liked to meet him."

"2275

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 10 of 14))~~

The reason Garovel thought Harper Norez would be sent to Melmoore was because he'd heard that the Surgeon Saint was currently operating there. And if everything else the reaper had heard about Frederick was true, then that meant that Melmoore was one of the deadliest war zones in the world, right now.

Which unfortunately made sense.

That country had been invaded on two different fronts, north and south. Technically, Vantalay was much worse off, as it was fighting four different countries simultaneously, those being Czacoa, Yena Maria, Naos, and Lyste. However, Vantalay had also been the aggressor in that conflict, while Melmoore was simply defending its own borders. Plus, Czacoa, Yena Maria, and Naos were all tiny nations, not much larger than Atreya.

But then again, perhaps it was wrong to judge their military strength by the amount of land they possessed. Garovel mentioned as much. Historically, larger nations held far more power, having access to a much greater pool of resources. But in the modern age, it wasn't always so cut and dry, anymore.

By all accounts, that little country called Czacoa was putting up quite the fight. Everyone seemed to think--given Vantalay's comparative size and first strike advantage--that Czacoa was doomed, but so far, it was apparently holding firm.

But of course, the war had only just begun.

As for Atreya itself, Hector was observing some interesting developments in the situation here. Clearly, the general public was uneasy with so many terrible things going on abroad, but it hadn't slowed the growth of the Darksteel National Bank.

In fact, that unease might've actually been increasing it.

That was what Amelia Carthrace seemed to believe, anyway. In this time of great turmoil, the people were looking for stability wherever they could find it. And many of them were hanging their hopes squarely upon Hector's shoulders.

It was almost becoming a problem of its own, actually, because the Bank had begun to draw attention from Atreya's neighbors."

"2276

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 11 of 14))~~

Amelia showed Hector a news report from Lorent about him and the Darksteel National Bank. It seemed to just be a fluff piece of some kind, expressing vague praise and a bit of confusion, so Hector mostly just wondered why the Madame Carthrace was bothering to show it to him.

But then she showed him another one. And another. And another. And then still one more. They weren't all about him, per se, as some were just about the generally insane circumstances that Atreya had been through in the past year, but Hector did appear in all of the reports at one point or another.

He had no idea why Lorent had taken an interest in him, but he was prepared to write it off as just some kind of strange foreign fad that he lacked the cultural context to fully understand.

He didn't want to ignore it completely, though. Lorent was an important neighbor. It was the country on Atreya's northern border, which meant it was practically on Warrenhold's doorstep. Hell, maybe that had something to do with it. The region around Gray Rock was almost entirely enveloped by Lorent.

Still, that seemed unlikely. Lorent was much larger than Atreya. They probably wouldn't have any lingering attachment to a tiny bit of land that had been independent for three hundred years.

Whatever the reason was, it was fucking weird.

And it certainly didn't get any less weird when he received a call from Queen Helen, telling him that the Lorentian Ambassador wanted to meet with him.

Hector had blinked a few times in disbelief when he heard that.

<"Apparently, you have gotten quite famous there,"> the Queen told him. <"However, I suspect that he does not wish to meet with you merely because of your notoriety.">

"You suspect?" said Hector. "You don't actually know what he wants?"

<"Oh, no, he claims that your fame alone is the reason,"> said Helen. <"I simply do not believe him.">
"2277

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 12 of 14))~~
"Why would he lie about that?" said Hector.

<"Because he does not wish to tell me the truth,"> said the Queen.

Hector's expression flattened a little. "Well, yeah... I meant, like, what would he want to hide from you?"

<"Oh, any number of things. Perhaps he means to make you an offer in hopes of stealing you from Atreya.">

Hector blinked, and his head reared back. Seriously?

<"Or perhaps he hopes to conduct business with you discreetly, behind my back. Or he could simply be trying to plant an idea in your head and use you to help persuade me of something in the future. The possibilities are only limited by one's imagination, Hector."">

He scratched his head. ""Uh... okay. Are you sure I should meet with this guy, then? Because this is sounding like nothing but trouble.""

<""Yes, it probably will be. However, our relationship with Lorent is vital, now more than ever. This could be an easy way to improve--or to at least gain some insight into what their government is thinking. I have no doubt that the ambassador requested this meeting at someone else's behest."">

Damn. She was really trusting him with some major shit here, wasn't she?

Hector was honored. And also pretty fucking uncomfortable.

""...Alright,"" he said. As long as Garovel came to the meeting with him, Hector figured he wouldn't screw things up too badly. ""When will this meeting take place?""

<""He will be at the royal palace tomorrow."">

""Tomorrow?!""

<""I am aware it is short notice,""> said the Queen. <""I can postpone it, if you prefer, but the sooner, the better. The ambassador seems quite enthused to meet you, but he is also a busy man, much like yourself. It could be quite some time before both of your schedules line up perfectly."">

""Ah..."

<""I understand if you have more important matters to take care of, but I ask that you make time for this, if at all possible."">

"2278

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 13 of 14))~~

And so it was that Hector found himself visiting Bosliat Palace again. The crowd wasn't nearly as crazy as it was during the Gala, which was nice, and yet somehow, he still felt like he was drawing even more attention than before. The Gala had been so busy and full of big name lords from all over the country, but now, it seemed like every single person he passed by paused to stare at him.

Maybe the Bank had something to do with it, too. He hadn't opened it before the Gala, and it had only increased his fame further.

Man.

This was just life now, wasn't it?

In the back of his mind, he'd kind of been thinking that this fame would eventually die down or normalize a little--that fifteen minutes or whatever would be up. He'd been looking forward to it, actually.

But he was starting to realize that this really wasn't going to just go away. Thanks to the Bank, it seemed like his fame within Atreya's borders had reached some kind of critical mass. It was now totally self-sustaining.

Was there a term for being both flattered and horrified at the same time? Mere ""embarrassment"" didn't seem like it quite captured the depth of what he was feeling, these days.

Well, at least he could relegate his utter confusion on that subject to a background thought process.

And it sure was nice to visit Bosliat again, if for no other reason than to admire the architecture as his designated guide led him down the tall corridors to his meeting.

The Lorentian Ambassador was a man named Edgar Stoutamire, but thanks to the short notice of this meeting, Hector hadn't been able to learn much more about the guy.

When he finally saw the man, Hector couldn't help being a bit surprised. He'd never seen someone quite so... square-shaped."
"2279

~~((The Mother's Day Special -- page 14 of 14))~~

""Ah,"" the man said, his flat face about as expressive as a wall. ""Lord Goffe. There you are. Thank you for meeting me. I know how busy you must be during these turbulent times.""

Hector returned a nod. ""Ambassador Stoutamire. Pleased to make your acquaintance." Behind him, the woman who'd guided him through the palace bowed and excused herself silently. Hector might not have even realized she left if not for the Scarf.

"Not as pleased as I am, I'm sure." The surly look on his face didn't match his words, nor did his tone. Maybe he just had one of those faces, though.

But that did strike Hector as a little odd. The man was an ambassador, an official representative of an entire nation. You'd think a person with that kind of job would have a friendlier disposition.

Then again, Hector supposed he was in no position to judge something like that. "Why is it that you requested to meet with me?" he asked.

"Straight to the point, then." Stoutamire adjusted the silvery cuffs on his black-and-red suit. "I am unaccustomed to such earnestness, but I must say, it is a welcome change. My peers often tell me that I am too blunt by a half."

Earnestness? Hector wasn't even sure what he meant.

Stoutamire looked him square in the eye. "I have come here today in hopes of enlisting your help, Lord Goffe."

Hector did not react. He just waited for elaboration.

"I do not know if this is the... 'proper channel' to go through for such a request, but all the same, I hope the unusual circumstances of this meeting have at least made clear the severity of what I am about to say. My... superiors do not wish me to use the word 'desperate' to refer to our situation." The man allowed a pause. "So I will not use it."

"...Why didn't you inform the Queen of this request for aid?" said Hector."

"2280

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

"To be very frank with you," said Stoutamire, "I feared the Queen would blankly refuse us."

Hector allowed himself to frown.

"You are highly valued by your nation," the ambassador went on.
"This much is obvious. My concern was that the Queen would flatly tell me no and then never even inform you of this request in this first place. I know this may cause you to think me a duplicitous snake, but the matter is grave enough that I felt I had to appeal to you in person. Please, Lord Goffe, I only ask that you hear me out. Innocent people are dying."

Holy hell. At the start of that little speech, the guy hadn't been emoting much at all, but by the end of it, his passion could be heard in every word. It was still a bit subdued compared to most people, perhaps, but it was there.

The Queen wouldn't be happy to hear most of what the man had just said, Hector figured, but she'd also expected that Stoutamire had been lying to her. What would she want him to do in this situation?

Hmm.

She'd probably want him to do whatever he thought was right, wouldn't she? Reflecting on what she'd told him of this meeting, that was the impression that he was now getting.

Stoutamire seemed to be growing uncomfortable with the protracted silence.

Hector finally sat down in the chair next to him. "What exactly is the problem?"

Stoutamire followed suit and sat down as well. There was no table between them, but the window in the ceiling allowed a solid beam of light to pour into the middle of the chamber where a small table might go. "It is a monster. A savage beast. It has slain over fifty citizens of Lorent in the last six months, and the frequency of the killings has only increased."

"2281

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

A monster? Hector hadn't known what to expect, but that answer still surprised him. As far as he was aware, Lorent was about as peaceful as Atreya.

Well, as peaceful as Atreya used to be.

It therefore seemed strange to him that there would be anything blatantly supernatural in the country. There were probably a few hidden servants hanging out there, sure, but a monster? A real one?

And the government there wanted him to hunt it?

He had a lot of questions, and he was silent for a time as he mulled them over in his mind. Garovel wasn't saying anything, either, which struck Hector as unusual.

Eh, the reaper probably just didn't want to interrupt. Hector had little doubt that Garovel would have plenty to tell him later.

""...You don't have anyone in Lorent who can kill this monster for you?"" said Hector.

""It would seem not. Several hunters were previously contracted to kill the beast."" The ambassador's stern face became abruptly more so. ""None have succeeded.""

Well, shit.

""In fact, I am understating it,"" the man continued. ""Not only have none succeeded, but none have even returned. Which is particularly troubling, I feel. One would imagine that the more cowardly among the hunters would have been quick enough to flee and save their own lives, but apparently not. Even merely retrieving their bodies has often proved too difficult. The beast is extremely territorial.""

Geez. Hector cocked an eyebrow. ""How many hunters have you lost, exactly?""

""Forty-three in total,"" said Stoutamire. ""That is in addition to all of civilians who have been killed.""

Hector blinked. ""That practically doubles the number of victims.""

""Yes, you see, at beginning of this... problem... we did not realize the full extent of the danger, and so a call went out for volunteer hunters. Open to the public."" The man shook his head grimly. ""I heard it was a festive gathering, at first. Full of confidence and optimism. Until it became a slaughter.""

"2282

Hector touched his chin as he considered the man's words. ""If the monster is territorial, then shouldn't it be relatively simple to avoid more casualties?""

""By closing off its territory to the public, yes,"" said Stoutamire. ""We tried that. It seemed to work for a time, but the damned thing keeps getting around our barricades. Or breaking through them, in some cases.""

""Does this creature have a name? And what does it look like?""

""At this point, it has acquired several names. The Beast of Lorent is unfortunately becoming the most popular, I fear. As for its appearance, the rarity of living witnesses makes describing it difficult. However, before you ask: we do indeed have confirmation it is a monster and not... ah, one of your kind.""

Hector knew perfectly well what he meant, but he couldn't help wanting to press him a bit on that. ""My kind?""

""A human with supernatural abilities,"" said Stoutamire.

Hmm. Not using the term servant or mentioning reapers. As Hector expected.

""I... hope I have not caused offense,"" said the ambassador. ""That was not my intention.""

At that, Hector cracked a slight smile. ""You didn't. I appreciate your concern, though. More importantly, how were you able to confirm that it's a monster?""

""A couple witnesses yet live who saw the creature from afar. But primarily, it is satellite imagery that we have to thank."" The man reached into a briefcase that had been on the floor this whole time and pulled out a small stack of photographs. He handed them to Hector for inspection.

They weren't the clearest things in the world, but he could make out the gist. One was of a sprawling forest, viewed from above. Another, a small town. Then, a field of some kind.

And at the center of each shot was a dark blot. At first, it didn't really look like much, probably because of the angle, but as Hector compared it against the other objects in the photographs...

It was gigantic."

"2283

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

In the photo of the town, there were numerous buildings--or the remains of them, at least--and this Beast of Lorent, whatever the hell it was, looked comparable in size to most of them.

It made him think of the worms in the Undercrust.

But it couldn't be another one of those. He could make out an occasional limb in some of the shots. And while it did leave some noticeable trails of destruction in its wake, there were no obvious signs of sludge.

Plus, he wasn't even certain that worms could survive on the surface. It might've been too cold up here for them.

'Hmm,' mused Garovel privately as he examined the photos from over Hector's shoulder. 'Yeah. I can see why they think this thing isn't human.'

'Could be some kind of crazy mutation user,' said Hector.

'Or something else,' said Garovel.

That made Hector curious. 'Do you have any guesses?'

'A few. But large monsters on the planet's surface are rare, especially in the more civilized regions of the world like this one. Historically, extremely dangerous creatures were often hunted to extinction by one group of servants or another. In retrospect, it's enough to make modern scientists or environmentalists cry, but it was for everyone's safety. In my view, that is. I'm sure it's difficult for many modern people to relate to the experience of being forced to live in constant fear of horrific monster attacks.'

'I never learned about any of that in school,' said Hector.

'Really? Hmm. Well, in fairness, I'm talking about VERY ancient history, here. Probably aren't too many physical records of this stuff left.'

'Damn. So... this monster REALLY shouldn't be here, then.'

'Pretty much.'

'Where could it have come from?'

'Good question. Let's hear what else the ambassador can tell us.'

"2284

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Ambassador Stoutamire appeared to be waiting on him to finish his examination of the photographs before saying anything else, so it was up to Hector to revive the conversation.

""...Where did this creature come from?"" he asked.

""That, too, is unknown,"" said the ambassador.

'Figures,' muttered Garovel.

""You don't have any ideas at all?"" said Hector. ""No theories, even?""

""We do not."" Stoutamire shook his head. ""Perhaps if we were able to study the creature up close, we could gain some insight into that subject, but as things stand, that is impossible. It is difficult enough to observe from afar. The Beast likes to conceal itself, usually in the forest--of which, Lorent has many.""

The forest, huh? Many of the photos did seem to be taken there.

Another question occurred to Hector, one that was perhaps more important than any other he had yet asked. ""Have you sent any other hunters like me after it? Ones with supernatural powers?""

For a moment, Stoutamire only looked at him. He had been quite straightforward thus far, but now he seemed to be considering his answer. ""...Yes. We have.""

""I see."" Hector maintained his composure. ""And still, none of them returned, you said.""

""Yes.""

'Well, this just keeps getting better and better,' said Garovel. 'Ask him why he's contacting us instead of Intar. They have loads of servants.'

""Why are you coming to the Atreyan government and not the Intarian one?"" said Hector.

Stoutamire frowned. ""We did go to them. And they sent help. Three times. After that, they said they could no longer spare the resources to assist us.""

'Holy shit,' said Garovel.

""Perhaps they were telling the truth,"" said Stoutamire. ""With this war going on, the Intarians are very wary of invaders. And even if they are not officially involved in any of the conflicts, they may still have their fingers in quite a few of the related pies, so to speak.""

"2285

'Ask him about the dead Intarians,' said Garovel. 'Who were they and how many were sent?'

""What do you know about the Intarians who were sent to fight the monster?"" said Hector. ""You said that their government sent help three times, but what does that mean, exactly? Three hunters? Or three groups of hunters?""

The ambassador required a moment to think. ""The Intarians were rather protective of their operational details. No doubt, they were afraid of us learning something from them and then being able to increase our own military strength as a result.

""However, I do recall that in the first failed attempt, Intar sent a single hunter. On the second, it was again only one. But on the third, they sent three. I'm afraid their names were kept a secret.""

Hmm.

Hector had a question for Garovel, though he knew that the reaper obviously couldn't know the answer. 'Did those servants who were sent actually die? Reapers included? Or does Stoutamire just think that they're dead, because he doesn't know how our powers work?'

'Hard to say,' said Garovel. 'You could ask him, but you'd have to reveal some rather sensitive information about servants in order to do so. I don't think it's worth it.'

'Yeah...'

'But if he doesn't even know their names, then the first and second attempts might've actually been from the same person. Possibly the third as well, just bringing two buddies along.'

""Lord Goffe?"" said Stoutamire, having perhaps grown uncomfortable with the silence. ""So what do you say? Will you help us?""

He still had another question, though. ""Did you say that you sent superpowered hunters who were not from Intar?""

""Ah--yes. Only one. A local man named Frank Bishop. He was something of a hero, though he was notoriously reclusive. Time and again, he was offered a formal position as a protector of the nation, but he never accepted, ostensibly due to concerns over his privacy. His loss was felt by the entire country. Even now, many still hope that he is alive.""

'Sounds like he might be,' said Garovel.'

"2286

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector thought carefully. He wanted more details, but it seemed like the ambassador wouldn't be able to provide them.

Perhaps he was getting spoiled by the kind of intel that Gina, the Rainlords, and now perhaps even the Gaolanets were able to provide him with. It sure was nice, wasn't it? Knowing shit about the enemy before going into battle.

He still recalled a time when he hadn't had that luxury, and he wondered now if it was about to make a return.

Hmm.

""Please, Lord Goffe,"" said Ambassador Stoutamire. ""The situation is dire. Only three days ago, seven people were killed. That is the highest single-day body count since that doomed gathering of hunters half a year ago. We fear that the creature is growing more bold and trying to expand its territory. Evacuations have already been going on for months, and now it seems they will only increase. People have had to abandon their homes without any idea of when they might be able to return.""

Hector sympathized--perhaps a little more than he should've, even. It was like the man was speaking straight into Hector's heart.

He tried his best to remain cold and logical, though. He wanted to ask the ambassador why Lorent was coming to him of all people when there were so many other servants out there who were way more famous than him. Even if Intar had failed, there still plenty of other candidates to ask.

But as he thought about it more, he supposed he already knew the answer. No doubt, it was because Warrenhold was so close to Lorent. Not to mention, many of those super famous warriors out there were now quite busy fighting a war.

Even a few of his own. Leo and Melchor probably would've been able to make short work of this monster. If they were here.

Would he have even wanted them to go, though? Sending them to Vantalay was one thing. That country was far away. If they made a big splash there, there was a comparatively low risk of it getting traced all the way back here to Atreya.

Either way, he supposed it hardly mattered now."
"2287 -- CCXXIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

"I need some time to think about this," said Hector.

The ambassador nodded. ""Of course. I understand. But please decide soon. The Beast could attack again at any time. I fear the longer we wait, the more innocent people will die.""

Hector returned a nod of his own.

However, Hector had just told a lie. What he actually needed was not more time to think. He only needed time to talk to the Queen and the Rainlords.

The truth was, he had already made up his mind.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Three: 'In the land of disorder...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Evangelina Stroud would have much preferred to simply sneak into the country in the dead night. If stealth was their goal here, then it was better to forego all of these pretenses with disguises and fake identities. To her mind, proper stealth didn't mean hiding in plain sight like this. It meant never being seen in the if first place.

But sadly, that wasn't an option. The Vantalayan Border Guard was everywhere--and for good reason, of course. They were watching for enemy forces. And they appeared to be well-equipped as well. Fences, cameras, drones, dogs, watchtowers--and probably more. Vantalay had obviously been prepared for this war of theirs.

Much of that observational intel arrived via Raul Blackburn, who'd had a much easier time getting into the country since he'd arrived before the lockdown.

So they were blending in--or were trying to, at least.

Evangelina wondered how long this would last. Ridgemark was one of the only open ports in the country, and just like the Triplets had reported, it was absolutely inundated with reapers.

On the bright side, that made it a bit easier for their own reapers to blend in. Unfortunately, it also dramatically increased the likelihood of running into someone they recognized, and concealing themselves from a reaper who had memorized one or more of their souls would be quite the difficult feat indeed.

But not necessarily impossible."

"2287 -- CCXXIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""I need some time to think about this,"" said Hector.

The ambassador nodded. ""Of course. I understand. But please decide soon. The Beast could attack again at any time. I fear the longer we wait, the more innocent people will die.""

Hector returned a nod of his own.

However, Hector had just told a lie. What he actually needed was not more time to think. He only needed time to talk to the Queen and the Rainlords.

The truth was, he had already made up his mind.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Three: 'In the land of disorder...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Evangelina Stroud would have much preferred to simply sneak into the country in the dead night. If stealth was their goal here, then it was better to forego all of these pretenses with disguises and fake identities. To her mind, proper stealth didn't mean hiding in plain sight like this. It meant never being seen in the if first place.

But sadly, that wasn't an option. The Vantalayan Border Guard was everywhere--and for good reason, of course. They were watching for enemy forces. And they appeared to be well-equipped as well. Fences, cameras, drones, dogs, watchtowers--and probably more. Vantalay had obviously been prepared for this war of theirs.

Much of that observational intel arrived via Raul Blackburn, who'd had a much easier time getting into the country since he'd arrived before the lockdown.

So they were blending in--or were trying to, at least.

Evangelina wondered how long this would last. Ridgemark was one of the only open ports in the country, and just like the Triplets had reported, it was absolutely inundated with reapers.

On the bright side, that made it a bit easier for their own reapers to blend in. Unfortunately, it also dramatically increased the likelihood of running into someone they recognized, and concealing themselves from a reaper who had memorized one or more of their souls would be quite the difficult feat indeed.

But not necessarily impossible."

"2288

Primarily, their team consisted of Evangelina Stroud, Diego Redwater, Melchor Blackburn, and Leo. However, they had also brought along two more members of House Blackburn: Dino and Rafael.

Those two were young enough that they would likely be of no help in an actual fight, but there was also zero chance of running into any reapers who had memorized their souls. So the plan was to have those use their soul power to infuse everyone else's clothing.

Which was why Evangelina was so heavily garbed, at the moment. Her modified cloak had a thick hood that even extended halfway around her face, allowing only her eyes to be seen.

Could this even be considered a "cloak" anymore? She'd never worn anything so concealing. It was dark blue instead of black, but she still felt like one of those Sandlords who rarely ever saw the light of day.

Not exactly to her tastes.

Maybe that Atreyan guardian girl would've liked it, though. She seemed to have a thing for cloaks.

Diego, Melchor, and Leo were all similarly dressed, to the point where even she might've not been able to tell them apart if not for their slight variance in colors. Diego was in dark red, while Melchor was in black, and Leo was in dark gray--all appropriately chosen, she supposed.

Their heights were also somewhat telling, since Diego was taller than the other two, but Melchor and Leo were so similar that she still had a bit of trouble differentiating between them.

The two young ones were heavily clothed in black as well, but they were short enough that Evangelina could differentiate them easily enough. Plus, they always walked together in a little pair. Aside from hiding their souls, however, this rather heavy-handed precaution came with one other major advantage.

It allowed them to bring their reapers along by hiding them under their clothes."

"2289

Leo's reaper had remained at Warrenhold, but everyone else had brought theirs along. If they were to be confronting the Killer of Krohin, it was likely that they would have need of hyper-states.

Hopefully, that would be all they needed their hyper-states for.

Here in Ridgemark, the potential danger was obvious. Just walking the street, she could feel the presence of powerful people in this city. Precisely how powerful, she couldn't tell, but with all the unknown reapers she saw flying around, any obvious conflict that broke out would either be quickly put down or immediately escalate to city-destroying levels.

According to some last-minute intel that Lord Goffe had provided for this mission, the major players in Vantalay were not just the Vanguard and Abolish but also the local companies. Apparently, Ridgemark's ""peace"" was being maintained by powerful business owners, primarily the hotels and casinos.

Which was why Ridgemark was still allowing foreigners into port, much to the chagrin of the Vantalayan military.

It was honestly amazing how this city could still have so many tourists when it was so close to several active war zones. However, it was thanks in part to all these tourists that their plan to conceal their souls was at all viable here. The city's patrolling reapers would've had a far easier time noticing their little group of repeated souls, otherwise.

And even now, that was still a risk, Evangelina knew. They needed to get out of Ridgemark as soon as possible.

Raul Blackburn was not there to greet them at the docks, but he did hire a driver for them and left a code word that confirmed it was his doing. After the capture of his two brothers, Evangelina was actually somewhat relieved to see that he was taking extra precautions. She had not been the most confident in the Triplets' suitability for this mission, and thus far, her fears had not been proven unjustified."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Granted, she had expressed her disapproval of the Triplets before the war began. She was now inclined to cut them a modicum of slack for having to deal with such an unexpected development in their mission.

And as tempting as it was to blame them for their recklessness, a part of her felt as if she would have done exactly the same thing in their shoes.

They may have been young. They may have been a bunch of goofballs.

But they were not meek.

They had put themselves in danger just to increase the odds of their mission's success. To save those poor townsfolk.

Just because their plan hadn't worked out perfectly for them didn't mean they hadn't acted like true Rainlords.

Regardless, she was still planning to give Raul a piece of her mind when she saw him.

The limousine came to an abrupt stop in the middle of the road, and the passengers all looked around in order to figure out why. It didn't take long to noticing the line of people standing in front of the car-- followed by a few more who appeared at the vehicle's flanks.

Their driver muttered something in Valgan. Evangelina didn't speak it, but the timbre of his voice made his fear apparent to her, nonetheless.

Shouting arrived from one of the men standing in the road. More Valgan.

Ezura, Evangelina's reaper, was kind enough to privately translate for her. 'They said, ""Come on out of there, whoever you are.""'

Hmm. Evangelina didn't recognize any of their faces, but she almost didn't even need to. The expressions on those faces... she'd seen them countless times before.

The smiles of madmen.

And their behavior? Standing in the middle of the road? Just for a chance to talk to a few people whom they apparently knew nothing about?

It was a fair bet that this was Morgunov's side of Abolish here."

"2291

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Melchor Blackburn didn't sit around to discuss what to do. He immediately got out of the car, and everyone else soon followed suit.

""Aha!"" came the same voice from a moment ago. ""Good listeners, these ones! How nice to encounter someone with a bit of courtesy for a change! This town is chock full of so many rude and vulgar people, you know!""

Melchor said nothing, nor did anyone else.

Evangelina eyed the apparent hostiles from beneath her hood. She counted twelve in total. Three on each side of the car. The ones behind them had appeared last.

Double their number. Not exactly good odds, but it was far too early to be worried. She knew most of the faces of the truly threatening members of Abolish, and none of these fools resembled any of them. It was possible that there was an unknown threat here, of course, but it was highly unlikely.

She'd seen more than her fair share of overconfident jackasses in her day.

""Why so quiet?"" said the same man, having walked a bit closer so that he no longer had to shout. Perhaps he was the leader of this little troupe. He was quite tall--comparable to Diego and maybe even Dimas--and with that long black hair of his, Evangelina might've mistaken him for a woman if not for his deep voice. ""Ah! Could it be that you don't speak Mohssian? My bad. I'm still not accustomed to all these Valgan-speakers.""

The man motioned to someone else, who began saying something in Valgan, but Evangelina decided to interject.

""What do you want?"" she said. She wasn't kidding herself. This was probably going to escalate to violence any moment now, but if there was any hope of avoiding all the attention that a fight would bring, then she had to at least try."

"2292

""Oho!"" came the loudmouth's voice again. ""So you did understand me! Well, now! Don't I feel foolish! Here I was, paying you compliments, thinking you were polite, and the whole time, you were actually being quite rude. It's not nice to leave people hanging when they're talking to you.""

Yeah. This man was almost certainly from Morgunov's side of Abolish.

Evangelina elected not to respond, and she was rather pleased when no one else in their group did, either.

""Hmph! Our intentions were purely academic, you know. We were merely curious as to why the lot of you were attempting to hide your souls. Why, a more suspicious person might think that you were up to no good--but not me. I'm very trusting. I'm sure I'd be content if you would only tell me your names and show me your faces. Sounds reasonable, right?""

Evangelina could see the twitchiness among some of the Abolishers. The talkative one seemed calm and collected, sure, but his friends were pretty obviously just waiting for an excuse to fight.

They were about to get it.

Melchor decided to speak up first, though. ""You are about to bite off more than you can chew, friends. I suggest you rethink this strategy of yours.""

That was far more diplomatic than Evangelina wanted to be, right now.

Oddly enough, however, it did seem to give these lunatics pause, and the apparent leader looked around at his group. ""...Is that right? Well, we appreciate the warning, friend, but with all due respect, I don't think you have any idea how much we can chew.""

The main problem was that Evangelina couldn't see any of their reapers. She could see a few observing from a distance, but there was no way to know if they belonged to Abolish, so wantonly attacking them might just bring down a completely different group of servants on their head."

"2293

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 1 of 20))~~

No doubt, that was why these Abolishers were acting so boldly despite having no clue who they were going up against. So long as their reapers remained hidden, they weren't in any real danger. The worst that could happen to them was being taken captive, and if they were low enough level, their superiors might even consider them expendable enough to be worth that risk.

The Rainlords, on the other hand, had more to worry about. Evangelina was confident that they could stomp these chumps into the pavement, but engaging in open combat in the middle of the road would also risk exposing their identities. Ideally, they wanted to avoid that. They had only just arrived in Vantalay, after all.

No one said anything. Even the noise of the vehicles passing them on the road seemed to fall away.

The same nameless Abolisher decided to speak up again. ""Say... you folks wouldn't happen to be on your way to a little town called Miro, would you?""

Evangelina's breath caught. How did they know that?

Still, no one said anything.

It had to be an educated guess. Whoever this man was, he must've known enough about the situation in Miro to suspect that the two men they captured the other day might attract reinforcements.

It was either that or... Adan and Esai Blackburn had talked.

More than anything, Evangelina didn't want to believe that. Rainlords wouldn't tell the enemy anything. It was a matter of honor. And if they had, then they would have at least informed their own reapers of what they had done so that the reinforcing team could be told that the enemy was expecting them.

Unless... their brains had been frozen immediately after confession. Then they wouldn't have had the opportunity to tell their reapers anything.

Evangelina's jaw clenched. The more she mulled over the possibilities in her mind, the more she wanted to kill these bastards and be done with it."

"2294

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 2 of 20))~~

"Your silence strikes me as a tad suspicious," said the loudmouth. "Got something to hide, do ya? I know a few people who might be able to get you talking. Why don't we go and--?"

"Yo, this is getting real tiresome, my dudes." Leo's voice cut through the other man's like a hot knife through butter, and everyone turned to look at him. "I dunno about any of you guys, but I'm in a bit of a hurry."

The loudmouth remained undeterred. "It's rude to interrupt people, friend."

"It's more rude to block the road, daddy-o. In fact, I'm pretty sure it's illegal."

"That's a fair point. What say we all go some place quieter and have a nice chat?"

Leo whipped a phone out of his cloak. "What say I call the police? I'm not feelin' too chatty, myself, but I bet they would be able to help you out, don't you think?"

The loudmouth's smile disappeared for the first time. "Don't play dumb with me. It's obvious that you don't want any cops sniffing around your business. Just look at all of you."

Leo wasn't even looking in his direction. "Hey, what's the emergency number in this country? Anyone know?"

Evangelina noticed a few discontented rumbles among the Abolishers and couldn't help being surprised. Were they actually afraid of the civilian police showing up? Why?

Leo hadn't gotten an answer out of anyone yet, but he'd started dialing, anyway. ""Well, maybe I can just guess it.""

""Stop your bluffing,"" said the loudmouth. ""There's no way--""

""Yes, police? Hi there. Oh, you speak Mohssian, too. That's convenient. Hey, I'm not too sure where I am, right now, but could you, like, figure out my location or whatever and send someone over here? Like, someone really strong, I mean? There are some hooligans blocking the road and harassing me and my buddies.""

"2295

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 3 of 20))~~

""Pretend all you want. It's obvious that you're just--""

""Cool. Yeah, I'll wait right here. Hmm? No, I'm not too worried about that. They seem pretty toothless, honestly. All bark, know what I mean?"" He broke for a laugh. ""Really? Wow. Okay, awesome. Thanks so much. Yeah, I'll stay on the line.""

The loudmouth was no longer loud. Instead, he was red in the face with visible veins around his temples.

Leo was just tapping his foot as he waited. His face was still mostly obscured by his hood, but he looked in the direction of the most talkative Abolisher again. ""I'm not sure what local response times are, but if you plan on attacking us, you'd better get on with it.""

The other man just scowled.

""Or could it be that you were actually trying to goad us into attacking you for some reason?"" said Leo. ""Heh. Afraid of the law around these parts, maybe?""

And abruptly, Evangelina understood. It seemed odd at first that any servants--especially those of Abolish--would be wary of conventional law enforcement, but Ridgemark was no normal city, was it? Somehow, it was maintaining order despite harboring seemingly huge numbers of both Abolish and the Vanguard.

So who were the peacekeepers around here?

If the nervous looks on the Abolishers' faces were any indication, then Leo had hit the nail on the head.

They still weren't down, though. The loudmouth had apparently run out of tough talk, but none of them were budging.

And so they had a silent standoff, of sorts, as they waited for the authorities to show up.

Supposedly. Even Evangelina wasn't sure if Leo had actually called the police or not. He could've just been acting. Perhaps that was why Abolish wasn't leaving. They wanted to see if he'd been bluffing or not."

"2296

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 4 of 20))~~

At length, the loudmouth began to look more smug again. As the time ticked, he was no doubt starting to believe that Leo had indeed been acting.

Until the sound of sirens arrived.

It was an unfamiliar noise to Evangelina's ears, unlike the sirens they used back in Sair. These were more piercing and whistle-like. But the sudden frowns on all of the Abolishers faces told her everything she needed to know.

Without another word, they dispersed like cockroaches, with only the loudmouth lingering a moment longer to spit on the ground in front of them.

Once they were all gone, Leo started chortling.

""Why are you laughing?"" said Melchor. ""The situation may have been diffused, but the police will still be quite inconvenient to deal with. I'm not even convinced that simply crushing them wouldn't have been the wiser course of action.""

Leo only laughed harder, however. He stuffed his phone into his pocket and got back in the limousine.

Everyone exchanged confused looks before joining him.

Once all the doors were closed, he explained, ""I didn't actually make the call. Those sirens were just a coincidence!"" And he kept laughing. ""Talk about timing, eh?!""

Evangelina had no words.

Nor did anyone else, apparently.

Their driver started the car back up.

But before they could get rolling again, someone else appeared in the middle of the road.

From above. Evangelina's view was partially blocked by the roof of the car, so it looked as though a man had dropped down from seemingly nowhere and then was suddenly leaning on the hood of the car, peering through the windshield.

A man in a policeman's uniform.

Leo's laughter cut off, instantly replaced with a confused grunt. ""What the frick?!""

Everyone looked at him again as he double-checked his phone.

""Dudes, I swear I didn't call nobody!"" he said."

"2297

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 5 of 20))~~

Melchor opened his mouth to say something, but he was interrupted.

""Hello in there,"" came the apparent officer's voice. It was rather soft yet still masculine, and his Valgan accent was faint.

Now that Evangelina was looking, the police officer actually had a bit of a babyface.

""Sorry to trouble you,"" the officer went on, ""but would you mind exiting the vehicle? I have a few questions. I promise I won't take up too much of your time.""

They were more than a little reluctant to do so, but none of them were eager to get into a fight with the local police, either. They all stepped out of the limousine one more time.

Evangelina saw a reaper floating just behind the man, observing them all from over his shoulder. If his unusual entrance hadn't been enough of a clue, this was confirmation. But the fact that he had actually brought his reaper along was interesting.

Taking that kind of risk meant one of two things: either he was very confident in his ability to protect his reaper, or he was trying to be courteous and diplomatic. In some circles, keeping one's reaper hidden was a sign of ill-intent and distrust. Allowing the reaper to be seen, therefore, was sometimes regarded as an extension of good will and openness to discussion.

""Thank you for your cooperation. I am Officer Brand of the RPMP.""

That was the Ridgemark Private Military Police. There was no government-run law enforcement in this city. The RPMP was instead jointly-funded and operated by the largest companies in Ridgemark.

Evangelina had known this, yet it was still somehow difficult for her to wrap her head around the idea of local law enforcement being powerful enough to keep the peace between Abolish and the Vanguard. Surely, there had to have been other players involved, right? Foreign influence of some kind?"

"2298

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 6 of 20))~~

Hopefully, this peacekeeping effort wouldn't turn out to be Sai-hee's doing, but that would at least make more sense to Evangelina than all this strength being concentrated into the hands of the locals.

""Could you please present your passports and accompanying documentation to me?"" said Officer Brand. He even gave them a smile--a pearly white one, no less.

Ah. Their papers had already been checked and double-checked at the port, so there was no reason to expect them to suddenly fail here. Diego moved to retrieve the items in question from a briefcase in the car.

While they waited, Evangelina eyed this Officer Brand up and down.

Quite well-built. And handsome, in that youthful way. There was almost no chance that he was as young as he appeared, though.

Evangelina couldn't sense any kind of overwhelming soul power from him, but that didn't mean anything conclusive. The Lord Goffe never exhibited such oppressive pressure, either, and he was obviously very dangerous in a fight.

Plus, there was just something about this man, something about the way he carried himself. Calm, yet attentive. Speaking clearly and with confidence.

She wondered if all members of the RPMP were like this. If so, what kind of training did they receive?

Documents in hand, Brand took a moment to look them over, and his reaper joined him.

""Excellent. Thank you."" The policeman offered them back to Diego, who returned them to the car. Brand regarded his small audience again with his bright blue eyes. ""I'm sorry for the inconvenience. You see, the people who were just hassling you are on an active watchlist, of sorts.""

Melchor was the first to respond. ""You were observing that encounter? From where, exactly?""

""That, I cannot say,"" said Brand. ""I can, however, offer an apology for not stepping in immediately. Things are a bit tense in Ridgemark, at the moment. I have orders to only intervene directly when a situation escalates to violence.""

"2299

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 7 of 20))~~

He couldn't say? Evangelina found that very odd. Why would the location that Officer Brand had been observing the situation from be a classified subject?

""Did those people say anything to you that you would like to report?"" said Brand. ""Any information you could provide regarding their activities or plans would be greatly appreciated.""

""Unfortunately, they did not tell us anything like that,"" said Melchor.

""Are you sure?"" said Brand. ""I should add that there is a financial reward for actionable intel on these people.""

A reward?

Truthfully, that did pique Evangelina's interest a bit. Too bad the mission came first.

""We are quite certain,"" said Melchor.

Diego decided to chime in. ""Would you mind if we asked you a question, Officer Brand?""

""Of course. Feel free.""

Diego adjusted his crimson hood and cloth mask. ""How far does the RPMP's jurisdiction extend, precisely?""

Ah. Good question, Evangelina thought.

""The city limits,"" said Brand.

""I see,"" said Diego. ""So the town of Miro is of no concern to you, then?""

And for the first time, Officer Brand's easy smile turned into a frown. ""I'm afraid so.""

""Hmm?"" Diego's head perked up a little. ""Is that remorse I hear in your voice, Officer Brand?""

The policeman made no response.

""Could it be that you know what's happening there?"" said Diego.

""Not exactly, but the rumors aren't pleasant. But the same can be said for the rest of the nation. My job is to prevent those same things from happening here.""

""I see,"" said Diego again.

And there was silence.

Evangelina expected more questions from the policeman, but he didn't offer any. Perhaps he was expecting more from them.

She decided to seize the lull in the conversation for herself. ""Perhaps I shouldn't be asking this, but you've been very amicable thus far, and I would like to trust you, if only a little. Why have you not asked us what we are doing here?""

""It is not my business to interfere with yours,"" said Brand."
"2300

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 8 of 20))~~

Wow. Evangelina could hardly believe her ears, especially after the policeman had just mentioned people being on a 'watchlist.' She almost wanted to push her luck and ask him why he didn't seem to be concerned that they were all concealing their faces, but she held her tongue.

Officer Brand took a moment to check his phone before addressing them again. ""In any case, I hope you all enjoy your stay here in Ridgemark."" He handed a card off to Diego. ""If you think of anything regarding those men who were bothering you, please give me a call. Or you can just dial 883, and the operator will help you.""

""Thank you, Officer,"" said Diego.

""You are welcome. And before I go, a word of caution: Ridgemark is safe, but everywhere around it is a lawless zone. You people seem like you intend to leave the city, and while I obviously don't intend to stop you, I strongly recommend that you reconsider. You will be taking your lives into your own hands, if you do.""

""A 'lawless zone?"" said Diego. ""That's a strange way to put it. Isn't everything within Vantalay's borders subject to the laws of the Vantalayan government?""

Evangelina was fairly certain that Diego was playing a bit dumb with those questions. He'd received the same briefing that the rest of them had with regard to Vantalay's unique political circumstances. He probably just wanted to hear Officer Brand's take on the situation.

""Ah, well, being foreigners, I suppose it's to be expected that you wouldn't know about that,"" said Brand. ""The truth is, you can't rely on the Vantalayan government for anything. Whether it's protection, funding, food, or healthcare--it's always in flux. Occasionally, they'll help you. Most times, they won't. Even before this war, that was the case, and now it's just doubly so.""

Diego gave a small laugh. ""Those're some pretty strong opinions you have there, Officer.""

""Not really. You should hear some of my coworkers.""
"2301

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 9 of 20))~~

Diego gave a second laugh. ""Your Mohssian is very good, by the way.""

""Thank you.""

""Are all RPMP officers as fluent as you?"" said Diego.

""Being multilingual is a prerequisite for the job, yes.""

""Ah, because of all the tourists Ridgemark gets?""

""Indeed. In truth, I speak six languages.""

""Oho! Impressive. I only know a bit of Valgan, myself. Trying to learn more, you know. What are all the languages you speak?""

""Valgan, Mohssian, Lhugian, Vaelish, Yenish, and Ghisi.""

""And which is your native tongue?""

""Ghisi, technically, but I spoke Valgan for most of my adolescent life, so my accent probably sounds more akin to that.""

""Aha. You, sir, sound like you've had an interesting life.""

""And you, sir, sound like you are buttering me up in order to ask another question. You can simply ask. I shall answer to the best of my ability.""

Diego snickered.

Evangelina merely listened, but she was hardly surprised by the initiative Diego was taking here. He'd always been a bit of a conversationalist, and while this might've seemed like an inappropriate time to be engaging in small talk, Officer Brand was clearly a valuable source of information.

""You got me,"" Diego admitted. ""I suppose what I'd really like to know is who those people who were bothering us were. Do you know?""

""I'm not at liberty to say, I'm afraid. My apologies.""

""I figured as much. Shame. Then can you at least tell us if there are any other people we should watch out for while we're in Ridgemark?""

Officer Brand was quiet a moment as he met Diego's gaze, perhaps trying to take the measure of him in some way. ""As I said, Ridgemark is safe. You don't need to 'watch out' for anyone while you are here. The RPMP will protect you perfectly.""

Diego nodded. ""Of course. I did not mean to imply otherwise.""

""I'm sure you didn't."" Brand's sky blue eyes drifted between everyone. ""However, there are a few names you may wish to be mindful of. In the off chance you hear of any of them.""

""Oh?""

"2302

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 10 of 20))~~

""Risto, Orma, and Voss,"" said Brand. ""If you encounter anyone with those names, I recommend you walk the other way. They're liable to get you into trouble.""

Evangelina was familiar with all of those names. They were all infamous Abolishers. On par with the Killer of Krohin, arguably.

She wasn't afraid of them. If not for their mission, she would've relished an opportunity to take each and every one of their heads. The amount of misery that they were collectively responsible for over the years beggared belief.

Officer Brand wasn't done, though. ""Those are the ones you should probably avoid the most, but I would also recommend staying away from anyone named Jun or Graves. You'll find nothing but trouble from them as well, I suspect.""

Evangelina didn't react, but she sure wanted to. Having been a member of the Vanguard herself for over twenty years, she knew that last name particularly well.

Field Marshal Graves.

She'd never had the opportunity to meet him--which was perhaps to her benefit now, since it meant that his reaper wouldn't have her soul memorized--but all of the Field Marshals had their own mythos surrounding them. The lower ranked Vanguardians loved to talk about them, to swap fantastic tales of questionable veracity.

No one was ever quite sure what to believe when it came to the Field Marshals--and she'd heard that was by design. The legendary stories about them served to muddy their actual histories and thereby protect any innocent people who might've been connected to them.

One of Abolish's favorite pastimes was raiding a place that a Field Marshal once called home. In addition to enjoying the slaughter and destruction, they no doubt hoped to bait the associated Field Marshal into a trap.

Even among the Field Marshals, though, Graves was regarded as perhaps the most mysterious. Supposedly, he'd once fought Dozer to a standstill, yet that was the only story Evangelina had ever heard circulating about him. Beyond that, his past was a complete blank."
"2303

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 11 of 20))~~

Jun, on the other hand, Evangelina had never heard of. It could've been someone who had only recently made a name for themselves, but whoever it was, if they were being mentioned in the same breath as Graves, then they were bound to be extremely dangerous.

Bah.

She'd hoped that none of the Marshals would be here in Vantalay--or at the very least, not in Ridgemark--but it seems that wasn't to be.

They'd just have to be that much more careful, she supposed.

Diego and the policeman continued their chat for a while longer, but Diego didn't manage to get any other useful information out of him. And thankfully, Officer Brand did indeed leave them alone as he said he would.

Finally, they all got back in the car and resumed their journey out of the city.

No one said anything aloud for a long while. Perhaps they were afraid to.

'That policeman worries me,' said Ezura privately. She was still attached to Evangelina's torso, hidden beneath her cloak.

Normally, Evangelina saw reapers as quite large birds--storks, to be precise. Their black-and-gray feathers smoldered like fire while their eyes glowed white or sometimes yellow or even occasionally red. When they were hidden like this, however, their large size made no difference whatsoever. That was what happened when reapers attached themselves to someone else's soul. Their usual appearance melted away, and they became little more than an amorphous blob stuck to the person's body.

'I thought he was surprisingly well-mannered and unintrusive,' said Evangelina.

'I thought so, too,' said Ezura. 'His personality isn't what concerns me. It was the way he showed up like that out of the blue. He said he'd been watching us the whole time, but I still didn't sense him until he was basically on top of us already.'

'Well, your senses are hindered by my cloak,' said Evangelina.

'Sure, but it wasn't like I was blind. I was paying close attention to our surroundings in case any more Abolishers showed up.'

'Hmm.'"

"2304

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 12 of 20))~~

'The more I learn about this town, the less I like it,' said Ezura. 'If Graves is really here in Ridgemark, then why the hell hasn't he gotten rid of Abolish?'

Evangelina could tell where she was headed with that question. 'Officer Brand didn't name any Abolishers who can stand up to a Field Marshal.'

'Exactly. So why's he dragging his feet?'

'Maybe he is worried about collateral damage. There are plenty of innocent tourists still in the city. And if the casinos refuse to evacuate civilians, then I imagine Graves' job becomes much more difficult.'

'You might be right,' said Ezura, 'but even if that is the case, the question remains: why doesn't he just strong-arm them into evacuating the city?'

Evangelina tipped her head to the side a little, considering that thought. 'Technically, the Vanguard is supposed to respect local sovereignty.'

'Hah!'

'I am aware that we represent a rather potent counterexample.'

'An understatement if ever there was one. I don't believe for a second that Graves is just sitting around like a good little boy. This country is at war. Local sovereignty, collateral damage--these things are already in flux, at the moment, even without the Vanguard's input. If he hasn't run Abolish out of here, it's not because he doesn't want to. Someone really strong must be getting in his way.'

Evangelina almost didn't even want to say it. '...The RPMP?'

The reaper sighed. 'I don't want to entertain the idea that they could have someone that powerful on their payroll, but right now, it's looking like the only explanation.'

A worrisome thought, to say the least. But Evangelina could also see a potential bright side. 'Well... if that really is the case, then perhaps that is to our advantage.'

'Maybe. But I've never been much for optimism.'

A faint smile crossed Evangelina's lips. 'Believe me, I know.'

"2305 -- CCXXIV.

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 13 of 20))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Four: 'O, crusading champion...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The trip to Lorent happened quickly. Hector had expected more pushback from both the Queen and the Rainlords when he told them about what the Lorentian Ambassador said, but they all seemed to understand. In the Queen's case, she actually sounded somewhat pleased about the idea, telling him that his victory would help to improve relations between Atreya and Lorent considerably.

Why she was assuming that he would succeed, Hector wasn't quite sure. He didn't want to dampen her spirits, though. Apparently, there had been some trade disputes with Lorent going on in the last few weeks, and it was hindering some kind of building project that the Queen was working on. She promised to tell him more about it when he returned.

The Rainlords were not quite so enthused by his departure--which, admittedly, warmed his heart a little bit--but they were still very supportive and of course insisted on sending strong warriors to help him.

In fact, if he hadn't said anything, half of their remaining forces might've ended up accompanying him. It was the Babbadelo-situation all over again.

However, who to actually bring along proved to be a difficult decision to make. Most of their strongest warriors were in Vantalay at the moment, so the most powerful servants in Warrenhold currently consisted of Zeff Elroy, Joana Cortes, Salvador Delaguna, Dimas Sebolt, Horatio Blackburn, and Nere Blackburn--in no particular order.

But all of those people were the heads of their respective families. They had the most responsibility and would therefore be the most sorely missed. Hector didn't want to bring any of them along.

For some reason, though, Salvador Delaguna wouldn't take no for an answer. All the other heads seemed to understand Hector's perspective, but not him.

""You think I'm too important?"" the giant man had said. ""Boy, you're more important than any of us. And I'll be damned if I let you go off and face some mysterious beastie all on your own.""

"2305 -- CCXXIV.

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 13 of 20))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Four: 'O, crusading champion...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The trip to Lorent happened quickly. Hector had expected more pushback from both the Queen and the Rainlords when he told them about what the Lorentian Ambassador said, but they all seemed to understand. In the Queen's case, she actually sounded somewhat pleased about the idea, telling him that his victory would help to improve relations between Atreya and Lorent considerably.

Why she was assuming that he would succeed, Hector wasn't quite sure. He didn't want to dampen her spirits, though. Apparently, there had been some trade disputes with Lorent going on in the last few weeks, and it was hindering some kind of building project that the Queen was working on. She promised to tell him more about it when he returned.

The Rainlords were not quite so enthused by his departure--which, admittedly, warmed his heart a little bit--but they were still very supportive and of course insisted on sending strong warriors to help him.

In fact, if he hadn't said anything, half of their remaining forces might've ended up accompanying him. It was the Babbadelo-situation all over again.

However, who to actually bring along proved to be a difficult decision to make. Most of their strongest warriors were in Vantalay at the moment, so the most powerful servants in Warrenhold currently consisted of Zeff Elroy, Joana Cortes, Salvador Delaguna, Dimas Sebolt, Horatio Blackburn, and Nere Blackburn--in no particular order.

But all of those people were the heads of their respective families. They had the most responsibility and would therefore be the most sorely missed. Hector didn't want to bring any of them along.

For some reason, though, Salvador Delaguna wouldn't take no for an answer. All the other heads seemed to understand Hector's perspective, but not him.

""You think I'm too important?"" the giant man had said. ""Boy, you're more important than any of us. And I'll be damned if I let you go off and face some mysterious beastie all on your own.""

"2306

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 14 of 20))~~

It wasn't just Salvador accompanying him, though. Matteo Delaguna, Fidel Blackburn, and Carlos Sebolt had either volunteered or been selected to come along, too.

And much like the treasure hunting teams, they weren't taking their reapers with them. The fact that the so-called Beast of Lorent had already ""killed"" multiple other servants was an unsettling notion. Perhaps that bit of information was mistaken or exaggerated, but either way, caution seemed like the wisest course of action.

It would be weird to be away from Garovel for so long, and Hector wasn't looking forward to it, but at least he'd still be able to talk to him whenever he wanted.

Unlike the trip to Sair, however, word had gotten to the media about the Lord of Warrenhold's trip to Lorent, and now there was a crowd of reporters camping out at Warrenhold's main gate. Thankfully, the aboveground walls had already been repaired or completely rebuilt, so at least there weren't camera crews all over the castle grounds like there were last time, but it still made leaving more difficult.

He didn't want any of the Rainlords to be caught on camera, especially Lord Salvador, so Hector had to leave first on his own and draw the media away so that the Rainlords could meet up with him later.

Hector couldn't help thinking that this might not have been such a hassle if he'd managed to explore more of the cave network that Warrenhold was part of. He'd done it multiple times previously when searching for the location of the underground waterfall, but after finding it, the exploration effort had lost most of its fervor. Plus, he'd had about a million other things distracting him, lately.

Those caves, though, were something else. They were an absolute labyrinth, and Garovel even mentioned that there was a good chance that they extended beneath most of the city, perhaps even connecting to the subway system. And if that were true, then there were bound to be other routes back up to the surface elsewhere.

That sure would've made it easier to leave the city without drawing so much attention."

"2307

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 15 of 20))~~

In this case, though, those caves alone probably wouldn't have been enough. There were more reporters waiting for him at the airport concourse. By then, the Rainlords had rejoined him, and he was faced with a difficult decision. Split up again? Or just encase all the cameras in iron? He'd done the latter before, and it certainly hadn't won him any points with the media.

He was more concerned about the reporters noticing the four Rainlords in his company. He doubted any normal person would recognize them, and if they acted casual, they could just pass as normal bodyguards, but it was still a risk that Hector preferred not to take.

Hmm. Maybe he could just armor the Rainlords up.

No, wait, that would freak the media out even more, wouldn't it? They might think there were suddenly five Darksteel Soldiers or some shit.

""Having problems?"" came a deep, yet oddly familiar voice.

Hector turned to see that it belonged to a uniformed pilot. Then he did a double take when he saw that it was Roman Fullister. ""What're you doing here?"

"You didn't think I'd let you go to Lorent without me, did you?" The base in his voice was so much heavier than usual.

"...Are you using vibrations to modulate your own voice now?" said Hector.

Roman chuckled. "Yeah. Pretty neat, right? I should've tried this out ages ago. Once I get the hang of it, I feel like I might be able to pull off some killer impressions."

Hector exhaled half a laugh. Roman had been staying at Warrenhold with everyone else, so him showing up at the airport like this was highly unnecessary.

Carlos Sebolt was the first to point that fact out. "If you wanted to come along, you could've just accompanied us when we left the castle."

"Where would be the fun in that?" said Roman, returning his voice to normal.

"2308

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 16 of 20))~~

Salvador chortled and slapped a meaty hand on Roman's shoulder, making the man's whole body shake. "You are a strange one, Mr. Fullister!"

"Do you have some way around those reporters for us?" asked Carlos.

"It just so happens that I've got a spare plane that we can use. One that our media friends over there don't know about."

Hector was reminded of something. "That isn't the same plane that you stole from the Vanguard, is it?"

The Rainlords all snapped to attention in unison at that question.

"Oh, no, don't worry," said Roman. "I got rid of that thing a long time ago. Can't just leave a loose end like that hanging around. Even if it is worth millions of troa."

"So you bought a whole new plane, then?" said Hector.

"Nah, I only chartered this one," said Roman. "Less expensive this way. I do want to get another one eventually, though."

Roman guided them to the hangar where it was being kept. It was a handsome machine, painted white-and-silver and bearing the black insignia of a sword with wings--the logo of the Gray Rock International Airport.

"How long ago did you charter this thing?" said Hector.

"Oh, it's been a good while," said Roman. "Almost twenty-four whole hours."

Hector just shook his head and laughed as he boarded the plane.

It didn't take much longer for the small crew to finish preparations. Hector also discovered that Fidel Blackburn was a certified pilot, and with Roman's permission, he was allowed into the cockpit with the aircraft's otherwise lone airman.

Soon enough, they were in the air and leaving the country.

With Lorent being so close, Hector had at first thought that an airplane wouldn't be necessary, but after a quick geography lesson on the internet, he realized that Lorent was actually kind of huge--and their destination was the Imara Forest, deep in the heart of the country. This way, it would only take a few hours to reach instead of all night."

"2309

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 17 of 20))~~

This was Hector's second time seeing Lorent from the air. The trip to Sair had afforded him the opportunity once before, but he'd been considerably more distracted by Lynn's presence during that flight.

He was able to get a better look now.

Ambassador Stoutamire hadn't been kidding when he'd said that Lorent had a lot of forests. That was all Hector could see across the entire horizon. Were there even any cities in this country?

Ah, yeah, he managed to spot an occasional building peeking up among the trees here and there. Wow, did they really just build their towns in the middle of the forest like that?

Suddenly, he felt a little bad. He probably should've known a lot more about this country, considering how close it was to Warrenhold.

Well, hopefully, this trip would help change that.

""Is Garovel complaining to you?"" said Roman, who was sitting next to him.

""Hmm?"" said Hector. ""Ah. No? Complaining about what?""

""About not bringing him along, "" said Roman. ""I just left, and Voreese already won't shut up.""

""Ah... well, now that you mention it, I'm sure Garovel will get around to it, eventually.""

""I'm tempted to tell her to go bother Garovel instead of me, but if he's not annoying you already, then I'm afraid she might infect him with her whining.""

""Heh. Oh, uh, by the way, thanks again for your help with the Bank.""

""Don't sweat it."" After a beat, Roman bobbed his head to the side.

""Well. Okay, maybe you can sweat it a little bit. That's ten million troa I've got riding on you.""

Hector's laugh was a moderately nervous one. ""I'm sweating it plenty, I promise...""

""Seems like it's going pretty well, though, yeah?""

""So far.""

""Well, even if it all goes pear-shaped, don't worry. I'll bail your bank out for you.""

Hector blinked and looked at him anew. ""Really?""

""Hell no! Are you kidding? Do you have any idea how much money you're talking about?""

Hector's expression flattened, and he went back to looking out the window. ""Suddenly, I'm starting to miss Voreese.""

Roman snorted a laugh of his own."
"2310

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 18 of 20))~~

A question occurred to Hector, and it made him smile, so he couldn't help asking it to Roman. ""Does Voreese have any theories about what this monster might actually be?""

""Oh, sweet Cocora, does she ever,"" said Roman. ""You don't actually wanna hear all of her crazy ramblings, do you?""

Hector returned a slight nod, as if to say that he kind of did want to hear them.

Roman groaned. ""Did Garovel not bombard you with any wild theories of his own? He must've, surely.""

""Oh yeah, he definitely did,"" said Hector, smile widening. ""That's what gave me the idea to ask you about Voreese.""

""Ah, I see. So you're amused by the thought of me suffering through the same sort of thing that you did, is that it?""

""Pretty much.""

""Alright, well... I guess I can give you the abridged version. Heh, but only if you tell me some of the crazy shit that Garovel said, too.""

""Deal.""

Roman took a moment to think. ""She mentioned something called a Ceese. Apparently, it's a type of 'evil spirit.'"" He made air quotes with his fingers.

Hector asked the obvious question. ""Evil spirit? What does that mean?""

""That's what I said. She couldn't provide details. Probably because it's a mythological creature and never actually existed. I asked some of the Rainlords' reapers, and they were a bit more forthcoming with the truth. She was just trying to scare me, I think. She's like a little kid sometimes, I swear."

"Ah." Hector was still curious, though. "...So what's so scary about a Ceese, then?"

Roman breathed a partial laugh. "Well, it's supposed to stalk you from the edges of your peripheral vision, always staying just outside of your view, somehow. And as it gets closer and closer, it begins to laugh at you--or at least, that's what it sounds like. Might just be its breathing, since it's not actually supposed to be human."

"Huh..."

"2311

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 19 of 20))~~

"It's supposed to do all this because it feeds off of your fear or some shit," said Roman. "And it only tries to kill you when either your fear reaches a critical point or it becomes dissatisfied with the amount of fear you're exhibiting."

"Wait, so it tries to kill you no matter what you do?" said Hector.

"Guess so."

"Shouldn't there be, like, a special rule or something to help you stay alive? That's how these mythological stories usually go, isn't it?"

"I dunno, man. Like I said, Voreese didn't offer anything in the way of proof--even anecdotally. And the Rainlords said it wasn't real."

Hector spared a glance at the other passengers and lowered his voice. "The Rainlords didn't know about Sparrows, either."

Roman opened his mouth, then perhaps thought better of whatever he was about to say and closed it again.

"And besides... I've met two gods in the last six months--one of which, even Garovel thought never existed. So you'll have to excuse me if I try to keep an open mind about these things."

Roman scratched his forehead. ""Well, when you put it like that..."

Hector let the silence linger for a moment longer before saying, ""So did Voreese mention anything else?"

""Yeah. She said it could also be something called a Wamp--which is another mythological creature, by the way."

Hector's brow depressed a little. ""A Wamp? Doesn't exactly sound scary..."

""Right? Apparently, it's an Old Mohssian term that doesn't really have an accurate translation."

""Hmm. So what does the Wamp do, then?"

""Sucks your soul out of your body and tortures you in a hellish nightmare of your own imaginings."

Hector's pressed his lips together flatly. ""Oh."

""Yeah. Doesn't sound too fun."

""Does it have a particular reason for doing that to you? Or is it just an asshole?"

"2312

~~((National Rescue Dog Day - page 20 of 20))~~

""Not sure,"" said Roman. ""I think Voreese said it's supposed to eat you afterward."

""So it's like tenderizing your soul by torturing you?"

""Maybe."" Roman shrugged. ""But like I said. Mythological. Probably not real."

""Right... and I don't suppose you know if servants are immune to its soul-sucking powers, huh?"

""Why would we be immune?"

""Because our souls don't even belong to us. They belong to our reapers."

""Mm. That's one way of putting it, I suppose. I don't see why that would make us immune, though.""

""Well, I know for a fact that we're immune to certain aberration abilities.""

""You do? How do you know that?""

""Because the first time I fought Geoffrey Rofal, he tried to consume my soul. Didn't work.""

""Oh, right. Him. I'd almost forgotten about that little bastard.""

Hector made no response. He wished he could forget. He knew he never would.

Roman took the opportunity to change the subject. ""So what were Garovel's theories about this monster, then?""

""Were those two the only ones that Voreese brought up?""

""No, but I'm tired of talking about them. It's your turn.""

That was fair. ""Ah... he told me about something called a Yigorosk.""

""Scarier name than Wamp, at least. What's its deal?""

""Basically, it's a giant tentacle monster.""

""...Is that it? Maybe I'm just jaded at this point, but if all it's got going for it is a bunch of tentacles, then I doubt it would stand much of a chance against six servants. Or even one, for that matter.""

""Well, it can also camouflage itself. And it's supposed to be pretty durable. Kinda like the worms in the Undercrust, was what Garovel said.""

""Hmm. Still not impressed.""

""It stalks its prey while camouflaged and then springs on them when no one is looking and drags them back to its gooey lair--which it made from its own bodily juices, by the way.""

""Okay, well, that's fuckin' gross.""

""Mmhmm.""

""So is this actually real?"" said Roman. ""Or is it mythological like the ones Voreese was talking about?""

""Garovel said it really existed like two thousand years ago,"" said Hector.

""Hmm. Doesn't really sound like a forest-dwelling monster, though, so why does he think it might be this 'Beast of Lorent?""

""Supposedly, it could goo-ify almost any kind of environment to suit its needs. And it was known to migrate to new regions when threatened by hunters.""

""Did you look this Yigorosk up on the internet?""

Hector hesitated. ""Y-yeah...""

Roman cocked an eyebrow ""And? What'd you find?""

""Uh... not what I was looking for.""

Roman seemed confused.

Hector considered how to explain. ""...Tentacle monsters are really popular online.""

Roman no longer looked confused. A smile flickered across his face as he attempted to maintain his composure, but it didn't take long for him to start laughing outright.

""It's not that funny,"" said Hector.

Roman settled himself. Mostly. ""Sorry. Heh. So, I guess, the term Yigorosk didn't help to, heh, narrow your search?""

""No."" Hector frowned. ""It sure fucking didn't.""

Roman snorted again. ""That's still a little strange, though. If it really does exist to this day, then you should've been able to find some actual academic articles about it.""

Hector scratched his chin. ""Maybe I'm just bad at searching for stuff online.""

""You think so? I thought all young people these days were well-versed in using the internet.""

Hector smiled. ""Hey, maybe you should look it up.""

Roman just stared at him a moment. ""I see where this is going, and I don't like it.""

""I'm sure you'd be better at it than me.""

""Alright, y'know what?"" Roman pulled out his phone. ""I'm willing to walk over this land mine if we do it together.""

At that, Hector's enthusiasm waned a little. ""Eh...""
"2314

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""I'm not doing it by myself,"" said Roman. ""You can back out, but so will I.""

Hector's mouth scrunched up. ""Fine.""

And so, for the next several minutes, the two of them braved a world of pretty fucked up shit. Unfortunately, even Roman couldn't find any ""academic"" articles, per se, but at length, they did happen upon a website that was full of words instead of artwork.

Which was something of a relief, at least.

The site itself seemed quite primitive, though, so Hector impulsively figured that they would soon move on from it, but Roman actually started reading that giant wall of text on the front page.

Hector decided to give it a go as well.

The text did indeed mention the Yigorosk by name and even described it as a creature first mentioned in ancient Luughian mythology. The Yigorosk supposedly emerged from the depths of the Luthic Ocean and laid countless eggs, which then hatched and terrorized the western coast of the Luughian continent for a hundred years.

It also stated that most modern scientists believe the Yigorosk to be either fictional or extinct due to the fact that no fossilized remains of it have ever been found--and because the only ""historical record"" that even mentioned it belonged to Harundel the Elder, who was apparently a notoriously unreliable and eccentric figure in ancient history.

Then the author of the website said that modern scientists were fools and claimed to have not only personally seen a Yigorosk, but also killed it and used its remains to create a powerful aphrodisiac.

Then the text started getting weirdly sexual.

""Who wrote this shit?"" said Roman.

They scrolled down and found a link to a credits page.

""Harundel the Younger,' apparently,"" said Hector.

""I want the last few minutes of my life back,"" said Roman."
"2315

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

They spent the remainder of the flight discussing more hypothetical monsters that their reapers had mentioned. The only thing they knew definitively about the Beast of Lorent was that it had managed to avoid being identified despite Lorent's best efforts, so most of their proposed monsters were ones that could operate stealthily in one form or another.

At length, however, the conversation became more obviously about entertaining one another than it did about actually trying to discern what the creature might be. Among others, Hector brought up something called a jajarith, which was a kind of man-eating frog-beast that supposedly came from Qenghis, while Roman brought up something called a tomokooni, which was a freaky badger-like humanoid-creature that crept up on people while they slept and flayed them alive in order to wear their skin as its own.

They hadn't been competing, exactly, but after that, Hector decided that Roman had won. Maybe it wasn't such a good idea to be so open-minded about the possibility of all these things existing, after all.

""Apparently,"" Roman was still saying as they were getting off the plane, "the jury is still out on whether or not a tomokooni can pass for a human being. Voreese wasn't too sure on that part. But regardless, I have to imagine that the Lorentian authorities would've noticed a bunch of flayed corpses lying around and told us."

"Y'know," said Hector, "everyone likes to talk about how great the power of the imagination is, but sometimes, I think it might be the most horrific thing in the world."

"Could very well be."

A small group of people were waiting for them on the tarmac--which Hector found a little surprising, considering how they'd changed planes at the last minute, but he supposed the pilot must've radioed ahead."
"2316

It was a bit difficult to make out their faces in the darkness of the late evening, but as they got closer, Hector realized that the one on the right was Ambassador Stoutamire. The man was not first to step forward and speak, however. Instead, it was a middle-aged woman in a long red coat with feathers along the collar.

"Thank you for coming on such short notice, Lord Goffe," she said, holding up a rather archaic-looking lantern for illumination. "Welcome to the Imara Province. I am Larissa Karr, the Secretary of State for the Lorentian Federal Government." She offered him a gloved handshake, and Hector took it.

The Secretary of State? Didn't that make her super important? Or did it? Hector wasn't too familiar with the structure of foreign governments. Hell, he was still learning about Atreya's government.

Ambassador Stoutamire shuffled forward to shake hands with him as well. "Apologies for the lack of warning, Lord Goffe. Had I known, I would certainly have informed you that Secretary Karr would be here to meet you. Oh, you must think us terribly unorganized."

"It's no trouble," said Hector.

"Things have been especially hectic around here, you see," said Stoutamire. "Why, just yesterday, the power--"

The Secretary decided to interject. "That's enough, Ambassador. Lord

Goffe didn't come all this way to hear us complain."

"Ah--yes. Forgive me." Stoutamire stepped backward with a stiff bow.

Secretary Karr regarded Hector again, this time lingering on his companions. "Who is this that you have brought with you?" she asked. "Your hunting party?"

"That's right," said Hector, figuring that was as good a term as any. With the Scarf, he could sense that Salvador Delaguna was fidgeting a bit more than the others.

Hmm, perhaps he was worried about being recognized. Hector had made iron masks for all the Rainlords, so that wouldn't be a problem, but Salvador was the head of House Delaguna, which made him quite an important political figure in Sair. Maybe that was making him uncomfortable unconsciously or something."

"2317

Hector had offered an iron mask to Roman as well, but the man refused--"on principle," he'd said. Apparently, he took his disguises even more seriously than Hector thought. Either way, it wouldn't be quite as big of a deal if someone recognized Roman, since he was at least Atreyan, so Hector didn't press the issue.

"I did not expect you to bring such a large group," said Secretary Karr, "but this is encouraging to see. If there is any way in which we can help, you need only to ask. You are doing this country a great service. Come, let us walk."

The two parties became one as they moved toward the airport terminal together. Normally, it might not have been so easy to chat on the open tarmac like this, but there were no other airplanes either coming or going. It didn't escape Hector's notice how empty the place looked.

"Have you already evacuated this area?" said Hector.

"For the most part, yes," she said. "There have been a number of anomalous events in this area that suggest the Beast may be closer than we first thought."

Hector kind of wanted someone else to take the lead in this conversation, but that obviously wasn't going to fly, since he was the only person in their group who wasn't trying to keep a low profile in one way or another. ""Events like what?"" he asked.

""Frequent changes in weather, for one thing. This place was covered in snow three days ago, but you wouldn't know it now. Then it was blisteringly hot, and just yesterday, there was an electrical storm that knocked out most of our electronics.""

""Oh,"" said Hector. ""That would explain your lantern, then.""

""Hmm? Oh, yes. We found a few of these in storage. Thankfully, we at least managed to get some of the radios back up and running.""

Hector found that concerning. ""Sounds like this area is pretty dangerous, then. Should you even be here, right now?""

"2318

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Frankly,"" said Secretary Karr, her voice suddenly wavering, ""ah... no, I probably should not be here at all. I only meant to greet you upon your arrival. I did not think that once I came here, I would be trapped.""

Hector blinked. ""Trapped?"" And he noticed her gaze as well, going back and forth, as if watching for something.

""As I said, the storm yesterday knocked out most of our electronics. We lost all ability to communicate with the outside world until only a few hours ago. It was quite a frightening ordeal, I must say.""

Stoutamire chimed in again. ""Oh, indeed! We were worried that the Beast would attack at any moment! So you can be sure that I am not exaggerating or merely being polite when I say that we are quite pleased to see you now!""

Damn. Hector eyed the distant treeline in the darkness. The airport was fairly large, but it still seemed to be surrounded by forest. The monster could literally appear from any direction, in that case.

So far, these people didn't sound that scared, but maybe they were just trying to remain professional and not panic their subordinates.

If he were in their shoes, he would probably be pretty fucking terrified. He could only imagine what they must have gone through in the last day.

""Is someone coming to pick you up?"" said Hector.

""Yes, we received word that a Special Operations team was being deployed here over two hours ago,"" said the Secretary. ""They have... yet to arrive.""

Hmm. Hector eyed their small group another time. It was just the Secretary, the Ambassador, and three apparent attendants. ""Did you not have a security team escort you here?"" he asked.

""We did,"" she said. ""However, they went missing about ten hours ago. We have no idea where they are.""

Holy shit.

Hector stopped walking, which made everyone else do the same. ""Well, we have an airplane and a spare pilot,"" he said, very calmly. ""Why don't you take them both and go somewhere a bit safer?""
"2319

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Secretary Karr was visibly taken aback. ""That is an incredibly generous offer, Lord Goffe! You would be leaving yourself with no means of escaping this place. Are you sure that would be wise?""

Before answering, Hector glanced toward Roman. He was the one actually paying for that plane, after all.

Roman merely returned a slight nod, apparently not feeling the need to actually interject into the conversation personally.

""We'll be fine,"" said Hector. ""Please, take it and go.""

The Secretary of State looked around at her people for a moment, then gave Hector a nod. ""Thank you. We will do as you ask. But before we go, do you have any other questions for us concerning the Beast? Or anything else?""

Hector mulled it over. If this was really going to be the last chance he got to talk to any of the Lorentians before the hunt was on, then he probably shouldn't waste the opportunity. But what should he ask about?

""...Have you learned anything new about the creature since I last spoke to Ambassador Stoutamire?"" said Hector.

It was her turn to think. ""I already mentioned the abnormal weather. We were not previously aware that the Beast possessed any such capabilities. I suppose it could be unrelated. We have no actual proof that it is causing these strange disturbances in the environment.""

It was good to be skeptical, Hector supposed, but he highly doubted that it was just some freak coincidence.

The masked Carlos Sebolt leaned in to whisper something into Hector's ear. ""Lord, ask her where she last saw her security team.""

""Your security escort,"" said Hector. ""You said they went missing ten hours ago?""

""That's right.""

""Where was the last place you saw them?""

""Ah... they were not all in one place together,"" she said. ""They went missing around the same time, but I remember seeing them surveying the area in pairs. The most alarming moment was when my two personal bodyguards disappeared. Unlike the others, they were not supposed to leave my side at all.""

"2320

Carlos whispered to him again. ""Lord, that is highly alarming. Please ask her for more details.""

Hector didn't need to be told either of those things. ""How exactly did your two bodyguards disappear?""

""Ah--well, one moment they were there, and the next they were not,"" she said. ""We looked all over the airport, but we were unable to find them.""

""Okay, but--"" Hector hesitated. He wanted to be careful with what he said, but he needed better clarification. Was she actually talking about people vanishing before her eyes? Probably not, right? And broaching the subject of invisibility was more likely to alarm everyone in the group. He decided to rephrase his question. ""...So let me make sure I understand. One moment, they were there, then you turned away? And then when you looked back, your bodyguards weren't there anymore?""

""Yes, that is correct."" The Secretary sounded mildly confused, perhaps wondering why he was asking for clarification on something so simple.

Okay, so probably not invisibility, then. For a second there, he'd gotten flashbacks to both Dunehall and the Gaolanets' Estate. In a background thought process, he wondered if the Scarf would work as well on detecting invisible aberrations as it did on invisible Sparrows.

""Lord,"" came Carlos' voice again, ""ask her how well she knew her bodyguards.""

Hmm. Hector could see where he was going with that question. ""How well did you know these two bodyguards of yours?""

The Secretary looked suddenly even more confused. ""I... not very well, I suppose."" And she blinked. ""You're not suggesting that they..."" For whatever reason, she left that sentence unfinished.

Hector, however, had another question for her that she might not like very much. ""Is it possible that the Beast didn't get them? That they just left on their own?""

Her posture stiffened somewhat. ""What are you implying, Lord Goffe?""

Hmm? Was he approaching a sore spot? ""I'm just trying to understand the situation here.""

"2321

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

The Secretary did not look pleased. ""You think they may have betrayed me.""

Hector cocked an eyebrow. Was she getting upset at him? ""Do you think that they may have betrayed you?""

She looked like she wanted to say no, but she only frowned, instead.

""...Can you think of a reason why they might leave you here?"" said Hector.

She glanced at Stoutamire, then at the three attendants. ""I... have my enemies. As any public figure does.""

""...But is there something more specific?"" said Hector.

She exhaled. ""Ah... you're looking for what you would call a 'credible threat,' no?""

Was he? It just seemed like a sensible thing to ask about, Hector thought.

""There was an incident a few months ago,"" she went on, ""wherein three members of Congress were convicted of treason.""

That was certainly news to Hector.

""I was... tangentially involved, you might say,"" she said.

""How so?"" said Hector.

""I bankrolled the lead prosecutor when all of his other funding had mysteriously dried up. I tried to keep my name out of it, but I suspect my efforts only went so far.""

Hector couldn't help feeling like he'd just heard a secret that he might've been safer not knowing. It was quite a familiar feeling, actually.

""It is unlikely that those three were the only conspirators,"" she said. ""If they wanted me dead, then I suppose it would be quite convenient if the Beast of Lorent took care of it for them. No need to risk an assassination attempt. My death would not look suspicious at all this way, would it? How could I have been so blind?""

Hector held up a hand. ""Alright, well, let's not jump to too many conclusions yet. It was just a thought. We don't actually have any proof that your bodyguards betrayed you. It really might've just been the Beast that got them.""

"2322

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The Secretary's frown remained exactly where it was. ""But if it was the monster, then why did it not come for us as well? I was wondering that previously, yet now I feel foolish for not having realized it sooner.""

Stoutamire chimed in again. ""Sadly, I think you may be right, ma'am. And if that's so, then might it not be safer to remain here? With Lord Goffe?"" He addressed Hector directly. ""Your offer to give us your plane is incredibly kind of you, but now I can't help worrying that the real danger for the Madame Secretary may not come from this mysterious Beast at all.""

Hector cocked an eyebrow. ""Just like that, you think the monster isn't real?""

""Oh, no, it may well be,"" said the Ambassador, ""but so may the threat on the Secretary's life be. I cannot speak for the rest of us, of course, but I feel much safer now that you are here, and to be quite blunt, I would rather not leave your side just yet. What if the Beast is somehow able to bring down the aircraft?""

That pulled a couple of disquieted whispers out of the man's unnamed associates.

Hector made no response, though. He supposed the guy had a point. They didn't actually know what the monster was capable of. It wasn't outside the realm of possibility that it could attack the airplane, especially if it could alter the weather.

But Hector still couldn't help mistrusting Stoutamire's words a little. There was something in his mannerisms that Hector found slightly unsettling. Perhaps it was the lack of genuine fear in the man's eyes. The Ambassador somehow looked happy about having an excuse to stay.

Hector tried not to rush to judgment, though. He probably shouldn't base his decisions off of things like ""the look in someone's eyes,"" eh? The fuck did that even mean, anyway? He may've been a lord now, but it wasn't like he'd suddenly gained lie-detecting powers or anything."

"2323

A suddenly cold gust of wind interjected in their conversation, causing everyone to brace themselves against its biting touch. Then in the distance, a bolt of lightning flashed across the night sky, followed very soon afterward by its accompanying boom.

The others all looked briefly in the direction the bolt had been in, and Hector did the same, but his mind was simultaneously elsewhere.

Because that gust of wind had showed him something through the Scarf.

Quite far away from the group, on one of the grounded airplanes, Hector had briefly sensed the foggy outline of a figure. And a large one--familiarily large. It had only been for a fleeting moment, but he was pretty sure of what he'd just sensed.

A Sparrow.

Impulsively, Hector wanted to look over in that direction immediately, but he resisted. He was pretty sure that they would just be invisible, anyway, and they might suspect that he was onto them if they saw him looking right at them.

Was it Hanton? Hector doubted it. The Lord Gaolanet would've known better than to try to hide from him.

Whoever it was, this was a problem. Before anything else, Hector needed to know if they were hostile. Because if they were, then he couldn't trust anything that his eyes were telling him, right now. Everything was potentially an illusion.

""Excuse me,"" said Hector, drawing everyone's attention. ""I know this may seem odd, but could you all wait here one minute? There's something I have to take care of. I won't be long.""

Understandably, they were all confused, and it took him a little while to ""explain"" without actually explaining. He told that he knew he was being a little weird but that everything was fine. And even after he'd convinced the Lorentians, the Rainlords tried to come along, too, so he had to tell them to stay and guard the Secretary.

They didn't say much, but he knew they weren't very pleased by that."
"2324

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Roman seemed curious as well, but even though he already knew about the existence of Sparrows, Hector still couldn't explain the circumstances without alerting the Sparrow who was probably listening to their conversation at this very moment.

He would have to be quick. Now that the wind had died down again, he couldn't actually sense the bird anymore. It was almost definitely still there, but Hector was sure that it would fly away as soon as he got close. He would've liked to be more diplomatic in his approach, but he highly doubted that an unknown Sparrow would stick around and talk to him, even if he asked nicely.

So he did it all in an instant. Simultaneous materializations. He domed everyone in with soul-infused iron and also launched himself straight in the direction in which he'd sensed the bird.

And yes, it was definitely still there.

He bolted across the tarmac in the span of a single breath. The Sparrow barely had time flap its wings once before he'd clapped its entire invisible body in iron, save only the beak.

Immediately, he could feel the psychic assault on his mind, the same oppressive sensation as when he'd first met Hanton Gaolanet.

""That won't work on me,"" said Hector. ""Just calm down. This doesn't have to turn into a fight. I only want to know who you are and what you're doing here.""

'Then why did you attack me first?!' The telepathic voice was somehow feminine. Hector didn't know how he could tell that. He just could.

""Only to prevent you from fleeing. Here."" And he annihilated the Sparrow's iron coating to demonstrate that he was telling the truth.

The Sparrow remained invisible to his eyes but not the Scarf. She flapped her wings with seeming disorientation and kicked up a few new gusts of wind on her own, but she didn't start trying to fly, and after a few more moments, she settled back down.

There was tense silence, but given her body language, Hector was hopeful.

""...Tell me who you are,"" he tried.

'My name is Pauline Gaolanet.'

"2325 -- CCXXV.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Five: 'Emissaries unto the Gloom...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Aw, fuck.

'I believe you've already met my father,' said Pauline.

""...Yeah,"" said Hector. ""I have. Did he tell you to follow me?""

'Aha... No.'

""Then why are you here?""

'Curiosity, primarily.'

He frowned. ""This place is dangerous.""

'No kidding.'

""You should go home,"" he clarified.

'Heh. I'm a big girl. But I appreciate your concern. How long have you known I was following you, by the way?'

He ignored that question. ""Do you even know what's going on here?""

'Do you?'

This was getting obnoxious. ""Ms. Gaolanet, please just--""

'I'm not going home, no matter what you say. You might as well get that silly notion out of your head, right now. Do you have any idea how difficult it was to keep up with a freaking airplane? I'm flesh and blood, okay? After all that trouble, I'm seeing this little adventure through with you to the end.'

Hector was getting the distinct impression that Pauline was going to be even more difficult to deal with than Hanton.

'In fact, perhaps it's better that you noticed me. I was considering revealing myself to you eventually, anyway. Once I'd observed you for a bit longer. So maybe we can think of this as just speeding things up a little.'

He stifled a sigh. ""Why are you so interested in this?""

'Oh, multiple reasons, really. But let's just say that I'd like to know more about Atreya's very own Lord Darksteel. Seeing you in action is reason enough, I think.'

This time, he really did sigh.

'By the way, not to sound too conceited, but I think you could probably use my help. I mean, it's impressive that you were able to get the jump on me the way you did, but I've been listening to your conversation long enough to know that you are in dire need of good information. And gathering intel is what Sparrows are best at.'

"2325 -- CCXXV.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Five: 'Emissaries unto the Gloom...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Aw, fuck.

'I believe you've already met my father,' said Pauline.

""...Yeah,"" said Hector. ""I have. Did he tell you to follow me?""

'Aha... No.'

""Then why are you here?""

'Curiosity, primarily.'

He frowned. ""This place is dangerous.""

'No kidding.'

""You should go home,"" he clarified.

'Heh. I'm a big girl. But I appreciate your concern. How long have you known I was following you, by the way?'

He ignored that question. ""Do you even know what's going on here?""

'Do you?'

This was getting obnoxious. ""Ms. Gaolanet, please just--""

'I'm not going home, no matter what you say. You might as well get that silly notion out of your head, right now. Do you have any idea how difficult it was to keep up with a freaking airplane? I'm flesh and blood, okay? After all that trouble, I'm seeing this little adventure through with you to the end.'

Hector was getting the distinct impression that Pauline was going to be even more difficult to deal with than Hanton.

'In fact, perhaps it's better that you noticed me. I was considering revealing myself to you eventually, anyway. Once I'd observed you for a bit longer. So maybe we can think of this as just speeding things up a little.'

He stifled a sigh. ""Why are you so interested in this?""

'Oh, multiple reasons, really. But let's just say that I'd like to know more about Atreya's very own Lord Darksteel. Seeing you in action is reason enough, I think.'

This time, he really did sigh.

'By the way, not to sound too conceited, but I think you could probably use my help. I mean, it's impressive that you were able to get the jump on me the way you did, but I've been listening to your conversation long enough to know that you are in dire need of good information. And gathering intel is what Sparrows are best at.'"

"2326

Hector couldn't deny that her abilities might prove useful here, even just judging from what he knew Sparrows to be capable of. He doubted he even understood the full scope of what they could do.

But still.

""Your father--""

'Isn't here, right now,' said Pauline.

""But he can find you no matter where you are, can't he? Because of your psychic bond?""

'Oh, you know about that, do you? Well, not to worry. He has to actively be looking for me in order for that to work, and right now, he has no reason to think I am anywhere out of the ordinary. Not to mention, he's been quite busy lately, himself. He probably won't even have time to worry about little old me.'

""But if something were to happen to you, he'd never forgive me,"" said Hector.

'And if something were to happen to YOU, our country would suffer tremendously.'

Flattery now? Hector wasn't buying it. ""I'm a little more durable than you are.""

'I know how to keep myself safe. And maybe you, too, if you're nice to me.'

Agh. What the hell was he supposed to say here? Or do, for that matter?

Maybe... just roll with it? For now, at least?

Hmm.

""...Alright, well, how would you even go about gathering intel on this monster?""

'First, I'd go observe it.'

""...That would be insanely dangerous for you.""

'Well, I wouldn't waltz up to the thing and poke it with a stick, if that's what you're thinking. I'd scout it from a safe distance.'

""How would you locate it, though?""

'Hmm? Oh, I already know where it is.'

Hector couldn't help blinking at that bit of news. ""What?""

'It's emitting a powerful aura. I can sense what direction it's in from here. Sorry, I forgot that you adorable humans can't sense auras. Or at least, not very well. That must really suck. No offense.'

"2327

""What do you mean by 'aura,' exactly?"" said Hector. ""You're not referring to its soul, are you?""

'No,' said Pauline. 'Souls and auras are linked, but they're not the same thing. They can have profound effects on one another.'

Profound effects?

Hector wanted to ask for further explanation, but everyone was waiting on him, and he felt like this could turn into a rather long conversation if he allowed it to.

""Well, if you insist on helping, I won't try to stop you,"" he said. ""But I want you to stay close by. If something does happen, I'll try my best to keep you out of harm's way.""

'Oh my. So gallant.'

""That's not--what I--agh...""

'Hee hee. Are you embarrassed?'

Aw, shit.

Hector turned and started walking back to the iron dome he'd made for the others. ""Just don't go off on your own, please.""

'That's fine. I can scout pretty far away without moving at all. Oh, and hey, should I reveal myself to your friends, too?'

Hector stopped and half-turned. He didn't need to look, since she wasn't actually visible, but he at least wanted to talk in her direction again. ""Do you want to?""

'Mm, I don't know. It'll be a little awkward if you're the only one who knows I'm here, won't it?'

""There are Lorentian politicians over there, you know. My people would be fine, but they'll probably freak out if they see you.""

'Yeah, but I'll be lonely if I can't talk to anyone!'

Hector just looked at her.

'Alright, fine, I'll stay hidden. I guess you'll just have to talk to me enough for everyone.'

""...How? If I respond to anything you say, they'll think I'm crazy.""

'That sounds like a YOU problem.'

He couldn't tell if she was joking or not. ""Just... we'll talk later, okay?""

'I'll hold you to that, Lord Darksteel.'

"2328

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector annihilated his dome and rejoined the others. The Rainlords remained quiet, but the Lorentians had questions. Hector apologized for being secretive and told them that it was too difficult to explain.

They didn't seem to care for that response very much, but perhaps they felt like they didn't have much choice, because it didn't take long for them to stop asking him about it.

The worsening weather and growing tension in the air apparently took priority.

From there, things actually proceeded a bit more smoothly, though Hector was even more uncomfortable than usual. There were far too many variables in play right now for his liking, and knowing that Pauline was secretly listening to every word being said made him second guess almost everything that was coming out of his mouth.

But he wasn't showing it, thankfully. He was able to relegate his worries to a background thought process and thereby mitigate most of his visible hesitation.

That was important. He knew he needed to be calm. These people were relying on him.

He asked Secretary Karr if there were any other personnel in the airport right now, and he was unhappy to hear that there were.

The first order of business, then, was getting everyone together so that they could be protected. He may have been here to hunt down the so-called Beast of Lorent, but these civilians took priority.

The booms of thunder were becoming both louder and more frequent. The terminal's very large windows that overlooked the tarmac shuddered harder each time, to the point where everyone began to stay away from them in the fear that they might simply break.

It took a little while to gather everyone together, but Hector was at least relieved that, according to one another, all of the airport's personnel were accounted for. It also helped that there weren't very many of them, due largely to the fact that the airport was currently closed to the public. Apparently, the only people here were the ones who'd been needed in order to maintain essential operations for his arrival here."

"2329

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Once the civilians were taken care of, though, Hector was faced with a decision.

The hunt was still on, but he couldn't very well leave these people here unprotected. And at the same time, trying to take them somewhere safer was also risky.

He took his time to think it over. He brought Garovel up to speed on the situation and asked for his opinion, and the reaper told him to rely on the Rainlords for not just their strength but also their opinions.

So he did. He found a place where he could talk to Roman and the Rainlords in private while still keeping an eye on the Lorentians, and then they held an impromptu strategy meeting.

It didn't take long for the general consensus to become clear. Rather than splitting up their forces to protect the civilians and hunt the Beast separately, they believed it would be wiser to pool all of their power to ensure the Lorentians were taken to safety, and then they would go hunting afterwards.

When pressed on the subject of the potential assassination of Secretary Karr, they only had one thing to say.

""We'll protect her while she is with us, of course, but doing anything more than that would be unreasonable."" It was the Lord Salvador Delaguna who actually uttered those words, but Fidel Blackburn and Carlos Sebolt both agreed.

Roman seemed less certain, though he did nod in approval.

Hector could see why they felt that way. Getting involved in Lorentian politics without any knowledge of what was really going on--that did seem like it could spiral out of control and bite them on the ass, even if their intentions were pure.

However, they were still leaving the final decision in Hector's hands. They told him that they would go along with whatever he chose to do.

Which was rather surprising, Hector felt."
"2330

Appearances aside, he wasn't actually their leader. They didn't have to listen to him, especially when they were all speaking in private like this.

But then again, Pauline was no doubt eavesdropping on their conversation, wasn't she? In that case, he supposed it was good that they were still playing the part of his subordinates.

The thing was, though, that he hadn't yet told them about her presence. He'd been waiting for the right time, and then it slipped his mind until just now.

They were doing this unprompted.

Phew. That was a nerve-racking realization, somehow.

He had to relax. The Rainlords were just following his lead because he was the one that Lorentian government had asked for. This was his mission. That was all this was.

Or so he kept telling himself.

Zeff's words rang through his mind.

""Do you even realize how many people look up to you now?"" he had said.

That was quite a while ago, yet it seemed more accurate than ever now as Hector deliberated on what their next move should be.

With the weather the way it was, leaving the airport with the non-servants seemed like a bad idea, but if the cause of the weather was supernatural, then it might not stop any time soon.

For now, at least, everyone was safe. He could hear the wind howling outside and sheets of rain buffeting the windows, but it wasn't like the building was crumbling or anything. It was just a scary storm.

Ultimately, he decided to wait a while longer to see if the weather cleared up. If it did, he planned to do as the Rainlords said and take the Lorentians to safety as a group.

Hector also took the opportunity to privately inform Roman and the Rainlords of the allied Sparrow's presence, which of course prompted more questions that he didn't have the answers for."

"2331

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Oh, so you're just gonna casually rat me out like that, huh?' came Pauline's telepathic voice. 'And after you told me not to reveal myself, too? I'm not sure I can forgive this betrayal, Lord Goffe.'

He couldn't respond to her, but judging from her tone, she was joking.

Probably.

Hector hoped his understanding of avian psychic inflections was accurate.

The group gathered in the airport's food court while they waited out the storm. None of the shops were open--or even staffed, for that matter--but there were a few places with prepackaged food on display. Hector wasn't hungry, but apparently some of the Lorentians were. Secretary Karr didn't stop her people from taking anything, but she did insist that they leave the appropriate amount of money behind for whatever they chose. She even paid for a few things herself.

Hector observed the civilians closely, wanting to gauge how well they were handling the pressure of the situation. On the whole, they seemed like they were doing alright, but he could occasionally spot their hands trembling or their shoulders shaking.

Hector admired their courage even more, somehow. They were true professionals, showing up for work at a place like this and not visibly panicking, but in the end, they were still normal human beings.

""Hey, bird lady,"" said Roman suddenly, addressing the empty air in front of him. He was sitting with Hector, a good distance away from everyone else. ""You can hear me, right?""

A beat passed, and Hector wondered if she would respond.

'Yes, I can. What do you want?'

""Aha. Cool. I was just wondering something. You can make incredibly lifelike avatars of yourself, right?""

'Indeed. And now I'm sure you're wondering why I haven't made one in order to talk with you.'

Roman chortled. ""Actually, I was wondering if you could make an avatar of yourself that doesn't look human.""

'...Excuse me?' said Pauline.

""Like a dog or something,"" said Roman. ""Could you make your avatar a talking dog?""

"2332

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'...I suppose I could,' said Pauline. 'But why would I do that?'

Roman shrugged. ""Because it'd be fun?""

'I'm already a talking bird. Is that not enough for you?'

""What can I say? I want to experience all of life's great wonders.""

'Are you telling me that a talking dog is better than a talking bird?'

""Hmm. That depends. Would saying that piss you off?""

'Quite possibly.'

""Ah, so you Sparrows are proud of your heritage, then? That's cool. I can respect that.""

'And I suppose I can appreciate your affection for talking dogs. I'm sure they would be much more interesting than talking apes.'

""Oho! On behalf of the entire human race, I take offense to that.""

'No, you don't. I'm psychic. I can tell.'

Roman laughed again. ""Alright, so what am I thinking right now?""

'It doesn't quite work that way.'

""Oh? Then how does it work?""

'Thoughts are generally too complicated to read. Emotions are a bit easier. And physical senses are easiest.'

""Ah, I see. So what am I feeling right now, then?""

There arrived a pause. '...Nothing in particular?' she said.

""Wow, you're right! Good job.""

'You are a very strange man, Roman Fullister.'

He perked up at that. ""How do you know my last name? Did you pull that out of my brain, too?""

'Didn't I just tell you that thoughts are too difficult to read like that?'

""Yeah, but a single word probably wouldn't be so hard, would it? That, or you could've been lying. Trying to get me to let my guard down so that you could rifle through my head and learn all of my juicy secrets.""

'Heh. Unfortunately, the 'size' of the thought makes little to no difference.'

""Mmhm. You didn't deny that last thing I said, I noticed.""

She gave a silent laugh. 'Do you even have any juicy secrets that I would be interested in?'

""Sure, loads. ""

"2333

'Somehow, I doubt that,' said Pauline.

""Tch. That's a very rude thing to say, you know. I have hidden depths."" Roman looked to Hector for some reason, then cracked a goofy smile. ""Very hidden, maybe, but they're there. Right, Hector?""

""Er... yeah...""

""C'mon, man, you've gotta agree with more enthusiasm than that. She'll think I'm full of shit, otherwise.""

Hector couldn't help laughing now, too. ""Are you full of shit?""

""Dude...""

'Perhaps your depths are too hidden for you own good,' said Pauline.

""Alright,"" said Roman, ""forget I said anything. And you never answered my question, by the way. If you didn't pluck it out of my brain, then how do you know my last name?""

'I overheard it.'

Roman raised an eyebrow. ""When? I'm pretty sure no one has said it during this trip.""

'Yes. This isn't the first time I've seen you.'

Roman blinked. ""Say what?""

'A billionaire servant living in Atreya? You may be good at fooling people with your disguises, but you'll have to do better than that in order to remain under the radar of Sparrows. In truth, I've known about you for a few years.'

And for a moment, Roman looked genuinely unsettled.

Hector could hardly blame him.

'Sorry,' said Pauline. 'I didn't mean to disturb you like that.'

""I'm not disturbed,"" said Roman.

'Yes, you are. I can tell.'

He frowned. ""Right..."

'If it makes you feel any better, I don't know everything about you.'

""What else do you know about me?""

'You're not affiliated with the Vanguard. Your reaper's name is Voreese. You live in Walton. You are quite close with your personal secretary--who is also rather fascinating, by the way. Your relationship with her is somewhat--'

""Alright, alright. That's already more than I wanted to hear.""
"2334

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Really? I didn't think it was that much,' said Pauline. 'You must be a very private person.'

""Hah. That's rich, coming from a Gaolanet,"" said Roman.

'Fair point.'

Roman put a smile back on as he changed the subject. ""So would you mind making an avatar for us to speak with? It's kinda awkward just talking to thin air, you know.""

'I could, but would it not be difficult to explain to our Lorentian friends why a new person suddenly appeared?'

""Mm, not if your avatar was a dog,"" said Roman.

Pauline gave a telepathic sigh.

Hector decided to offer her some help. ""Or you could just make it so that only the Atreyans can see your avatar, no?""

""Agh. Hector, buddy, you're killin' me here.""

'No offense, but I don't see much point in making an avatar that can only be seen by those of you who already possess knowledge of Sparrows. That would be like me asking you to do a handstand purely for my own amusement.'

Hector just shrugged. He didn't much care, either way.

Roman sure did, though. ""So a talking dog it is, then!""

'Sorry, but that's not happening, either.'

""Aw, c'mon, really?""

'It's not that simple. Creating new avatars is a long and arduous process.'

""Oh yeah? How come?""

'What do you mean how come? How long would it take YOU to create an illusory avatar for yourself? Oh, that's right, you can't.'

""Hey, hey, I didn't mean that as an insult. I was actually asking why it would take so long. What makes it so difficult?""

'Well, every perceivable detail must be accounted for in order for it to be truly lifelike. It requires considerable planning and building. And if my knowledge of the subject that I am trying to replicate is in some way lacking, then it will undoubtedly show in the finished product.'

"2335

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""I see, I see,"" said Roman. ""So the problem isn't that you literally cannot create an avatar quickly. It's that you're a perfectionist.""

'Excuse me?'

""I'm right, aren't I? You can make an avatar whenever you want, but it'll just look janky as hell. You're like an illustrator or painter obsessing over their craft, too embarrassed to show anyone your work until it's exactly to your liking.'

'...That's not accurate at all. It has nothing to do with a sense of artistry. It's for the purpose of making the avatar actually ""pass"" as lifelike, undetected.'

""Yeah, yeah, sure, but we already know that it'll be an illusion, so in this case, the lifelike part is superfluous, don't you think?""

'Ah...'

""C'mon, I dare you to make a super primitive avatar for yourself, right now. In like one minute.""

'Eh...'

""We won't be bothered if it looks weird. In fact, the weirder the better, I say. Right, Hector?""

Hector had no idea why Roman was trying to bring him back into the conversation. ""Er. Sure.""

'I don't think so...'

""Just do it! It'll be great!"" Roman started pumping his fists as if sitting at a dinner table. ""Avatar, avatar, avatar, avatar...!""

'Okay, fine. One minute, you said.'

""Yeah!""

And so they started waiting.

""I'm gettin' excited,"" said Roman. ""I wonder what it's gonna look like. Is it gonna be like a flat, 2D drawing floating in front of us? That'd be pretty neat. Oh, or do you think it'll be some kind of horrific, uncanny-valley-style mutant abomination? I'd be cool with that, too, honestly. Maybe even more so.""

Hector just listened quietly, the majority of his attention being paid to the non-servants on the other side of the cafeteria. He was glad Roman was able to enjoy himself, though, even in these strange circumstances."

"2336

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 1 of 20))~~

'...I changed my mind,' came Pauline's voice again. 'I don't want to do this, after all.'

""What?"" Roman's grin only widened, however. ""You finished it, didn't you?""

'N-no...'

""Yes, you did! I can tell! I'm psychic, too!""

'You most certainly are not.'

""Just show it to us. We won't be mean. If anything, it'll help endear you to us.""

'Is that really true?'

""Of course it is.""

'What do you think, Lord Goffe? Is Mr. Fullister telling the truth?'

Oh shit. ""Uh. Look, I don't know. Maybe.""

'Hmm...'

""Here. Hector will put a little barrier around us so that other people won't be able to see. Won't you, Hector?""

Hector was beginning to see a pattern with Roman. ""Sure."" He materialized a waist-high iron barricade.

'Fine, I'll show you. But you better not be mean.'

""We won't. We're the nicest guys you'll ever meet.""

'Oh, shut up.'

And right before their eyes, a cluster of lines appeared in midair. They were all rather disjointed and rough, as if hastily scratched with a pen on paper.

Roman's first prediction had been spot on, Hector realized. It really did look like a 2D drawing, though Hector couldn't really tell what it was supposed to depict.

Roman was barely containing his laughter with a hand over his mouth. His chest and shoulders were trembling with each breath. ""It's great!"" he barely said.

'Mrgh...'

Hector couldn't stop himself from asking what was probably a rude question. ""What is it supposed to be?""

'A dog!' she said. 'You said you wanted a talking dog, didn't you?'

""Oh, ah--yeah, I see it now,"" said Hector.

Roman, however, just exploded with laughter, drawing attention from everyone else in the cafeteria. ""That's great! It's so good! Thank you for showing us!""

Despite his words, those didn't actually sound like compliments, Hector felt.

And perhaps so did Pauline, because her avatar promptly vanished into nothingness again."

"2337

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 2 of 20))~~

""Aw, come on, bring it back!"" said Roman. ""Let me see that again!""

'Lord Goffe, it's okay if I erase his memory, isn't it?'"

"No," said Hector, though that question did pull a small laugh out of him, too.

Roman's cackling was cut short when a sudden rumbling arrived.

It didn't last long, but the entire cafeteria shifted, toppling chairs and even a few tables. And it certainly caught everyone's attention. Where before there had at least been a low murmur of discussion, now there was nothing as everyone was simply listening, waiting.

Had that been the storm, Hector wondered? Surely not. Yeah, it had enough strength to make the windows shake, but not the whole building?

Right?

He dematerialized the little barricade he'd made earlier and stood up in order to go check outside. They'd deliberately moved their party far away from all windows, so it was a bit of a trek to find some again.

When he did, however, he was not comforted to see that they were broken--not shattered, since they were presumably designed to be shatter-proof, but certainly in crumbling pieces, nonetheless. And the wind outside was howling even louder than before. It wasn't flowing inside, thankfully, but that was probably just because this area was sitting in a favorable direction. Hector could see the treeline in the distance bending deeply and losing scores of leaves by the second.

"Pauline, where are you?!" said Hector, having to speak louder over the wind.

'I'm safe in one of the hangars,' she said. 'Don't worry about me.'

He did worry, though. With winds like those, he doubted she would be able to fly away if she were put in danger.

But he had others to worry about, too, and another bout of rumbling made sure to remind him of that when it pulled a few screams and shrieks out of the Lorentians."

"2338

This time, the rumbling didn't dissipate immediately. It sustained itself for much longer, and even after it was gone, Hector began to hear even more unsettling noises coming from all directions. Cracking and groaning from the building itself--especially from above.

And seeing those winds out there, he couldn't help thinking that the roof might be coming off.

He rejoined the others and was glad to find the Rainlords already surrounding the Lorentians. Secretary Karr was trying to say something to him, but the rumbling returned again, louder and more violent than ever before.

Hector felt his feet move suddenly out from under him, and he was on the tiled floor before he even knew it. Disorientation reared up on him, compounded by all the noise and quaking, and all he could think to do was panic.

But that was only one thought process.

In another, he hadn't let go of what the Scarf was telling him.

That, too, was plenty confusing in its own way, as the roaring winds had apparently found their way inside and were running amok, tossing objects to and fro, swirling around everyone, and buffeting everything with punishing force.

But it wasn't that chaotic. True, it was perhaps the heaviest wind he'd ever sensed, but it was at least flowing in one general direction. He'd sensed much more confusing air currents sparring with Zeff. Compared to that, this wasn't so overwhelming.

So it took him a few moments to get his bearings, but he was able to figure out where everyone was--even while he himself was tumbling across the floor, crashing through tables, and toppling over counters.

He armored up and caught himself on the cafeteria's eastern wall. Then he started reaching out with his imagination to the Lorentians and armoring them up as well, ignoring the intensifying whirlwinds of chaos around them--ignoring even the fact that the ceiling and floor were both beginning to bend upwards."

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 4 of 20))~~

The whole building was coming apart. Hector could sense it more clearly with each passing second. The wind's fury was extending throughout the entire buckling structure.

But there was worse news. The Scarf was telling him about something particularly horrible outside, something that wasn't yet fully formed but that seemed like it soon would be. A gigantic, swirling funnel descending slowly from the cloudy sky.

A tornado.

And it was far too close to the building. The airport terminal was already barely holding together. That thing was going to rip through it like a drill.

Hector didn't have much time to think. He'd never sensed a fucking tornado before with the Scarf, but this one seemed absolutely gigantic and probably unstoppable. He just did whatever he could to prepare everyone, thickening their armor and strengthening it with his soul. Through the mayhem, he could vaguely sense some of the Rainlords doing similar work. Copper from Fidel Blackburn was even occasionally mixing in with his iron, adding layers on top of layers and providing walls for everyone.

By now, the roof and ceiling were both gone, replaced only by open sky and a storm of dust and rubble. The floor was threatening to go as well, but for the moment, it was holding together.

More concerning to Hector's mind was all of this highly conductive metal in the area. The wind and debris were the primary problems, of course, but there was still lightning to worry about, too. So he set to work simultaneously, trying to create large towers outside in order to attract any stray bolts, but the winds out there were so furious that his work could hardly even finish forming before being shredded to pieces.

He did hear a crashing boom, though, and promptly sensed the explosive dispersion of an already-crumbling iron tower. So maybe it had worked, after all."

"2340

The Rainlords seemed to have the others covered pretty well now, so Hector shifted more of his focus to creating towers. His first attempts hadn't held together very well, but that was because they hadn't been solid enough. He'd instinctively made them more porous in design--like radio towers, perhaps--but in this case, thicker might've been better.

And more than anything, he needed an extremely heavy foundation, lest the winds would immediately launch them into the air, so he started with a giant block of solid iron on the airport's tarmac, as large as the plane they'd arrived in. He added multiple spires to it, and also kept expanding out the base to give it extra grip on the ground.

The spires began to buckle almost immediately, so he had to annihilate and remake them. And it didn't stop happening the second or even third times, either. He just had to keep rebuilding.

But they were catching lightning alright. Which was all that mattered, he supposed.

It became a constant effort to maintain, but that was fine. He gave it its own thought process while he reassessed the situation.

The tornado had fully touched down, but it wasn't coming toward them, thankfully. Not yet, at least. The Rainlords were ushering everyone to another location and trying to catch his attention, so he gave an acknowledging wave and started following, bringing up the rear of their procession.

Behind him, the walls were coming down and chunks of the floor were flying up into the sky. He could even feel his feet beginning to catch a bit too much air with each new step he took, so he added more weight to his armor in order to help anchor himself.

He pushed onward through the punishing wind, each step becoming a task unto itself as he tried his best to maintain full awareness of the situation. The status of the lightning rods. His own armor. The location of the tornado. The location of the Rainlords and Lorentians."

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 6 of 20))~~

So much to keep track of. Even with multiple thought processes, he was struggling. If he let up on his concentration, it would all just become a chaotic blur.

He could sense that the non-servants were being led down a flight of stairs. Getting everyone underground did seem like a good idea, but there was considerable rubble in the way. Roman and Salvador were digging through it while the others were preventing any new debris from falling on the group.

Before Hector could catch all the way up to them, however, the Scarf warned him about something much more important.

The tornado had turned around. It was heading straight towards them now.

He stopped walking, his mind racing. The others couldn't sense it. And with all this noise and chaos, he couldn't warn them. So what could he do, then?

Could he stop a tornado?

Probably not, he felt.

But he was about to find out for certain.

He eliminated some of his armor to lighten it and let himself get swept away by the wind. This was quite possibly the stupidest idea he'd ever had, but he didn't see any faster way of getting up close to the tornado.

He tumbled through open air, leaving the terminal behind completely and doing his best to keep his bearings.

It almost impossible. The roaring winds were louder now than he could've ever imagined, and the constant movement--being tossed around like a rag doll--would've surely been one of the most disorienting things he'd ever experienced if it hadn't been the air itself that was doing it.

The Scarf of Amordiin was saving his ass here, and he knew it.

As he flew around the vortex, he could sense the full of the tornado and all of the streams of air flowing to and from it like a thousand tendrils destroying everything in their path. A gargantuan monster in its own right, connecting land and sky. Magnificent. And terrible."

"2342

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 7 of 20))~~

There was so much loose debris in the air. Clusters of leaves, splintered wood, busted concrete, glass shards, metal scraps, and clouds of dust obscuring everything--Hector knew he couldn't just ignore it all. Garovel wasn't here to regenerate any injuries. If that metal pole flying toward him gored him through the chest, that would be the end of this mission.

It broke upon Haqq's shield without even so much as denting it, but there was more all around. The shield could probably stop just about anything the tornado wanted to throw at him, but doing that required constant attention and concentration.

He wanted a more streamlined solution, like maybe a giant orb of meter-thick iron, but he knew that if he did that, then the Scarf would be cut off from the wind, which would render him blind.

No. He was thinking too defensively. He was always like that, wasn't he? Perhaps that was just his natural state of mind. But that wasn't what was needed. He couldn't bring down this tornado by just protecting himself.

He had to be aggressive.

Right about now, he was seriously regretting not devoting more of his materialization studies to aerodynamics. No time to dwell on it, though. It seemed obvious enough disrupting the cyclical flow of air would hurt the tornado. How to go about it, though?

First ideas first. A big ass wall. He materialized in midair on the side of the tornado that was opposite to himself, and he started growing in both dimensions, making it as tall and wide as he possibly could.

More debris kept threatening him, though. He had to twist his body around to bat away a splintered tree trunk before it could skewer him, then a block of crumbling concrete, and then--oh shit, a truck."

"2343

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 8 of 20))~~

He knew instantly that he didn't have enough weight on his side to stop something that size, so Hector didn't even try. Instead, he materialized a dozen iron appendages from his armor and grabbed onto the truck, deciding it was better to hitch a ride than get clobbered.

Even that still had a jarring impact, though, and he narrowly avoided getting squished against the enormous vehicle's undercarriage. When he found his grip, he started annihilating and recreating his iron appendages in order to help him move along the outside of the truck. He spidered his way around to the topside, and once he was there, he used his iron arms and legs to counteract the vehicle's aerial spin and keep himself steady. The appendages needed to be destroyed and remade constantly in order to pull that off, but that wasn't too difficult for him.

The wall he'd made earlier had buckled in several places, and its pieces were now circling the tornado just like he was.

Shit.

He tried to think. Should he try to fight wind with wind? Maybe create a whirlwind that could counter the flow of the tornado?

A nice thought, but it seemed flatly impossible. He didn't see how he could built up that the necessary momentum in all this chaos. Surely, the tornado's cyclical flow would just swallow anything he made and turn it against him.

He looked down and regretted it. He'd never considered himself particularly afraid of heights, but holy fuck, he was high up now. And this wind. Constantly howling in his ears and pressing against his armor. If he wasn't already moving in the same direction, it would've certainly thrown him off the truck by now.

Hmm. Maybe this here was the right idea, though. The truck. The way he'd latched himself onto it. Looking around again, he could countless other objects swirling within the tornado.

What would happen if he started collecting them?"

"2344

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 9 of 20))~~

Worth a shot, he figured. He started using his iron to catch anything that flew close to the truck. Farther objects were more of a problem, though. He couldn't just propel an iron fishing line out and reel back in, unfortunately. Even if it were possible for him to ""shrink"" his iron back toward him like that, he doubted that these furious winds would allow him to pull that off.

But the iron wall that he'd made earlier was still flying around the tornado--in big pieces, maybe, but it was there. He decided to use those pieces to accumulate more things, catching more objects with thick iron nets and tentacles.

There was so much stuff. It took all his concentration, all thought processes. Those lightning rods from earlier? Ignored. The non-servants should've been underground by now, anyway.

But wait, wouldn't that mean that all this iron in the tornado would attract the lightning, instead? And none of it was touching the ground, either, so where would the electricity go?

Shit. He couldn't worry about that, yet. He had to focus on finishing his work here. He could sense the tornado bending and squirming, losing some of its shape--and the truck, it felt like it was slowing, if only a little.

Was this actually working? Or was the tornado just fading naturally?

He couldn't really tell one way or the other, but he didn't intend to stop. He'd amassed several giant clusters of debris already, and there was almost nothing else left. Just a few things here and there, too far away from everything else to catch. But not too far from each other. He attached them together with iron shackles and created one last little cluster.

Things were definitely slowing now, but the situation was still dangerous--perhaps even more than before, Hector suddenly realized. Sure, the tornado was no longer drilling through the airport like it was paper, but now there half a dozen house-sized wrecking balls of debris flying all around him."

"2345

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 10 of 20))~~

His still-spinning truck was losing altitude as well. It wouldn't be long before it crashed into the ground, and the impact alone would probably be enough to kill him if he didn't do something about it.

He tried attaching the wrecking balls to one another, but it was futile. The debris was too massive, and the iron connectors, too thin, even when he added dozens more links.

And the ground was getting awfully close.

Well.

The only thing he could think of was to push his materialization volume to its absolute limit. He hadn't tested the maximum amount of iron he could create in quite some time, but he supposed now was as good a time as any.

From the ground up, he started materializing an enormous iron cylinder, leaving it hollow in the center so that it could fully encapsulate the dwindling whirlwind. He could sense his work trembling against the raging winds, and he rushed to add more weight to it, making it taller and thicker.

He devoted everything to that end. Nothing else mattered. More mass. More weight. More iron.

It grew at a speed unlike anything he'd ever materialized before, and soon enough, he was looking down at a true tower of iron as it was rising up to meet him--to meet the wrecking balls, as well.

The goal wasn't to let them barrel into the side of it, though. He wanted it to catch the giant chunks of debris from below and thereby slow their descent. He wasn't expecting it to be easy or smooth.

And boy, was he right.

His truck was the first to crash down on the iron tower, and he leapt off it just as it was about to hit. The impact sent scraps of metal flying in all directions as the entire tower shuddered, but the truck's horizontal momentum helped to mitigate some of the damage, making it scrape diagonally down through the tower instead of straight through it."

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 11 of 20))~~

For a few moments, Hector was tumbling through open air again, loose iron appendages dangling freely as he struggled to maintain his bearings. Where was he in relation to the wrecking balls? It was hard to--

There. Above him. About to pass him by.

He hooked onto the nearest one at the last second, and it yanked him forward with enough force to knock the breath out of his lungs and leave him feeling light-headed. He teetered on the brink of passing out before regaining himself with only seconds to register the fact that the wrecking ball he was attached to was about to collide with the tower, too.

No time. He pushed for more iron. More weight to the tower. And some quick links--spindly attempts to bridge the gap between the tower and the ball. To soften the blow, maybe.

He let go just before impact again, but this time, he couldn't even tell what happened to the tower, because he went sailing straight onward and completely overshot everything.

The wind wasn't circling anymore, he realized. The tornado had fully dissipated, and now he was just in freefall with the remaining wrecking balls. One was close to him, but the others were far away, flying off into the forest or toward the tarmac.

He had to concentrate on landing safely. That was the priority. The mission depended on it.

Flight. He could fly, couldn't he? That would soften any landing, but for the life of him, he couldn't summon to mind how he'd managed to pull that off before.

Simplify.

That was what was in his head--or at least, that was what one of the thought processes was telling him. What were the others saying? Nothing? He couldn't tell.

Didn't matter.

Velocity states were simple enough. An iron plate between him and the ground. Pushing him upward with enough force to ease his descent. But not by enough. So he added another. And another.

Layers.

Then a few more to slow his horizontal speed as well."

"2347

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 12 of 20))~~

Hector could barely hold onto a single thought between choked breaths. Where was he? How fast was he going? Where was the ground? What was the Scarf telling him? Hopefully, this would be--

He hit pavement, thick armor scratching and kicking up visible sparks as he toppled over himself. The iron layers he'd made all went clattering in various directions and as he finally skid to a halt, face down.

Agh.

That hadn't felt good. He wanted to groan in pain, but he was still struggling to catch his breath, too, so he ended up just coughing into his faceguard for a while longer.

Gradually, he tried to take stock of his body parts. He could still move everything, at least. He felt pain all over, but it was dull and not that bad. He'd certainly had worse.

He groaned as he tried to crawl back up onto his feet. Plate armor didn't make that task any easier, and it was battered and dented in several places, locking some of his limbs at awkward angles. He ended up just annihilating it.

He was prepared to remake his armor immediately, but he noticed that the winds had died down significantly. Not only had the tornado disappeared, but the rest of the storm had settled as well.

Where the hell was everyone?

That wrecked building over there could only have been the airport terminal, though it was almost unrecognizable now. He started toward it as he tried to reassess things.

He could see the tarmac from here. One of the balls of debris was there, but he didn't see any airplanes anymore. Had the tornado swept them away, too?

Oh.

Yep.

He saw half of an aircraft buried in the nearby treeline. He was fairly certain that was the same plane that had brought them here to Lorent. It was missing its tail and also a wing."

"2348 -- CCXXVI.

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 13 of 20))~~

Hector wasn't sure if he felt worse for Roman or for the company he'd chartered the plane from. He considered informing Garovel that their ride back to Atreya had just been chewed up and spit out by an angry sky, but he wasn't sure what that would accomplish other than making the reaper worry. He planned to tell him eventually, just not yet. The priority was locating everyone. He jogged back toward the airport as he reached out with the Scarf, trying to sense human figures among all the rubble.

Instead, he sensed an enormous bird approaching, and he slowed down just before feeling the gust of wind from her landing.

Before even saying anything, however, she revealed herself to his eyes. She wasn't quite as tall or bulky as Hanton had been, but her plumage was similarly red-and-brown, though she had a bit of gold around her eyes and along the tips of her wings and tail.

""What are you doing?"" he asked. ""Someone might see you.""

She didn't answer him. She only stared at him.

""Pauline? Are you okay?""

'Yes. I'm fine.'

He took a breath. ""Good. We need to find the others.""

'That we do.'

He couldn't help squinting at her. Something in the tone of her psychic voice was bothering him. ""Are you sure you're okay?""

'Lord Goffe... you're the only human I can sense here now.'

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Six: 'O, avatar of clarity...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector didn't understand. ""What?""

'The others have all disappeared,' said Pauline. 'You're the only one left.'

She wasn't saying that everyone had been... killed. Right?

""What are you talking about?"" Hector walked past her and continued toward the terminal. ""I saw them heading underground. I'm sure they're fine.""

'Perhaps they are,' she said, 'but something happened to them when they went down there, and I don't know what it was. They simply vanished from my sight.'

"2348 -- CCXXVI.

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 13 of 20))~~

Hector wasn't sure if he felt worse for Roman or for the company he'd chartered the plane from. He considered informing Garovel that their ride back to Atreya had just been chewed up and spit out by an angry sky, but he wasn't sure what that would accomplish other than making the reaper worry. He planned to tell him eventually, just not yet. The priority was locating everyone. He jogged back toward the airport as he reached out with the Scarf, trying to sense human figures among all the rubble.

Instead, he sensed an enormous bird approaching, and he slowed down just before feeling the gust of wind from her landing.

Before even saying anything, however, she revealed herself to his eyes. She wasn't quite as tall or bulky as Hanton had been, but her plumage was similarly red-and-brown, though she had a bit of gold around her eyes and along the tips of her wings and tail.

""What are you doing?"" he asked. ""Someone might see you.""

She didn't answer him. She only stared at him.

""Pauline? Are you okay?""

'Yes. I'm fine.'

He took a breath. ""Good. We need to find the others.""

'That we do.'

He couldn't help squinting at her. Something in the tone of her psychic voice was bothering him. ""Are you sure you're okay?""

'Lord Goffe... you're the only human I can sense here now.'

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Six: 'O, avatar of clarity...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector didn't understand. ""What?""

'The others have all disappeared,' said Pauline. 'You're the only one left.'

She wasn't saying that everyone had been... killed. Right?

""What are you talking about?"" Hector walked past her and continued toward the terminal. ""I saw them heading underground. I'm sure they're fine.""

'Perhaps they are,' she said, 'but something happened to them when they went down there, and I don't know what it was. They simply vanished from my sight.'

"2349

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 14 of 20))~~

Hector's jaw clenched, but he didn't stop walking. Waiting around wasn't going to resolve anything.

Pauline hopped up and glided to keep pace with him. 'Are you alright, by the way? Your aura has changed.'

He wasn't much in the mood for questions--asking or answering them--but he felt like he'd regret it later if he didn't inquire further on that point. ""My aura?""

'Auras are sometimes reflective of one's emotional state, though it's not a direct link. Your soul and your will are more likely to have an effect on it.'

His will, huh? ""I'm still not even sure what an 'aura' is.""

'Hmm. How to explain? It's like your 'presence,' I suppose. It can't normally be felt with purely physical senses--though there are certainly exceptions.'

""Are you talking about the field density of my soul?""

'Ah. Servant terminology. I'm less familiar with how your reapers describe things, but I believe a soul's field density is only one aspect of an aura. It's the aspect that links souls and auras together, I believe.'

""Then I still don't understand.""

'Agh. It's difficult to explain to someone who lacks strong psychic abilities.'

Hector climbed through a gaping hole in the terminal's southern wall. He touched it as he passed, and more of it came crumbling down, prompting him to remake his iron armor. Nothing fell on him, though.

Pauline flew up above the building and began circling. 'An aura is like your own little... energy space. It goes wherever you go. It shifts and changes as you do, growing more powerful or more weak as you do.'

Hector had to push a few boulders aside. ""You mentioned 'profound effects' before, didn't you?""

'Yes. A powerful aura can make a soul... more resilient in certain ways, though not all. And the opposite is true, as well. A powerful soul will almost inevitably emit a stronger aura.'

This sounded vaguely familiar, Hector thought."

"2350

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 15 of 20))~~

'I should admit, however, that auras remain somewhat mysterious even to us Sparrows. We can perceive them far more clearly than you can, but it is difficult to identify what is influencing them in each specific case. One aura might be enhanced by an uncommonly strong soul, while another is enhanced by an uncommonly strong will. Or by emotions, as I mentioned before.'

That put a question in Hector's head. ""And what about this Beast of Lorent? You said it has a powerful aura, didn't you?""

'Yes. Monsters are among the more mysterious specimens. They don't generally have strong wills, since they are typically driven by instinct alone, and emotions are not really a factor for them, either. I'm less familiar with how soul power works, but as I understand it, most monsters cannot wield it.'

""Then are you saying that the Beast can?""

'I think that is quite likely. If not, then there must be some other explanation for its imposing aura.'

""Like what?""

'I have no idea, but I cannot imagine it would be anything good.'

Hector had more he wanted to ask, but he arrived at the staircase that he'd seen the others use. It was partially clogged with debris, so he materialized iron in between the gaps and then pulled it all out at once.

Before he completed the task, though, he ran into a problem. As much as he tried, it wouldn't budge. At first, he was confused, until he realized that he couldn't materialize any more iron.

So this was his current volume limit. He'd almost forgotten about that problem, but he could hardly be disappointed with himself. He'd left enough iron outside that he probably could've built a brand new air traffic control tower for this poor airport.

Not that it would've been a good idea to make a building entirely out of iron.

He annihilated all of the iron he'd left outside. It took a couple solid minutes to get it all."

"2351

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 16 of 20))~~

Hector stared down the open stairwell and saw only pitch darkness waiting for him. It wasn't so surprising that the electricity wasn't working anymore, considering the state the rest of the airport was in, but that rationalization didn't make that big black hole in the floor look any less menacing.

'You sure you want to go down there?' said Pauline.

Scary though it might've looked, the Scarf was telling him that it was just an empty room. No movement other than the air itself. Only a bunch of large boxes and maybe some debris. He didn't sense any other way out, either, but he was sure that he'd seen the others heading down there.

""Do you sense the monster's aura down there?"" he asked.

'No. I don't sense anything.'

Hector sighed. There was no helping it. 'Hey, Garovel, is Voreese with you?'

'Not at the moment,' came the reaper's echoing response, 'but I can go get her. Why? What do you need from her?'

'Well, I don't mean to alarm you, but... I need to know if Roman is still alive.'

'Ah.'

'And also, where he is. We've gotten separated.'

'...Hector. I have a lot of questions.'

'I figured. Can you ask Voreese about Roman first, though?'

'Alright. One second. Just need to... eh... hmm.'

Hector waited, but the silence went on a little too long. 'Garovel?'

'Uh... I swear, I sensed her somewhere around here like thirty minutes ago...'

Hector's eyes widened. 'Please don't tell me she's missing.'

'No, of course not. I'm just. Having trouble locating her. I'm sure she's... aha... oh shit. Yeah, okay, I think she's missing. Or she's playing a killer game of hide-and-seek, right now. How unfortunate would that be, huh? Talk about bad timing.'

'Garovel, that's not helping.'

'Okay, so how fucked up is your situation, right now?'

"2352

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 17 of 20))~~

'Well, the Lorentian Secretary of State is also missing,' said Hector.

'Oh. Fantastic,' said Garovel.

'And so is everyone she was with. As well all the Rainlords who came with me.'

'Holy shit, Hector. You're alone, right now?'

'Well, Pauline Gaolanet is with me.'

'What?!'

'Look, uh, let's focus on what's important here. What about the Rainlords' reapers? Can you sense Mevox? Or any of the others?'

'Ugh. One second.'

Truth be told, Hector actually kind of appreciated Garovel's attempts at levity, because his imagination was already running wild in the worst way. How could Voreese be missing? She was in completely different country. Surely, it was impossible for--

'Yeah, I can't sense any of them, either,' said Garovel.

'Fuck,' said Hector.

'I'm gonna have to tell the other Rainlords about this,' the reaper said. 'And sooner rather than later. Assuming they haven't noticed already, that is.'

Hector could see where this was going. They were going to send reinforcements. It was only a matter of time.

That could complicate matters significantly. But it could also help significantly.

Well, he had bigger things to worry about, right now. If Voreese and the other reapers had somehow been brought here against their will, then everyone was in much more danger now. He wanted to believe that they would be fine, considering how strong they all were, but this situation was just so weird.

'Do whatever you've gotta do, Garovel. I'm going to look for everyone.'

'Alright. Try to be careful. And maybe give me a warning if you're about to do something that might make me mysteriously go missing as well.'

'Okay. Um. I'm about to do that right now, actually.'

'Excuse me? What're you about to do?'

'Go down into the hole where everyone else disappeared.'

'Agh. Okay. Well. Good luck, I guess.'

'Thanks.'

Much to his dismay, however, the short trip down into the airport's underground area proved fruitless. It really was empty, just as the Scarf had told him."

"2353

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 18 of 20))~~

Hector half-expected to be attacked or to be teleported somewhere or to at least find a hidden escape route, but he combed the place quite thoroughly and found nothing.

He returned to Pauline outside. ""You said you could find the monster, didn't you?""

She was perched atop one of the few remaining portions of the terminal's roof. 'I did. The creature's aura is like a lighthouse to me.'

""Well, we've already wasted too much time here. Lead on.""

'I admire your proactive mindset, but are we even sure that this so-called Beast of Lorent is responsible for everyone's disappearance?'

""No, but do you have any better leads?""

'I do not. However, if the monster has truly abducted them, then it seems especially strange to me that I never sensed its aura at the location where the abduction occurred.'

""Hmm."" Hector thought about that new piece of information. ""I'm new to auras, but as I understand it, they only go wherever the body they're attached to goes, right?""

'Yes. Why?'

""Maybe the monster abducted them from a distance,"" said Hector.

She ruffled her feathers. 'How could it have done such a thing?'

""Teleportation.""

'Excuse me? Such a power does not exist, does it?'

""Oh, it definitely exists. I've personally witnessed two different forms of it. This seems different from either of those, though.""

'You're joking, surely...'

""Believe me or don't. It doesn't matter. Please, just point me in the right direction. I can go find the monster on my own, if you want to head back to Atreya. I certainly wouldn't blame you.""

'Oh, please. Things are just getting interesting.'

Hector frowned. ""This is serious, Pauline. We have no idea what this thing is capable of.""

'I am aware of the severity of the situation.' She bounded off the roof and began gliding northward. 'Follow me, Lord Goffe.'

"2354

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 19 of 20))~~

Hector started after her. She was flying pretty close to the ground and at low speed, presumably for his benefit, so he figured he should pick up the pace. And what better opportunity would there be to practice flight?

He'd refined a bit with Zeff's help since he'd first discovered it, and it was significantly easier when he only had to worry about keeping himself aloft and no one else.

Where before it had just been a platform to stand on, now he'd made almost a full pod for himself, keeping only the top open so that he could see. There were grips for his hands as well to help maintain his balance.

The outer layer of hovering iron--or the ""holster,"" as he'd come to think of it--was what actually allowed him to go against gravity. It was a constant mental effort, requiring the continual reapplication of velocity states and the annihilation of any iron that would have fallen away from the holster.

All in all, it was still a bit rough, Hector felt. There was probably still room for significant improvements to be made--like making it somehow more aerodynamic, perhaps--but it was certainly more stable than that haphazard platform he'd used before. Plus, he was more experienced. Turbulence wasn't quite so worrying, anymore, though he doubted he would've been able to handle that tornado.

'You can fly?!' came Pauline's silent voice.

The rushing wind was too noisy to talk over, so Hector merely responded with a simple look. He couldn't even say anything with his expression, either, because he was armored up again.

Instead, he just flew up higher and faster than her, hoping that she would get the message.

She certainly did. Her huge wings flapped, and she soared into the lead again.

Hector did his best to keep pace, but holy crap, she was fast. She ended up having to slow back down a little for him."

"2355

~~((National Yo-Yo Day - page 20 of 20))~~

The Imara Forest was truly sprawling. It filled the entire horizon, save only for a few distant mountains. He'd already seen it from the airplane, of course, but now that he was a bit closer, the sheer scale of things was coming even more clearly into perspective. The notion that the Beast could be anywhere in this place was truly unsettling--as was the notion that he might've had to wander around aimlessly if Pauline wasn't here.

She turned invisible again. 'We're almost there,' she said. 'I'm curious. Can you sense the monster's aura at all? Oftentimes, humans can pick up on the particularly strong ones, if only a little.'

They were descending now and slowing down. Hector concentrated on his senses. They weren't telling him anything especially abnormal, nor was the Scarf.

But... there was something. A vague discomfort, of sorts. As if his whole body were only a step or two away from shivering. He didn't know how to describe it. If she hadn't mentioned anything, he probably would've just chalked it up to the forest's natural atmosphere--or to the understandable unease that came with hunting an unknown creature with unknown powers.

On second thought, maybe it really was just because of that last thing.

When they were landing, he answered her. ""Sort of. Feels like my senses could just be playing tricks on me, though.""

'A rational thought,' said Pauline, perched amid the verdant canopy over Hector's head. 'You may be right to not trust your senses in this place. Some auras can have very disorienting effects.'

""Which way now?"" he asked.

'That, I don't know,' said Pauline. 'We've entered the nucleus of the aura. The creature could be anywhere nearby.'

Hector frowned. ""You can't sense its exact location?""

'As I said, some auras can have very disorienting effects.'
"2356

Great.

Hector looked around. They were well into the middle of the night now. Thankfully, there was a very bright moon out tonight, and the canopy wasn't so thick as to block all light from it. The contrast was incredibly stark, however--pitch blackness interrupted by visible bars of moonlight, each only able to illuminate a small patch of the forest with its pale white glow.

It was beautiful, Hector thought. And a bit haunting, perhaps. Almost like a painting. He'd never seen anything quite like it before.

He was again grateful for the Scarf of Amordiin. With it, so much more of the surrounding area was perceptible to him. However, he still decided to materialize a hovering cube of red hot iron above his gauntleted hand. The extra light wouldn't hurt.

As long as he didn't accidentally start a forest fire, he supposed.

Even with the Scarf, though, he couldn't yet tell where the monster was. This 'nucleus' that Pauline spoke of must've been pretty huge, still.

He decided to just pick the same direction that they'd been going in earlier. If he somehow ended up leaving the nucleus, then he figured she would warn him.

Man, it sure was quiet. The only noise seemed to be coming from himself. The clink of his armor. The rustling of leaves and branches as he brushed past them. The subtle hiss of his iron cube.

Even Pauline was completely silent. Was she masking the sound of her own movements? Or did her feathers just allow her to be that quiet naturally?

He supposed it didn't matter. He needed to stay on task, attentive with all thought processes. No distractions.

But as he thought about it more, he still had some questions for her that might prove relevant to the mission."

"2357

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""So what are some of these 'disorienting effects' that we should be watching out for?"" said Hector.

Pauline took so long to respond that Hector stopped and looked toward her. 'Oh. Ah. There are various things, but a skewed perception of the passage of time is perhaps the biggest one.'

""Hmm."" He didn't like the sound of that, but he started walking again. He still wasn't sensing anything other than plants in the areas. Not even any wild animals.

'Spatial awareness as well can easily become compromised,' she said. 'My father believes that this is because auras themselves are a component of spacetime. So if spacetime is like a blanket, then an aura is like a liquid soaking that blanket through, making it much heavier than you are accustomed to.'

""I think I understand. Anything else?""

'...Ah. Sorry, did you say something?'

He stopped again. ""Are you feeling okay?""

She glided down closer to him. 'Frankly speaking, no. This aura is very uncomfortable. But I will manage.'

""Is there anything I can do to make it easier for you?""

'Heh. Actually... your own aura seems to be helping.'

He blinked. ""What?""

'I mentioned it before, didn't I? Your aura is different from a while ago. Come to think of it, you never did explain why that was.'

""That's because I had no idea what you were talking about. And I'm still not sure I do, even now.""

'Well, in any case, I think I will stick a bit closer to you from now on, if you don't mind.' She was still invisible, but Hector could sense her there on the ground next to him now. 'I sense something ahead, by the way. I think it's a building.'

That information acquired his full attention, and he tried to reach out farther with the Scarf. If it was there, he couldn't sense it yet."

"2358

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

They trudged on together with Hector clearing some of the underbrush for her hulking avian body. He figured the trail they were leaving behind would at least help them to not get lost.

After a while of walking, Hector still didn't sense this building that Pauline was talking about.

But he saw it.

A modest structure, it looked to be little more than a single room. Beams of moonlight illuminated its rusted metal exterior.

Yet the Scarf couldn't sense it there. Air flowed right through it.

He stopped a few meters short of the building, and so did Pauline.

""...It's an illusion,"" said Hector.

'It is?'

Slowly, he began moving closer. ""Can you not tell?""

'Hmm. Hold on a minute. No, I see the issue now. You're half-right. It's only partly an illusion.'

He stopped again. ""What do you mean?""

'Technically, this building is not here. But it used to be.'

""...What are you saying?""

'It's the aura. Messing with our perception of time. On the other hand, though, you might call this building a kind of ""memory""--one that has even been preserved in physical reality. It's quite special, when you think of like that, no?'

What the hell? A memory?

'I'm going to try touching it,' she said. 'There may be historical information I can discover by doing so.'

""Uh. You sure that's safe?""

'Nope.' She shuffled past him. 'Please make sure nothing springs out and attacks me. Also, if I begin violently convulsing, make sure I stop touching the building.'

""Pauline, this doesn't seem--""

'I know. I'm a little scared, quite honestly, but we're in need of direction, and this is our best chance, right now.' She was very close to the building now. She puffed her feathered chest up and exhaled deeply. 'So just. Keep me safe, please. And I'll do my best, too.'

Well, shit. ""Okay...""

"2359

Pauline reached out with one of her wings and touched the illusory building.

Hector could see that the structure was slowly shifting in a strange, ethereal way. One moment, it appeared old and rusted, and the next, it became significantly less so, merely a bit dull and weathered-looking. Then the next, it looked almost new. Then back to rusted.

Hmm.

He felt like he understood. The perception of time. That was what she'd said, wasn't it? He was seeing the building over the course of the many years, compacted into only a minute or two.

How odd. Was it really just this monster's ""aura"" or whatever that was causing this phenomenon? He had to wonder what Garovel would make of this situation. He considered asking him, but he wasn't even sure how he would begin to explain. Maybe later.

More importantly, he wanted to know how much longer this would take.

Because nothing was happening.

Hector waited but did not see, nor feel, nor sense any changes in the environment or in the Sparrow herself. At length, he had to say something. ""Pauline? Are you okay?""

'Hmm? Ah. Yes, I am fine. I understand now. This place is a reservoir of psychic information. And also a minor point of geographic resonance. There seems to be... perhaps a hundred years or so of knowledge preserved here.'

""A hundred years?"" said Hector, surprised. ""That sounds like... quite a lot.""

'Well, not every moment in time has been kept. Only moments of ""psychic significance,"" you might say. But yes, there is quite a lot to go through.'

Hector had questions, though he wasn't certain which to start with. Just how deep did all this psychic stuff go?

'By your silence, I assume you are still confused. I could share with you what I am able to see. I believe that would explain much better than I ever could with words. But you will have to either take off your helmet or place your bare hand on my back.'

"2360

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Ah. An extension of trust, was it?

Well, Hector didn't think Pauline would try to do him harm. In the back of his mind, though, he supposed she could've been somehow deceiving him this whole time and that perhaps she was in some way responsible for everyone's disappearance, but...

Nah. It was one thing to be cautious. It was another to be paranoid. Plus, even if she did try to assault his mind like her father did, it wouldn't work. Probably.

He went up to her, removed his right gauntlet, and put his hand on her avian body. Her feathers were huge, yet still quite soft and fluffy, almost like that of a stuffed toy.

'Okay,' she said. 'Brace yourself.'

And that was all the warning he got.

The night melted away, replaced by a world of swirling and ethereal grays. Everything had a soft glow, not entirely unlike the moonlight from earlier, but now there were images playing all around him. Movies, of a sort. All unfolding simultaneously.

And yet, it wasn't overwhelming. So much was happening all at once, but he wasn't struggling with any of it. He couldn't tell if that was because of his Focus or if it was somehow Pauline's doing, but either way, it was less like actually watching a film and more like the information was just being poured directly into his mind.

This place. This little building. It was much more than it appeared to be. In truth, it was the entrance to an underground facility.

One that was being run by the Lorentian government.

Or no. Not being run. Not anymore. It was long gone now. Only a collapsed hole remained. That was just the strange perception of time playing havoc with his thoughts, Hector supposed.

Time was...

Hmm. Suddenly, Hector felt like he understood Rasalased a little better.

But that was neither here nor there. He concentrated on the vision--or whatever this was."

"2361

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

This government facility was being used for a multitude of things, it seemed. This little entrance here was only one of many, and it served primarily as an emergency escape route.

Hector could see it being used on several occasions. People with indecipherable faces flowing out of it. Rushing. Running. The only thing clear about them was their panic.

He wished he could understand the timescale better, but it was foggy, at best. One thing was evident, though. It ended with an explosion.

That was why this small building wasn't actually here anymore. It had been blown to smithereens.

And not everyone escaped that time. He could see people on fire rolling in the grass. Smoldering corpses among burning trees and underbrush. The whole forest around was aflame.

And roars. Piercing, guttural roars.

He couldn't actually hear them with his ears, yet he could perceive them through the vision nonetheless. There were so many of them. And not all were angry. Some were more pained. Some were whimpers.

Vast rooms with cages lay deep underground. Empty one moment, then filled to bursting with animals of all sorts, then empty again, then filled again. And perhaps there were also some creatures that... weren't animals at all--or at least, none that Hector recognized.

And there were people moving between them. Prodding them. Antagonizing them. Sticking them with needles. Tranquilizing them. Taking them out and tying them down.

And dissecting them. Opening them up. Then stitching them back together, different from before.

With the help of reapers.

Those were somehow less clear, so it had taken Hector longer to recognize them. They'd been there all along, he realized. Murky specters, always in the background, sometimes indistinguishable from shadows. He couldn't tell how many there were, though. It could've been two. It could've been twenty."

"2362

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 1 of 10))~~

This was a place of experimentation. He could hear it in silent conversations among the lab workers. Entire dialogues fell into his mind at once like buckets of water, too much information to process normally, yet he was still mostly able to understand. Calm discussions. Loud arguments. Cold observations. Angry diatribes.

They spoke on many subjects. Philosophy. Biology. Ethics. Law.

So many words. Over the course of years. At times, they blended together. Muddled. Insignificant. Becoming little more than routine.

Until some catastrophic event or another shook everything up again. Reestablishing significance.

Experiments getting loose. Tearing lab workers limb from limb. Requiring violent suppression. This happened multiple times. Difficult to tell how many. The cycle just kept repeating.

Until a certain creature arrived.

This one was more distinct. More significant. The vision made sure that Hector could tell it apart from all the others.

At first, it was small. A puppy. Then a kitten. A lizard. A scorpion.

Its form seemed to shift by the day, baffling its captors. If not for the direct insight of the vision itself, Hector might've misunderstood what he was seeing with his eyes alone and believed them all to be different creatures.

But no. They were one. And it grew. Both in size and in intellect.

A sly tentacle discovered how to unlock its own cage.

But it did not flee. It stayed. Why, the vision could not make fully clear. Perhaps it knew that merely escaping its immediate confines would not be enough to truly get away from this place. Perhaps it had seen what had happened to the other creatures that rebelled unsuccessfully.

But during its time here, the creature was subjected to numerous fleshrending experiments. In time, it suffered more than any other captive. The ""researchers""--if they could be called that--were fascinated by its mysterious body and by its resilience."

"2363

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 2 of 10))~~

Time and again, they cut the creature open. Time and again, they stitched it back together, oftentimes with limbs or organs that previously belonged to other animals. On many occasions, they thought it dead and tried to revive it with reapers.

But it was never necessary. It lived through everything they did to it.

And its form continued to shift in new and grotesque ways, perhaps attempting to conceal its excess of new body parts. A horse with seven legs. A crocodile with three heads. A lion with an eagle's wings and a scorpion's claws.

It only ever grew larger. The experiments continued for years. Countless conversations took place among the researchers, expressing all manner of concerns and curiosity. They did not understand. The beast seemed docile.

Until one, final experiment. More abominable than all the rest.

A severed human head. They attached it to the creature.

And just like every time previously, it absorbed it into its body.

The researchers celebrated their triumph. Few expressed reservations, mostly because they never thought it would work. They spoke of what a tremendous leap forward this would be, of what new ""legitimacy"" this might mean for government funding.

The fools did not realize what they had done.

But the creature told them. It spoke in a guttural, twisted voice that struck every listener dumb with terror as soon as they heard it.

""You have finally listened,"" it said. ""My will has been done. Now let me share with you... my joy.""

The slaughter that followed was unlike anything Hector had ever witnessed. Which was saying something. The creature tore through them like paper, its claws and tentacles and hands appearing from seemingly nowhere all the while.

But it was more than just that. It made them turn on one another, as well. It forced them, against their will, to rip each other apart with their bare hands, screaming but never stopping until breath no longer filled their lungs."

"2364

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 3 of 10))~~

And it didn't end there. The creature triggered a series of explosions that were designed to bring the facility down, to bury it and conceal everything that had transpired here in the case of imminent exposure to the outside world.

Only a handful of people escaped that fiery doom, and none made it out unscathed.

But the facility was not fully destroyed--or rather, the creature did not allow it to be so. Instead, it began gathering up sundered bodies of its victims and stacking their corpses upon one another, seemingly organizing them into piles.

It took Hector a while to understand what it was doing. Dragging them each onto the same table that it had been dragged to so many times before. Cutting them open, digging through their flesh like it was looking for something. It wasn't until it started stitching them back together that Hector realized.

It was conducting experiments of its own.

Whether it was because it was genuinely curious or because it merely wanted to revisit the same torture it suffered upon its captors, Hector could not tell. The vision did not seem to understand the creature's mindset terribly well.

With some of the lab workers and even some of the lab specimens, the vision had been able to impart emotional states, at least to a degree. They were often foggy, but occasionally, such as during arguments or periods of great stress, the emotions flared up and became quite clear.

But not with the monster. It was always subdued. Its emotions, if it even had any, were hidden.

And once or twice, Hector thought he caught a moment where it was... looking at him. Through the vision. But how could...?

Hector focused. The vision wasn't done.

The creature's experiments continued for some time. Never succeeding, of course. Perhaps it didn't comprehend that its victims were already dead or that their bodies were not like its own."

"2365

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 4 of 10))~~

But eventually, the monster stopped experimenting.

Instead, it fell still and silent. For long period of time, months or perhaps even years, it did not move. It merely sat there among the wreckage of the facility, alone.

Hector could only guess what it was doing. Contemplating its next move? Or...?

Meditating?

That thought sent a shiver down his spine for some reason. Just how intelligent was this thing? He had to wonder. In some ways, it seemed naive or even childish, but in others...

Hector almost didn't want to know.

When it finally began to stir again, it was not the same. The beast was shapeshifting again--only this time, it was transforming into people. It struggled because of its bulk, its overabundance of limbs, but it was working on that problem. It would compress its body down to shocking levels, smaller and smaller with each new attempt. Other times, it would actually transform into two people and try to conceal the linked flesh between them with camouflage.

It could camouflage itself? That was another new thing.

But where was its ability to control the weather? Hector still hadn't seen any sign of that yet. And he was growing a bit impatient, too. All these details about the monster were certainly important enough that he didn't think he should ask Pauline to skip to the end of the vision--assuming she even could--but he sure wanted to give it a shot, anyway. It was impulsive of him, he knew, but he wanted to ignore everything that didn't have to do with where Roman and the others might be.

Were they even going to be at the end of this vision? He was afraid of the answer.

Or. Wait a minute. His perception of time was all wrong again, wasn't it? This vision wasn't really taking long. It just felt like it was. It was all there, already in his head.

Agh."

"2366

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 5 of 10))~~

Well, if the entire vision was already in his mind, then perhaps he didn't need Pauline to control it for him. Perhaps he could skip to the end himself. He hadn't yet seen how the monster acquired had acquired weather powers--and possibly teleportation powers--but he figured it wasn't a priority to know that information, right now. It would be good to know more about how they worked, sure, but Roman and the others had been missing for hours already. There was no telling what their situation was like, right now.

And hell, maybe he could go back and rewatch these parts of the vision later.

He concentrated on what he wanted. To see further along the timeline. To see his friends.

The vision responded. Time distorted and warped before his eyes, before his mind.

He saw them.

They appeared in a cloud of smoke, all seemingly confused and even having trouble keeping their own balance.

But they were not in the underground facility like Hector might have expected. They were somewhere in the forest. Somewhere very strange-looking. Giant mushrooms that glowed in the dark were almost as numerous as the trees, and a slight mist filled the area. A thin layer of water splashed with each stumbling footstep, and more strange creatures began to appear.

What in the hell was he even looking at? How many more were there now? How much time had he skipped?

He saw the Beast, though. It was different again, but the vision made it somehow clear that it was the same creature. And these weird critters all around it, were they its children?

It had created a little empire of its own.

And Roman and the others had been sucked right into the middle of it. Hector could see the reapers with them, too."

"2367

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 6 of 10))~~

None of this made sense. Where the hell were those glowing mushrooms? It wasn't that long ago that he and Pauline were flying through the air, overlooking the vast reaches of the forest. An area that glowed in the dark so much should've been like a beacon to them, but he didn't recall seeing anything like that.

Not to mention, wasn't this vision supposed to be a ""memory"" of the building? This part obviously wasn't taking place anywhere near this building.

...Or was it?

If all those glowing mushrooms hadn't been visible from the air, then... could it be that they were underground? Mushrooms could definitely grow in such a place. But there were trees there, too--and a lot of them. They couldn't grow underground, right?

The vision made it difficult to tell, since it was nighttime. He couldn't see the moon. Or any beams of moonlight among the trees. But that could've just been because the light from the mushrooms was washing them out.

Agh.

""Pauline,"" he said. It was his first word aloud in what felt like ages, and it was somehow strange to hear the sound of his own voice again. ""Where are those giant mushrooms?""

The vision was still going on, but it was faltering, either because the events were now too recent or because he'd fractured it by speaking up. Hector could see everyone, though, and that was all that mattered. They were just standing there, surrounded by so many of those unknown creatures.

Were they talking? Hector thought they might be, but it was too hard to tell.

Why wasn't Pauline answering him yet? Argh, this fucked-up-time shit was so annoying.

'I think they might be underground,' she finally said.

Really? But what about the trees? Ah, whatever, that wasn't important, right now. ""Can you guide me to it?"" he asked."

"2368 -- CCXXVII.

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 7 of 10))~~

The vision was barely holding together now. The Beast of Lorent and its army of children were inching closer to everyone.

'I don't know,' came Pauline's reply. 'The aura makes everything more difficult.'

Well, if they were underground, then maybe he wouldn't need her to guide him. He could just start digging.

This vision wasn't yet done, though.

The crowd of monsters were rushing everyone like a flood. But at the last moment, everything seemed to slow, and Hector could see the Beast of Lorent looking back at him again.

Its form was shifting constantly between that of a rather average-looking human man and that of an almost indescribable abomination of meat and bone.

"I know you are watching, aura warrior," it said in a deep, unfamiliar voice. The sound wasn't twisted and horrible like the last time he'd heard it through the vision. It sounded much more human. Normal. Almost pleasant, even.

Which was somehow even more horrible, Hector felt.

"Find me quickly," it said, "or I shall break your toys before you get here."

Hector's jaw clenched. Toys? Did this fucking thing really just say that? And how could it possibly know--?

The vision returned to its previous speed. The fighting that broke out was immediately furious--so much so, in fact, that Hector couldn't even make sense of what he was seeing.

He put his questions out of his mind. This wasn't the time to agonize over details. He knew more than enough already.

Hector summoned all his concentration.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Seven: 'O, avid Seer, witness prime conviction...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Pauline could hardly believe her eyes. The Lord Goffe's aura had shifted again. And this time, it was expanding outward at a rate she had never personally seen before. Granted, she was still fairly inexperienced with these sorts of things, but she couldn't help staring in awe, nonetheless.

That metal of his was appearing and swirling all around him in a fury. What was he doing? Did he even know? She suspected not."
"2368 -- CCXXVII.

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 7 of 10))~~

The vision was barely holding together now. The Beast of Lorent and its army of children were inching closer to everyone.

'I don't know,' came Pauline's reply. 'The aura makes everything more difficult.'

Well, if they were underground, then maybe he wouldn't need her to guide him. He could just start digging.

This vision wasn't yet done, though.

The crowd of monsters were rushing everyone like a flood. But at the last moment, everything seemed to slow, and Hector could see the Beast of Lorent looking back at him again.

Its form was shifting constantly between that of a rather average-looking human man and that of an almost indescribable abomination of meat and bone.

""I know you are watching, aura warrior,"" it said in a deep, unfamiliar voice. The sound wasn't twisted and horrible like the last time he'd heard it through the vision. It sounded much more human. Normal. Almost pleasant, even.

Which was somehow even more horrible, Hector felt.

""Find me quickly,"" it said, ""or I shall break your toys before you get here.""

Hector's jaw clenched. Toys? Did this fucking thing really just say that? And how could it possibly know--?

The vision returned to its previous speed. The fighting that broke out was immediately furious--so much so, in fact, that Hector couldn't even make sense of what he was seeing.

He put his questions out of his mind. This wasn't the time to agonize over details. He knew more than enough already.

Hector summoned all his concentration.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Seven: 'O, avid Seer, witness prime conviction...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Pauline could hardly believe her eyes. The Lord Goffe's aura had shifted again. And this time, it was expanding outward at a rate she had never personally seen before. Granted, she was still fairly inexperienced with these sorts of things, but she couldn't help staring in awe, nonetheless.

That metal of his was appearing and swirling all around him in a fury. What was he doing? Did he even know? She suspected not."

"2369

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 8 of 10))~~

The aura that seemed to pervade the entire forest was being melted through by the Lord Goffe's, carving out a much larger area for the two of them.

This had two immediate effects that were of great use for Pauline.

First, it further lessened the oppressive disorientation that she had to constantly fight against. While the Beast's innate hostility towards them was present in its aura, Lord Goffe's welcomed her as an ally. And as it grew in size, the aura's nucleus also grew more potent.

The feeling of protection washing over her now reminded her of her own father. When Lord Goffe had said earlier that he would do his best to keep her safe, those had not been empty words. She had known that even then, but never was it more evident than now. The strength of his intent, his will, permeated his aura, draping her in a metaphysical sense of safety was difficult to articulate, even to herself.

Secondly, she could sense farther into the forest than ever. The friendly aura pushing back the oppressive one was like a psychic amplifier for her abilities. While she still couldn't sense as far away as if there had been no hostile aura at all, this was certainly a dramatic difference.

It even extended underground, though with diminished results. The ground was a naturally more difficult medium for auras to penetrate, but there were many cracks in the earth here that led into the collapsed cave beneath their feet.

Perhaps it also helped that this area was a minor point of geographic resonance. Where before it had resonated with the Beast's aura and allowed her to extract that vision of its psychic history, now it was beginning to resonate with Lord Goffe's aura instead."

"2370

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 9 of 10))~~

She was tempted to try to extract a psychic history from him, too, but this was hardly the time for it, and she wasn't at all sure that it even would work. Not to mention, she doubted he would be pleased by such prodding into his past.

She didn't get much longer to deliberate on it, either, because Lord Goffe scooped her up in a metal cradle and raised the both of them high up into the air. Before she could even ask what he was doing, one of the metal chunks that had been swirling around him shot back toward the ground and impacted with explosive force.

Plumes of dirt, shattered rock, and splintered wood shot up into the air, high enough even to pelt the metal barricade that had been made for her. An entire section of the forest shifted visibly around the explosion as well, bending outward from the force, then back inward with the distortion of the ground.

Wide-eyed, Pauline wondered if Lord Goffe cared that he had just obliterated a location of geographic resonance.

Probably not, she decided. Perhaps he didn't know how rare they were. Or perhaps he did know and was simply more concerned about his people. She couldn't exactly fault him for that, but wow, if her father were here, he would not be happy, right now.

With so much debris in the air, she couldn't even see what had become of the site, but that didn't last long, either. A gigantic metal wall appeared in midair and swept almost all of it away before disappearing again.

A not-so-small crater was visible where the two of them had only recently been standing, and at the center of it, she could see a hole leading down into what was presumably the wrecked facility from the psychic history she had extracted.

""How about now?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Can you sense anyone down there?""

Pauline, however, could still only stare at him, dumbstruck."
"2371

~~((National Corn on the Cob Day - page 10 of 10))~~

Lord Goffe had to press her. ""Pauline.""

She snapped back to herself. 'Ah. Give me one minute.' She reached out with her mind and surveyed the hole.

Her ability to monitor areas that she couldn't physically see was limited insofar as it required, at the very least, life to be present in said area. Technically, she could sense ""souls"" as they were often called, but only through process of elimination, because souls, minds, and auras all overlapped in various ways.

As far as she was aware, every mind had a soul attached to it, and every soul emanated a very weak aura. So while she couldn't exactly sense souls themselves, she didn't need to. Plants had their own distinct little auras, though it often required a bit of concentration to actually notice them.

But that hole down there, it seemed quite deep and quite devoid of life. So she kept going. Farther and farther.

The Beast's aura wasn't growing any weaker, which was a clue. If it were aboveground, then its aura would've surely diminished the deeper she went.

But that was also curious. If the Beast truly was underground, then the earth should've still been serving as a dampener against its aura, just in the opposite manner. So why was it still so strong up here, then? Was it just so powerful that the dampening didn't matter?

A worrying thought.

But the Beast must've also had some other route up to the surface.

Given all the reports about its murderous activities, it wasn't sealed harmlessly away underground. Perhaps that other route was large enough that its aura could pour out over the rest of the forest, undiminished.

At length, she sensed it. A crowd of minds. Full of hostility. Clashing violently.

'I sense many beings down there,' she said.

""Okay,"" was all the Lord Goffe said.

But she could sense his aura flaring up again."

"2372

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Clearly, the Lord Goffe was not bothered by the nighttime darkness that should've made the hole difficult to see for any normal human's eyes, because he launched them both downward on a metal rail.

If not for that reassuring aura of his, she might've thought he was trying to kill her.

Then it became truly dark. Even her eyes couldn't see anything, and she had to rely entirely on her mind for guidance. She might've expected him to ask her for directions again, but at the rate they were moving, that was apparently not necessary. The musty underground air rushed past her feathers at a speed that felt similar to flying through the open sky, and more than once, she flinched at an approaching rock wall that she barely sensed before being instantly veered away from.

It was a literal roller coaster ride.

Which was particularly strange for her, because she'd never actually experienced such a thing. Amusement parks didn't make seats big enough for her. If this was what it was like, she could suddenly understand why so many people screamed their heads off while riding them.

They shot into a cavern that was so huge, she nearly thought they'd somehow returned to surface and were outside again. Light had returned as well, but it was different. It was a ghostly blue and gray color, and it came entirely from the field of gigantic mushrooms below them--the same ones from the psychic history.

There was precious little time to admire them, though. She could already see the battle taking place in the distance, and the Lord Goffe was veering them toward it.

Pauline tried to prepare her heart. She'd never gotten involved in full combat before, but she'd experienced it in training with her father and in psychic constructs many times.

This would not be like any of that, she felt."

"2373

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

First and foremost, she needed to maintain her invisibility. That was any Sparrow's most valuable tool, and while it was obviously possible that this Beast of Lorent could sense her presence regardless, she didn't yet have confirmation on that one way or the other. It had spoken to Lord Goffe, not her.

She would have to be cautious.

As they drew closer to the fighting, she had to say something. 'Let me fly on my own, Lord Goffe.'

He didn't respond, but he did as she requested and dematerialized the metal that he'd been using to carry her.

The freedom was both welcome and terrifying. She allowed him to shoot ahead of her and join in the battle first.

She maintained her altitude as she observed the underground field. She recognized the Lorentians easily enough, but she still didn't know who any of Lord Goffe's companions were other than Roman Fullister, who she noticed was also zipping around the air--and at quite high speeds, too.

They were obviously servants, though. At least one of them besides Lord Goffe seemed to be materializing another metal, and the largest human there seemed to be a transfiguration user, bulldozing dozens of little monsters at once with metallic arms.

But they were struggling. The monsters weren't staying down, regardless of if they were crushed or slice or skewered or even hit with explosions. The multi-legged little creatures just kept scurrying back into the fight.

They were a horrible sight, Pauline thought. Scores of them, maybe even hundreds. They were all vaguely spider-like, but the more she examined them, the more she realized that they had shapeshifting abilities like their progenitor.

Along with other powers.

But they weren't all the same. Some were spitting fire. Some were clearly electrified. Some were spewing acid. And it didn't end there, either. The chaos made it difficult to differentiate between what was caused by the monsters and what was caused by the servants, but Pauline was certain that there was more she wasn't seeing."

"2374

And then, of course, there was the Beast itself. That one, at least, was much easier to tell apart from all the others--and not just because of its size.

It wasn't engaging in the fight. It was letting its offspring do all the work--for now, at least.

Pauline was the most mindful of that creature. If it looked in her direction, she wanted to know immediately. She needed confirmation regarding whether or not it could even see her.

Thus far, it seemed like her invisibility was holding up, but she was wary of growing too comfortable.

As for the Beast, its form was currently that of an enormous horse. Mostly. Instead, it had two heads and eight legs, and all four of its eyes smoldered with red fire. Its hulking, muscular body was also wreathed in black-and-orange flames.

Pauline noticed, however, that those flames were not emitting any light upon their environment, which suggesting that at least part of the creature was an illusion. Not exactly surprising, but that did speak a little to how it was conducting its ""shapeshifting.""

She tried to penetrate the illusion with her mind, to see its true form, but that wasn't as easy as perhaps it should've been. Maybe it was the Beast's aura protecting it, or maybe the creature just had some kind of natural psychic defense. She could've pressed harder, but a more forceful or invasive approach ran the risk of exposing her own presence.

She wanted to bide her time. The humans were having difficulty bringing down the little monsters, but they were at least holding their ground and protecting the Lorentians. And with the Beast itself hanging back, Pauline had a feeling that the true fight had not yet begun.

The tide of battle soon started to change when metal boxes began clapping around all the little monsters."

"2375

At first, they were breaking out almost immediately, but then the offspring struggled more and more, until they seemed to be truly captured. And the metal boxes flew over to Lord Goffe and started orbiting around him.

The chaos of the battle slowed as the enemy's numbers steadily dwindled, and at length, the Beast stepped forward--but not to attack, seemingly.

It let out a low, grumbling roar, and in unison, its remaining children pulled back and huddled around it. There were still dozens of them.

""Aura warrior,"" came the Beast's human-sounding voice. ""You wish to speak with me, no?""

There arrived a long silence as Pauline continued circling the battlefield from above. Lord Goffe was at the front of the party, eyeing everyone at his back, no doubt making sure that they were okay.

A few had sustained injuries, Pauline noticed, but they were healing. One of the Lorentians had fallen and twisted his ankle, and another had a gash on his arm, but someone was already bandaging it up.

More worryingly, the four reapers were all wounded. To her eyes, they were small, phantasmal skeletons gripping short spears. Their eye sockets glowed softly with a dark gray light, and they had long, ethereal chains wrapped around their necks.

She hadn't seen very many of them over the course of her life, but she knew that they weren't supposed to emitting that black-and-white smoke from the cuts on their "bodies."

Everyone was frightened. Pauline could sense their fear, both psychically and just relying on her eyes. Several of the Lorentians were trembling and uttering hushed reassurances to one another.

Pauline didn't fault them.

The Lord Hector Goffe stepped closer to the Beast. "How did you know I wanted to talk?" he asked.

"Your kind always wishes to talk," the Beast said. "I rarely wish to listen."

"2376

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

"You've encountered many humans before," said Lord Goffe.

"Yes," said the monster.

"And you killed them all?"

"Yes."

"...Why?"

"They would have killed me and my spawn."

"...But you just said that they wished to talk."

"They wished to lie. Or to convince me to spare their worthless lives."

"I see."

More silence drew out as neither side anything, perhaps considering their next words. Or perhaps considering if they should simply start attacking again.

One might have thought that the cessation of battle had at least partially defused the situation, but Pauline could tell from the two auras that this was not the case. They were both growing, not diminishing.

The Lord Goffe and the Beast of Lorent.

Pauline could hardly imagine two more opposing auras. One was gentle and warm, reassuring and sturdy. The other was furious and cold, clawing and wild.

And the way they clashed with one another. It was like an ocean crashing against a cliff. Equal, yet unrelenting.

Even the humans could probably sense the clash, to some extent. No doubt, that was playing a role in their apparent deference to the Lord of Warrenhold's handling of the conversation, right now--including that big human, who had a bit of his own aura boiling around him.

""...In that case, why is this time different?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Why are you interested in what I have to say?""

""You are holding my spawn hostage,"" said the Beast.

Lord Goffe relinquished a nod at that, perhaps admiring the monster's honesty.

""And I saw you,"" said the Beast. ""You looked at me. At my life. You've seen me. Perhaps you understand me.""

""Is that what you want?"" said Lord Goffe. ""To be understood?""

""In part. Yes. That is why my spawn is numerous. They are my children, as you might say, no?""

"2377

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Hmm."" Lord Goffe folded his armored arms. ""What else do you want, then?""

""To flourish,"" said the monster. ""To prosper. And to share the fruits of my labor with all.""

""With all? Does that include us humans?""

""Of course.""

""...What exactly are the 'fruits of your labor' that you wish to share with us?""

""In short? The primacy of being.""

""...And what do you mean by that?""

""Most creatures do not understand the value of their own existence. I think that is a terrible shame. To live without the realization of the miracle that is yourself.""

Lord Goffe made no response, perhaps because he didn't know what to say.

If so, Pauline wouldn't blame him. What the hell was that thing even saying? She had no idea. It sounded oddly optimistic, but she also still remembered what the Beast considered to be sharing its ""joy.""

""You do not understand after all, do you?"" The Beast's enormous body shifted somewhat, bubbling beneath its skin in grotesque fashion. Was it preparing to transform again?

""...Where are you from?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Originally, I mean. Before you were brought here.""

""A truly silly question,"" said the Beast. ""I come from the same place as everyone and everything.""

""Which is?""

""You know it.""

""...Pretend I don't.""

""You fear to utter it? I find that quite pathetic, aura warrior.""

""You're the one who's avoiding the question.""

""Hmph. Chaos. I am of Chaos. As are we all.""

What the hell? It wasn't talking about that Chaos, was it? The imaginary 'nothingness' from which all thought supposedly emerges? According to certain religions, anyway. This thing wasn't religious, was it?

She was so confused that it was almost difficult to continue listening.

""...Okay,"" said Lord Goffe. ""But how did you get here? In Lorent? Where were you born? And who brought you here?""

""Trivialities. Details that only humans obsess over.""
"2378

""Be that as it may,"" said Lord Goffe, ""I'd appreciate it if you answered my questions.""

The Beast took its time responding. Perhaps it was considering whether or not that had been a threat just now. The Lord Goffe hadn't exactly phrased it like one, but there was also an undeniable firmness in his otherwise soft speaking voice. ""...I was summoned into this world by one of your kind,"" it said. ""A man called Lozaro.""

Pauline recognized that name, though only vaguely. It belonged to a famous scientist of some kind, she was fairly sure. Agh, but she should've been able to recall more than that. Her father would've known.

""...What do you mean by 'summoned into this world,' exactly?"" said Lord Goffe.

""How else would you like me to explain it? I was pulled forcibly into existence.""

""Okay, but how?""

""If I knew that, I would not have to create so many of my own spawn. I only know that the Carlan Point was somehow involved. Perhaps in time, I will return there and attempt to learn more, but I currently do not think it is worth the risk.""

Whoa, whoa, whoa. The Carlan Point was a famous location, though only among Sparrows. It was a place of major geographic resonance, one of only handful in the entire world.

And this thing came from there? Like from another dimension or something? Pauline had never heard of such an occurrence. Who the hell was this Lozaro person, to be able to pull off something like that?

""What risk would that be?"" said Lord Goffe.

""The risk of being returned to Chaos, of course,"" said the Beast.

""That is why so many of you do not appreciate what you have. You fail to grasp the hellish nature of nonexistence--of the Infinite Current.""

""...The what?""

"2379

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""You do not know of it?"" said the Beast. ""Well, of course you don't. I thought because you are an aura warrior, you might be less ignorant than the rest of your kind, but I see now that I was mistaken.""

""Y'know, for someone with so many children, you're surprisingly childish yourself,"" said Lord Goffe.

Pauline's beady eyes widened a little at that comment.

""...In what way am I childish?"" said the Beast.

""Mocking people who are earnestly trying to learn--that's a hallmark of immaturity,"" said Lord Goffe.

The monster didn't say anything.

Pauline honestly thought it might just start attacking again, but the Lord of Warrenhold didn't seem too concerned. Was he just that confident?

Well, it wasn't like he had no reason to be, but still... she might've liked it if he took a more delicate approach here. But then again, it wasn't like she knew how someone was supposed to converse with a violent interdimensional hellbeast.

""So what is this Infinite Current you mentioned?"" said Lord Goffe. He sounded as though he were asking about something as typical as the weather.

The Beast took its time responding. ""...I do not know how to explain it to one who has never experienced it.""

""Ah. Wait a minute. Is that why you feel the need to kill people? So that they can experience this Infinite Current for themselves?""

""Yes. Perhaps you do understand.""

""How do you know they'll end up in the Infinite Current when they die?""

""It is what all of existence is reduced to in the end.""

""Alright, but how do you know that?""

""Because it is where I come from.""

A beat passed as Lord Goffe mulled that over. ""But according to you, we all come from this Chaos, right? So why don't I have this knowledge, too?""

"2380

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The Beast fell quiet again. Lord Goffe waited a while, but it didn't say anything.

Pauline was beginning to get the impression that this manifestation of Chaos might not be a very rational being. She could only imagine what was going through Lord Goffe's head, right now.

The Beast's aura was not diminishing, however. The Lord of Warrenhold may have struck a blow in the name of reason, but it had not deescalated the situation, as far as Pauline could tell.

At length, Lord Goffe decided to change the subject. ""...How were you able to summon these reapers here?""

And again, the monster was quiet. It took so long to respond that, for a while, Pauline thought it was simply fed up with the conversation.

""They were already here,"" it said.

Lord Goffe apparently needed a moment to process that statement.

""No, they weren't. They were in an entirely different country.""

""You are mistaken.""

Mm, Pauline wasn't so sure he was. And her reverence for this creature's knowledge was severely lacking.

Lord Goffe kept pushing, though. ""What do you mean? How could they have already been here?""

""You disappoint me again, aura warrior.""

""You're not scoring many points, yourself. Tell me what you meant by them already being here.""

Pauline was starting to wonder why he was even bothering. It seemed fairly evident now that this Beast of Lorent was quite the confused creature.

""You see two distinct beings,"" said the Beast. ""And yet, surely, you must realize that they are as one, yes? Is your aura so pathetic that you cannot even see that which you already know to be true? How can you allow the obvious to escape your notice?""

More chastising. Pauline was growing weary of this.

Lord Goffe, however, tilted his head and unfolded his arms. ""I should... be able to 'see that which I already know,' huh? Because of my aura?""

"2381

""A true aura warrior would be able to see such things even without first knowing them,"" said the Beast.

""Oh yeah?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Interesting. But even if you can 'see' the connection between reaper and servant, that doesn't change the fact that the reapers aren't actually there. But you still managed to pull them here from very far away.""

""Hmph. You are not a true aura warrior, are you?""

""Well, maybe not. Maybe I'm still learning."" Somehow, Lord Goffe managed a small laugh in this situation. ""Have you met many 'aura warriors' before?""

""Met? No. Seen? Yes.""

""How did you come to know so much about them, then?""

""Through the Great Echo, of course,"" said the Beast.

Agh, another term that Pauline didn't recognize. She was tempted to believe that this was something significant, but she also had to acknowledge the very real possibility that the Beast of Lorent was completely mad and just speaking utter nonsense. In fact, the more she thought about it, the more likely that seemed.

""And what is the Great Echo?"" said Lord Goffe.

""The immense division between realms,"" said the monster. ""It is where whispers of the past propagate beyond themselves, perhaps for eternity. A true aura warrior would know of it. Your predecessors would surely be ashamed.""

Oh? Wait a minute. Was it talking about geographic resonance, Pauline wondered?

""What can you tell me about these aura warriors of the past?"" said Lord Goffe.

""Hmph. Have I not told you more than enough already? Return my spawn to me.""

""If I do that, will you attack us again?""

""Yes.""

Lord Goffe laughed outright at that. ""You might be a little too honest for your own good, y'know that?""

""I despise liars.""

""I've noticed.""

""Return my spawn.""

""Give me your word you won't attack.""

""No.""

"2382

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Why not?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Why do you refuse something as simple as not attacking us?"

"Because you wish to destroy me," said the monster. "If I promise not to attack you, then I would be giving you free reign to attack me without reprisal."

"...Wow."

"What? Are you confused again?"

"No. It's just... I think most people would not consider it to be breaking your promise if you attacked us in self-defense only."

"I do not care what most people would think. A promise broken is a promise broken."

"Sure, but context is important, no?"

"No."

That left a flat silence in its wake. Pauline could only wonder how Lord Goffe intended to respond to something like that. The more she learned about this creature, the less she felt she understood it. It made more sense to her when she thought it was just a mindless beast driven only by violent instinct.

"You really do hate lying, don't you?" said Lord Goffe.

"Yes."

"Why is that, exactly? I mean, sure, it's perfectly natural not to like dishonesty, but, uh... you seem to take it to the extreme. Is there some reason for that?"

"Yes."

"...Please tell me that reason, then."

"Why?"

"Because I'm trying to understand you."

"Why?"

"Because you interest me."

"Why?"

""Okay, stop saying that. It's really annoying.""

For a moment, Pauline expected it to ask why again, but it didn't.

Instead, the Beast took a moment, and then said, ""Lying is evil. Is that not obvious to you?""

Hector took a moment of his own, now. ""...But what if your lie protects someone?""

""A lie upon a lie.""

""You don't think it's possible for a lie to protect someone?""

""No. Lies only lead to destruction. Of the self. And of the world.""

Lord Goffe made no response.

""Again, I should not have to tell you this, aura warrior. Did you learn nothing from the foul deeds of the Deceiver?""

"2383

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""The Deceiver?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Who is that?""

""You do not even know of the Deceiver? Your ignorance truly knows no bounds.""

""So enlighten me, then.""

""Skapa the Deceiver. The First Traitor. The man who should have served as a lesson to your kind for all eternity, but I see now that is not the case.""

""How long ago are you talking about here?""

""He betrayed you all for power and sought to subjugate the world.""

""That wasn't what I asked, but okay...""

""How could you not know of him? But if you truly believe that lies are not evil, then I suppose your ignorance in this matter only makes sense. How saddening for you.""

""I'm getting the impression that this guy lived a really long time ago..."

""Truly, your predecessors must be looking upon you and weeping. I would pity them, if they did not wish me dead as well.""

""You're not even listening to me anymore, are you?""

""You sadden me, aura warrior. When I saw you, I thought you a formidable and familiar foe in this dreary, stagnant realm. But I see now that you are just as lost as the rest of these soul riders. Perhaps it is even doing you too much honor to call you aura warrior, though I can hardly believe I am saying such a thing. How lamentable and backward must this world have become for me to feel remorse at the loss of my enemy?""

Pauline could hardly even follow what it was saying, anymore. So this creature was from the distant past? Or believed it was, at least? But then how...?

She didn't even know where to begin asking questions.

Lord Goffe managed to come up with a couple, though. ""Oh, are you done now? Can we get back to having an actual discussion?""

""What else needs to be said? At this point, I feel as though I could learn more from a rock.""

"2384

Lord Goffe ignored the insult. ""Do you have a name?""

""A name...?""

""That's what I said, yes.""

""I have been called many things.""

""But is there something that you call yourself? Something you would like others to call you?""

And the Beast of Lorent fell quiet for a time. ""Chortomolengoth.""

""...Sorry, would you mind saying that one more time?""

""Chortomolengoth.""

The Lord of Warrenhold nodded. ""That seems a little difficult to remember. Can I just call you Chort?""

""It makes no difference to me.""

""Alright, Chort. You can call me Hector.""

""I fear your attempt at familiarity is wasted, Hector. I do not foresee this conversation going on for much longer.""

Pauline could sense movement among the Beast's offspring. They seemed to be getting antsy, inching closer to the group of humans. Still, none of them appeared to have noticed her presence, though, which was good.

""Well, stranger things have happened,"" said Lord Goffe. ""And I have a lot more questions for you.""

""But I have none for you. Return my spawn and let us end this charade.""

""How much do you know about blessings?""

Chort made no response.

""How about Primordials?"" said Lord Goffe. ""Do you know about them?""

Still, it said nothing.

""Do you know about a being named Malast? Or the Hun'Sho, maybe?""

Chort's children were beginning to settle back down again, Pauline noticed, though she didn't understand why.

Primordials? Pauline was familiar with the term, though only vaguely. Cocora was sometimes regarded as a Primordial, wasn't she? What did that have to do with anything? What was Lord Goffe thinking?

""These words you are using,"" said Chort, ""I am not familiar with them. And yet... I sense that you are referring to something... significant. Your aura tells me so.""

What the hell?

"That's one word for it," said Lord Goffe."

"2385

((The Father's Day Special -- page 1 of 24))

Chort's equine form bristled, and its eight legs shifted positions--nervously, perhaps? Pauline couldn't say she understood the mysterious creature's body language.

"You are... an archiver?" said Chort.

Lord Goffe deigned not to answer this time.

"Yes," said Chort. "That is why you demand knowledge from me, no? I did not think an archiver would have such an aura, but... yes, it must be so."

Lord Goffe was still remaining quiet. Thinking about his response? Or consulting his reaper?

The other humans were all still watching with rapt attention, the Lorentians in particular. The way they were ever so slightly leaning forward, the way their eyes moved back and forth between Lord Goffe and the Beast--Pauline wondered if they even realized what they were doing.

That older woman there was the Lorentian Secretary of State, wasn't she? Politicians sometimes had unusually strong auras of their own, especially the charismatic ones, but hers was almost imperceptible now, swept up as it was in Lord Goffe's aura.

But that man next to her. Ambassador Stoutamire. His aura was not quite so completely smothered. It still flickered faintly, though the man's body language was no different from those around him.

In fact, now that she was focusing, the only other auras that she could clearly sense belonged to him and that mysterious giant man among Lord Goffe's companions.

She would have to keep an eye on them in the future.

"You're right," Lord Goffe finally said. "I am an archiver. How were you able to tell that just from my aura?"

""I... do not know how to explain. It may not have been your aura. It may have simply been... intuition.""

And Pauline was surprised. It was slight, but Chort's aura was diminishing.

Was it... afraid? Of what?"
"2386

((The Father's Day Special -- page 2 of 24))
Perhaps Lord Goffe could tell that something had changed in the Beast as well, because he asked, ""Are you okay? You seem different all of a sudden.""

""I am... fine,"" said Chort.

But that was all.

Lord Goffe tried again. ""Are you sure?""

""Yes."" The monster's body began to shift. Slowly. It no longer looked like a horse, but Pauline couldn't yet tell what it was transforming into-- if anything. ""What is it that you want from me, archiver? Beyond mere questions. You came here to hunt me, no? To destroy me and my spawn?""

""...I want you to stop killing people,"" he said bluntly.

""That makes little sense to me. Why would an archiver care about such things? That is the work of aura warriors.""

""...I think you may be talking about how things were in the distant past. You have a false perception of who I am and what I should want.""

""The distant past?"" said Chort. ""No. The passage of time should make little difference. Archivers are archivers, and aura warriors are aura warriors. You are all too stubborn to change.""

""...Sounds like projection, if I've ever heard it.""

""An insult. How dare you.""

""You've insulted me a dozen times.""

""I have only ever spoken the truth.""

Pauline had to wonder if Lord Goffe really did have a handle on this conversation. From his composure, he seemed as calm and collected as could be, but some of these things being said still managed to worry her. She could only imagine how the other listeners must've been feeling. If not for Lord Goffe's protective aura, some of them probably would have been trembling from anxiety alone.

""Alright, look,"" said Lord Goffe. ""Is there any way that I can convince you to stop attacking humans?""

""No,"" said Chort plainly."

"2387

((The Father's Day Special -- page 3 of 24))

""...Yeah, I figured you would say that. But I have to ask: why not? Tell me your exact reasons for attacking us, because I still don't understand.""

""That does not surprise me,"" said Chort. ""My spawn must continue to grow. Both in number and individually. You ask me to stop attacking your kind, but how then am I to feed them? How then am I to make more? These things would become impossible.""

""...Wait a minute,"" said Lord Goffe. ""Chort. That's a very different answer from what you gave earlier. You said you wanted to 'spread knowledge of the Infinite Current,' didn't you?""

""Yes, that is also true. Teaching humans of their own ignorance is similarly important.""

""So it's just like a two birds, one stone situation for you, then?""

""It sounds as though you understand. Finally.""

""No, Chort, I don't. You could just hunt regular animals and feed those to your children. Like we do. You don't have to kill people for that. Plus, it would be safer for you, too. Normal animals won't send hunters like me after you.""

""Hmph. Incredibly, there is a modicum of sense in what you say. It would indeed be safer to feed on less volatile creatures. But you ask the impossible. My spawn require more than mere flesh. They need the sustenance of souls in order to transform, grow, and flourish.""

""...Excuse me?""

""It is impossible to create even a single new spawn from the lesser souls that inhabit other, lower creatures. One human, however, can sometimes equal two of my spawn.""

Pauline could sense the monster's aura growing again as it spoke, regaining rigidity. Certainty. Conviction.

But she could also sense a change in Lord Goffe's. His was twisting in places, not unlike swirls of steam. Growing heated. Angry."

"2388

((The Father's Day Special -- page 4 of 24))

""Why do you have to kill people for their souls, though?"" said Lord Goffe. ""There are plenty of humans dying of natural causes every single day.""

""Ah. You would have me be like your reapers?"" said Chort. Its form seemed to finally be coalescing into that of a giant toad. It, too, had far more legs than was normal, but instead of two heads like the horse, the toad had a half-dozen eyes and multiple tongues.

""Not exactly,"" said Lord Goffe. ""I'm just... trying to understand.""

""How could I possibly teach humans of their ignorance if I am not the one taking their lives?""

""...Is that it?"" said Lord Goffe. ""That's your only justification?""

Pauline could feel his aura grow still hotter.

""You speak as if I need more,"" said Chort.

""You do."" And the Lord of Warrenhold's voice as he spoke those words was abruptly more grave than anything he had yet said. They seemed to resonate with his aura, carrying more heavily through the air and even making Pauline's avian bones tingle slightly.

Surely, the Beast of Lorent must have felt that as well, no? Unless its own aura was shielding it too much.

Whatever the case, the monster took another moment to respond. At the very least, it must've been able to sense the fluctuation in the opposing aura, even if it couldn't personally feel the effects.

""...In truth, yes, there is more,"" said Chort. ""A soul that has already been rent from its accompanying flesh cannot serve as a yolk for my spawn. As the shell of an egg, the body is also necessary."" And when Lord Goffe made no immediate response, the Beast continued, ""I cannot see why such details should matter to you, but that is also characteristic of an archiver. The end result is the same, either way. Humans dying. You would be upset with me regardless, would you not?""

"2389

((The Father's Day Special -- page 5 of 24))

""...So let me get this straight,"" said Lord Goffe. ""Are you telling me... that you consume souls and then give birth to your children later? Or... are you telling me... that you transform people into your 'spawn' while they are still alive?""

""Again, the end result is the same, no?"" said the Beast. ""Why must you pursue such inconsequential details, archiver?""

""Answer me, Chort.""

""Hmph. There is no 'birthing,' as you put it. It is closer to the second method you described. Humans become vessels for my spawn to hatch out of. In some sense, you may consider them 'reborn' as such. More powerful and less ignorant than before. It is a happy thing, though I am sure you will not see it as such.""

That was already more detail than Pauline wanted, quite frankly. Just imagining deceased human bodies ""hatching"" was enough to make her feel sick.

And she wasn't even human. What must Lord Goffe have been feeling, right now?

""...I guess you're right,"" said Lord Goffe. ""The end result is the same. The details don't make that much difference, either way.""

His aura was telling a different story, though. It was twisting and heating to such a degree that it almost seemed to be boiling now.

Chort must've noticed it as well. ""You clearly do not speak truly to your feelings, archiver. I do not consider that a lie, but it is reprehensible, regardless.""

Abruptly, the metal boxes swirling around Lord Goffe sped up. Pauline couldn't say that she understood how his power worked, but that metal was moving fast enough that the children of the Beast sealed therein would no doubt have begun feeling pressure from the immense G-forces.

""Maybe we should just get on with this, then.""

""Stop. You are hurting them. Return my spawn to me.""

""...Okay.""

"2390 -- CCXXVIII.

((The Father's Day Special -- page 6 of 24))

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Eight: 'The Battle of the Sunken Forest...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had thirteen spawn-filled cubes whirling around him. He kept increasing the speed, bringing them to verge of what he was capable. He had to flirt with losing control in order for this technique to work, after all.

That limit was higher now than ever before, though. The wind that the boxes whipped up was strong enough to threaten his footing a little, even in his full suit of armor.

He loosed the first one at rocket speed, straight toward the Beast of Lorent.

The impact threw up so much dust and rock that, at first, Hector couldn't even see what had become of the monster.

But then a giant, bulging hand wiped the cloud away like a fan.

And Hector saw.

The Beast had caught it.

Two enormous hands had emerged from its frog-like form, and one was now holding the iron cube. The force of the catch had pushed the creature back a few meters and torn up some rock around its giant feet, but no damage appeared to have been done.

""Thank you,"" said Chort. ""Now, the rest. But a bit gentler, please.""

Certainly, Hector hadn't expected that one blow to end things straight away--not after what he'd seen during that vision--but still.

Just how strong was this fucking thing?

Well. First things first.

Hector raised his right arm and made a fist.

Every single iron box was immediately filled with spikes, skewering their contents.

""No!"" cried the Beast, apparently able to sense what he had just done, and it bounded forward.

Its other children followed immediately after it, spitting fire and acid at the party.

Iron and copper walls rose up in their defense, shielding everyone from the vomited projectiles, but the creatures clambered over the structures like spider monkeys."

"2390 -- CCXXVIII.

((The Father's Day Special -- page 6 of 24))

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Eight: 'The Battle of the Sunken Forest...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had thirteen spawn-filled cubes whirling around him. He kept increasing the speed, bringing them to verge of what he was capable. He had to flirt with losing control in order for this technique to work, after all.

That limit was higher now than ever before, though. The wind that the boxes whipped up was strong enough to threaten his footing a little, even in his full suit of armor.

He loosed the first one at rocket speed, straight toward the Beast of Lorent.

The impact threw up so much dust and rock that, at first, Hector couldn't even see what had become of the monster.

But then a giant, bulging hand wiped the cloud away like a fan.

And Hector saw.

The Beast had caught it.

Two enormous hands had emerged from its frog-like form, and one was now holding the iron cube. The force of the catch had pushed the creature back a few meters and torn up some rock around its giant feet, but no damage appeared to have been done.

""Thank you,"" said Chort. ""Now, the rest. But a bit gentler, please.""

Certainly, Hector hadn't expected that one blow to end things straight away--not after what he'd seen during that vision--but still.

Just how strong was this fucking thing?

Well. First things first.

Hector raised his right arm and made a fist.

Every single iron box was immediately filled with spikes, skewering their contents.

""No!"" cried the Beast, apparently able to sense what he had just done, and it bounded forward.

Its other children followed immediately after it, spitting fire and acid at the party.

Iron and copper walls rose up in their defense, shielding everyone from the vomited projectiles, but the creatures clambered over the structures like spider monkeys."

"2391

((The Father's Day Special -- page 7 of 24))

Hector was sure that his friends could keep the spawn at bay, but he felt like if he didn't keep a close eye on the Beast, it would disrupt their formation and tear through everyone.

The spikes that he'd materialized inside the cubes made things more difficult, throwing off their shape and making them more awkward and unwieldy to launch--but also more dense and impact-heavy.

Without a doubt, Chort did not expect the second cube to be any different than the first, because when it tried to catch it, the force sent its huge frog body flying, as if it had tried to catch a baseball that instead turned out to be a bowling ball.

Hector didn't let up. He lobbed two more right afterward.

With a spare thought process, he was relying on the Scarf to keep track of the chaotic battlefield around him. Salvador Delaguna was on his left, clobbering spawn with his huge, cobalt-infused arms. He'd merged with his reaper, Mevox, in what was presumably pan-forma.

The spawn weren't dying, though. They would get flattened like pancakes and even spew blood or have their limbs knocked off their bodies as if they'd barely been attached in the first place, but they didn't stay down. Their scattered body parts were scrambling back to one another and reassembling themselves.

It was like each piece of flesh had a mind of its own. Not entirely unlike the worms of the Undercrust, Hector realized, though this was far bloodier.

Fire wasn't doing much to them, either. Roman was soaring through open air, causing the creatures to burst into flames purely through particle-induced combustion, but it barely slowed the little bastards down at all.

Fidel Blackburn wasn't managing much better with his copper materialization, but he was at least keeping them away from everyone, shoving the critters back or just straight up flinging them away on platforms. He was buying everyone precious room to breathe, which was no meager contribution."

"2392

((The Father's Day Special -- page 8 of 24))

The remaining two servants, Matteo Delaguna and Carlos Sebolt, were working together in support of Lord Salvador.

This was actually the first time that Hector had seen either of them fight. If circumstances were less chaotic, he might've liked to assess their combat prowess a little more, but he was only able make out so much in the unfolding mayhem. He already knew that they both used transfiguration, and he could sense them relying on it now to create soul-infused smokescreens and acid attacks.

Matteo was surprisingly agile, however. Hector wanted to warn him not to go so deep into the enemy's front line, but he was handling it well, bobbing and weaving between claws and flaming acid, only catching the occasional scrape here or there as he pummeled the monsters with fists that were quite literally on fire.

Carlos, meanwhile, was the only servant relying on firearms at all, but he was making interesting usage of them. He had multiple pistols on him, but the one he was currently using did not seem be a normal gun. Its loading chamber was very large, and Hector could sense him loading small chunks of his left arm into it instead of standard ammunition.

The resulting shots seemed to have different effects as well. Sometimes, they would drill through the monsters like tissue paper, and other times, they set the creatures ablaze or exploded on contact.

Carlos was also the first one to to start changing up his tactics, Hector noticed. He stopped trying to use fire and explosives and instead tried using bullets that froze on contact.

It didn't entirely work, since the bullets were small and only managed to freeze parts of the monsters, but it seemed clear to Hector that tactic was at least successful in slowing the little bastards down."

"2393

((The Father's Day Special -- page 9 of 24))

All in all, they were holding their ground quite well.

Hector was able to keep his primary focus on Chort while the others kept the little ones at bay, and all the while, Hector continued scooping up Chort's spawn to add to his collection. He wanted to outpace himself, to gather the spawn into orbit faster than he was shooting them back at Chort. That way, their numbers would constantly be reducing while the Beast of Lorent was busy dealing with an endless barrage attacks.

His plans were prematurely ended, however, when he noticed a dramatic shift in the air.

In the back of his mind, Hector had been wondering about the Beast's ability to manipulate the weather, but given that they were in a giant cave, he thought that perhaps that ability had been rendered unusable.

This was not the case.

Dark clouds were gathering at the roof of the cave--and quickly, too. The airflow was changing so rapidly that he hardly even needed the Scarf of Amordiin in order to sense it.

Hector decided not to let that continue.

He added extra mass to one of the cubes and lobbed it up toward the gathering clouds. It cut right through them, of course, but his real objective was to have it hit the ceiling with explosive force--which it did.

That was enough to disrupt the airflow, somewhat. The clouds shuddered, threatening to disperse but not quite following through. All too soon, they were re accumulating--and sparking with electricity, by the looks of it.

More of the others were resorting to freezing tactics, now. Salvador's oversized hands were trailing with icy mist, and instead of just slamming down on the monsters like before, he was grabbing them and holding on until they froze solid--even while they belched fire right onto his face and torso."

"2394

((The Father's Day Special -- page 10 of 24))

Pan-forma's enhanced regenerative properties would keep Salvador in fighting shape, but Hector didn't know for how long. If this battle became one of attrition, Salvador's fatigue would become a rather large problem.

They needed to make sure that didn't happen.

But Hector didn't intend to resort to temperature manipulation himself-- not in this case, at least. Even if it did help slow the creatures down a little, it would also make his metal more brittle, which would definitely be counterproductive.

Plus, he could sense that even the frozen spawn were not truly stopped. Their bodies were shaking and steaming, trying to melt or otherwise break free from their icy confines. Even when Roman flew down and shattered a couple frigid monsters into pieces with a visible pulse of particle vibrations, the scattered remains were still wiggling and trying crawl back together.

Whew.

There was so much information streaming into his mind. The Scarf was describing so many things to him simultaneously.

And yet, he didn't have to ignore most of it in order to maintain his focus on the main objective.

His parallel thought processes allowed him to keep track of the whole battlefield, maintaining awareness of everyone's status and positioning. For the most part. Little details might've been slipping through the cracks here or there, escaping his notice, but he didn't quite feel overwhelmed. Almost, but not quite.

It was a crazy feeling. Like reading four books at once and comprehending them all.

Comprehending chaos.

It felt impossible.

But maybe that was all chaos really was. Just more information than one's perception could accommodate.

Wait, was he philosophizing in the middle of all this, too? He didn't have time for that shit.

Those clouds up there needed dispersing again.

He launched another cube at them, which crashed into the ceiling of the cave. Somehow, it seemed to have even less of an effect on them this time, but the impact did accomplish something else.

The cave began to crumble."
"2395

((The Father's Day Special -- page 11 of 24))

Everyone else seemed surprised by the sudden threat of falling debris, no doubt because there was already so much chaos going on around them that they weren't prepared for something to take priority over it all.

So Hector helped them along.

""Hold on!"" he managed to shout, more out of courtesy than actual instruction.

All of his orbiting cubes were dropped as he instead shifted all of his focus to shoving everyone out of harm's way. It was a split-second that he couldn't second guess. He could've tried to shield them all from the falling debris, but this cave was huge, and that was an unknown volume of earth that was about to come down on their heads.

What was known, however, was the way out of the cave. The airflow was more than a little muddled now, but he still remembered which way it was going earlier, when things were calmer.

So he grabbed everyone with iron--even Pauline--and practically launched them out of the cave's exit. It was a difficult balance, because he knew he had to be fast yet still gentle, especially with the non-servants. The actual technique he employed--or improvised, rather--was like a sudden swarm of primitive trains. They weren't on actual wheels and instead just slid along the top of flat, iron platforms that hugged the ground.

Each ""train"" carried only one or two passengers, and they all ramped up to speed quickly but certainly not instantaneously. He made sure to add protective domes and pointed noses to each construct, for the sake of both aerodynamics and shielding from the debris.

It was still a damn close call, though. The entire cave came crashing down behind them like a forty-story building, and the debris didn't stop ricocheting and flying towards them even after they'd cleared the fall zone.

And the dust. It was like a tidal wave of its own."

"2396

((The Father's Day Special -- page 12 of 24))

Hector kept the trains running until the dust was well behind them. When he let everyone go, the very first thing they all did was look back at the devastation they had just escaped.

The Lorentians were all obviously shaken and stumbling, apparently having difficulty standing upright. None of them were vomiting, though, so Hector figured he'd done something right. A few of them were electing to stay inside the little iron train cars that he'd made.

All the Lorentians, that was, save the ambassador. Edgar Stoutamire was much calmer than the others, Hector noticed--perhaps even calmer than some of his own party members.

Curious. Hector wasn't sure what to make of it, though.

Fortunately, no one else seemed to notice the train car that had been flying through the sky, and Hector was able to annihilate it without drawing attention to Pauline. Maybe that didn't really matter at this point, but it was one less wrinkle to worry about--for the time being, at least.

Chort was not dead, Hector knew. He couldn't sense any of the monsters anymore, but there was no way in hell that a bunch of rubble would be enough to kill them.

They could've been trapped, though, unable to move under that small mountain of debris. He could hear Salvador and Mevox openly discussing that very subject behind him, having apparently ended their pan-forma merge.

'If it's stuck under there, should we bother trying to dig it out and finish it off?' said Mevox.

""If it can survive that, what makes you think we can finish it off?"" said Salvador. His breathing was somewhat labored, but he still looked like he was ready for more, despite his words.

'Don't psych yourself out,' said Mevox. 'We were handling business just fine.'

"2397

((The Father's Day Special -- page 13 of 24))

""We could hold our own, yes,"" said Salvador, ""but we still have no idea how to actually kill the creature. Or even its spawn.""

'It's not the first monster I've seen with the ability to regenerate unaided,' said Mevox. 'With things like that, you've just got to stay the course. The biggest obstacle is just not getting discouraged. It can feel like you're losing when it heals back all the damage you just did to it, but if you keep hammering away at it, it'll eventually stop regenerating and die.'

'I'm not so sure about that,' came the silent-yet-familiar voice of Voreese. She flew down with Roman, attached to his shoulder as he descended from the moonlit canopy over their heads and landed softly next to Hector. 'Sure, we have a lot of power and stamina on our side right now, but it's not endless. We don't know if we'll be able to outlast it in a drawn out battle.'

'Maybe, but it's far too early to be getting demoralized,' said Mevox. 'Lose heart, and all we'll accomplish is making it easier for Chort to kill us.'

'Of course,' said Voreese. 'I wasn't saying we should give up.'

'You sure? Wouldn't surprise me if you turned out to be a big ol' chicken.'

'Hah. And it wouldn't surprise ME if YOU turned out to be a big ol' dumbass. Oh, wait, that's already been confirmed. My bad.'

'Yeah, yeah, hearin' a lot of shit talk,' said Mevox, 'but haven't seen much to back it up so far.'

'Heh. Well, what can I say? Shit talk is my favorite pastime.'

""It really is,"" added Roman.

They kept talking, but Hector was only half-listening, because he could feel the ground shaking--though only slightly. It wasn't violent enough to alert everyone, and it could've just been some lingering tremors after the cave's collapse, but he still wanted to pay it due attention. Because unless he was mistaken, it seemed to be fluctuating."

"2398

((The Father's Day Special -- page 14 of 24))

He annihilated his right gauntlet and knelt down to feel the ground with his hand. Honestly, though, he wasn't entirely sure what he was doing. Man, it sure would've been nice if he could sense forms through the earth like he could through the air.

The vibrations in the ground were definitely fluctuating, though. And not in any kind of pattern that he could determine. What could be causing that, he wondered? The tremors should've abated by now, surely. And if the monsters were somehow tunneling their way toward them, then the vibrations should've been growing steadily stronger, right? Not fluctuating like this?

Unless, maybe, they were tunneling somewhere else? If they were trying to escape, then the shaking should've been getting steadily weaker, but that wasn't the case, either.

So what else could it be, then? If they weren't attacking, and they weren't running, then...?

They were preparing.

That thought made Hector stand back up and turn to Voreese, who was still talking to Mevox. He had to interject. ""Can you sense the monsters' locations at all?""

'Uh. Not really. It's all kind of foggy down there. Like a soul-empowered haze.'

""...Or an aura,"" said Hector.

'Whatever term you like,' she said.

Hector concentrated harder on what the Scarf was telling him. Specifically, he tried to pay attention to how the air was flowing over the ground. It was pretty hard to discern specifics with all the foliage around, and the collapsed cave was far enough away that he couldn't really sense in between the cracks in the rubble, but maybe he was thinking about it in the wrong way.

Maybe he needed to look at the bigger picture that the Scarf was describing to him. Was the flow of the air affected by the shaking in the ground? Even just a little?

...Yes, he realized. It was extremely faint, but it was there. A slight shiver here or there in the air currents."

"2399

((The Father's Day Special -- page 15 of 24))

It required pretty much all of his concentration, but Hector could sense it: a pattern.

The shivers in the air formed a ring around the party, with short lines pointing inward. And if each shiver represented a monster tunneling underground, that meant only one thing.

They were surrounding them.

There wasn't much more time to deliberate, Hector knew. They must have been pretty deep underground if the tremors were so faint, but the ring was nearly complete.

He could use his multi-train technique again. Move everyone out of harm's way again. But to what end? Where would they go? Back to the airport? That was far, and there was no guarantee it would be any safer there. Plus, it was unclear how Chort had pulled them all the way here from the airport storage room in the first place.

He could hunker down and fight. That was obviously dangerous. They still had no idea how to actually bring the monsters down. And the civilians would have to be protected again, of course. Plus, Hector was certain that the Beast of Lorent still had a few unknown tricks up its sleeve, too.

Twin thought processes allowed him to assess those two options simultaneously and arrive quickly at the conclusion that they both sucked equally.

But he had to choose.

""Everyone!"" he called out, motioning wide with his hands. ""Gather up! Come in close! They're coming!""

They all looked at him, some seeming confused and sluggish, but the iron barricades materializing around the party seemed to spur them closer. The Rainlords' faces were all still hidden behind their iron masks, so he couldn't gauge their reactions, but they were all clearly listening to him, at least, and Carlos and Fidel positioned themselves on different sides of the non-servants.

Roman looked like he wanted to say something, to ask a question maybe, but he held his tongue. And Voreese was the same."

"2400

((The Father's Day Special -- page 16 of 24))

This didn't seem like the time to inquire into their thoughts, Hector felt. There would be time for that later if and when they made it out of this mess.

As expected, the trembling in the ground grew more violent as the monsters were no doubt tunneling up towards the surface. Hector had to wonder if they had all shapeshifted again so as to dig more efficiently.

What was not expected, however, was how long the enemy was taking. The shaking kept increasing, threatening everyone's balance, but a full minute must have transpired, and the monsters still hadn't popped up yet.

What were they waiting for?

Abruptly, Hector sensed a heightening of the wind. When he looked up, he could already see clouds appearing in the night sky, blotting out the moon. These ones were much farther away than the ones in the cave had been, which would probably make them trickier to disperse from a distance, Hector figured.

He might have an easier time if he flew up there, but he had a feeling that they would just keep trying to come back. And he was still pretty new to flying, besides. He didn't think it would be very easy for him to keep going back and forth between the ground and the sky throughout the battle.

But someone else probably could.

""Roman, can you stop those clouds from gathering?"" said Hector, pointing.

""Sure, but I feel like I'll be needed down here,"" he said.

Hector wondered if the man wasn't underestimating himself. From what he'd seen, Roman's speed and control over his flight had improved dramatically since the last time Hector had witnessed it. Maybe it wasn't quite on the level of someone like Dimas Sebolt, but it was still way better than what Hector was currently capable of.

There was no time to explain all of his thinking, though.

""You're fast enough to do both,"" Hector told him.

Roman just blinked at him."

"2401

((The Father's Day Special -- page 17 of 24))

""But the clouds should be your priority,"" Hector went on. ""The last thing we need right now is another storm like the one at the airport.""

Roman exchanged glances with Voreese who was still attached to his shoulder, and then he gave Hector a nod. He crouched down a little, and when he leapt away from the ground, the force he left in his wake was strong enough for Hector to feel it through his armor but not enough to push him back.

Hector watched him zip off into the sky and puncture the clouds like a bullet. Roman immediately curved around for a second pass, then a third, and just kept going. The moon was fighting to become visible again, and the porous clouds were fighting to keep it hidden, but Roman was clearly making progress.

Why those clouds seemed so resilient, Hector didn't know. He'd noticed that before, too, back in the cave. Maybe there was more to Chort's ability to control the weather than he'd realized.

But with the clouds neutralized for the moment, Hector had a feeling that the monsters would now attack. They'd probably been waiting for a storm to provide them with cover or something, so now that it wasn't going to happen, they would have to adjust their strategy. They could do something completely different, of course, but Hector suspected that they would go after Roman in order to start building up their storm clouds again.

And he wasn't going to let that happen.

So when the shaking earth became more violent than ever and the monsters finally started popping up out of the ground, Hector was ready. And so were the Rainlords.

Fidel Blackburn's copper was right there alongside Hector's iron, bisecting the creatures with metal blades as they were appearing."
"2402

((The Father's Day Special -- page 18 of 24))

Salvador wasn't yet resorting to pan-forma again, but Mevox was holding onto his back while the man grabbed the thrashing monsters as if they were no more unwieldy than beach balls and started freezing them again. He managed to keep their faces pointed away from him, so they weren't spewing fire and acid on him this time.

The monsters themselves had indeed shapeshifted, however. They were furrier now and more mole-like, though they still had far too many legs to look anything like normal animals.

But Hector didn't see Chort. Was it still underground? Trying to weave that storm together while its children distracted them?

Yeah, that seemed likely. And the spawn were as resilient as before, of course, being difficult little bastards.

But they weren't impossible to deal with. Hector started collecting them again, and the others were quickly beginning to overwhelm them with freezing tactics.

It was the Beast who was at a disadvantage, right now. If Chort didn't do something soon, all of its spawn would be captured.

In a spare thought process, Hector was just observing their densely compacted battleground with the Scarf and waiting. The Beast of Lorent might've been an insane, otherworldly monster with an almost unrecognizable value system, but Hector hadn't gotten the impression that Chort was actually stupid.

He was certain that Chort would make a big move soon.

Wait a minute.

How many of it spawn were up here, right now? It was difficult to count exact numbers in the midst of all this mayhem. Most of the monsters up here kept digging back into the ground and then popping up again elsewhere, which confused things even more. No doubt, they wanted to make it as difficult for Hector to target them with his orbiting boxes as possible--and it was kind of working, though he was still able to occasionally snag one here and there."

"2403

((The Father's Day Special -- page 19 of 24))

Hector stopped trying to collect the spawn so that he could instead focus on just counting them. Between keeping track of the non-servants, the Rainlords, Roman up in the sky, and fighting and capturing the dozens of spawn that were swarming them, Hector couldn't spare yet another thought process for counting, too. Something had to be sacrificed to make room for it, so the collection was put on pause.

And as he counted, Hector became increasingly certain that there were fewer spawn here than there had been in the cave. Not a lot, though. Only a handful, maybe.

But that begged an important question. Where were they? They weren't in his collection. He'd made sure to count them, too.

They must've been with Chort underground, right? But doing what? Why would Chort be holding any of them back? If its objective was to overwhelm them so that he could summon another storm, it should've been sending all of its spawn. So why wasn't it?

Well, there was one answer that Hector could think of.

He didn't have long to dwell on it, though, before it was confirmed for him.

The ground heave up from beneath everyone's feet, then plummeted immediately back down--and it didn't stop. It kept falling.

The entire section of the forest lurched and slid down, sinking scores of trees into a freshly dug pit.

That was what Chort had been up to. Trying to destroy their footing. What better way to throw them off balance than to eliminate the very thing they were all standing on?

If Hector hadn't seen it coming at the last moment, they would've been down there with all those uprooted trees and shattered boulders. Instead, a hovering iron platform was keeping everyone aloft where the ground had just been.

And man. This was not easy. There were more people here than he'd ever supported on a hovering platform before. And there were several spawn still leaping and spitting at them.

Agh."

"2404

((The Father's Day Special -- page 20 of 24))

The platform began to tilt under the frantic, scrambling weight of six more spawn all trying to claw their way onto the eastern edge. And the Lorentians--they were panicking, stumbling, flailing.

Hector struggled. The balance was way off. He had to adjust it. Fix the problem.

Iron spikes shot out along the eastern edge to deal with the stowaways. Some were skewered; most were knocked off. He quickly obliterated the spikes regardless, knowing they would just screw up the balance worse if he didn't.

There were more spawn on the northern and southern sides, but the Rainlords were dealing with them already. He was closest to the western edge, so he had it covered. He just needed to focus on--

A group of five spawn flew up in front of him, no longer mole-like. They had wings. Big ones. And they were coming straight for Hector.

With only a split second to react, he managed to clobber two with haphazard pillars materialized up from his feet, but the other three reached him.

They tackled him in unison, clawing his armor, puncturing the iron in deeply enough to nick his flesh beneath.

Pain. In his right side. His back. His left shoulder.

The frenzy of it stole all of his concentration, and before he could even retaliate, the hovering platform wobbled and dipped sideways. It was enough to toss two of the bastards off him, but Hector was only thinking about the civilians.

Where were they? If they fell off the platform, they wouldn't--he had to make sure they--

Agh.

This last monster on him would not let go. Its claws were like knives, and its feathers like razor blades. The flailing and scratching and growling and shrieking were more than just obnoxious. And they were tumbling together all the while, too.

Full spike defense, he decided."

"2405

((The Father's Day Special -- page 21 of 24))

Hector instantly became an iron porcupine. The spikes were both numerous enough and carrying force enough to shred the lone monster into meaty chunks and send them flying away from him.

He kept tumbling, unable to get his bearings. He hit a tree, and his spiked armor added so much weight to him that he felled it on impact instead of bouncing off. The trunk snapped in half, exploding into splinters.

The second tree he hit was able to stop him, though, and Hector had regained just enough situational awareness to wrap his iron around the tree and latch onto it so that it didn't fling him away. The wood groaned and bent under his weight, but it held, and Hector had a chance to annihilate enough of his iron for the Scarf to flow freely in the air again.

And so, sitting there in that metal cocoon at the top of a tree, Hector took a second to reassess the situation, to concentrate and absorb everything the Scarf of Amordiin could tell him.

The hovering platform was no longer so. It was stuck sidelong in the giant crater that Chort had made, but Hector's worst fears were thankfully not realized. He didn't sense any people at the bottom of it.

They'd gotten out somehow.

He sensed human figures among the treeline at the edges of the pit. Some were still fending off the spawn, but some were simply huddling together in apparent fear. A small building seemed to be there as well. A materialized structure from Fidel, probably.

Hector breathed. The civilians were safe, still.

Damn, he loved the Rainlords.

They needed help, though. He could sense more stirring from the rubble in the crater. Chort's doing?

Hector didn't intend to wait around to find out."

"2406

((The Father's Day Special -- page 22 of 24))

Four of the five winged spawn from earlier were soaring toward him again. Hector was ready this time, but he didn't need to be, because Roman zoomed down and barreled through like bowling pins, sending them all careening back down into the forest. Then Roman flew back up to the clouds, which were already attempting to regather.

The last winged spawn, the one that he'd shredded to pieces with his spikes, was almost fully reassembled on the ground, and it was already scratching at the base of Hector's tree. Its wings were still only half-formed and disjointed, but it seemed determined to get at him.

Hector launched himself up and away from the tree and glided over to the others, but in a background thought process, he was still evaluating the behavior of those winged monsters. They were all clearly gunning for him more than anyone else, probably at Chort's direction.

Did they have some kind of psychic link with their parent? It seemed likely. Hector hadn't seen the Beast giving any of them orders at any point, yet they always seemed to operate as Chort desired.

He might've expected Chort to go after Roman with those winged spawn, since Roman was the one actively sabotaging its efforts to create a storm, but no, it was sending them after Hector, instead. Why?

As if to answer that very question, Pauline's voice arrived in his head.

'Be careful,' she said. 'Your aura is greatly diminished. The others are more vulnerable now.'

His aura? Why would his aura--?

Wait, they were more vulnerable? What did she mean by that?

He would've asked her for more details, even in the midst of all this chaos, if he could've.

Instead, he just refocused on what he was doing, on dealing with that stirring in the crater."

"2407

((The Father's Day Special -- page 23 of 24))

Unsurprisingly, Hector had dropped all the monsters he collected when the platform fell, so he didn't currently have any of the Beast's spawn to launch at the ground.

But that was an easily remedied problem.

Iron materialized in orbit around him and quickly increased in both speed and mass. By the time he was directly over the crater, it was already the size of a person.

That would have to do. Making it any bigger would require more time, and the if it was too large, the impact would hurt his own allies.

He launched it down into into the rubble as he finished sailing over the crater and caught himself on another tree.

Rocks flew up up and out of the hole like a bomb had just gone off, and Hector could even sense a few more spawn mixed in there, toppling through air with the debris.

But where was Chort? Hector was searching for it, but the monster was still--

Ah, there it was. Latched onto one of the bigger rocks headed northward. Hector might not have noticed it if the boulder's trajectory hadn't been so substantially different from the others. It flew higher and farther than all the others.

Chort had wings now, too, along with squid-like tentacles wrapped around its rock. What was the point of that, though, Hector wondered?

Was it trying to hide from him? If so, that had been some frighteningly quick thinking on Chort's part. Had it really come up with that strategy as a reaction to his attack?

Hector maintained pursuit as those questions were relegated to a background thought process, but he didn't intend to attack again just yet. He only wanted to stay close enough to keep Chort within range of the Scarf of Amordiin. First, he wanted to make sure the others were truly okay."

"2408

((The Father's Day Special -- page 24 of 24))

Hector didn't like what he found. Everyone was indeed accounted for, but they were clearly not doing so hot. The spawn were all around them, crowding closer and dodging attacks left and right.

Which was strange.

The Rainlords' movements were abnormal. Carlos was missing shots. Fidel's copper was slow to formulate itself. Matteo and Salvador were fighting in barehanded unison, but they were sluggish, and their swings with their fists were far too wide.

They looked exhausted, but that didn't make any sense. They were servants, and their reapers were right there with them. They shouldn't have been running out of stamina this soon. And the non-servants--the ones that hadn't yet made it inside the makeshift copper building--could barely even stand. A few were on their hands and knees, seemingly uninjured, yet still crawling.

It made no sense.

Until, that was, Hector remembered what Pauline had told him before. About auras. About the disorienting effects they could have.

The Rainlords weren't tired. Their senses were being suppressed. Dulled. Why now? Because Hector's own aura had diminished? If so, then how the hell was he supposed to fix that?

These were the questions in the back of his mind as he flew to their aid, trying to subdue as many of the monsters at once as he could. Big iron blocks slammed down and flattened some, while others were boxed in and put into orbit around him.

Restarting his collection yet again was perhaps an exercise in futility, considering how many times he'd had to suddenly drop it already, but he still felt like it was their best bet. Thus far, capturing the little bastards had been the only way to actually remove them from the fight. And right now, reducing their numbers was the most important thing."
"2409

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector could sense the winged ones approaching again from above the trees, and this time, they had even more help. Half the swarm turned its attention to him and him alone.

But Hector was ready for them. Without a giant, hovering platform weighing down his concentration, he could sense them all quite clearly and was perfectly content to pull them away from the other servants. Hopefully, that would give everyone some breathing room.

He was still keeping track of Chort, too, in a thought process all its own. The Beast of Lorent was keeping its distance for the moment but not actually trying to flee, which told Hector that it was cooking up something else.

Roman was still up in the sky, seemingly in better condition than the Rainlords had been. Hector wondered if that was because the Beast's aura wasn't reaching him up there or if Roman had a strong enough aura of his own.

Hector bounded from tree to tree, relying on his iron to assist with each jump. Even in the moonlight, this area was a bit too dark and dense with foliage for him to rely on just his eyes, but that wasn't a problem for him, of course.

As he'd hoped, half the swarm was indeed following him, and once he had enough space to work with, he turned to face them.

He intended to add all of them to his collection this time.

But he knew that they were agile little buggers and that they had grown wise to his tactic of trying to capture them. Whenever they noticed him resorting to that strategy, they countered by scurrying underground again, which made them almost impossible to keep track of.

He had to disrupt their movement, prevent them from digging. And he had an idea in mind.

He could just send them all flying, first."

"2410

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Amid the treetops, Hector stopped and waited for the spawn to close in a bit more. It would make his job easier if they weren't quite so spread out.

But to his surprise, they hesitated.

They'd just been chasing him like bloodthirsty animals a moment ago, but now they were keeping their distance.

He still seemed to have their full attention, though. Hector could sense that their heads were pointed in his direction. They hadn't lost track of him or gotten distracted by something else.

So what the hell was going on?

Were they... scared of him? Because he'd suddenly stopped running, and they didn't understand why?

They suspected he might up to something? Were they really that smart?

Well, Chort probably was, even if they weren't.

Hmm.

Hector kept waiting, wanting to be patient, but he knew this couldn't go on for too much longer. If they didn't make a move soon, then he would have to.

Slowly, they began surrounding him. They formed two lines, one closer and one farther, before the front line finally converged on him.

How cautious. And annoying.

But oh well. He decided to take what he could get.

When the front line drew near enough, Hector summoned iron all the way up from ground, filling the whole area with one enormous platform that shot the entire line of monsters high up into the air, far above the trees.

And Hector launched himself after them. He intended to capture every single one before they could hit the ground again.

They toppled and spun and thrashed helplessly in midair, even spitting fire and acid onto each other, but none of that could prevent him from adding them to his collection. In rapid succession, iron walls clapped around each of them and were drawn into orbit around Hector."

"2411

It was already a lot to keep track of, forty or so cubes in orbit around him, all carrying deadly monsters inside them. And there were still more waiting down below, not to mention all the ones who were attacking his companions.

He stayed up in the air on a small, hovering platform. It was a bit precarious, but the wind wasn't disrupting his balance. The Scarf informed him that the wind was breaking on the enormous cluster of moving cubes around him.

Unfortunately, that cluster was also reducing the Scarf's range. The chaotic swirls of air around weren't blocking his sense completely, but they were definitely having a deleterious effect on the Scarf's ability to detect things farther away. Hector had to move northward before Chort's location disappeared from his mind.

And there was another problem, wasn't there? If he descended back down into the forest again, the orbit of his cubes would undoubtedly be obstructed by the sheer density of the foliage. It hadn't been so bad when it was only a few cubes in orbit, but now he required quite a bit of space to move around.

The spawn down below were transforming, Hector sensed. More and more of them were growing wings, and he figured that he would soon have company up here.

Hmm.

He decided to head toward Chort. The spawn would give chase, and he could deal with them on the way. It was actually better if they attacked him in the air, he thought, since it meant that he wouldn't have to deal with the forest.

But he was expecting a new tactic from them, too. They'd been adapting nonstop to the fight, both physically and strategically, so he doubted that dealing with the next wave of them was going to be as simple as the first.

And indeed, he was soon proven right."

"2412

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Their wings were larger than the previous iteration of flying spawn. They were faster now and seemingly more organized as well. They snaked up into the sky in a spiraling formation, arching toward Hector-- with the ones in front spewing acid for good measure.

Hector narrowly avoided them on their first pass, and they still clipped a couple of his cubes, disrupting the flow and his concentration for a moment, throwing him briefly off balance. He could sense the giant flying spiral curving back around for a second try, too.

But there was even worse news.

In a background thought process, he was trying to keep track of everyone else, including Roman, who'd been quite busy this whole time trying to keep those damn clouds from regathering. And he'd been doing a good job, as far as Hector had been able to tell, even managing to occasionally zoom down and help the others. He was even coming to help Hector now, for which Hector was grateful.

The problem was that there was a second group of clouds forming to the north, closer to where Chort was currently located.

And Roman obviously didn't know that. Voreese probably couldn't sense it, either, thanks to the Beast's aura.

So when Roman flew in and shattered the enemy's formation like a brick through glass, the first thing Hector tried to do was direct him north, but the wind at this altitude was howling too greatly. The monsters were still hounding them. And forty cubes were still orbiting Hector.

It was all too crazy. Roman battered a few more winged monsters and zipped off again, going in completely the wrong direction.

Hector saw no choice.

It was far away, but he had to try. He summoned all his concentration and launched a monster-filled cube at the second grouping of clouds. Then he launched another. And then a few more.

They all missed. They did, however, attract a few lightning bolts from the previously dark clouds."

"2413

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

That was not what Hector wanted to see. The first group of clouds had never developed lightning at all, so these must have been even further along than he'd feared.

Hector had to get closer, but the swarm of spawn around him weren't making it any easier. It had quickly become apparent that he could not outmaneuver them up here. His aerial movement was not up to snuff for this fight, he knew. Not only was it almost impossible to box these new winged spawn in, but even just coating them in iron was too difficult.

He could at least deal with it when they tried to surround and overwhelm him, though. After having their formation broken by Roman, they were chaotic and tried to simply rush him, which was nothing that a few giant walls of outward-moving iron couldn't handle. It didn't stop them, of course, but it kept them at bay while he progressed toward Chort.

That didn't last long, though, and he found trouble again when they resorted back to that same aerial drill technique. As expected, a simple wall couldn't stop that. It barely put a dent in their formation before they came barreling through.

He managed to slide out of the way again but not without losing even more of his cubes this time. He growled under his breath, beginning to wonder if it wouldn't be better to just ditch his collection yet again and return to the ground.

Or maybe that wouldn't be necessary. He was close enough now. He could clear a path through forest for himself. A path to Chort.

A hulking iron plate materialized and fell, with him and the flying spawn in pursuit.

It crashed into the ground with the force of a meteorite, causing a large chunk of the Imara Forest to flex and depress under its weight."

"2414

Hector hit the iron ground running, having added a slightly grainy texture to it so that he wouldn't slip.

Chort was straight ahead and clearly saw him coming, because somehow, the creature had managed to lob a truck-sized boulder directly at him.

With the Scarf, though, Hector had the spatial awareness he needed in order to know the perfect timing for this problem. Instead of dodging out of the way, he raised an equally large column of iron up from the path he'd already made--and he did so at the precise moment that the boulder passed over it.

The giant rock was batted cleanly away to the west like a baseball, and Hector could keep running forward without slowing down.

Those dark clouds above were still on his mind, too. They were looking more dangerous than ever. He could sense the wind bending around them, forming the beginning of a twister, and there were visible electric sparks brewing near in the center.

Hector stayed the course toward Chort, but he felt like he could spare another cube along the way and decided to launch without even looking, using only the Scarf for guidance.

His aim was dead on this time. It would've hit, if a sudden crowd of five winged spawn didn't get in the way. The cube had enough force behind it to reduce them all to chunks of flesh falling out of the air, but their sacrifice indeed managed to knock it off course.

Electricity leapt from the cloud again to strike the cube as it passed. The thin blue bolt fractured into a dozen smaller ones and fried the sundered monster chunks, crackling loudly even at this distance.

If those sparks developed into full blown lightning, it would be a serious problem. This wasn't like his fights with Karkash. Garovel wasn't here to heal him. Hector didn't know if he would be able to take a direct hit and keep going afterward."

"2415

that lightning did arrive later, but with so much going on around him--Chort in front, dozens of spawn in pursuit, over thirty cubes swirling around him, and the wind picking up like crazy--Hector honestly wasn't sure if those rods actually got materialized or not.

Chort melted in the forested background, disappearing from normal sight, but Hector was hardly using his eyes, anyway. Whether it was camouflage or true invisibility didn't matter. Hector could still sense the bastard.

And most importantly, he could sense that the Beast of Lorent was not trying to use this tactic to hide.

Rather, it was charging him. Hoping to take him by surprise, perhaps.

The only thing that surprised Hector, however, was how stupid that strategy seemed. Did Chort really not yet realize that it couldn't hide from him that way?

Hector didn't want to launch a cube at the Beast, though. It may have been his most powerful technique, but it hadn't worked on Chort thus far, and Hector didn't think this time would be any different. Most of all, he didn't want the impact to knock Chort away again. He'd had enough of this chase.

So he tried a cage, instead, combined with an iron coating.

Unfortunately, the coating didn't quite take. Only a few specks actually managed to materialize on Chort's body, and the cage was barreled through like it was made of cardboard.

And Chort had more electricity for him, this time spewing forth from its gaping maw as it closed in on him.

That proved about as effective as Hector's cage did, though. Instead of catching him, the sparks caught on the cubes and bounced between them harmlessly before ultimately discharging into the ground.

Huh.

Hector wasn't too sure what to make of that, and neither did Chort, by the look of it.

They had a kind of awkward staredown for a moment as they both considered their next move. Even Chort's spawn decided to pause, apparently also affected by their master's confusion."

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 2 of 10))~~
In the downtime, Hector dematerialized the broken cage, not wanting to worry about hitting volume limit again.

He could see now why a cage had been a dumb idea. In order to a keep a big monster like Chort in captivity, the whole cage would have to be extremely sturdy. There was too much opportunity to break through.

Perhaps something smaller and sneakier was the ticket.

Like chains.

Those could obviously be broken, too, but if he managed to snake them around just the right part of Chort's body at just the right moment, they could become disproportionately effective, couldn't they? And if he used a lot of them, then... hmm.

It seemed like the offspring were ready to move again, getting antsy, but Chort took the opening to speak. ""I fear this battle may never end, Hector.""

""Well, you could always surrender.""

Chort's body was bulging and growing--transforming again. The Beast was bigger than an elephant now, maybe even two. ""And what would that look like? What would you do with me and my spawn?""

Interesting questions, but there was something more pressing on Hector's mind. ""Stop those clouds from gathering, and we can talk about that.""

""I think not.""

Hector didn't intend to humor this any further. Chort was just buying time. Hector materialized iron shackles around each one of Chort's six amphibious legs and chained them to trees or the ground.

Chort immediately struggled and began breaking them, so Hector added more. More shackles. More chains. And even more layers of iron to the chains that hadn't immediately broken.

He materialized a big iron block above Chort's body, too. He didn't expect it to do much, but even if it only managed to stun Chort for a moment, that would be enough. He just wanted to seal the Beast's movement.

Unsurprisingly, the spawn were all over him now."
"2417

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 3 of 10))~~
The monsters were clambering through the orbiting cubes like monkeys trying to tumble over an obstacle course. Some had shrunk down to a smaller form and lost their wings, perhaps in an effort to better slip through the openings.

Hector wasn't trying to smash them with the cubes, though. Just the opposite, in fact. Any time one of them made contact with a cube, he made the iron morph around their body and absorb them. The cubes were already occupied by other monsters, and Hector didn't mind doubling up the occupancy. He had to make some of the cubes larger than the others, but they could be split up and equalized later. And for now, it wasn't that much more trouble to keep track of in his head, he felt.

The fleet of orbiting metal around him was quickly growing. And these cubes weren't exactly small, either. Sure, he'd practiced this technique quite a lot, recently, but even still, Hector didn't know how many of these he would be able to maintain before things would begin to crumble.

In his training, he'd been able to keep upwards of four hundred little iron satellites before losing track of them, but those cubes had been no bigger than mice. These ones were the size of ponies, or even full-sized horses some of them. He had to be approaching that limit soon, right?

And of course, there was still Chort to worry about. The Beast of Lorent clearly did not appreciate the iron chains that kept materializing and latching onto it. Chort's body was shifting again, its limbs becoming slimmer and bonier, perhaps in an attempt to help it wriggle free without having to break all that iron.

Then it did something Hector hadn't seen it do before. A huge, gangly hand with long claws appeared from its portly body--seemingly out of its back--and slashed the air.

And the air shuddered visibly."

"2418

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 4 of 10))~~
A pitch black sliver appeared there in midair, darker than even the night around it. Hector didn't get long to wonder what the hell it was for, because Chort's spawn came pouring out of it.

They hopped onto Chort's body and scuttled across it, tugging at the iron chains, trying to remove them. These spawn were smaller than the one currently assailing Hector, looking more like the group that had been fighting Salvador and the others. And indeed, Salvador himself came bulldozing through the apparent portal as well.

The big man fell on the bigger Chort like a sack of bricks. He was obviously confused as what was happening, but that didn't stop him from thrashing around like a wild bull, swatting spawn from atop Chort's and wrestling with the giant claws that were there, too.

So Chort really did have some kind of teleporting capabilities. If Hector's attention wasn't already so thoroughly occupied, he might've wondered if that was thanks to the Chort's aura or just an innate ability--or perhaps some combination of the two.

The portal wasn't closing. More spawn came through, along with Matteo Delaguna.

Hector was almost done clearing a path for himself through the crowd of spawn around him, and he would soon be able to provide much better assistance to his two allies over there, but for now, it was all he could do to keep adding chains to the flailing pile that already covered Chort.

It was like watching the world's most insane rodeo show. Chort tried to buck the two of them off, but somehow, they were both able to hold on, even when some of the Beast's spawn went flying away instead.

Then Salvador's fist glowed brighter than even the moon, lighting up the whole area around him, and he punched a hole straight through Chort's back."

"2419

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 5 of 10))~~
Chort's whole body heaved more violently than ever, and the Beast of Lorent rolled over, iron chains yanking up dirt and rocks and even entire trees in the process.

Salvador and Matteo toppled off its back and landed hard on Hector's iron pathway. A surprising amount of Chort's blood splattered off of Salvador's still-burning hand, which left a sizzling imprint in Hector's metal as the man pushed himself back onto his feet.

Chort just kept rolling, though, having apparently decided that it was a good strategy. It kept growing in size, too, and Hector was reminded of those satellite photos that had shown a creature as big as a building. He didn't get long to dwell on it, though.

And that was when the lightning began to arrive.

It was so fast, bright, and loud that Hector didn't even realize what had happened at first. It wasn't until he turned and saw a smoldering iron pylon, still trembling after the strike.

Ah, so those lightnings rods did actually get materialized after all. There were four of them, and they were about three times as tall as the trees around--which was important, because the height mattered much more than the fact that they were metal. The lightning would go for whatever the tallest structure was.

Hector could only hear ringing now, but he was fairly certain that his eardrums hadn't ruptured. He'd felt that before. Hopefully, the civilians were okay.

He sensed, however, that one of his allies was not.

Pauline Gaolanet was falling out of the air. Her wings limp, arching upward. She wasn't moving at all.

Fuck!

He feared the worst as he blasted away from the ground to go catch her. Through all the chaos of the fight, he'd completely lost track of where she'd been. He told her he'd keep her safe. And now she was--

He caught her with an iron cradle and pulled her close. He had to widen the orbit of the cubes in order to make space for her huge body, but he didn't really give a shit about the added difficulty, right now. He had to set her down somewhere."

"2420

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 6 of 10))~~
He needed to concentrate. There was no time for frustration or insecurity. These were the moments that determined life and death. Hector knew them well. His decisions now were critical.

Her invisibility was entirely gone, but she was still breathing. Hector could sense that much, at least. Air was flowing in and out of her beak.

Was she just unconscious?

He had no real idea of how durable Sparrows actually were. From his conversations with Hanton, it had seemed like they were fairly vulnerable, but that was only in comparison to servants. Compared to regular humans, they could've still been much more resilient, right?

He hoped so.

Why was there nowhere to fucking land?!

The iron pathway that he'd made earlier was crawling with spawn, not to mention Chort, so he didn't want to go back there.

Fuck it.

He materialized a second iron plate and dropped it straight down. The forest made way with crashing force, and Hector descended again, raising another lightning rod behind him as his armored feet touched the iron floor.

He set her down and dematerialized the cradle around her.

Now what the fuck was he supposed to do?

She was safe for the moment, but did she need medical assistance?

And if so, who the fuck could provide it? Agh.

The fight was still raging out there. He sensed it. Salvador and Matteo were clashing with dozens of spawn, and Roman seemed to have taken notice of the second group of clouds now. The lightning strike must have tipped him off.

Chort was closing in, rolling through the forest like a giant bowling ball, headed straight for him.

Good.

Right now, Hector was more than fine with that.

He had over sixty of Chort's spawn in orbit around him, at the moment. And they all began speeding up in unison."

"2421

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 7 of 10))~~
Thus far, this technique hadn't been having the desired effect on the Beast of Lorent. Every time previously that Hector had used it, Chort had either caught it or recovered from the impact shortly thereafter. Hector had to step his game up somehow.

And he had an idea.

Temperature manipulation was still a fairly tricky thing for him, but he'd been getting a lot of experience with it in his more recent training sessions with Zeff. While he suspected the colder temperatures would have more of an effect on Chort in terms of slowing it down, he also knew from trial and error that his iron would become structurally weaker when frozen.

On the opposite end of the heat spectrum, though, Chort and its spawn hadn't seemed particularly affected by higher temperatures--at the beginning of the fight, at least. Some of them had even been breathing fire. But that most recent strike from Salvador had clearly achieved something. Maybe that had just been the result of the Lord Delaguna's undead strength, but Hector was prepared to give it a go.

Heat was all relative, anyway. If their previous attempts to burn the enemy hadn't been effective, then maybe they just needed to go even hotter.

Molten iron was something that Hector had wanted to do for a long time but had only recently had the both the skill and opportunity to test out. It hadn't exactly gone well. He'd scorched his right arm and neck, and he'd dealt with stinging pain there for days after Garovel had healed him. He had technically pulled it off, though. Just not elegantly.

Maybe it was a bad time to be conducting tests like this, but that wasn't what was going through his head, right now. He just wanted to do as much damage to Chort as he could possibly imagine."

"2422

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 8 of 10))~~
For Hector, temperature required a kind of 'emotional command' to be given to his iron. An impassioned demand in his mind, merged with his materialization. And fortunately, he did not need to try very hard to summon that emotion.

But he tried hard, anyway.

The anger was already there, just waiting to be used, but he wanted more. He wanted true heat. The melting point of iron was a staggering 1,538 degrees Celsius. And in order for his iron to come out fully melted and not just all weird and bendy in the process of melting, he wanted to surpass that number by a good margin. So he didn't hold back.

With all of his concentration, he gave that command. And every single cube began to fill with iron as their speed increased more and more. He could see them already beginning to glow. He could feel the heat already surrounding him, clashing with the cool nightly wind.

Chort was close enough.

Hector launched them all in rapid succession, fired off like gigantic rounds from a minigun.

Chort took the first one straight on while rolling, but that was all Hector got to see before the stream of molten cubes began explosively colliding with the monster. Dust filled the darkened area in an instant, though it was quickly joined by orange, gooey iron spewing high up into the air and all around with volcanic fury.

The explosions just kept going. The cubes were the cars of a freight train, unrelenting for a solid minute straight until they were finally all spent, leaving Hector standing there alone, looking over the obliterated scene before him.

The forest was on fire on both sides of the path, and scores of trees had been felled by sheets of molten iron that splashed over them."

"2423

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 9 of 10))~~
Hector could still sense Chort's spawn across the battlefield, but they had all stopped moving and were looking in Hector's direction. The other servants weren't wasting the opportunity and had started pummeling them or shredding them or freezing them, but Hector had to wonder if any of that was even necessary at this point.

Through the persistent cloud of dirt, he couldn't tell what had become of Chort yet. He was reluctant to believe that the Beast of Lorent was dead, just because of how much of a resilient bastard the thing had been up to now, but on the other hand, that attack would've killed most things that Hector could imagine.

He annihilated the scattered remnants of his metal, including the molten parts, wanting to get a better look, and as the dust began to clear, Chort's hulking, unmoving body came into view.

Hmm.

According to the Scarf, Chort wasn't breathing, but now that he was thinking about it, Hector wasn't sure that Chort had been breathing beforehand, either. It was a being of Chaos or whatever, wasn't it? Did it even need air? Eh, maybe it did. Maybe he was worrying for no reason.

'Agh...'

The voice in his head was familiar, and Hector's attention was drawn to the fallen Sparrow behind him who had begun to stir.

Hector divided his focus again and went over to her, keeping part of his mind concentrated on what the Scarf was telling him about Chort-- which at the moment, was nothing.

Pauline moved slowly, attempting to ease herself back onto her feet already.

Hector wanted to help her, but he wasn't sure what to do or even what to say, for that matter.

Her feathers ruffled as she shook her head and turned her avian gaze toward Hector. 'What in the world happened...?'

"2424

~~((The National Chocolate Pudding Day Special -- page 10 of 10))~~
"'I'm not entirely sure myself,'" said Hector, "'but I think you were struck by lightning.'"

'Ah...'

""...How are you feeling? Can you still move everything?""

She let out a kind of chirpy groan and began testing all of her limbs. 'Bit groggy. Slight headache. But everything still seems to be in working order.'

""Really?"" Hector was not able to conceal the surprise in his voice. ""I don't think a normal human would be able to walk away from a lightning strike that easily...""

She stood up more rigidly, perhaps to demonstrate her wellness. 'Worry about me later. What happened to the Beast?'

Hector thumbed back behind him, toward Chort's motionless figure. The woods were still on fire around it, but Roman had arrived and was dampening the flames with his ability. The Rainlords were slowly coming closer, too. They seemed to have captured the remaining spawn and were pulling them along, but they were clearly still wary of being attacked again. 'Is it dead?' said Pauline.

""I can't really tell,"" said Hector. ""Can you?""

'Hmm.' Pauline started waddling stiffly over to it.

Hector made sure to stay in front of her. He was still paying close attention to Chort's body via the Scarf, wanting to discern anything he could. The flow of air around it was a bit confused, perhaps due to lingering heat distortion, but Hector was fairly certain that he could sense several large holes that had not previously been there.

Holes about the size of the cubes he'd launched at it.

Given the many explosive impacts he'd witnessed, Hector would've imagined that Chort's body would've been more shredded than this, but it looked more like some of the cubes had gone straight through.

As they got closer, Hector was able to use his eyes more, and indeed, he could see the steam rising off of the creature in the moonlight, as well as the scorch marks all over Chort's body.

Hmm."

"2425

Considering how hot that molten iron was, the fact that it had only left scorch marks was a testament to how resistant Chort was to heat.

What a tough bastard.

Pauline was being awfully quiet, though, Hector thought. ""So? Sense anything?""

'Ah. Yes, the Beast's aura is almost entirely gone now,' she said.

Hector found that answer unsatisfactory. ""Almost?""

'It is still dwindling,' she elaborated. Her eyes went to some of the smaller monsters that were currently being dragged closer by Salvador and Matteo. 'But I suspect that its aura will never truly disappear so long as its spawn remain.'

Salvador and Matteo seemed to have heard what she said as well, because they both turned to eye the critters, too. Then they went back to staring at the Sparrow.

No doubt, they had questions, but they weren't posing them yet.

Mevox was less reserved, though. 'What the fuck is goin' on around here, huh?! Someone please explain, because I am confused as shit, right now!'

Salvador began talking to his reaper, who was still attached to his shoulder, but the man didn't even get a full sentence in before Roman flew down and landed on the other side of Chort's charred corpse.

Which, of course, allowed Voreese to join the conversation. 'I second that motion! Someone tell me that this shit is finally over! Because that fight was all kinds of fucked up, and I hated every second of it!'

Hector did his best to do so, but he couldn't fully confirm that the matter was indeed settled without reiterating what Pauline had just said. The reapers didn't seem to know what he meant by 'auras'--and hell, neither did he, really--but now didn't seem like the best time to try opening that can of worms.

'Okay, okay, so what you're basically saying is that's it's dead, but not really,' said Mevox, 'and that we need to kill its stupid murder-babies in order to finish it off, right?'

'That is one way of putting it, yes,' said Pauline."

"2426

'Well, great,' said Voreese. 'Let's get to it, then. Kill away. And then we can get the hell out of this horrible place.'

Matteo's reaper, Ernivoc, who rarely ever spoke up in these group conversations, decided to do so now. 'Would that be the wisest course of action?' he said. 'We have the creatures subdued. Would it not be better to take them back to Warrenhold for further study?'

There arrived a brief silence.

The reapers looked like they were about to launch into a debate, but they didn't get the chance, because Fidel Blackburn and Carlos Sebolt soon arrived with the Lorentians--all of whom looked shaken and exhausted.

Hector turned to his head slightly and noticed that Pauline had rendered herself invisible again. Probably for the best, he figured. The Rainlords, Hector had at least informed about Pauline's presence back at the airport, but the Lorentians would no doubt be utterly confused if they saw her.

Fidel and Carlos made way for Secretary Karr and Ambassador Stoutamire to come forward, apparently to speak to Hector again.

The Secretary's gaze lingered beyond Hector, on Chort's corpse.
""...The deed is done, then? We are safe?""

All eyes were on him again, Hector knew. He wanted to be careful with his words. ""We're still deciding what to do with the remains, but yes, you're safe now.""

The woman breathed a sigh of relief. She didn't quite have the same composure now that she'd had when Hector had first met her, but that was certainly understandable.

""Thank you, Lord Goffe,"" she said, the sincerity clear in her voice.
""And company. You saved our lives. And slew the Beast of Lorent. Every single one of you is a hero to the nation.""

And Hector felt abruptly like he would've a year ago, having zero idea how to respond. He was sure that he'd been getting better about handling conversations, but heartfelt compliments were still like daggers in the gut to him."
"2427 -- CCXXIX.

Thankfully, Hector was still wearing his armor, so no one would could see how dumbstruck and embarrassed he was all of a sudden.

It still left a gap in the conversation, though, as everyone seemed to be waiting for him to say something. When he didn't, Secretary Karr picked things back up herself.

""I assure you that your efforts here tonight shall be well-rewarded once we return to P.J.,"" she said.

At first, Hector wasn't sure what she was talking about and nearly asked who P.J. was. He caught himself, though, when he recalled his recent study of Lorentian geography.

The Imara Forest filled much of the country and encompassed several large cities, one of which was the capital: Riverton, P.J.

He remembered thinking what a strange name it was for a town, much less the capital of the nation. P.J. stood for Pori Johari, which was the town's original name before it became the capital and started attracting many politically important residents. Why ""Riverton"" had been added to the name, Hector hadn't been able to discern, but given what the Secretary just said, the locals were still referring to it as P.J. for short, anyway.

And apparently, that was where they were headed next.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Nine: 'O, guardians from afar...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul Blackburn was looking through his binoculars again. That was pretty much all he'd been doing, lately. It was hard not to be discouraged or distracted after hours of seeing literally no changes whatsoever, but he didn't intend to slack off now. This mission had already gone wrong in too many different ways. He wasn't about to add to their problems due to his own inattention or laziness.

Their raid on the little town of Miro had turned into a veritable siege. Which was a particularly strange situation, considering there were only seven of them here, not including the reapers."

"2427 -- CCXXIX.

Thankfully, Hector was still wearing his armor, so no one would be able to see how dumbstruck and embarrassed he was all of a sudden.

It still left a gap in the conversation, though, as everyone seemed to be waiting for him to say something. When he didn't, Secretary Karr picked things back up herself.

"I assure you that your efforts here tonight shall be well-rewarded once we return to P.J.," she said.

At first, Hector wasn't sure what she was talking about and nearly asked who P.J. was. He caught himself, though, when he recalled his recent study of Lorentian geography.

The Imara Forest filled much of the country and encompassed several large cities, one of which was the capital: Riverton, P.J.

He remembered thinking what a strange name it was for a town, much less the capital of the nation. P.J. stood for Pori Johari, which was the town's original name before it became the capital and started attracting many politically important residents. Why ""Riverton"" had been added to the name, Hector hadn't been able to discern, but given what the Secretary just said, the locals were still referring to it as P.J. for short, anyway.

And apparently, that was where they were headed next.

Chapter Two Hundred Twenty-Nine: 'O, guardians from afar...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Raul Blackburn was looking through his binoculars again. That was pretty much all he'd been doing, lately. It was hard not to discouraged or distracted after hours of seeing literally no changes whatsoever, but he didn't intend slack off now. This mission had already gone wrong in too many different ways. He wasn't about to add to their problems due to his own inattention or laziness.

Their raid on the little town of Miro had turned into a veritable siege. Which was a particularly strange situation, considering there were only seven of them here, not including the reapers."

"2428

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Their initial hopes of going in there hard and fast and freeing all the hostages, including Raul's two brothers, had not panned out. Their first battle with the Abolishers in Miro had developed into a true battle of attrition. Even with Cousin Melchor, Leo, Diego Redwater, and the Lady Evangelina Stroud working together, the Abolishers currently residing in Miro had proven to be quite the pain in the neck to deal with, and after nearly an entire twenty-four hours of fighting with not a single servant being taken down on either side, the Rainlords decided to withdraw and rethink their strategy.

Now they were playing the waiting game, watching for any sign of movement or change in that little town over yonder.

If any of the Abolishers tried to flee Miro, the Rainlords would pounce on them. Even if one of their reapers tried to escape underground, they wouldn't be able to get away.

The Rainlords hadn't set up a soul net to catch them, but with Raul's power, digging was exceptionally easy, and now Diego, the Lady Stroud, and the two younger Blackburns, Dino and Rafael, were all down there in a huge cavern below Miro, just waiting for a reaper foolish enough to try to slip past them.

That left Raul up here with Cousin Melchor and Leo. If needed, they could join the others underground very quickly, but Raul had a feeling that Abolish wasn't going to make a move any time soon.

If he were in their position, right now, he would probably just try to stall long enough for reinforcements to arrive. No doubt, there were plenty more members of Abolish here in Vantalay who could show up any day now.

Which meant that the Rainlords were at a disadvantage now. If they didn't launch another attack soon, then the next battle would only get harder."

"2429

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The real problem, though, was the hostages. The entire point of storming the town in the first place was to rescue them, and Abolish seemed to know that. In fact, the battle had at first been going in the Rainlords' favor--slowly, but surely--until the Abolishers started bringing out hostages and using them as distractions and meat shields.

After that, it gradually turned into a stalemate.

Now, Raul honestly wasn't sure what their next move was. Logic dictated that they had to be the ones to instigate, but what was the best approach?

If they could just pick one of them off... or isolate them, maybe. That might free up some new angles of attack. There were only eight total Abolishers in the town, but they were all quite powerful, it seemed. And worse, they weren't stupid.

As for their own little trio here, they were taking turns observing the town, two at a time with one person allowed to take rest. For the past few hours, it had been Raul and Leo together with Cousin Melchor sleeping.

Orric was assisting as well, though his job was mainly to keep an eye on their immediate surroundings with his soul sense. If someone was approaching, the reaper would likely be their first warning.

It was a bit strange having only one reaper here between the three of them. Raul had heard that Leo was having certain difficulties with his reaper at the moment, which was unfortunate, and Raul's own reaper, Arumoro, was still all the way back in Warrenhold.

He might've appreciated his input and observational support right about now, but the others had decided that bringing him all the way to Vantalay was simply not worth the risk. And Raul couldn't really argue with that. Without the ability to enter a hyper-state with him, it truly would've been exposing him to danger needlessly."

"2430

Additionally, it was hypothetically helpful for Arumoro to remain at Warrenhold so that the reaper could relay any new information from his brothers' reapers.

The reason that was hypothetical was because their reapers had not received any updates from them in several days, which suggested that their brains were most likely frozen somewhere

Leo, for his part, wasn't much for conversation--which shouldn't have been surprising, Raul supposed. He'd heard through the grapevine that Leo was actually a bit of an oddball, but Raul hadn't seen it. Thus far, the man had been all business.

And of course, that fight with Leo in Capaporo was still on Raul's mind. Having witnessed that horror show firsthand, seeing all of his brethren cut down and taken captive by this man--that was sort of thing that left a lasting impression.

But then again, Leo did look like a different person, now. What a difference a clean haircut and suit could make.

Honestly, it still boggled Raul's mind how a person like this--who'd been such a terrifying enemy not so long ago--could have been recruited to their side.

Lord Goffe really was incredible.

All the more reason not to let him down, Raul thought.

Leo's turn to rest soon arrived, and Raul moved to wake Cousin Melchor. As they were transitioning, however, Orric spoke up.

'I sense someone is approaching from the southwest,' the reaper said. 'Six souls. Three are reapers, I think. I don't recognize any of them.'

Miro was to the north, and if Orric didn't recognize them, then they couldn't have been any of the enemies that they'd already fought.

It could've been a group of Abolish reinforcements, though. In fact, that seemed the most likely.

""Are they on foot?"" said Cousin Melchor.

'No, they're flying. And at a very low altitude, so I don't think they're in a plane, either.'"

"2431

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""They're headed straight for us?"" said Leo. ""Like they can sense our location?""

'Hmm, no,' said Orric. 'Look like they're closing in on the westernmost fortress you built first.'

Leo had materialized ten different boron structures around the outskirts of Miro.

Nine of them were decoys, all empowered with his soul to throw off the enemy, and whenever the soul infusion began to where off, he would simply destroy his work and recreate it from afar. The man's range was absurd.

The one they were currently using was probably a bit more spacious than the three of them needed it to be, but it was fairly comfortable as far as impromptu encampments went. And most importantly, it was wedged between two higher-rising hilltops, offering cover on either side while still providing a clear view of the whole town to the north.

'They're going from fortress to fortress,' said Orric. 'They're definitely looking for us.'

Raul couldn't help growing tense as he waited. If it really was Abolish reinforcements, then this was probably going to get very ugly very quickly.

'...But they're not destroying any of the buildings,' the reaper went on. 'And they have a fairly clear path to the town now, but they're not going for it. These people might not actually be Abolish.'

That would be fantastic news, but Raul had his doubts, to say the least. They could've just considered the buildings too time-consuming to take down, and if they were in remote contact with the other hostiles, then there was no reason they would need to go into Miro in order to link up with them.

'Oh? They've stopped. I think they're doing something. Hmm. Can't tell what, though.'

Agh, this waiting was nerve-racking.

A new sound arrive before the reaper said anything more, and the three servants looked around. It was a kind of mechanical hum."
"2432

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Raul bolted up a boron staircase to the rooftop in order observe the early morning sky over their heads. The sound was growing louder, becoming gradually easier to locate with his binoculars.

He spotted a drone.

It didn't look like a military model, though. And it was coming closer but not in a straight line. It looked more like it was surveying the area.

With their little fortress wedged between two hills, they were probably a bit difficult to see. The drone would have to turn its camera at just the right angle. Even if it was one of those models with a 360 degree view, then whoever was looking at the footage would still have a hard time finding them.

If it had infrared, though, then that might be a problem.

Raul reached out with his right hand and touched the rocky face of the hillside there. He concentrated, and a baseball-sized stone came free as he pulled his hand away.

As a teenager, most school sports had been off limits to the Triplets, because their power made it so easy to cheat. The House didn't want him or his brothers making a scene and drawing too much public attention to the Blackburns--or worse, killing someone.

But they'd still played as a form of training with other servants. Their best games, though, had been the ones they played in secret among the three of them. And yeah. They'd accidentally killed each other a few times. Damn, if it hadn't been fun, though.

Raul could easily throw a pitch that would break the sound barrier, but that might be a bit overkill here. The resultant sonic boom would draw more attention to their position, not less.

Cousin Melchor's hand arrived on Raul's shoulder. ""Hold on.""
"2433

Raul just looked over at him, uncertain.

Melchor wasn't taller than him, and yet it sometimes felt as though he was. Something about the man's presence was always mildly oppressive. As a child, Raul had been terrified of him. It wasn't until he grew older and understood the side effects of very powerful souls that he began to reconsider how he felt about the fabled Darktide.

Also, it didn't help that Melchor was quiet as a mouse when he wanted to be. Someone with that kind of oppressive field density to his soul shouldn't have been able to sneak up on him so easily, and yet it had happened more than a few times.

The drone was still up there, seemingly looking around still.

""Orric,"" said Melchor.

The little ethereal blackbird just nodded and seemed to understand. Reaper and servant moved toward each other, but they were interrupted by the additional arrival of Leo.

""Allow me to check it out,"" the man said.

Melchor's gaze lingered on him. ""It's fine. You should continue keeping watch.""

""No,"" said Leo. ""You shouldn't waste your hyper-state, pal. A materializer can check out that drone more easily than you can.""

Hmm? Was that what Cousin Melchor had been about to do? Use a hyper-state to go investigate that drone up close? That seemed a bit risky to Raul, but then again, knocking it out of the sky with a stone would've probably drawn a certain amount of suspicion, too.

Melchor still had a counterargument, though. ""You're more recognizable than I am.""

""Dunno about that,"" said Leo with a shrug. ""But they've already sensed my soul in the buildings, anyway. It should be me.""

Melchor made no response and merely frowned.

Leo returned a smile. ""Alright, how about this?"" In an instant, black sheets of boron materialized around him, covering his whole body in armor.

Armor that looked... noticeably familiar."
"2434

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

It did seem slightly off, though. Leo pulled up the faceguard on his helmet, but it got stuck halfway and only revealed his mouth. ""Huh. This is a little trickier than I expected. It's my first time making this, though, so. It's pretty close, right?""

Raul, Melchor, and Orric just stared at him.

He took their silent judgment in the wrong direction. ""Okay, look, I'll do a better job next time. I'll have to pay closer attention to how Hector does it.""

He called Lord Goffe by his first name? That was awfully familiar of him. Raul wasn't sure if that was as a good or bad thing.

""We're supposed to be undercover,"" said Melchor. ""You shouldn't be imitating Lord Goffe here in Vantalay.""

""Why not? Oh, you think he'd get mad?""

""I'm more concerned about someone mistaking you for him and then thinking Atreya is involved in this war.""

""Hmm, but he's not that famous yet, right? He's one o' them quiet ones who've been playin' it cool for ages, ain't he?""

""Even so--""

""C'mon, Melk-o, you worry too much. It'll be fine!""

""Don't call me Melk-o.""

""I said it before, didn't I? Whoever's out there has already sensed my soul. Hiding my face at this point is just, like, spitting on a house fire 'r something, so who cares if I have a bit of fun with it? The world could use a bit more fun, don'tcha think?""

Okay, Raul could see now where those rumors about Leo had come from.

""This is serious, Leo,"" said Melchor. ""The mission--""

""I know how serious things are, Melkeesey. That town over there means more to me than anyone else here. Just relax. I got this.""

And without waiting for another word from Melchor, Leo carried himself away on a serpentine column of materialized boron, cutting a path through the air toward the drone."

"2435

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))
Raul, Melchor, and Orric could only watch.

As soon as Leo got close to it, the drone whirled around to look at him.

Raul expected it to immediately attack or sound an alarm or to hear Orric tell them that the new arrivals were now headed this way.

But none of that happened.

Instead, Leo merely sat there cross-legged on a hovering platform of boron in front of the drone, seemingly inspecting it. He had already dematerialized the column that he'd used, apparently not wanting it anymore.

The drone wasn't moving, either. It just let the black-armored man observe it, like that wasn't a strange thing to do.

Trying to look closer with his binoculars, Raul noticed something on the underside of the drone. Something pointed toward Leo. A faint blue light? Words?

It was a small display. Some kind of computer screen. Leo must have been reading it.

After a short while, Leo held up a single index finger, as if to ask the drone for one moment, and then he stood up on his platform and launched himself off of it back toward the three of them.

He fell with enough speed that Raul thought he would either break all the bones in his body or smash this little boron fortress like a meteor-- or both. But Raul's expectations were again mistaken, because Leo softened his landing at the last moment with another column of boron, though this one had a softer, sandier texture in order to catch him.

And, Raul supposed, the man's passive soul defenses would've been astronomically strong. His body wouldn't be bothered by that kind of violent change in speed at all.

""Okay, so good news,"" said Leo from inside his helmet. ""The folks lookin' for us are from Ridgemark, and they just want to talk. Supposedly.""

"2436

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 1 of 12))~~

'Ridgemark?' said Orric. 'Was that all they told you regarding their identities?'

""Yup,"" said Leo. He still wasn't removing his armor. Whenever he moved, it had more of a shifting and scraping noise to it than Lord Goffe's did. ""But I figure it's gotta be the RPMP, right? Other than Abolish, they're the only ones who might have any kind of clue that we're here, yeah?""

'You're probably right,' the reaper said, 'but it's common courtesy to identify yourself clearly before requesting a meeting with anyone, especially a group who may think you are hostile.'

""True,"" said Leo. ""Maybe they've got a little mission of their own, then. One that requires 'em to be a bit sneaky, eh?""

'Hmm.'

There was quiet as the four of them mulled the situation over. The drone had flown away, Raul noticed.

He certainly understood Orric's apparent reluctance in this situation, but at the same time, he felt like they almost had no choice but to go and meet with these people. The battle was currently not going their way. They had to start doing something different if they intended to turn things around.

""So what do you guys think?"" said Leo. ""Should we hear 'em out? I mean, we could just attack 'em, but it seems like that'd be kind of a dick move at this point.""

'Maybe it would, but this a battlefield, and this could be a trap to lure us out into the open,' said Orric.

Leo bobbed his head to the side but made no response.

""Did they provide a particular location in which to meet?"" said Melchor.

""They just said they would wait for us,"" said Leo. ""Guess that means they've already figured that our reaper here knows where they are.""
"2437

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 2 of 12))~~

'Two of you should go,' said Orric. 'The third should remain here in order to keep an eye on Miro and also to serve as backup in case this meeting turns into another fight.'

""Good thinking,"" said Leo. ""n we should probably inform the other Rainbros, eh?""

'That would be ideal, yes.'

""I can do that for ya.""

'Are you sure? You wouldn't rather go to the meeting?'

""I mean, kinda, sure. But let's be real here, dudes. I ain't exactly the greatest negotiator in the world, y'know? 'n I figure you guys'd probably be more comfortable without me there, too.""

'Hmm, why do you say that?'

""C'mon. You're afraid I'ma do somethin' crazy. Or say the wrong thing 'n botch the meeting. It's okay. I ain't offended. Really.""

Melchor chortled. ""Leo, we're Rainlords. We don't exactly have a reputation for calm agreeableness.""

Leo scratched his lip and shrugged. ""If you say so. Either way, meetings're pretty dull, so just go ahead 'n take the youngin' here."" He eyed Raul. ""You can handle it, right, chief?""

Raul hadn't expected to be prompted on his opinion at all. ""Ah--yes, sir, I believe I can.""

""See that? What a go-getter. Attitude like that, you'll go far, kiddo.""

For some reason, Raul didn't think he really meant that.

Leo didn't give Melchor or his reaper another opportunity to argue with him. The boron beneath his feet disappeared, and he dropped straight down. ""See yaz!""

Raul soon heard drilling noises from below as Leo presumably began tunneling his way toward the others. He exchanged looks with Cousin Melchor.

'Guess that settles that.' Orric latched onto Melchor's shoulder.

They left together.

Orric guided them toward the southwestern most fortress. The terrain was quite rough, and they didn't want Melchor to waste pan-rozum time just to move faster, so Raul cleared a smoother path with his power. A thick layer of top soil slid out of their way, creating a gently arching dirt road for them to jog across."

"2438

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 3 of 12))~~

When they arrived, they found three men and three reapers waiting for them just as Orric had said.

They were all casually dressed, but Raul still detected wealth in their clothing. He might not have normally noticed such things, but having spent so much time in Ridgemark over the past few weeks, he'd gained a bit of an eye for expensive brands.

Well, okay, in truth, it wasn't just his time in Ridgemark. It was his time with a particularly nice fashionista named Karina Labeau. They'd made a game out of trying to determine personality types of passersby based on their choice of attire.

Raul didn't know if he believed in it quite as thoroughly as she did, but it had still been quite the informative exercise. Karina had taught him a lot about fashion in Ridgemark and how people used it to distinguish themselves from the crowd in all sorts of ways.

And these three here definitely had money. They may have each been wearing simple black slacks and gray t-shirts, but Raul recognized the silvery collars and subtle, patterned texture in the fabrics. Those clothes were of the Domingo brand, named after a famous Steccati designer. Karina would've been able to name the line they belonged to as well, no doubt, but Raul wasn't quite that advanced.

""Thank you for coming,"" said the foremost gentleman with a slight Valgan accent. ""We understand that this may not be the most convenient timing for you.""

""Who are you?"" said Cousin Melchor.

""I'm afraid that I may not be able to answer that question in such a way as to fully satisfy your curiosity,"" the man said. ""But you may call me Renart. We represent someone from Ridgemark who is interested in your operation here.""

'Why the need for secrecy?' said Orric.

""Ridgemark has its own power structure,"" said Renart. ""And the competition can, at times, cause difficulty that might otherwise have been avoided with a pinch of forethought or discretion.""

"2439

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 4 of 12))~~

""Competition?"" said Melchor. ""I was under the impression that oligarchs of Ridgemark were of unified beliefs.""

At that remark, Renart was silent for a time, merely observing them blankly.

Perhaps he hadn't appreciated Melchor's use of the term oligarch, Raul thought. It did seem like a needlessly provocative choice of word, even if Raul didn't necessarily think it was inaccurate.

""...Some in Ridgemark view Abolish's presence in this country as a necessary evil,"" said Renart. ""Our employer feels differently. As do you, we suspect.""

'We aren't here to run them out of Vantalay for you,' said Orric, 'but yes, we do feel similarly.'

Raul tensed further. He could understand Orric and Melchor's frigid approach to this conversation, but he also couldn't help feeling that being a tad friendlier in tone might be better. They most certainly had seniority over him, though, so he kept his mouth shut.

""Good,"" said Renart. ""In that case, perhaps we can offer some assistance."" He motioned to the man on his right, who was carrying something, but Orric interrupted first.

'You'll have to forgive us,' the reaper said. 'We're a rather untrusting lot. Why exactly does your employer feel so differently about Abolish?'

""Does that question truly need answering?"" said Renart. ""This is Abolish we are talking about.""

'Okay, then why do certain 'others' in Ridgemark not share your employer's feelings?'

Renart fell briefly quiet again, and he glanced at the reaper attached to his shoulder. ""...I am not sure what relevance that information has to you. Do you think that their views might somehow convince you to change your own minds with regard to Abolish?""

'Hah, not likely,' said Orric. 'But like I said. We're an untrusting lot. We'd like to have a better understanding of things, especially when they pertain to who we're working with and why. Too often, simple misunderstandings cause avoidable problems, wouldn't you agree?'"
"2440

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 5 of 12))~~

Renart's reaper detached from his shoulder and regained the form of a blackbird to Raul's eyes. 'Perhaps our two groups are kindred spirits, because we, too, are rather untrusting. Information regarding the current political state of Ridgemark is highly sensitive and not to be shared carelessly. There are many enemies, both domestic and abroad, who would seek to use such knowledge against us.'

'Your concerns are understandable,' said Orric, 'but I'm afraid we really must insist that you share something more with us. Especially because I suspect that we are already on an uneven playing field, no? You have not sought out our help while having no idea of who we are.'

'Yes,' said the other reaper, and his glowing eyes turned to Cousin Melchor. 'However, we have not asked what your business is in this country. I'm sure a great many people would be interested to know why you are so far from home.'

""Careful, stranger,"" said Melchor with physical weight behind his voice. ""That almost sounded like a threat.""

""I assure you, it was no such thing,"" said Renart. ""My colleague here was merely pointing out the fact that there is much we do not know about you, as well. It may be in both our best interests if we limited the scope of this conversation to the task that is immediately ahead of us.""

More silence arrived as Raul looked between everyone. The air in here was more uncomfortable than ever, even as a golden-orange sunrise was beginning to fill the dark room with warm light.

Orric was speaking up again--and not with words that Raul wanted to hear.

'No. Not good enough. If that is your criteria for working together, then this is not going to happen. And if there is nothing further, then we will be taking our leave now.'

They waited a moment longer, but when Renart and his reaper said nothing, Melchor turned around and began walking away.

Raul knew it wasn't his place. And he started to follow. But then he stopped."

"2441

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 6 of 12))~~

Melchor and Orric stopped as well and looked back at him.

Raul could see the uncertainty on Cousin Melchor's stern face, already mixed with a hint of disapproval.

But he had to do something. He had to.

""This is a rescue mission,"" said Raul as he turned around to face Renart again. ""We are trying to save innocent lives. Not the entire country, maybe, but that is the context of our presence here in Vantalay.""

And again, no one said anything for a time.

Come on, Raul thought. He'd given a little ground, but not enough to be dangerous. These Ridgemarkers could return the favor, at least.

""...And we are trying to do the same,"" said Renart.

Raul took a single step forward. ""We have ample reason to distrust both Abolish and the Vanguard, at the moment. Reasons that... you may have heard about?""

""...Yes,"" said Renart. ""Rumors. Here and there. Of betrayal. On both sides.""

""On one side."" Raul's voice was firm as he stared at the other man.

Renart made no response.

Raul felt Cousin Melchor's hand on his shoulder, felt it silently telling him that he'd said enough.

Fine.

He'd hoped for more, but if these people weren't going to budge, then he didn't see what else could be done about it.

And so, finally, they left the boron fortress behind and returned down the smooth path that Raul had made for them earlier.

It was disappointing. And demoralizing. Raul wondered if there was any way in which that negotiation could have gone differently. Perhaps both sides were simply too stubborn.

Then he heard footsteps behind him.

Renart's group were following them.

Everyone stopped again.

Renart had a box in his hand, no larger than a basketball, and he tossed it to Raul. ""Before you go, take those with you. Do with them as you like.""

Those? Multiple? Raul felt a gap in the box's metallic frame, as well as a broken lock on one side. He pulled the top of the box open and examined its contents.

Rings."

"2442

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 7 of 12))~~

There were only four of them, all fastened in tight little wedges while the rest of the box was filled with a pillow-like cushion. Clearly, they were special in some way, but Raul wasn't quite sure how until Orric spoke up.

'These are the remains of an aberration,' the reaper said.

Raul's eyes widened. Now that he was looking at them more closely, they did look like bone. He hadn't realized it at first because of the polished sheen they had, as well as how small and thin they were.

Renart again said nothing.

'Where did you get these?' said Orric.

Raul doubted that question would be answered, but he was wrong this time.

""Abolish,"" said Renart. ""Where else?""

Raul could see the disgruntled expression on Cousin Melchor's face, and indeed, he could even feel a bit of that emotion himself. These Ridgemarkers obviously weren't aware of House Blackburn's experience with aberrations.

Renart seemed mildly confused, perhaps he could sense their displeasure but didn't understand why. The man posed another question. ""Are you familiar with the kind of power that can be harvested from aberrations?""

""...We have heard of such things, yes,"" said Melchor.

""Try them on and see for yourself,"" said Renart. ""They will not come off easily, but the ability they grant should prove very helpful in your mission.""

Raul's jaw clenched as he eyed the rings in the box another time. It was hard not to feel sickened.

All he could think about right now was Ibai.

What if someone out there tried to do this to him? Lord Goffe had told them that he was safe, but... Ibai's power would no doubt tempt many people if they ever discovered that they could ""harvest"" it from him in this way.

'Is something wrong?' said Renart's reaper.

'...No,' said Orric."

"2443

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 8 of 12))~~

""You can consider those rings a gift,"" said Renart. ""Or payment for your mission, if you prefer. Whatever the outcome, they are yours.""

'These must be quite valuable,' said Orric.

'Indeed,' said Renart's reaper. 'If you have some issue with holding onto them, then they would undoubtedly net you a sizable sum from the right buyer.'

Raul doubted that would happen, but there was historical precedent for it, at least. The Rainlords of Sair had often been in the business of selling military equipment to their allies, and Raul was sure that these rings would qualify as such.

With new or rare technology, though, they generally preferred to deconstruct the items for the purpose of reverse engineering and hopefully mass production. If successful, it was much more profitable in the long-term that way.

To his knowledge, they had never really tried to hoard such technology en masse for their own usage before, but that seemed to be changing with these new missions being dispatched out of Warrenhold.

""What ability do these rings possess?"" said Melchor.

""Invisibility,"" said Renart. ""Even from reapers.""

Melchor did not react, though he must have wanted to. Aberrations with invisibility had been involved in the attack on Dunehall. The attack that had been responsible for numerous casualties among the different houses.

The attack that had been responsible for Lord Ismael's death and Ibai's disappearance.

Now Raul really wasn't sure how to feel. Sickened and confused didn't quite seem to cover it. The prospect of striking at Abolish with their very own weapon was certainly... appealing, in its own way. Perhaps too much so.

""I would explain how to use them,"" Renart went on, ""but there is not much to it. Unlike other aberration-harvested items, these are very intuitive.""

"I see," was all Melchor said.

And the thick silence returned, though it was accompanied by a heavy westerly wind now that they were outside."

"2444

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 9 of 12))~~

'You seem to be rather knowledgeable about aberrations,' said Orric.

'Yes,' said Renart's reaper. 'Such information has become crucial, as of late.'

'How do you mean?' said Orric.

'Hmm. You truly have no idea what I am referring to?'

'I'm afraid not. Should I?'

'If you intend to keep participating in this war, then yes. For your own good, you should know much more.'

'Ah,' said Orric, and Raul recognized that ever-so-slightly irritated tone. 'Perhaps you would be so kind as to enlighten me, then, O wise one.'

Renart intervened again. ""My companion here meant no offense.""

'Nor did I,' said Orric. 'I was just wondering if he was good for anything other than running his mouth.'

Yikes, Raul thought.

Then again, he was already holding the rings, so he supposed there probably wasn't much point in holding their tongues any longer.

The other reaper elected not to respond, instead letting Renart handle things.

""...Tell me. What do you know of how this Second Continental War came to pass?""

Orric let Melchor take over, too, and the man angled his emerald gaze at Renart. ""What do you mean?""

""Exactly what I said.""

"I only know what I have heard," said Melchor. "Five nations invaded their neighbors, seemingly without provocation."

"Calthos, Kavia, Orsta, Corrico, and Vantalay, yes," said Renart. "All countries with significant Abolish influence, as I am sure you have noticed."

"Of course."

"And in each of the initial assaults, there were reports of strange or otherwise mysterious circumstances."

"Reports from whom?"

"From those who were present, of course."

"Yes, but how did you come by such intel?"

"It pays to have friends. And to keep your friends paid."

"Cute. Is that a company motto?"

"More like a Ridgemark motto. One that more foreigners should take to heart, in my humble opinion."

"2445 -- CCXXX."

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 10 of 12))~~

'Are you saying that Abolish has been deploying aberrations in large numbers during this war?' said Orric.

"Yes," said Renart. "The invisible ones in particular. That seems to have become a favorite tactic of theirs, especially before an assault. Having their soldiers or saboteurs sneak into a territory and sow discord before striking hard--that has been happening all over the continent."

Whoa.

The Blackburns of course knew exactly what the man was talking about. They'd experienced it firsthand. Suddenly, it was looking like Dunehall had been some kind of trial run for Abolish.

Did they really have that many invisibility-wielding aberrations? Raul would've expected them to be fairly difficult to come by, but from the sound of it, that wasn't the case. Or Abolish had just devoted a ton of resources to that endeavor.

Either way, it was unsettling.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty: 'Thine ally, thine enemy...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Of late, Emiliana Elroy was even more uncomfortable than usual. She tried to remain focused on her training, but it was difficult. Ever since she had caught wind of another great Eloan war, her mind had been clouded with worry almost all the time.

She'd first heard of it here in the Library, in whispers among Gohvis' followers. And when she'd asked Hector about it via her Shard of the Dry God, he indeed confirmed it.

Her worries had gotten so bad that she had started relegating them to a constant place in the back of her mind. That didn't seem like the proper or healthiest solution to her, but at least it allowed her to think about other things simultaneously.

Sort of.

Too often, her other thoughts twisted back toward those in one way or another. She wondered if this training of hers would be of any use to anyone other than herself, one day."

"2445 -- CCXXX.

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 10 of 12))~~

'Are you saying that Abolish has been deploying aberrations in large numbers during this war?' said Orric.

""Yes,"" said Renart. ""The invisible ones in particular. That seems to have become a favorite tactic of theirs, especially before an assault. Having their soldiers or saboteurs sneak into a territory and sow discord before striking hard--that has been happening all over the continent.""

Whoa.

The Blackburns of course knew exactly what the man was talking about. They'd experienced it firsthand. Suddenly, it was looking like Dunehall had been some kind of trial run for Abolish.

Did they really have that many invisibility-wielding aberrations? Raul would've expected them to be fairly difficult to come by, but from the sound of it, that wasn't the case. Or Abolish had just devoted a ton of resources to that endeavor.

Either way, it was unsettling.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty: 'Thine ally, thine enemy...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Of late, Emiliana Elroy was even more uncomfortable than usual. She tried to remain focused on her training, but it was difficult. Ever since she had caught wind of another great Eloan war, her mind had been clouded with worry almost all the time.

She'd first heard of it here in the Library, in whispers among Gohvis' followers. And when she'd asked Hector about it via her Shard of the Dry God, he indeed confirmed it.

Her worries had gotten so bad that she had started relegating them to a constant place in the back of her mind. That didn't seem like the proper or healthiest solution to her, but at least it allowed her to think about other things simultaneously.

Sort of.

Too often, her other thoughts twisted back toward those in one way or another. She wondered if this training of hers would be of any use to anyone other than herself, one day."

"2446

It didn't help that Gohvis had begun behaving a bit differently lately, as well. His purported reason for even bringing her here to the Library of Erudia in the first place was to 'study their link,' the one that she had apparently inherited from Agam Elroy, but Gohvis had hardly been paying attention to her in the last few weeks.

She didn't necessarily mind that part so much, especially because her training had already progressed enough so that she was no longer concerned that her mutation power would go out of control, but still. She couldn't help growing more and more curious about what he was up to.

From the way Hector had described this Second Continental War, it sounded like Abolish was intimately involved. And Gohvis was one of Abolish's most notorious members. So... was he going to participate in it, too?

Didn't seem like it so far, but maybe he was just preparing or something. She was a little afraid to ask.

Scratch that. She was extremely afraid to ask. No doubt, Gohvis would wonder how she had come to learn of the war in the first place. Maybe he would believe that she'd learned about it from his followers, but she didn't want to risk it.

Chergoa, at least, had talked to her at length about the war, offering all manner of rationale and reassurances. Which Emiliana appreciated. Greatly, in fact. The reaper was good at spinning a tale.

'I'm telling you, this is actually perfect,' Chergoa told her in the echo of privacy. 'I mean, obviously, it's not so great there's a war going on, but you and I are in an ideal position. We're safely tucked away behind enemy lines while still having a means of communication with our allies.'

'...You're saying we can spy on Abolish from here?' said Emiliana, unable to conceal the doubt in her mental tone."

"2447

~~((The July 4th Special -- page 12 of 12))~~
'Pretty much, yeah,' said Chergoa.

'But what if Gohvis doesn't even get involved in the war?'

The reaper allowed a beat to pass. 'Well. Yeah. I mean, that would be a bit of a problem for us.'

Emiliana was somehow not surprised by that response.

'But on the bright side,' the reaper went on, 'that would probably be even better for our allies, since it would mean that the Monster of the East isn't one of their opponents.'

Well, that was true, Emiliana supposed. Above all, that was the thing she wanted to avoid most: her father trying to confront Gohvis. After all that he had been through? She couldn't imagine that would result in anything good.

Truthfully, though, a part of her felt as if that meeting was inevitable. She doubted her father would ever give up looking for her. And he was immortal. It might take him many years to find her all the way out here on the dead continent of Exoltha, but she had a terrifying degree of confidence that he would do it eventually.

And when that day came, she wondered if there would be anything she could do save her father's life. Perhaps, she thought, Gohvis might spare him in order to avoid making her hate him. Was that possible?

It was hard to tell anything when it came to what Gohvis was thinking. And it seemed the peak of hubris to assume that he would place that much value upon her feelings.

Unless she tried to win his affection before then.

Which was a similarly terrifying notion. Gohvis did seem to have a certain sense of humanity behind that colossally intimidating exterior, but she was still far from convinced that he wasn't still just as monstrous deep down as his reputation implied. Sure, he was more academically minded than she might have expected, having taken up the charge as the Keeper of the Library, but that didn't mean he was genuinely benevolent."

"2448

The Mad Demon was famously very scholarly, too, and she didn't think that made him any more humane or empathetic, either.

She knew it wasn't quite that simple, though. Gohvis had helped her get a handle on her power. Even if he had kidnapped her, it also wasn't an exaggeration to say that he had saved her life.

Ugh.

What a confusing problem. To feel indebted to someone like him.

Ibai Blackburn had also been acting rather curiously of late. Reading and writing seemed to be all he was ever doing. Apparently, Chergoa had to keep reminding him to eat. His odd behavior had even begun drawing Gohvis' attention. She occasionally saw the Monster looking over his work.

She of course had to ask Ibai about it when Gohvis wasn't around.

""Oh, he was just proofreading for me!"" said Ibai. ""Real generous offer, huh?""

""I... see,"" said Emiliana.

""He's ruthless, though, in his criticism. Doesn't hold back at all. Takes grammar very seriously, that guy. It's super helpful, though. Wouldn't want my readers getting confused.""

""...You have readers?""

""Well, not yet, but one day, maybe. You never know. My work could become posthumously famous! Happens all the time! Wouldn't that be something?!""

And as was often the case since her arrival in this place, Emiliana found herself lost for words.

But Gohvis' interest in Ibai's work also made her curious to read a bit of it for herself. And Ibai was certainly eager to give her the chance.

Only then did she realize that she had no idea what she'd gotten herself into.

There was a small mountain of volumes to choose from. Ibai had only started doing this a few weeks ago, but there were already over twenty books sitting there on the floor by his desk. Emiliana had thought they belonged to the Library, since Ibai's quaint little desk was already surrounded by bookshelves, but no. Those were apparently all his creations."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

They were all handwritten, of course. And all the words were so hastily scrawled that Emiliana struggled to read them.

"I want your honest opinion!" said Ibai. "Don't try to spare my feelings! I'll never improve, otherwise!"

Even as he spoke, Emiliana could see his hand still scribbling.

And abruptly, she felt compelled to ask, "Have you eaten today?"

"Hmm? Oh. Yeah, I think so. If not, I'll get something later."

She frowned. She'd noticed that he was looking a little thinner, recently. And of course, this whole writing craze had only started after Ibai received the news of his father's death.

It was no mystery why Chergoa was constantly fussing over him.

And the reaper was right there next to Emiliana, so when she heard that, she demanded that Ibai take another break and go to the refectory that very moment.

Ibai laughed at her insistence, but he did as she said.

Emiliana intended to follow, but first, she lingered a bit longer in Ibai's tiny, makeshift office. She had no idea how he could work in such conditions. So cramped. And aside from all the books and stacks of writing materials, all he had in here was a small table with a lamp on it--both of which looked so ancient that they could fall apart at any time.

She wondered if there was anything she could do to improve his circumstances. Maybe she could talk to Gohvis about finding him a more spacious work room. Or a computer, at least. Were there even any in the Library? She hadn't seen one, but she'd learned that this building was still hiding plenty of secrets when Gohvis had taken her on that eerie visit to the Weaver.

Which was another thing that had been on her mind a lot: the conversation she'd had with that... creature."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Even now, she still wasn't sure she understood who or what the Weaver actually was. Emiliana had a vague idea that the Weaver was simply an old mutation user whose mutations had sadly debilitated her to an unrecognizable point, but it also seemed clear that there was more to her than just that. Assuming that part was even correct.

And if that were true, then the implications of it were quite incredible. For one thing, it would mean that mutations could allow for the development of telepathy.

Emiliana was a bit torn. A part of her would've liked to speak to the Weaver again and perhaps learn something more about mutation. Or telepathy. Or Agam Elroy, maybe. But another part of her wanted to stay as far away from her as possible.

Either way, it hardly mattered, because Gohvis wouldn't let her go near the Weaver without him there to chaperone, and he was barely around enough for Emiliana to even ask. Sure, she could try to go and see the Weaver on her own--without his permission--but she had a disturbing feeling that he would find out about it.

Maybe she didn't have to be so afraid of that possibility, though. He obviously cared about keeping her safe, at least for the purpose of continuing his research, so she doubted that he would hurt her.

But still. He was too terrifying. Even if he wouldn't physically harm her, Emiliana didn't wish to anger him and test how 'creative' he might become with his punishment thereafter.

All this business about Agam Elroy had turned him into a constant point of curiosity, though. Especially with regard to the idea that the Weaver had floated to her during their conversation.

The idea that she might somehow harbor Agam's memories in her mind. The idea that Agam himself had been able to remember things he had never personally done or seen before.

Emiliana had given that notion a lot of thought lately, too."

It was a strange thing to attempt, but she had been trying to search her memories for anything that seemed odd. Nothing in particular stood out to her, though, and she didn't even know if she was going about it in the right way. Was there some optimal technique for combing through one's own memories?

She'd started with the earliest thing that she could recall. It was of her mother walking with her through the family's courtyard, showing her the madega tree and talking to her and her two older siblings, Cisco and Gema.

She didn't exactly remember what her mother had said, but it was something about her ancestors, about the importance of that tree and others like it to their family.

Mainly, however, she remembered the tree itself. The huge, gangly branches. Those tiny blue-gray leaves. Endlessly dripping in the rain.

From there, Emiliana had wanted to go through her memories in chronological order, but she found it incredibly difficult to do that. Determining precisely when something had happened was surprisingly... impossible, she felt. Sure, she had a vague idea of how old she'd been in each memory, but actually sorting them all out? No way.

That little realization had caused her some amount of worry. She began to think that might be evidence of the Weaver having been correct about her memories--or worse, evidence of something else being wrong with her mind--but when she'd talked to Chergoa about it, the reaper had told her it was perfectly normal.

And it had taken some convincing over the course of multiple conversations, but Emiliana eventually believed her.

The memory exercise did have one effect for her, however. It made her realize how common madega trees were in her memory. The timeline might've been a bit murky, but those trees were everywhere along it."

"2452

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Granted, there were many madegas in Aguary, where she'd spent her entire life until very recently, so it wasn't like them popping up in her memories was particularly odd or inexplicable--especially given her passion for biology. Plants and animals had always interested her.

Personally, sunflowers were more her thing, but the madegas could be visually striking in their own ways. In fact, one of the more interesting things about them was the subtle differences that they could have with one another. The tree in the Elroy Estate, for example, had very small, fine leaves that looked almost like feathers, whereas the Great Madega Tree at the heart of Aguary had leaves as big as her head.

There were all sorts of variants among them. Darker- or lighter-colored bark. More gnarled-looking branches. Some would flower in the spring despite the neverending rain, and some might even bear fruit.

As far as she was aware, there were mainly just two things that distinguished a madega tree. The teal-colored leaves and the fact that they seemingly couldn't drown no matter how much rain fell. Their gigantic, sprawling root systems extended for miles beneath Aguary and beyond, and the constant flooding below the giant platform on which the city was built never bothered them in the slightest.

It was no wonder why her kin had always placed such reverence on them. She even recalled her father once mentioning that their ancestors used to believe the madegas harbored the souls of their brethren who had passed on. Or at least, the ones who had lived honorably.

Remembering all of that had made her feel even more homesick than usual. She wondered if she would ever see Aguary again. A rather strong part of her didn't think so.

Since then, she had been looking through the Library for a book about madega trees or perhaps about Lhutwē, but she had yet to find either in the literal mountain of books here."

"2453

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Gohvis probably would have been able to help her find a book like that, but she didn't want to get into the habit of relying on him for book requests. It might make him more interested in what other books she was reading, and she most definitely did not want that.

The only useful thing that she could do here besides train was seek out ancient tomes regarding subjects that Hector Goffe expressed an interest in. He was with her family. He was helping them stay safe. So helping him meant helping them. It wasn't a difficult decision.

She had a terrible feeling, though, that Gohvis might realize that she was aiding someone outside the Library if he started paying close attention to her reading list. She didn't know how Gohvis might realize this, exactly, but it still concerned her, nonetheless. Maybe it was just paranoia on her part. In fact, she hoped it was.

Because no matter what happened, she wasn't going to stop doing it.

It was the only thing that made her feel valuable, like she wasn't just being a burden on everyone else.

Plus, Hector's chosen topics were certainly... interesting. She never would've thought to search for books about lost treasure, but it was a good idea. And the volumes she found typically made for pretty compelling reads when motivated by the idea that she might be helping someone to discover where the treasure in question was today.

One of the books she'd found was titled The Magnificent Life and Magnificent Times of Unso the Magnificent, and needless to say, it had left an impression on her. It didn't even have a credits page or date of any sort, so there was no way to know for certain who wrote it or when; but after reading the entire thing, Emiliana harbored a rather strong suspicion that it had actually been written by Unso himself as a kind of self-congratulating autobiography."

"2454

From that perspective, Emiliana found the book hilarious, though not intentionally. It discussed the man's creative process, and it described ad nauseum how he came to develop each of his supposedly supernatural inventions. Those parts, Emiliana didn't fully understand--or even mostly understand, for that matter.

The exposition in that book was some of the most incredible she had ever seen. At first, she'd thought it was written by an actual child. In fact, she would have certainly dropped it before finishing the first chapter if Ibai hadn't recommended it to her beforehand.

How or why he had managed to make it any further through that book, Emiliana had no idea, but regardless, as she'd continued reading, it gradually became clear that, no, these were not the words of a child. The word choice, spelling, sentence structure, punctuation, and capitalization were all over the place; and each chapter seemed to contain at least one rant about someone in Unso's life--usually a woman--who didn't understand him or had wronged him in some way.

But whenever the book got around to the inventions again, the author's technical expertise began to shine through. Even if Emiliana couldn't follow a lot of it, the sections where she could, she found sufficiently impressive.

It was like reading something that had been written by an absolute genius who had somehow never read a single book in his entire life.

Maybe that didn't make sense, but that was the impression that Emiliana had gotten, at least. And of course, books and literacy weren't nearly as common a thousand years ago, so perhaps it was possible. Emiliana just didn't understand how someone could become, of all things, an inventor without relying on any written knowledge for guidance.

And when she thought about it like that, she found the book a little sad, too. How much more brilliant might the man have been if he'd gotten a proper education?

But then she remembered the story at the end of the book about how Unso had once tried to seduce another man's wife with the power of his ""allmytee intelekt,"" only to be chased out of town by the ""ignerent pezentree.""

"2455

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

She doubted that she would find a more entertaining book than that one for a good long while.

But in any event, here and now, she decided to grab a couple more of the books that Ibai had written before following him and Chergoa to the refectory.

She read while she walked, now able to divide her attention between the words on the page and the pathway in her upper peripheral vision. She was fully aware of the abnormality of this now, thanks to Hector bringing it up once before.

It was Focus. The ""blessing"" that Rasalased had referred to.

She'd been trying to discover more about blessings as well. In fact, that was perhaps at the top of her priorities now.

But such information was not easy to find. She'd tried to pick up every book she saw with ""blessing"" in the title, but it seemed to be an extremely common word among ancient toms, especially religious texts. Most of them ended up being about moral philosophy or some such thing, and she was frequently disappointed to see that they had absolutely nothing to do with the subject she was actually interested in.

Hector, however, had specifically asked her about a blessing called Domain, so she tried zeroing in on that word as well, and as a result, she had recently found a particularly dense volume of work called The Domain of Gods and Kings by Liam Larutin.

She didn't know why so many of these ancient authors seemed to have alliterative pen names, but she'd begun to think it must have been some sort of fashionable trend.

In any case, she was still trying to make her way through that book. It was absurdly verbose and difficult to wrap her head around, leaving her quickly exhausted each time she sat down to read it. She intended to keep trying, though."

"2456

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

From what little she was able to discern, the text seemed to be suggesting that physical space was somehow fundamentally different than was commonly understood, that there was no such thing as ""emptiness"" as far as physical reality was concerned.

Beyond that, though, she was lost. She could hardly even comprehend the sentences that were supposed to explain the justification for that claim. It was written in modern Mohssian, but sometimes, it sure didn't feel like it. Even with a damn dictionary next to her, reading that thing was like pulling teeth.

Which, so far, was one thing that she greatly appreciated about the book that was currently in her hands. It was comprehensible, at least. Ibai hadn't used tons of words that she barely understood.

Or any, for that matter.

Was this a children's book?

Hmm.

She hadn't expected that, but as she thought about it more, that made sense to her. Suddenly, she could very easily imagine Ibai writing stories for children.

This length, though. It was the size of a full novel. She wasn't quite sure how child-friendly that aspect of it was.

But it was certainly nice to read something like this for a change. With all the stuffy, impenetrable crap she had been sifting through lately, this felt like stepping out into a fresh breeze after spending weeks in a musty old basement.

She didn't notice any mistakes in grammar, either.

Hah, wait a second...

Ibai had mentioned Gohvis proofreading some of his work for him, hadn't he?

So did that mean... that the Monster of the East had actually proofread a children's novel?

Just thinking about that possibility amused Emiliana to no end. She'd have to ask Gohvis about that the next time she saw him.

This book, though, was actually quite lovely. The sentences were simple, but they flowed like water, setting up each scene and painting nice, quaint pictures for her in her mind.

In fact... maybe it was a little too lovely."

"2457

As she continued reading, she found herself increasingly enraptured by the text.

And she didn't fully understand why, either.

It was nice, yes, but there was nothing about it that was particularly speaking to her. The text didn't resonate with her like her favorite stories did. It was clearly just too child-oriented for her tastes.

And yet... there was something about it that she couldn't quite put her finger on. An indescribable feeling. A vaguely pleasant swelling in her chest and stomach. A kind of warmth. Enveloping her body as her eyes passed over the words.

She stopped walking in the middle of the corridor and looked up from the novel in order to watch Ibai and Chergoa proceeding on even farther ahead of her.

Ibai wrote this?

She didn't know what to think. What was the best way to describe--?

""Curious, isn't it?"" came the deep and sudden double-voice of Gohvis from behind her.

And she flinched. She'd been trying to stop doing that, trying to get used him sneaking up on her all the time, but it sure wasn't easy. ""W-what's curious?"" she asked, turning around to face him.

If the Library's hallways weren't so abnormally tall, he would've had to hunch over. ""Those books in your hands. You've been reading them, no? You must've noticed it, too.""

What? She couldn't tell if he'd actually answered her question or if he was doing that annoying thing he often did where he would just ignore her and keep asking his own. ""I've, uh... I've only just started reading this one,"" she said, holding up the volume in question.

""Mm. But could you not tell? There is something strange about it.""

She blinked. ""...Yes. I think so.""

Gohvis' glowing red eyes moved to Ibai now, too, who almost out of sight. ""The first known creative works of an aberration,"" he said."
"2458

""...You mentioned something like this before, didn't you?"" said Emiliana.

Gohvis just looked at her.

""Is this why you expressed an interest in his writing?"" she asked.
""Because you suspected that he might be able to create something... abnormal?""

""Mm. Such a vague suspicion would make for a rather safe bet, as far as that man is concerned.""

Emiliana supposed that was true. ""...Is there some kind of historical precedent for books like this?"" she asked.

""Books like what, exactly?"" said Gohvis.

Was he toying with her, now? She didn't quite know how to articulate her feelings regarding Ibai's book, and it seemed like Gohvis could tell.
""Um... hmm.""

Gohvis began walking, which prompted Emiliana to follow. ""Books of a 'peculiar impact' have indeed been known to exist for some centuries. Perhaps longer.""

""Do you, um... know what makes them this way?"" she said.

""Their authors, of course.""

""No, I mean... what is it about their authors that causes this phenomenon?""

The Monster regarded her from the corner of his eye for a moment.
""There is a suspicion that the first books ever written were like this.""

It took her a second to realize that he'd ignored her question. Why the heck did he have to do that so much? It was really annoying. She wasn't even sure if she should ask another one, now.

""When writing was first invented,"" Gohvis continued, ""it was regarded as a dark art, of sorts. For multiple reasons. The most popular of which was simply that writing, for the first time in history, devalued the importance of one's memory. Many regarded this as an affront against nature or their god, and wars were fought over it.""

What in the world? She had a hard time imagining such a thing.

""One of the lesser known reasons, however, was because written works seemed to have an ability to change people. Sway them. Turn them from their tribe and their people.""

"2459

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Are you saying that people in ancient times could do what Ibai is doing now?"" said Emiliana.

""Not necessarily, but it is an interesting thought,"" said Gohvis. ""So much knowledge has been lost over the Ages. Even with immortal beings supposedly guarding it. Would it not be nice to imagine that something once lost might have been found again?""

Emiliana didn't know what to say. As usual, she had a thousand questions that she couldn't articulate.

""How is your training progressing?"" said Gohvis.

""Oh, um. Good, I think.""

""Mm.""

Was he waiting for her to ask something else? Argh.

""You are uneasy,"" said Gohvis. It was a statement, said with certitude.

Ah.

Hearing him say that made her even more so. She didn't see much use in trying to lie to him, though. ""...I am. Yes.""

""Why?""

Because there was a giant war going on in Eloa, right now? Obviously, she couldn't say that.

""For a time,"" said Gohvis, ""you seemed to have grown more comfortable here. I assumed it was because your mastery of Sto had granted you some semblance of relief.""

Oh, was he concerned she was struggling with it again? Hmm. She could lie, but... agh, that seemed like a terrible idea. What should she say, though?

Well.

There was always another truth she could rely on.

""I... miss my family,"" she said.

""Mm,"" was all Gohvis said. Again.

There was no obvious way to respond to that, so she didn't even try.

However, the Monster of the East decided to stop walking and look at her. ""You will see them again in time.""

She blinked at that, and her mouth hung open a little. ""...I will?""

""Probably."" And he resumed walking.

What in the world? She hurried to catch up again. ""A-are you saying that you'll eventually return me to them?""

""Mm. Probably.""

"2460

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Why?"" said Emiliana. ""Didn't you say that you needed to study the anomalous link between us?""

""Yes,"" said Gohvis. ""And once that study is complete, I will not have much reason to keep you here.""

She could hardly believe it. He was saying it so casually, like it was the most normal thing in the world to return a kidnapped prisoner to their family.

Well, maybe to him, it was.

""However,"" said Gohvis, ""that will most likely be a very long time from now. Your mutations must grow significantly more before the link between us becomes clearer to me.""

Ah...

That made sense. It was only after her power had manifested in the first place that she began seeing those ""visions"" of Gohvis. And that would also explain why he would be interested in assisting her in her training, as well.

A part of her had thought that his motivation in that respect could only have been empathy, that he must have had a humane side to him. But this made sense, too. Much more so, in fact.

It was scholarly interest.

Yes.

She shouldn't get it twisted, Emiliana thought.

And that thought spurred another into her mind.

She was reminded of the conversation she'd had with Gohvis regarding ""the problem of humanity.""

In it, Gohvis had described his worldview to her, at least in part, and explained his feelings regarding the rest of Abolish.

And it had all... mostly made sense to her, but there was one thing that had been bothering her, one thing that she had been trying to work through and find answers for on her own--or if not answers, then at least new questions through which to approach the same subject.

And she had the entire Library at her disposal. So in addition to all of her other reading, she had also been trying to find a text that addressed the issues that Gohvis had expressed to her. She just wanted something that could help clarify and support her own feelings."

"2461

Emiliana didn't know if she had succeeded in that goal yet, but she at least wanted to take a second crack at that conversation with Gohvis.

""There's something I've been meaning to ask you,"" she said. ""A philosophical question.""

Gohvis made no response, perhaps just waiting for her to elaborate.

""...You told me that the reason you side with Abolish is because you think that human beings are a problem by our very nature, didn't you?""

""Yes.""

""And you said that the reason our nature is a problem is because of 'growth,' right?""

""Yes.""

""And... you said that growth is a problem because of conflict. And conflict is--""

""No.""

Emiliana stopped walking. ""What?""

Gohvis stopped as well and turned to her. ""I said that the human need for growth is a problem. And I said that growth requires conflict. But I did not say that growth is a problem because of conflict.""

She blinked, rethinking what she'd been about to say. ""Oh... then I think I've misunderstood what you were trying to tell me before.""

""Mm."" He began walking again.

She moved to catch up. Were they even going to the refectory now? That was where she had been headed, but now he was in the lead.

""So--wait a minute. I thought you were saying that conflict is a problem because it requires instigation and that instigation is self-evidently a problem.""

""No. Growth is what is self-evidently the problem,"" said Gohvis.

""That doesn't seem self-evident at all.""

""No? The world is finite. Growth only ever increases. The clash between the two is inevitable. The problem, therefore, is self-evident.""

Emiliana furrowed her brow, suddenly uncertain. ""But you said all those things before about conflict being bad..."

""Yes. That is how many in Abolish view the problem. Growth requires conflict. Eliminate conflict, eliminate growth. In fact, some consider conflict to be the only problem and think nothing of growth. They make war in order to end war. Noble, in some sense."

""But that's not what you believe.""

""No, it is not, though the end goal is similar, at least in principle.""
"2462

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Your goal is to end war?"" said Emiliana.

""Not exactly,"" said Gohvis. ""However, my goal would theoretically make war unnecessary.""

""...You're saying war IS necessary now?""

""Of course. The eternal struggles for resources, security, and power make it so.""

She thought about that for a moment. ""But, I mean, if we are still speaking theoretically, then... cooperation could resolve those issues, too, could it not?""

""Mm. A nice thought, perhaps, but mistaken nonetheless.""

""How?""

""Because betrayal is simply too tempting for some. It is an action that can take its motivation from both emotional thinking and from stone cold reason. The only counters to it are based on either morality or the fear that one might not be able to get away with it.""

Emiliana was beginning to understand. ""...You're saying that you think people are too corrupt.""

""By their very nature, yes.""

""Which is why your goal is to change said nature.""

""Yes.""

They arrived in a large room that was most certainly not the refectory. Emiliana didn't even recognize this place. Much like the main areas of the Library, this room also had several tall bookshelves lining the walls, but they were far fewer in number here. Three long, black tables sat in the center of the room, each one filled with beakers, flasks, microscopes, graduated cylinders, test tubes, and so on.

It wasn't exactly... impressive. The equipment here looked about as sophisticated as what she'd seen in her high school chemistry lab. She did see a couple computers here, at least, which answered an earlier question she'd had, but somehow, she doubted they would have internet access. They looked a bit old, as well.

There was one piece of equipment that caught her attention, though: a cylindrical chamber at the far end of the room, large enough for a person to fit inside. For two people, even."

"2463

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

She'd never really seen anything like it before, but judging from the faint, watery stains on its translucent body and the dust all over its metal base, it must've been fairly old.

She was curious to know more about what the function of such a thing might be, but she wasn't yet finished with the subject that they'd been discussing.

""So if the problem is that humans are too corrupt,"" she said, ""then how do you intend to change that?""

""Perhaps you would like to guess,"" said Gohvis as he fiddled with something in the corner of the room.

Her expression flattened. ""I really wouldn't.""

""How are you to learn to think for yourself if I simply tell you everything?""

She resented that question a little. ""I think for myself quite a bit, thank you very much.""

""Oh? Then you should have no problem coming up with potential answers.""

Hmph. He really did know how to be annoying, sometimes.

She tried to think.

If the hypothetical problem was corruption, and the method of resolution was changing human nature, then... what aspects of human nature, if somehow tweaked, could possibly eliminate corruption?

""...Is this where conflict comes back into the picture?"" she asked. ""If you remove the human desire for conflict, then corruption might also be eliminated?""

At that, she saw the Monster of the East stand up more rigidly in his corner of the room. Then his shoulders began to tremble, and she heard a low rumble from him.

Wait, was he laughing?

He was! Quietly, but he was!

""No,"" he said through a subdued chortle. ""Removing all desire for conflict could have any number of unintended consequences. In fact, I'm quite sure that such a change would simply destroy a civilization instead of sustaining it."" He laughed a little more strongly now. ""And coming from a soft heart such as yours, that was a very amusing answer.""

She frowned with frustration. ""Well, then I don't know what answer you're looking for!""

""Mm.""

"2464

Emiliana sighed and allowed herself to fall into the nearest chair. It wasn't very comfortable.

Gohvis finally turned away from his corner, and in his hands was something encased in glass. A tall, flat thing. And quite large as well. As big as Emiliana's whole body, perhaps.

He stepped closer with it, and then she noticed all the tiny shapes crawling around inside it, up and down through snaking tunnels.

It was an ant farm, she realized. The biggest she'd ever seen.

And Gohvis just set it down on the table in front of her.

She looked at it, then at him, then back at it.

Somehow, she was even more confused than before.

""Do you know what the deadliest insect on this planet is?"" said Gohvis.

Emiliana's mouth twisted with an expectation of imminent horror. ""Tell me it's not these ants, right here.""

""No,"" said Gohvis. ""These little ones are harmless, but they are a close evolutionary relative, you might say. Useful for long-term study without all of the collateral damage.""

Well, that was a relief, at least. Emiliana didn't know what to say now, though.

""The deadliest insect is the Jaskadan jumper ant,"" said Gohvis.

""They vary somewhat in size, but the soldiers can grow to be as big as your fist. As their name suggests, they are known for their leaping ability, but they also have a paralytic venom that puts even most snakes to shame.""

""Why are you telling me this?"" she asked.

He held up a giant index finger. ""But their most fearsome attribute is the way that they wage war on other animals. They've been known to conquer enormous swaths of land, pushing out virtually all other fauna and even rendering certain creatures extinct--a feat which is typically only considered achievable by humans.

""However, despite all of that, despite being the deadliest insects in the world, they are still not the most resilient ones. That title goes to their long-standing rivals."" He motioned to the farm again. ""These little fellows. The Ardoran angel ant.""

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Emiliana still didn't see where Gohvis was going with any of this, but she doubted that it was some random tangent of his. There must have been something about these ants that was relevant to Gohvis' overall goal.

""Even though the Jaskadan jumper ant is a hundred times its size or more, the Ardoran angel ant is one of the few animals in the world that it cannot conquer. The angel ant is immune to its venom, has a body that can withstand pressures over ten tons, temperatures over three thousand degrees, and has an average lifespan of 150 years.""

Her eyes widened a little at that bit of information.

""Try as the jumper ant might, it cannot kill the angel ant,"" said Gohvis. ""It can 'occupy' angel ant territory, but that makes little to no difference to them. The angel ant can simply continue about its business as usual, climbing over the jumper ant's giant body like it would any other obstacle to gathering food. Even the angel queen is essentially invulnerable to attack or interruption of her reproductive cycle.""

Emiliana had to ask a question now. ""If all of that is true, then it seems like the angel ant could take over the entire world. Er, well. The entire ant world, at least.""

""Ah, but that is precisely the point. Angel ants do not wage war like most ants do. They certainly do not conquer like the jumper ants. And why should they? They have no need to. Almost nothing can truly threaten their colony.""

Hmm. She felt like she was beginning to understand now. ""Are you saying that you want to make human beings like the angel ant?""

""Mm. You're getting warmer.""

""But I'm not spot on?""

""Making humanity as physically resilient as the angel ant would be one step to ensuring its survival under extreme conditions,"" said Gohvis, ""but in truth, it is the social behavior of the angel ant that I find most interesting."""

"2466

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Social behavior?"" said Emiliana.

""Angel ant colonies are unique in that they function using a true hive mind,"" said Gohvis. ""Unlike other ants, which only operate according to pheromones and designated instincts to make it seem like they share one, singular intelligence, angel ants genuinely do. And that, I believe, is the real reason they are so resilient. As a unified colony, they are more intelligent than any other ant in the world.""

Emiliana felt like she could finally understand the picture that Gohvis was painting here.

The Monster sat down on the floor, crossing enormous legs over one another. He was still about as tall as she was in her chair. ""The jumper ants may be more aggressive, better at waging war, better at controlling territory, better at reproducing, but they still can't defeat the angel ants. Even by trying to take all of their food, they can't do it. The angel ant can survive for over a month on little more than a drop of water.

""They represent two very different evolutionary strategies. And personally, I believe that in the very long-term, the angel ant's method is superior. Humans could learn a thing or two from their example.""

Emiliana waited for him to keep talking, but when nothing else was said, she finally voiced the conclusion that she had reached in her mind. ""You want to create a hive mind for humanity..."

""Mm.""

""But that... agh..." How many different ways were there to tell him how crazy that sounded? What was she even supposed to say to something like that?

""You are worried about free will,"" he said.

Was she? Yeah. She supposed she was. It took her a second to gather her thoughts, but he was right. That was exactly the root cause of her concern."

""A hive mind might eliminate corruption by eliminating freedom,"" said Gohvis. ""All would be done for the good of the whole. And each brain could be used in parallel with the others to achieve a level of collective creative potential that is heretofore unheard of. But yes. The individual mind may become lost in the shuffle. Hypothetically.""

""...Only hypothetically? That sounds more like a certainty to me.""

""No. A true hive mind among beings with human-level intelligence has never been observed. The actual consequences of such a network are, at this time, unknowable."" His glowing red gaze shifted to Emiliana.

She felt like he had more to say on that point, but he remained silent.
""...Why are you telling me all of this?""

""Because you wished to know, did you not?""

Hmm. Was is really that simple? Maybe it was. Not everything had to be complicated. But he could still be lying. He may have acted like he was above it, but she still remembered when Gohvis showed up at Dunehall and tried to lie to the Salesman of Death.

Emiliana wanted to keep pushing, to see if she could find some fault in his explanations. ""...This seems like quite a lot of trouble to go through just because you dislike the concept of growth for some reason.""

""For some reason, you say?""

""Yes. Trees grow. Animals grow. I don't see you trying to wipe them out of existence.""

Gohvis's eyes narrowed. ""I am not trying to wipe humans out of existence.""

""But Abolish is.""

""Some among them, yes.""

""And you don't have a problem with it.""

""I do. But not as much as you do, I suspect.""

""Then my point still stands.""

""Comparing human growth to that of virtually anything else on the planet is absurd. Trees and animals have not developed the ability to become the arbiters of their own destruction.""

""Why should that make a difference? Especially if you're apparently okay with Abolish wiping everyone out, anyway?""

"2468

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 1 of 15))~~

""It makes an enormous difference,"" said Gohvis. ""The growth rate of humanity is unlike anything else in the known universe. To our knowledge, human civilization has only existed for a few thousand years, but look at all the power that it currently wields. Enough to wipe itself out--and perhaps even to take the planet with it.""

Emiliana's gray eyes went to the table in front of her while she listened.

""And this trend is not going to change,"" Gohvis went on. ""If anything, it will accelerate. So how powerful do you think humanity will become in another thousand years? Powerful enough to destroy the sun? The solar system? The galaxy? What about in ten thousand years? Or a million?""

""...You're worried about a million years into the future?"" she said.

""The foundations we lay now could have consequences that resonate throughout the rest of human civilization,"" said Gohvis. ""And as immortal beings, our responsibility over the future is two-fold. I don't know about you, but I would like to see how it all plays out. This cosmic game we find ourselves in.""

Geez. She wasn't sure she had a response for that.

But still. She pressed her lips together as she tried to reevaluate his words another time. ""...This is a completely different argument to what you said a minute ago. You said growth was a problem because of finite resources, not this.""

""I said it was self-evidently a problem because of finite resources, yes.

Which is still true. Growth demands innovation, and innovation discovers new ways to exploit resources, which can slow the decay; but in the very long term, the finite nature of the world will continue to be a problem that demands a direct solution. And that is what I am most concerned about: the long term."""

"2469

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 2 of 15))~~

Emiliana growled with exasperation and scratched her eyebrow. ""If you're so concerned about humanity's long-term survival, then how can you ally yourself with Abolish? They're actively working against humanity's short-term survival!""

""Mm. The answer to that is more complicated.""

""Oh, is it?! Well, I'm all ears!""

""Part of the answer, I mentioned before. I acknowledge that my solution may be wrong, that it may simply be impossible to achieve the kind of change in human nature that I am looking for. And if that is the case, if I am wrong, then Abolish's solution may be the only thing left that will save the universe from humanity.""

Emiliana put her face in both hands and sighed. Hearing all of this, she didn't know what else she had expected. She wanted to keep arguing, but this was starting to give her a headache.

""And the other part of the answer,"" said Gohvis, ""is that my plan does not require humanity as we know it to survive. It is debatable that mutants should even be considered human in the first place.""

She blinked and looked at him again with incredulity. ""Are you saying that you think Abolish will spare our kind?""

""Oh, of course not,"" said Gohvis. ""If it ever came to that, and only mutants remained, I am sure that the true zealots of Abolish would consider us a final obstacle to the fulfillment of their dream.""

""Then I don't understand. What would you do in that case?""

Gohvis just stared at her for a moment. ""Kill them."" His flat voice sounded so utterly unconcerned by that prospect that Emiliana couldn't help being taken aback a little.

""...You're confident you would be able to?"" she said, fully realizing that she was probably starting to push her luck now.

Gohvis made no response, however."

"2470 -- CCXXXI.

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 3 of 15))~~

Something about the way he was looking at her now made her lose most of her poise. She thought twice about continuing down this avenue of conversation.

Questioning his motivations was one thing. His reasoning. His logic. He was clearly forthcoming with those types of explanations.

But questioning his strength...

Perhaps that was different. The sudden shiver down her spine was telling her that perhaps the ice she was treading on here had become too thin.

And yet.

A part of her still wanted to push onward, anyway. Gohvis would give her a proper warning if she truly said anything out of line, right? Maybe she was just getting inside of her own head.

""I was just saying,"" she tried, ""hypothetically... in the scenario you're talking about, your opponents will have presumably wiped out the entirety of the Vanguard... as well as every other powerful servant in the world... so... how can you so casually say that you would be able to kill people like that?""

Gohvis stood up and began returning the giant ant farm to its previous position in the corner of the room. ""Because the world is on my side,"" he said.

""...What do you mean?"" she asked.

But this time, the Monster of the East truly did not answer her.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-One: 'A heroic welcome...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

The trip to the Lorentian capital of Riverton, P.J. had thankfully gone without further incident. All the way up to their arrival in the city, everyone seemed a bit on edge--and understandably so, Hector thought. After such a chaotic battle, there was a lingering feeling that the Beast of Lorent might not be entirely dead, somehow.

But to the best of their ability, they had made sure that it was."
"2470 -- CCXXXI.

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 3 of 15))~~
Something about the way he was looking at her now made her lose most of her poise. She thought twice about continuing down this avenue of conversation.

Questioning his motivations was one thing. His reasoning. His logic. He was clearly forthcoming with those types of explanations.

But questioning his strength...

Perhaps that was different. The sudden shiver down her spine was telling her that perhaps the ice she was treading on here had become too thin.

And yet.

A part of her still wanted to push onward, anyway. Gohvis would give her a proper warning if she truly said anything out of line, right? Maybe she was just getting inside of her own head.

"I was just saying," she tried, "hypothetically... in the scenario you're talking about, your opponents will have presumably wiped out the entirety of the Vanguard... as well as every other powerful servant in the world... so... how can you so casually say that you would be able to kill people like that?"

Gohvis stood up and began returning the giant ant farm to its previous position in the corner of the room. "Because the world is on my side," he said.

""...What do you mean?"" she asked.

But this time, the Monster of the East truly did not answer her.

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-One: 'A heroic welcome...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The trip to the Lorentian capital of Riverton, P.J. had thankfully gone without further incident. All the way up to their arrival in the city, everyone seemed a bit on edge--and understandably so, Hector thought. After such a chaotic battle, there was a lingering feeling that the Beast of Lorent might not be entirely dead, somehow.

But to the best of their ability, they had made sure that it was."
"2471

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 4 of 15))~~
After Chort's apparent death, all of its spawn had been rendered inert. There was discussion among the reapers about taking some of them captive for study, and Hector could see the logic in doing that. Chort was still a very mysterious entity. Performing an autopsy on it and its spawn was a tempting idea. The things that they might be able to learn from such creatures... Hector couldn't really blame Ernivoc for advocating that course of action.

But he couldn't in good conscience allow it. After having witnessed Chort's history firsthand thanks to Pauline, having seen the horrific experiments that Chort had been subjected to and the terrible consequences that had followed, there was no way in hell that Hector was going to let that same thing happen again. Even if he did trust the Rainlords to not do such fucked up and idiotic experiments, he just didn't think it was worth the risk of bringing something so chaotic and dangerous back to Atreya.

So Chort and its spawn had all been destroyed. With Salvador's assistance, Hector had melted their flesh down into puddles of goo. And then that, too, was gathered up and cooked again, even hotter until it was finally nothing more than ash and vapors.

It had taken quite a while. And the stench. The Lorentians hadn't complained, but Hector was quite certain that they had not enjoyed that long period of miserable waiting.

They did, however, seem relieved once it was all over; and they made sure to thank the young lord from Atreya another time.

From there, it was just a matter of finding a cellphone signal. The vastness of the Imara Forest made that a rather tedious endeavor as well, but Pauline again proved to be a very helpful guide, and soon enough, a military escort arrived from the capital to take them the rest of the way."

"2472

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 5 of 15))~~

As for the reinforcements that the Rainlords back in Warrenhold were sending, Hector was thankfully able to get Garovel to calm them down. With the situation now under control, there was no need for anyone else to show up and make a scene in front of the Lorentians.

With the reinforcements already en route, however, they decided not to simply turn around but to instead go all the way to Riverton, P.J. and link up with everyone in secret.

With the way Secretary Karr and Ambassador Stoutamire were talking, it seemed fairly obvious that Hector would soon be meeting with the Lorentian President and probably several other important political figures.

Mevox expressed concern about the Rainlords being present for this meeting.

'Especially if it's gonna be televised,' the reaper had said.

'What, are you camera shy?' said Voreese.

'Oh, yes. I'm the most withering little wallflower you ever did see. It doesn't have anything to do with the fact that my gigantic, highly-visible buddy over here is also one of the most recognizable Rainlords in the world. I'm not at all worried that the Vanguard might see him standing next to the Atreyan hero over here and think something is fishy.'

'In that case, why the hell did you even come along in the first place? Did you not think that the Lorentians might want to hold some type of award ceremony for this gigantic favor that we were doing for them? Because that just seems like a profound lack of forethought on your part. Or as I like to call it: a severe case of dumbassery.'

'As it so happens, I did think about that possibility. And I also thought about the possibility of something terrible befalling our good friend-- y'know, the one who is graciously hosting us in his home despite how incredibly fucking dangerous it is?'"

"2473

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 6 of 15))~~

'Yeah, yeah,' said Voreese. 'Always with the noble excuses, eh? You sure you weren't just spoiling for a fight?'

Mevox snorted. 'I guess I shouldn't expect you to understand such difficult concepts as ""having your friend's back"" or ""acting honorably."" That would require you to know what camaraderie and integrity actually feel like, wouldn't it?'

'Do they feel anything like having to listen to some loudmouthed douche yammer on self-righteously for ages? Because if so, then I think I'd rather not know.'

'Tell me, Voreese. Are you an insufferable bitch to everyone you meet, or am I just special?'

'Well, you're definitely not special, so it must be the first one.'

'I can believe that. But y'know, when you tell me I'm not special, it kinda makes me think that I am.'

'Oh yeah?'

'Yeah. As in, perhaps the lady doth protest too much, hmm?'

'Hah! And he's a narcissist, too! Talk about putting a shit-flavored cherry on top of a turd sandwich.'

'I'll have you know that I am extremely humble.'

'Oh, my apologies, then. If you say you're humble, then I guess it must be true.'

'No, no, I said EXTREMELY humble. Important difference.'

'If by ""important,"" you mean the exact opposite of that, then yes.'

'Well, if you were paying attention, then the exaggeration would've made it clear to you that I was joking.'

'Yeah, but were you? Just because you joke about your own massive flaws doesn't mean they stop existing.'

'Hmm, I guess you would know all about that, wouldn't you?'

'And what the fuck is that supposed to mean, huh?'

'Oh, just that you're full of horrible characteristics that I wouldn't wish on my worst enemy.'

'Ah, and I bet you've got plenty of enemies to choose from, now don't you?'

'Heh, well, we can't all be as warm and cuddly as you are, my dear.'"
"2474

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 7 of 15))~~

'That's actually true,' said Voreese. 'I'm able to get along with just about anyone, if they give me a fair shake.'

'I'm sure,' said Mevox. 'From what I've seen, you absolutely crush every social interaction you encounter.'

'Hmm, I'm getting the impression that you might not be entirely sincere when you say that.'

'Not at all. It's your best quality. Your ability to obliterate a conversation is matched only by the quaintness of your intellect.'

'Wow. Y'know what, Mevox? Maybe you're right. You're clearly way too smart for me. In fact, the power of your mind is so impressive that I think you might even have the ability to lower people's IQ just by talking to them. I definitely feel stupider every time I hear you say something.'

That one had earned laugh from Mevox.

Their back-and-forth continued throughout the trip, pausing only when one of the non-servants who couldn't hear them said something to Hector or Roman.

The topic of Salvador's recognizability got brought up again, and the other reapers chimed in with their opinions as well, ultimately coming to the conclusion that Salvador, Carlos, and Fidel should all withdraw from Hector's side once they reached the capital and join up with the reinforcements.

The Rainlords were still wearing the iron masks that Hector made for them, but apparently, Mevox thought that it would still be an unnecessary risk if they ended up on television.

'Masks have a way of drawing attention, too,' the reaper said. 'And with Salvador's build, someone in the Vanguard might see the broadcast and put two and two together.'

And considering that Roman also preferred to stay out of the public eye as well, Hector had a feeling that he would be attending this award ceremony--or whatever it was--by himself.

Aside from Matteo Delaguna, he supposed."

"2475

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 8 of 15))~~
Hector wondered if Matteo was ever going to say something to him. What a weird problem. He'd spent so much time with the guy now, and yet he still barely knew anything about him.

Maybe Hector would have to be the one to initiate a conversation.

Agh.

Or maybe not. Even without words, he felt like there was a silent understanding between them. Sort of.

As for Pauline, Hector wasn't too sure what she was going to do now. After that fight, he wanted her to get checked out by a doctor, but how exactly did Sparrows handle that, he wondered?

Plus, while he was stuck in a car, he couldn't sense where she was, anymore. He figured she was probably just following their little convoy toward P.J., but he couldn't be sure. He had a fairly strong feeling that she would want to observe his meeting with the Lorentian president, though. He may not have known her for very long, but it was quite clear that she was the nosy type.

When they arrived at the capital, Hector found himself gawking. Just as expected, it was built right in the middle of the forest, but he still hadn't expected it to be this thoroughly integrated with it. The density of the trees wasn't even that different from the rest of the forest. Hector could see many buildings that had trees growing out of them.

From an architectural standpoint, that seemed like a huge pain in the ass. He supposed the trees could also double as structural support, but that only went so far. The way that they shifted and moved as they grew would also mean that the structural stability of the building would become compromised if it relied on them too greatly. And the holes needed for the trees would definitely make it more complicated to regulate the temperature inside."

"2476

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 9 of 15))~~

It seemed to be quite the common feature here, though. Even many of the skyscrapers had branches protruding out of the sides of them. Some were themselves vaguely tree-shaped. Instead of going straight upward, whole sections of the buildings jutted out like stubby branches.

It was certainly beautiful, but Hector couldn't imagine that maintaining all this stuff was very easy. Clearly, the people of this country valued their trees, but at some point, trees needed to be trimmed down for reasons of safety, didn't they? If drivers couldn't see around the corner of an intersection because the trees there were overgrown, then that seemed like a pretty big problem. Or if a security camera's view was blocked by branches. Not to mention, when all those leaves started falling, how much could that interfere with...?

Hmm. Maybe he was becoming a little too security conscious.

'Oh, hey,' came Garovel's private words. 'I can sense you now.'

Hector blinked. 'Wait, what? You came to Lorent, too?'

'Yep. What, did you think I would let you talk to all those Lorentian politicians without me?'

'I, uh... hmm...'

'Wow. You could try sounding a LITTLE excited that I'm here. I mean, I'm not saying you're being a bad friend or anything, but y'know, it was kind of a long trip, and I think a GOOD friend would be excited to see me, so...'

'Garovel,' laughed Hector. 'Why didn't you just tell me you were coming?'

'It's been a while since I was able to hit you with a surprise. Honestly, this feels a little overdue.'

Hector exhaled another muted laugh through his nose. But then a thought hit him. 'Garovel...'

'Yeah, buddy?'

'You got here kinda fast...'

'Did I?'

'We just arrived in the capital, and you're already here.'

'Oh, hmm. How weird.'

'Yeah...'

'Guess you guys were driving pretty slow, huh?'

'Don't think that's the reason, Garovel.'"

"2477

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 10 of 15))~~

'Why not?' said Garovel. 'It's a perfectly good reason.'

'No, it isn't,' said Hector. 'How did you get here so fast?'

'Okay, well... I may have already been with the reinforcements when they initially left to go help you.'

Hector rubbed his right temple. 'You mean right after I told you that everyone had mysteriously gone missing? When the situation was still super fucking dangerous?'

'I mean, what qualifies as ""super fucking dangerous,"" really? That was just your own interpretation of events, y'know?'

'Yes, the events that I was there for and that you weren't. I'm pretty sure that makes my interpretation more valid than yours, Garovel.'

'Well, now you're just being closed-minded.'

'What the hell were you thinking? There was no reason to take a risk like that. You should've stayed at Warrenhold.'

'Look, I would've kept my distance and provided observational support from afar. I know you think that your new Scarf buddy is better than me, but I can still be helpful in a fight, okay? Can your Scarf provide you with thousands of years of experience and wisdom? I don't think so.'

'Garovel, I don't think the Scarf is better than you.'

'Your brain may say that, but your heart is saying otherwise.'

'Oh, you can read my heart now?'

'Yes. That's also an ability I have.'

'One that you've kept secret from me all this time for no apparent reason.'

'Okay, stop poking holes in my lies. It's really obnoxious.'

'You're right. I'm sorry.'

In the end, Hector supposed it didn't matter all that much, since the situation had been resolved before Garovel could even show up, so he decided to let the issue drop. For now, at least.

According to Garovel, the reinforcements consisted of Dimas Sebolt and Zeff Elroy, along with several lesser known members of Houses Sebolt, Delaguna, and Blackburn."

"2478

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 11 of 15))~~

It was a little weird to imagine, but the forces in Warrenhold must've been getting a bit thin by now. Hector had confidence that as long as Ms. Rogers was there, things would continue to run smoothly, but he was still somewhat uncomfortable with how scattered their fighters were, at the moment.

Which was an absurd notion to even occupy his mind, he realized. The Rainlords were guests. Obviously, they had no obligation to protect Warrenhold specifically. They could go wherever they pleased.

The scenery outside began to change when they passed through a checkpoint, and Hector realized that they had entered a massive estate. There were still trees everywhere, of course, but they were slightly fewer in number now, and he could actually see between them.

Gardeners were tending to said trees, as well as several very long rows of flowering bushes. A large statue of the sun lay straight ahead, marking the apparent entrance of the building behind it.

The vehicle eased to a stop, and Secretary Karr stepped out of the car first with her black-and-white suited bodyguards. She beckoned Hector to follow. ""Welcome to Riverton Hall, Lord Goffe.""

He'd never heard of this place before, but seeing it now, he felt like maybe he should have. It wasn't a castle, but it was still a gorgeous structure, to be sure. It, too, had trees growing out of it, and they were clearly well-maintained.

The tall, triangular windows were a distinguishing feature, Hector thought, as was the black coat of paint. Very uncommon for a political building, assuming that was what this place was. Hell, even just in general, black was rarely used because of how much sunlight it absorbed, making it more difficult to keep a building cool in the summer. Maybe that wasn't an issue for them, though, thanks to the shade from all these trees."

"2479

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 12 of 15))~~It was almost like a biosphere. The trees behind the main building were large enough that their collective canopy created a dome of leaves, allowing the late morning sun to shine through only in sparkling fragments.

The party entered through a pair of enormous double doors, and a large group of sharply dressed attendants were already there waiting for them.

Secretary Karr was moving a bit sluggishly, which was certainly understandable after all they had been through. Her clothes were scuffed and dirtied all over, and most of the feathers that had adorned her red coat were now missing.

She said her farewells and then ventured off with her bodyguards and a couple of newly attached attendants. The other Lorentians were also escorted away, presumably to a place where they could finally get some rest.

Ambassador Stoutamire, however, remained with Hector's group. And he did not stop talking as they all walked together.

"Allow me to serve as a temporary guide," he said. "I imagine you all must be quite tired after such a grueling night. Oh, or perhaps you aren't? Now that I think about it, that wouldn't surprise me. Myself, I am absolutely destroyed. Barely staying on my feet, truth be told. Ah, here we have the western corridor. These rooms are primarily offices, and in them, you will find many meticulous individuals. The type to go through more papers in a single day than I see in a month, searching for discrepancies and the like. Organizing them, too, I'm sure. And ahead are the guest rooms, which I'm sure you are--"

Honestly, Hector was pretty damn exhausted, too. Even after devoting an entire parallel thought process just to listening to Stoutamire, he was finding it difficult to actually pay attention.

It certainly wasn't the most tired he'd ever felt--or even close to it--but still. Right now, a bed sounded like paradise."

"2480

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 13 of 15))~~

The group arrived at a line of ornate doors, and Stoutamire was saying one thing or another about how wonderful these rooms were. The attendants started trying to guide everyone into different ones. The Lorentians in their party were the first to depart, followed by Roman and Voreese.

The Rainlords, however, did not budge.

Salvador, Carlos, Fidel, and Matteo all remained exactly where they were, looking toward Hector with their iron masks on.

A suddenly awkward tension was in the air as Stoutamire and the guides all seemed uncertain as to what was happening.

Hector had a fair idea, though, and Mevox confirmed it for him.

'We ain't leavin' your side, bucko,' the reaper said. 'Not until there are cameras to worry about or until we're sure it's safe here.'

Hmm. Should he tell them to just relax? He doubted there was any real danger here--and even if there was, he'd be more worried about everyone other than himself. Somehow, though, he didn't think that saying as much would convince these guys to leave him alone.

As he was mulling his options over, a new voice arrived from behind him.

""Excuse me, but would you happen to be Lord Goffe of Warrenhold?"" It was a man's voice, somewhat hard and raspy.

Hector turned to see another small group of people.

And an unfamiliar reaper among them.

That sight alone made Hector's posture shift slightly. He might've been tired, but it was time to be fully attentive again.

The same voice spoke up again, and Hector saw that it belonged to the man standing closest to him. ""You must be him, no? Or is that armor you're wearing meant to throw us off?""

Indeed, Hector was still wearing his armor. He'd been receiving a few odd looks because of it, but that wasn't terribly abnormal, and he was mainly just concerned about hiding the light wounds that he'd received from Chort's spawn. There wasn't that much blood, but it would probably still be alarming to anyone who saw him if he dematerialized his armor."

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 14 of 15))~~

Stoutamire interjected before Hector could respond. ""Astute as always, Mr. Zaman. This is our esteemed guest from Atreya."" He turned to Hector. ""And Lord Goffe, this is Ravi Zaman of Palei. He is currently serving as a special advisor to the President, along with one other gentleman named--""

""Let's not spoil this conversation before it even begins by speaking of him,"" said Mr. Zaman. He had quite the enormous scar down the right side of his face, and his eyes were so darkly colored that they just looked like black marbles. He walked right up to Hector and offered him a handshake. ""It is a pleasure to meet you, Lord Goffe.""

Hector saw no reason to be rude. ""Likewise, Mr. Zaman.""

""Ah, please, call me Ravi. I prefer it."" He shot Stoutamire a look. ""Not you, though. You have to keep calling Mr. Zaman.""

Stoutamire merely returned a smile.

Ravi looked over the masked Rainlords next. ""This is quite a group you have here. These are all your followers, hmm?""

Hector didn't much care for that question, but he didn't want to ignore it, either. ""Something like that.""

""Might you tell me their names, as well?"" said Ravi.

Okay, that one, he did want to ignore. ""What kind of advisor are you, exactly?"" he asked instead.

""The foreign affairs kind,"" said Ravi. ""In fact, it was I who advised the President to send ol' Stoutamire to request your help. Quite the persuasive fellow, is he not? I might have gone myself, but alas, my duties keep me here.""

Hector made no response. The questions he most wanted to ask were about the man's apparent reaper, but the small crowd of non-servants around them made him hold his tongue. He supposed the reaper could've been partnered to one of the others in Ravi's entourage, but there was something in the way this guy carried himself that made

Hector doubt that possibility very much.

Somehow, he just seemed like a servant."

"2482

~~((The National Ice Cream Day Special -- page 15 of 15))~~

"In the interest of full disclosure, there is something I should tell you." Ravi held up his hands defensively. "I suspect you will find it alarming, but I assure you, my intentions are entirely peaceful. So please do not attack me. I mean you no harm, nor anyone else here. In fact, my objective as advisor to the President is to help Lorent avoid precisely that type of conflict."

Hmm. Hector just waited.

"I am a member of the Freeman Fellowship," said Ravi. "Which, if you are not already aware, is a sect of Abolish. Among other things."

Hector's eyes widened inside his helmet, and he could sense the Rainlords all shifting behind him.

Ravi seemed to notice their discomfort as well and waited a moment before continuing. "I understand that your country, like many others at the moment, has quite a strained relationship with Abolish. I am not going to try to convince you that you are wrong. I will certainly acknowledge that Abolish has many, many problems."

What the hell? Hector eyed the onlooking Lorentians as he considered how to respond. None of them seemed terribly surprised by this revelation. Did they not know what Abolish was? "...You just admitted to being affiliated with an organization that commits genocide," said Hector.

Ravi frowned and nodded. "I am very aware. And just so it is clear, we fully condemn such actions, as well as any other that is considered a crime against humanity."

Needless to say, Hector was far from convinced.

Ravi scratched his nose and bobbed his head. "Our sect's relationship with much of Abolish is... complicated, to say the least."

Hector was incredulous. "If your intentions really are peaceful like you say, then why don't you just disassociate yourselves from Abolish entirely?""

"2483

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""There are a number of reasons,"" said Ravi. ""For one, our primary objective is to change Abolish from within. Now, I am sure that seems impossible from the outside looking in, so I will just say this: Abolish has existed for over three thousand years. And the Vanguard has been at war with it all that time. At this point, I think an ideological solution may just be the better option.""

Damn. When he put it like that, Hector found it hard to disagree.

Mevox sure didn't, though. 'Hah! That's been tried before, kiddo. Many times.'

Rather than defending himself, Ravi's reaper spoke up for him. 'We are aware of that. But past failure is no reason to give up. And if you know your history, then you will also know that some of those revolutions came quite close to succeeding.'

Mevox laughed. 'Y'know, they say that every revolution needs a bunch of naive fools at its heart, else it will never even get off the ground. Looks like you've got that part covered, at least.'

'We shall take that as a compliment,' said the unnamed reaper.

'Yeah, why wouldn't you? It was meant as one.'

Ravi picked the conversation back up. ""I feel that I must also admit, however, that there are other, less noble-sounding reasons why we maintain our ties to Abolish.""

""Like?"" said Hector.

""The recognition and influence,"" said Ravi. ""Stained though it may be, the name Abolish still allows certain doors to be opened that might otherwise remain closed to us. At times, it is much easier to befriend someone who fears you, than it is to befriend someone who has no idea who you are. I doubt I would have acquired my position as advisor to the President, otherwise.""

Was that really true? Hector wasn't so sure, but maybe that was just because he didn't want it to be. He was still quite new to politics, after all, especially the international kind."

"2484

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))Silence drew out as Hector considered everything he'd just heard. He certainly had more questions about this so-called Freeman Fellowship, but this didn't seem like the appropriate place to ask them. That, and he wasn't even sure where to begin. He would've liked Garovel's input right about now.

Ravi took the opportunity to move on from the subject entirely. ""In any case, allow me to thank you for your wonderful service to this great country. It seemed like this Beast was becoming more and more of a problem with each passing day. It is a relief to know that it has finally been taken care of, and I am sure the citizens of Lorent will be able to sleep easier now."" And he gave a short bow.

This guy sure talked a good game. It made sense that he would be involved in politics, Hector thought.

""I am sure you will be wanting to return to Atreya soon,"" said Ravi, ""but I hope not too soon. You must allow Lorent the time to show you her appreciation in full. Physical rewards are all well and good, but hospitality is important, too. I am sure the President will be asking you to extend your stay here for as long as you like. And if he doesn't, then I shall be recommending that he do so."" Ravi's smile had a mischievous charm to it, perhaps accented by his scar.

Hector still didn't quite know how to respond, though. Was simple politeness appropriate here? It probably was, right?

Mevox interjected again. 'Are there any other servants we should know about while we're here?'

Ravi's reaper hovered around to the man's other shoulder. 'You're quite a straightforward one, aren't you?'

'It's one of my better features, I think. Thanks for noticing. Now are you going to answer my question? Or are you just working your way up to telling me to go fuck myself?'

"2485 -- CCXXXII.

The other reaper's skeletal face did not seem amused by that remark.

Ravi began ushering the other Lorentians away, telling them that he would tend to the guests himself for the time being. His small group of followers, however, remained by his side. None of them appeared to have reapers accompanying, but that was far from conclusive evidence that they weren't servants, Hector knew.

'As it so happens,' the unnamed reaper said, 'there is another. He is the advisor that Stoutamire was about to mention before Ravi interrupted him. You could say that we do not get along.'

'Ah. A case of competing advisors, is it?'

'Something like that, yes. You would do well to be wary of him and his reaper, though I suspect you will not be.'

Hector doubted that part immensely.

'What makes you say that?' said Mevox.

'Because he is of the Vanguard.'

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Two: 'The land of masks...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A significant period of silence arrived.

'...Lemme get this straight,' said Mevox. 'The President of Lorent currently has two different foreign advisors, one of which is a servant of Abolish, and the other, a servant of the Vanguard.'

'That is correct,' said the unnamed reaper.

More silence.

Until Mevox broke it again. 'What a clusterfuck.'

Ravi released a small chortle, though Hector couldn't tell if it was sarcastic or not. "'It certainly has its difficulties. But I think the President appreciates hearing a variety of opinions. He is a wiser man than I first gave him credit for.'"

'You don't have to suck up to your boss,' said Mevox. 'He's not here, right now.'

That made Ravi laugh more strongly, which did sound genuine this time. "'I have not met a reaper with such a sharp tongue in quite some time. Might you be so kind as to tell me your name?'"

'Eh, I'm not really known for my kindness.'"

"2485 -- CCXXXII.

The other reaper's skeletal face did not seem amused by that remark.

Ravi began ushering the other Lorentians away, telling them that he would tend to the guests himself for the time being. His small group of followers, however, remained by his side. None of them appeared to have reapers accompanying, but that was far from conclusive evidence that they weren't servants, Hector knew.

'As it so happens,' the unnamed reaper said, 'there is another. He is the advisor that Stoutamire was about to mention before Ravi interrupted him. You could say that we do not get along.'

'Ah. A case of competing advisors, is it?'

'Something like that, yes. You would do well to be wary of him and his reaper, though I suspect you will not be.'

Hector doubted that part immensely.

'What makes you say that?' said Mevox.

'Because he is of the Vanguard.'

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Two: 'The land of masks...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A significant period of silence arrived.

'...Lemme get this straight,' said Mevox. 'The President of Lorent currently has two different foreign advisors, one of which is a servant of Abolish, and the other, a servant of the Vanguard.'

'That is correct,' said the unnamed reaper.

More silence.

Until Mevox broke it again. 'What a clusterfuck.'

Ravi released a small chortle, though Hector couldn't tell if it was sarcastic or not. ""It certainly has its difficulties. But I think the President appreciates hearing a variety of opinions. He is a wiser man than I first gave him credit for.""

'You don't have to suck up to your boss,' said Mevox. 'He's not here, right now.'

That made Ravi laugh more strongly, which did sound genuine this time. ""I have not met a reaper with such a sharp tongue in quite some time. Might you be so kind as to tell me your name?"

'Eh, I'm not really known for my kindness."

"2486

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""Heh. Somehow, that does not surprise me,"" said Ravi.

'Ooh, ouch,' said Mevox. 'Is that a bit of backbone I spy? If so, I'm glad. It's pretty discouraging how many servants allow us reapers to just walk all over them. Bunch of doormats, the lot of you.'

Ravi's reaper shook his skull. 'Perhaps they realized that the easiest way to deal with exceptionally rude individuals is to simply tell them what they want to hear and then move on with their day.'

'Hoho. Maybe so. But the quickest way to tell if a barrel is empty inside is to kick it, know what I'm sayin'?"

'Not in the slightest.'

'Ah, well. Never you mind your empty little head, then.'

'What?!'

'Hmm? Something wrong?'

It soon became clear that the reapers were not going to stop arguing, so Hector decided to just head into one of the rooms already. Salvador had to drag Mevox along, too.

Ravi joined them but only briefly to wish them a good rest before pulling his own reaper away.

The room was plenty spacious, but it was clearly meant for only one or two guests, since there was only one bed.

The Rainlords chose to stay, anyway. Salvador took the couch, while Carlos and Fidel both sat down by the door.

Hector wanted to just go to sleep immediately, but now that they were all alone with no Lorentians around, he felt like they needed to discuss a few things. Before he could even open his mouth, however, Garovel phased through the wall.

'About time you showed up,' said Mevox. 'How long were you planning to listen to me shit talk that Abolish reaper?'

'Oh, I could've listened to that all day,' said Garovel.

'Eavesdropping is unbecoming for us reapers, you know.'

Garovel snorted. 'Tell any other lies today?'

'Probably. I forget.'

"2487

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Voreese arrived, too, phasing through a different wall. 'Hey, keep it down in here. Roman's trying to sleep, and your conversation is louder than the clapping of your ass cheeks when you walk.'

'There are so many stupid things about what you just said that I don't even know where to begin,' said Mevox.

'Relax, I was just joking,' said Voreese. 'Nothing could be louder than your ass cheeks.'

'Good to see you, too, by the way,' said Garovel.

'Aw, shut up,' said Voreese. 'We saw each other like a day ago.'

'Yeah, and you almost died since then,' said Garovel.

'Pfft, so what?' Her hollow eye sockets widened a little. 'Oh, or are you telling me that absence has made your heart grow fonder?'

'Perhaps if I had a heart.'

'Don't try to play coy now, you big flirt.'

'I fucking hate this conversation,' said Mevox.

'That supposed to be our problem?' said Voreese.

'This is all very entertaining,' came the voice of one of the other three reapers in the room who had thus far remained quiet, 'but we have more pressing matters to discuss, do we not?' That was Olijas, the reaper of Carlos Sebolt.

Hector couldn't remember if he'd even heard the reaper say a single thing since getting pulled here to Lorent. It was a little strange to him when quieter reapers like Olijas and Ernivoc were around. Maybe spending so much time with Garovel made them seem weirder than they actually were, though. And the presence of Mevox and Voreese probably didn't help in that regard, either.

'We're aware,' said Mevox, 'but the walls have ears, as they as they say. These two louts just proved it.'

'So have one of your servants soundproof the room against reapers,' said Olijas. 'You're wasting time.'

'Oh, no!' said Voreese. 'Not time! What will a bunch of immortal beings like us do without more time on our hands?!'

"2488

'Hey, don't make fun of him,' said Mevox. 'He's not wrong, y'know. All you ever do is waste time.'

'Oh, shut the fuck up!' said Voreese, though she was laughing.

Hector exhaled a tired breath and began slowly dematerializing his armor while the reapers continued bickering. As he'd expected, his clothes were torn in several places and spotted with blood. He'd brought some luggage with him for this very reason, but the last time he saw it was in the cargo hold of Roman's chartered airplane. And the last time he saw that airplane, it was in separate pieces.

Oh well. He doubted the Lorentians would mind lending him some new clothes tomorrow.

""Lord Goffe...""

Hector looked up, unsure who had just spoken to him. Ah.

Fidel Blackburn was looking at him from the corner of the room by the door. And the expression on the man's face was one of mild surprise.

Hector didn't know why that was, though. ""What's the matter?""

Garovel answered, instead. 'Ah. You're dead.'

Hector blinked but resisted the urge to say anything else. His normally dark brown skin was looking grayer than usual, and he realized that his chest felt a little odd. His breathing, too, was somehow off.

'That's strange,' said Garovel as his gangly hand found his shoulder. 'Your injuries don't seem that bad.'

The typical vigor didn't surge through him, as his tiredness remained as it was, nor was his strength being enhanced. He could only feel his wounds tightening themselves and closing. There was a stirring in his rib cage as his heart started back up.

How weird. Hector often forgot that the regeneration, the removal of fatigue, and the undead strength were all separate abilities. Garovel usually used them in conjunction with one another, excepting only when the reaper was trying to help him correct his sleep schedule. It was especially rare for the reaper to ever invoke the regeneration without anything else.

And it felt a little strange to realize that he'd been a literal walking corpse this whole time."

"2489

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Salvador had been relaxing lengthwise on the couch, but now he was sitting up at full attention. ""How did you die? Did the Beast get you?""

""...I'm actually not sure,"" said Hector. ""Some of its spawn landed a few hits, but they weren't that bad. Or at least, I didn't think they were.""

""Clearly, they didn't slow you down,"" said Salvador.

'I think I can explain,' said Garovel. 'But first, let's take precautions...' He looked toward Carlos and Fidel by the door.

Fidel seemed to understand and began to coat the entrance in copper, along with the ventilation in the ceiling and the large window on the far end of the room that had previously offered a nice view of the building's inner courtyard. The man pressed his hand against his work, too, and after a few moments, he spoke up again. ""We're reaper-proofed,"" he said.

'Thanks.' Garovel rounded on Hector again. 'Something caused your heart to stop beating, and it doesn't look like it was blood loss. You didn't get struck by lightning, did you?'

Madly, Hector actually had to stop and think about that for a second. ""No... but I did have some close calls with that, I think. And now that you mention it, I'm pretty sure that Pauline got hit by a stray lightning bolt.""

'Oh, right, the Sparrow,' said Mevox. 'Is she still around?'

Hector allowed a beat to pass, half-expecting her to chime in suddenly from wherever she was. When that didn't happen, he tried to explain. ""I believe she is, but she probably can't hear us while the room is protected by soul infusion.""

'Aha,' said Voreese. 'So reaper-proof also means Sparrow-proof, eh? Good to know.'

'Why didn't she talk to us during the car ride here?' said Mevox.

'Maybe because you never shut up,' said Voreese.

'Hmm, maybe. But I seem to recall you being quite the blabbermouth, yourself.'

'Yeah, but people love it when I do it.'

'Really? Would these people happen to exist outside of your own delusions?'

"2490

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Voreese looked like she was more than prepared to keep arguing, but Garovel managed to yank the conversation away from the two of them again.

'Well, in any case, I think Hector's heart was probably stopped by some kind of venom from the Beast's spawn.'

""Hmm."" Hector mulled that possibility over in a background thought process.

Venom, huh? How many other tricks had Chort been concealing? Even now, Hector still didn't really understand how that bastard had managed to teleport everyone around against their will. And it was particularly mysterious, because as far Hector remembered, Chort hadn't used teleportation during the fight at all.

Why was that, he wondered?

Could the auras that Pauline talked about have had something to do with it? Damn. There sure were a lot of things he wanted to talk to her about, but he figured they would be able to wait until after had finally gotten some rest.

Meanwhile, the reapers were discussing Garovel's venom theory among themselves. All of the other servants had taken a few licks from the spawn as well, but none of them had been ""killed"" in the same way because--unlike Hector--all of their reapers had been able to invoke their regeneration in the middle of the fight.

In the end, it didn't seem like any real conclusion was going to be reached, and Hector began to drift off as he listened to the reapers talk. How were they able to do that? Just go on and on, endlessly? They never ran out of energy unless they were wounded, did they?

Mm.

Man, this sleep felt good. Warm darkness. So familiar and soothing. A hot spring for the mind. And the soul, too? Maybe. Why was this so great, he wondered? Sleep never did get old, did it?

...Hmm?

He was asleep now, wasn't he?"

"2491

Hector felt abruptly uncomfortable. Which was especially weird, because the warm darkness was still comfortable, too. Somehow, everything was fine and wrong at the same time.

Was this a dream, then? He never really dreamed much. He'd been that way his whole life. Unless... he just always forgot his dreams the instant he woke up? He supposed that was possible, but...

No, he didn't think so. This wasn't normal. His thoughts were too clear. He may not have dreamed very often, but he did still know what they were like, and this definitely wasn't it. Or maybe this was just a lucid dream? He'd only ever heard of those before. Was this what they were like?

Eh. Hmm...

Well, now what? How much time was passing? Was he just stuck here? Could he wake himself up? Did he want to? Not really. He needed his sleep.

Agh. So confusing. What the hell should he--?

""Young Hector,"" came a familiar voice.

And he stopped. He hadn't even been doing anything, but he stopped. ""Rasalased?""

""Hello.""

""Uh. Hi..."

""You are confused.""

""Yes, I am...""

""That is understandable. I see you have changed again.""

""...I have?""

""Of course. Change is the most natural thing in the world, is it not?""

""Maybe. This doesn't feel very natural, right now, though...""

""Yes, I must agree.""

""...How are we even speaking, right now?""

""A good question.""

""One you don't have an answer for, I take it?""

""Perhaps. Perhaps not.""

""Right...""

""I believe your two blessings of Focus and Domain are interacting with one another. And so you have created this... headspace, so to speak.""

Hector might've blinked if his eyes weren't already closed. ""Wait, what? I did this? I thought it was your doing.""

""No, it was not I.""

""But how could I have...? Uh... I mean, I was just trying to sleep.""

""Not every accomplishment is made intentionally, Young Hector.""

"2492

Hector still had his doubts, quite frankly, but he wasn't about to argue with the Dry God over it. In fact, now that he was thinking about it, he felt like he needed to thank Rasalased before doing anything else. ""Thank you for your guidance before,"" he said. ""Again, I mean. I don't think I could have gotten through to Leo if you hadn't told me what you did.""

""Ah, the sheep. Yes. You are welcome. And I must thank you for rescuing my successor.""

""...You can just call him Asad, you know.""

""Asad? Is that the new Lion's name?""

""What? How could you not know his name already? You know, like, everything.""

""Names... are difficult for me to perceive from afar.""

""They are? Why?""

""A name is not a soul, and a soul is not a name. A brain may regard itself by its name, but a soul does not. A soul's identity is something deeper. More piercing. Illustrative. And truthful. A brain may lie to itself and often does. A soul, however, has no capacity for deceit. It simply is. And names, in some sense, are a part of that deception.""

""Huh... it kinda sounds like you just don't want to perceive their names.""

""Hmm. That may also be true. It matters little.""

Hector supposed he was right. There were plenty of other subjects he wanted to discuss. ""...How much do you know about my current circumstances?""

""You encountered an entity of Chaos,"" said Rasalased.

""Yeah. Chortomo... something or other. Chort. Have you ever seen anything like that before?""

""Perhaps. Or perhaps not.""

Hector wanted to frown. ""Rasalased...""

""You speak of the unreal made real. Have I seen the unreal before? Everyone has. In their mind's eye, if nowhere else.""

""...Okay, but have you ever seen a monster like that in the real world before?""

""I... am not certain. Chaos is, by its very nature, difficult to perceive. I feel as though I have, but the memories may be blended with dreams and nightmares.""

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hmm. Hector was disappointed, but if Rasalased couldn't tell him anything, then that was that. And there were plenty of other subjects to ask about. ""Okay, well, do you know anything about Sparrows? Or auras, maybe?""

""Ah... you speak of the Wrobels. Yes. You are lucky. The one you are traveling with seems trustworthy.""

""Really?"" Wow. If Pauline had Rasalased's approval, then that was no small thing. Hector felt like maybe he should give her more credit than he had been so far.

""I believe so. But take my judgment of her character with a degree of caution. Wrobel souls are more difficult to read than that of our kind. And they are incredibly dangerous creatures.""

""Ah..."" Dang.

""As allies, they would of course be helpful, but you must be cautious. They are, perhaps, the worst of all possible enemies.""

""Uh..."" Hector found that a little hard to believe. ""You really think so? I mean, I wouldn't exactly put them in the same threat level as something like an emperor-level servant or a feldeath.""

""Ah. You may be right. The ones you have met do seem like a mere shadow of the Wrobels that I remember.""

""Wait, they were more powerful in the past?""

""Were they? Yes, I believe they were. Or perhaps yours are merely playing at being weaker than they truly are.""

Now there was a discomforting thought. ""I don't think so,"" said Hector. ""Pauline is one thing, but Hanton Gaolanet had plenty of reason to not hold back against me.""

""Perhaps so.""

""Can you tell me anything about auras?""

""Yes. But this headspace of yours is fading. You will wake soon.""

""Wha? Already? It feels like I just went to sleep.""

""Indeed. So allow me one last word: be wary of pretenders. They are...""

""...Pretenders? What do you mean?""

No response came.

And he could feel the warm darkness shifting. ""Aw, fuck...""
"2494

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Sluggishly, light began to return as Hector's eyes opened. Fog blanketed his thoughts as his consciousness reoriented itself.

'Hey there, buddy,' came an echoing voice.

'Garovel...?'

'That's me.'

Hector sat up in his giant guest bed and rubbed his face. Damn, he hadn't even changed his clothes before going to sleep, and there was still blood on them. ""Uh...""

'Did you have a nice rest?' asked Garovel. 'Was it pleasant? And totally normal? Not different at all? Hmm?'

Hector blinked dully a few times. Obviously, he intended to tell the reaper about meeting Rasalased again, but Garovel's tone was making him curious first. '...Why are you asking?'

'You were talking in your sleep. Well. Mumbling, really.'

'Oh...'

'Yeah. You were kind of weirding everyone out. I thought about waking you up, but then I started to find it funny and decided not to.'

He scratched his chin. 'Ah...'

The Rainlords were all still in the room with him, as were the reapers.

No, wait, Carlos Sebolt and Olijas were missing. Salvador and Matteo were asleep, but Fidel was looking at him.

""Good morning, Lord,"" said Fidel, softly enough to not wake the others.

""Is it morning?"" said Hector, getting out of bed.

""Ah. No. It is evening again.""

Hector nodded. ""Where's Carlos?""

""He went for a walk with Roman and Voreese. I think he intended to meet up with the others, as well."" Fidel stood up and retrieved a stack of clothes from a bureau by the bathroom. He handed them off to Hector. ""Here, Lord. These arrived for you a few hours ago. Gifts from Secretary Karr, according to the attendant who brought them.""

Hector took them and then noticed that Fidel had already changed his own clothes. A sharp suit, not entirely dissimilar to what the man had been wearing before, but certainly lighter in color.

The clothes that he'd been offered also shared the latter feature. Fashion had never really been Hector's forte, but neither were bright colors. He wasn't quite sure how to feel about these, honestly."
"2495

Still, it would've been rude to refuse them, and he didn't really have any other options at the moment, anyway. He entered the bathroom to get changed.

This place, too, was quite extravagant. The Lorentians really seemed to like their wooden beams and vaulted ceilings, and the white tiles below his feet were so polished that he could almost see his reflection in them.

That wasn't really the most desirable trait in a bathroom floor, he felt, but whatever.

The clothes, despite not exactly being to his tastes, were obviously quite well-made. The fabrics were soft to the touch, and the golden buttons seemed like they might actually have been crafted from real gold. The tie, at least, was black, though he wasn't sure how well it went with the bright gray coat. He still had a little trouble tying it, but he managed. He was slowly getting accustomed to wearing these things.

And then there was...

Wait, what was this thing? Some kind of long, silky blue strip of cloth with white fringes? It couldn't be a second tie, right? And it was too big, besides. How was even supposed to wear this?

He decided to be stubborn for a couple more minutes, trying to solve this puzzle himself, before finally asking Garovel for help.

'Oh, that's a sash,' the reaper said privately.

'Oh,' said Hector. 'Uh... really?'

'Why do you sound so surprised? You've never seen a sash before?'

'I mean... probably.'

'In fact, I know you have. Some of the Hun'Kui in the Undercrust were wearing them.'

'Uh... oh yeah. Those didn't look like this, though.'

'Well, yeah. The one you're holding is probably a hundred times more expensive.'

'Ah...'

'Plus, I could be mistaken, but I think that one is specifically for foreign officials. Those are Atreyan colors. That sash's real purpose is probably to help the people around here tell where you're from with just a glance.'

"2496

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector supposed that would make sense. He slipped the sash on and fiddled with it and the Scarf for a while. This thing wasn't inside out, was it? Garovel didn't seem to think so, so it was probably fine.

He had to admit--it was kind of cool. And also very weird. When he exited the bathroom, he realized that Fidel's new clothes didn't include a sash.

Hector almost asked the man why that was directly before thinking better of it and asking Garovel.

'Hector.' The reaper's private voice sounded disappointed with him. 'C'mon. Do you really need me to explain that to you?'

'Uh... I mean...' Well, now he wanted to say no, but frankly, he was even more confused than before.

'As far as Lorent is concerned, they're just your subordinates. That sash is meant to make YOU more distinguished, not them.'

Ah.

Hector didn't like hearing that. These brave men here obviously weren't his subordinates, and they deserved just as much recognition as him, if not more.

But that was impossible, of course. There was a bigger picture to worry about.

He was really starting to hate this whole charade. It seemed like so many things were just falling into his lap, lately. Like nothing he was doing was earned. Everyone was just bending over backwards for him, because for one reason or another, they had no real choice in the matter.

And worse, it felt like nobody but him could see it.

The Rainlords were too nice to say anything, but they must have been profoundly sick of this whole arrangement already. And Garovel--wow. Garovel played it cool in front of others, but Hector could tell that the reaper was taking a certain delight in it all.

Ugh. He had to get his head on straight. This meeting with the President of Lorent was important for Atreya. If he said or did the wrong thing, it would reflect badly on an entire country.

Oh, man."

"2497

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

A group of attendants arrived to check on them, and when they noticed that Hector was awake, they presented him with a blue folder and retreated without another word.

Fidel and the reapers seemed as curious about its contents as Hector was, so he tried to open it for everyone's viewing. As it turned out, there were several papers inside. He handed a couple off to Fidel.

The first few that Hector read were all part of a dinner menu. He wasn't even familiar with half or more of the listed options, but he could already feel his mouth beginning to water. If Riverton Hall was anything like Bosliat Palace, then the food here was probably pretty amazing, wasn't it?

And he was certainly famished.

""Lord,"" said Fidel, handing one of the papers back to him. Hector took it, but Fidel explained what it said for him, anyway. ""They're looking to arrange a time for your meeting with the President.""

Sure enough, Hector saw several times listed in the documents, one of which was this very night.

'Quite accommodating of them,' said Mevox from over Hector's shoulder. 'That's good. I've known more than a few of these political types who were so far up their own ass that they always tried to make everyone else work around their schedule, no matter how important their guests were.'

'I have to agree,' said Garovel. 'This is something that takes more than just money to do right. It speaks well of their consideration for us.'

""Or their fear of us,"" remarked Salvador, who had apparently woken up.

Mevox chuckled lowly. 'Well, that has its uses, too.'

""Don't even start with that,"" said Salvador, rolling his shoulders and breathing deeply.

Hector had a feeling that Mevox would start with that, regardless of what anyone else said, so he intervened with a change of subject.

""What time would you say is best for us, then?""

'Hmm, good question,' said Garovel. 'If we want to hang around P.J. for a few more days and enjoy this hospitality, then there's no real reason to meet the President tonight. But if we're in a rush to get back to Warrenhold, then the sooner the better.'

'I say we take a load off and relax,' said Mevox. 'Surely, after a battle like that, we deserve it.'

""You barely even did anything,"" said Salvador dryly.

'It's not about the quantity of one's contribution, my dear boy, but the quality.'

""Oh, shut up.""

'Maybe you should call the Queen and ask for her input,' said Garovel. 'She might want us to stay longer for political reasons.'

'Oh, good excuse!' said Mevox. 'Yeah, let's do that!'

He heard Salvador sighing, but Hector actually agreed with the reapers on this one. The Queen's opinion was pretty important here, he felt.

They decided to go through the other papers in the folder first, though. One of them was a handwritten letter from the President himself, Hector discovered with widening eyes.

It was quite wordy, but it essentially just seemed to be thanking him for his service to the country.

Wow. He should probably frame this and put it on his wall or something, shouldn't he? That would be the proper thing to do, he supposed.

He honestly wasn't sure that he was going to, though.

The final piece of paper was just a blank checklist with a short passage at the top explaining that the Riverton Hall staff would bring him any item that he wrote down. This, it clarified, would be in addition to the actual reward for killing the Beast of Lorent--which would be formally presented to him by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury.

All in all, it was pretty damn generous."

"2499

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector didn't plan on using the checklist, though. They were basically giving him a free pass to abuse their hospitality, but aside from food and clothing, he didn't really want anything.

'Heh, maybe you should try writing down the Dagger of Amordiin just to see what happens,' said Garovel privately.

Hector knew the reaper was joking, but the thought was honestly a bit tempting. Lorent was a pretty big nation. There was a decent chance that the government here had something like that in its possession without even realizing it.

Really, though, it just made him curious about what manner of reward they were planning to give him. It could be just about anything, he supposed. And maybe he was being greedy or narrow-minded, but he was kinda hoping for the obvious answer.

Money.

A big infusion of cash would be immensely helpful, right now. Warrenhold needed it. The Bank needed it. Sure, his financial situation was looking a lot better than it had a few months ago, but things were still in flux. He couldn't shake the feeling that the whole thing could come crumbling down at any moment with just a bit of bad luck.

Hell, even if the reward money went straight into the Atreyan treasury, he'd be cool with that. Atreya needed it, too, and that would probably help the Bank out tangentially.

As advised, he called the Queen, but she wasn't available. Her personal secretary answered instead and told Hector that Her Majesty would get back to him as soon as she could.

'Not surprising,' said Garovel. 'Busy lady, that Helen. Especially now.'

Yeah. Hector didn't need him to be more specific. Even with all this craziness going on, it was hard to forget that there was still a giant war raging across the continent.

The reapers discussed that very subject while the servants had dinner."

"2500

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The attendants offered to take them to a proper dining location, but the Rainlords preferred the relative privacy of this place. They didn't even take their iron masks off while anyone outside of the group was around.

Roman, Carlos, and Voreese returned in the middle of the meal, and so even more food was ordered. It was like a miniature banquet, if that made any sense. They moved furniture around or just sat on floor so that they could all gather in the middle of the room and eat together.

Salvador, in particular, did not hold back, and Hector felt a little bad for the waiters bringing all this food into their room. The man's gigantesque physique had not been achieved through a lack of eating, apparently. Hector watched him devour half a turkey by himself, along with dozens of other entrees and side dishes.

Hector began to wonder if part of that appetite was supernatural. It would make sense. He'd definitely noticed a difference in himself. After a big fight, he always ate way more than he usually did. And Salvador could no doubt eat more than most people, so maybe the effect on him was amplified even further.

Whatever the case, it was fantastic. Hector ate his fill, and then kept going, anyway. The crab legs were especially difficult to stop eating, he thought, and then the desert afterward with vanilla ice cream and fudge? He thought he might burst once he was finally done.

Thankfully, he didn't have to worry about being too engrossed in his meal to listen to the reapers' discussion regarding the war. They seemed to be the most interested with this news that Lorent had advisors from both Abolish and the Vanguard.

On the one hand, that seemed like a recipe for major conflict brewing in this country, but on the other, perhaps they were balancing each other out. Hector was curious to meet whoever this Vanguardian advisor was, but obviously, such a meeting would be a bit sketchy while the Rainlords were still hanging around.

Which was another of the reapers' concerns."

"2501

The longer they stayed, the more antsy the reapers seemed to become about an accidental encounter with this Vanguardian servant. Whoever it was would have a fair chance of recognizing Salvador, Carlos, or any of the reapers.

And so, after the meal, they decided to depart under the cover of darkness.

It seemed like Fidel Blackburn didn't need to go with them, but he decided to anyway, because they thought that his copper materialization would make it easier to slip away undetected.

Matteo Delaguna, however, remained with Hector as usual while Ernivoc did not. His reaper would be able to instantly warn the other Rainlords of any new dangers that arose around Hector so long as Matteo was with him.

Roman and Voreese decided to stick around, but they were giving the impression that they would soon disappear, too. Roman was less concerned about being recognized by the Vanguard than he was about being caught on camera in Hector's company, and his ability to fly would make it all but trivial for him to escape this place.

The remaining members of the group, having all gotten plenty of sleep during the day, decided to take an impromptu nighttime tour of Riverton Hall.

Hector used the opportunity to finally bring Garovel up to speed on all the crazy things that Chort had told him. Hector was interested in hearing Garovel's opinion, but for the most part, the reaper just listened quietly, apparently wanting to hear it all first. And then, the conversation just kind of bled seamlessly into Pauline and Sparrows and aura and whatever the hell 'geographic resonance' was.

By the time Hector was done, Garovel's open eye sockets were looking a bit wider than usual.

'...Wow,' the reaper said privately. 'I mean, I'm surprised, and yet I'm not.'

'Say what?'

'That all sounds in equal parts absurd and horrible to me, but at the same time, I knew shit must've gotten pretty weird and fucked up when reapers started getting teleported out of the country.'"

"2502

'I was hoping you'd have some useful explanations for me here,' said Hector. The stone path along the eastern edge of Riverton Hall was illuminated with scores of amber lanterns hanging from trees instead of lamp posts. They made for a beautiful view, but seeing as they weren't visibly connected to anything other than the trees, Hector wondered if someone had to light and douse each one individually every single day and night. Surely not, right? Maybe there was some sort of hidden electrical line in the trees or something.

'Well, I suppose there might be a couple things I could talk about,' said Garovel. 'You mentioned the name Lozaro, didn't you?'

'Yeah. You know it?'

'I've only heard it in passing a few times,' the reaper said. 'The first time, though, was over two hundred years ago.'

'Hmm. Don't like the sound of that.'

'Understandable. If this dude was responsible for bringing Chort into the world, then he's probably not one of the most respectable scientists out there.'

'Morgunov is a mad scientist, too, isn't he?'

'The most infamous one, yeah.'

'These two aren't, like, related at all, are they?'

'No idea. It wouldn't surprise me if they knew each other, though. The community of international madmen who are famous for conducting horrible experiments is not that big. Thankfully.'

'Are there any mad scientists that are... y'know, good?'

'Uh. Does Haqq Najir count?'

Hector bobbed his head. 'I dunno, does he?'

'Well, what distinguishes good and evil, really?'

'A question for the ages,' said Hector dryly, not wanting to go down that rabbit hole right now.

And his head turned. He'd had a thought process constantly monitoring the Scarf's input, looking for any sign of a Sparrow among the gently waving trees, and it finally found one nearby. He stopped walking, which made Garovel and the other stop, too.

""There you are, Pauline,"" he said aloud. ""I was starting to get worried.""

A rather long period of silence arrived, however, until a different voice arrived.

'Hello, Lord Goffe,' said Hanton Gaolanet."
"2503

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector pressed his lips together flatly as he realized. ""Ah...""

Judging from the strained looks on everyone else's face, Hanton was allowing them to hear him speak, too.

'I must apologize for any trouble that my daughter may have caused you,' said Hanton.

""Oh,"" said Hector. ""Not at all. She was actually an enormous help in tracking the monster down. Without her... I think we probably would have suffered at least a few casualties.""

'...Truly?' said the Lord Gaolanet. 'You are not merely saying that in order to cover for her?'

That question pulled a laughing breath out of Hector. ""Yeah. It's true."" She may not have contributed to the fight itself, but there was no way he would've found everyone as quickly as he did without her there to guide him.

'I see. Well, that is a relief to hear.'

""Where is she now?"" said Hector.

'I sent her home.'

""How is she doing? Did she seem tired or injured at all?""

'Hmm? She is fine. Why do you ask?'

Hector's eyes narrowed. ""...Did she tell you that she was struck by lightning during the battle?""

'What?!'

Ah.

'No, she did not tell me that!'

""I was afraid of that,"" said Hector. ""She sorta just brushed it off, so she seemed like she was okay, but I don't know much about Wrobel physiology, so--""

'Yes, yes, she should be fine in time, but still--agh, I cannot believe she did not mention that. Now it is no wonder why she did not put up more of a fight when I told her to return home. I would have gone with her, had I known.'

""...Are you sure she'll be okay? Most normal humans can't just brush off a lightning strike like that.""

Hanton was quiet for a moment. 'Our medicinal capabilities may not be a match for the regenerative prowess of servants, but I assure you that they are more than adequate.'

"2504

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Medicinal, was it? Hector was curious enough for elaboration on that point, but Garovel decided to intervene with a more pressing question.

'Since you're here, how much do you know about the political situation in Lorent?' the reaper said.

'Ah, yes,' said Hanton. 'This nation is being pulled in multiple directions, at the moment. The political factions here have been split on a variety of subjects for several years now, but primarily, it all revolves around militarization. Lorent has historically relied very heavily on Intar to help secure its borders, but a growing number of congressional representatives have been arguing that Lorent needs to become more militarily independent.'

'I see,' said Garovel. 'And I suppose the war has only been emphasizing that problem for them.'

'Indeed,' said Hanton. 'I believe that this issue with the so-called Beast of Lorent was unifying them temporarily due to how pressing it was, but now that Lord Goffe has apparently taken care of that problem for them, the divisions will return--and quickly.'

Oh. Great.

'Nice going,' said Voreese flatly. 'What were you guys thinking, saving all those innocent people from mutilation and death? Now a bunch of politicians are going to start arguing again!'

Roman smacked his lips. ""You're right. We can only apologize for our thoughtlessness.""

'I was not trying to blame anyone for anything,' said Hanton. 'I was merely pointing out the facts.'

'And I was merely making an observation,' said Voreese. 'Continue.'

There arrived a sizable pause as Hanton was perhaps considering if she was being serious or not. 'The factions here are numerous, but with the continental war putting pressure on them, I expect some of them will begin compromising and merging in order to gain as much influence in the Lorentian Congress as they can.'

'Were you aware that the Vanguard and Abolish are in this country?' asked Garovel."

"2505

'Yes,' said Hanton. 'It was the main reason why I did not make more of an effort to get involved with Lorentian affairs.'

'If you knew about it beforehand, then we would've at least appreciated a heads up,' said Garovel.

'And when would I have been able to do that for you?' said Hanton. 'This trip of yours materialized quite quickly, and I have been extremely busy.'

'Fine, but you could have sent someone else to tell us in your stead,' said Garovel.

Hanton fell quiet at that. 'You are referring to Pauline.'

'Well, I have not formally met her yet myself, but Hector here has. If not her, then were there not other Sparrows whom you could have sent?'

'Hmph.' A gust of wind caused the trees to briefly tremble as Hanton gave a single, harsh flap of his giant wings. 'You ask too much of me, reaper.'

Garovel didn't back down, though. 'My name is Garovel. And if we are to protect Atreya, then we should not ignore resources that are available to us without extremely good reason. I do not think that having your children serve as messengers for vital intelligence would be unreasonably difficult or dangerous.'

Hanton made no response.

'In fact,' Garovel went on, 'it may even be that their lack of roles to play is precisely what motivated Pauline to come all this way without your permission.'

'Do not presume to know my children,' said Hanton. 'They are not sitting at home doing nothing as you seem to think they are. They already have their roles to play.'

'Good to hear,' said Garovel.

It sounded like the reaper wanted to say more, like he wanted to question whether those roles were the ""correct"" ones, but for whatever reason, Garovel held his nonexistent tongue.

And the silence grew tense again."

"2506

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector abruptly felt like he would have to be the one to get the conversation back on track. ""...Do you know anything specific about the Vanguard and Abolish members who are stationed here? How strong they are? Who they report to?""

'I'm afraid not,' said Hanton. 'But if you don't mind, I shall attempt to use this visit of yours as an opportunity to learn precisely that kind of information.'

Voreese gave a short laugh. 'Don't wanna risk it without someone there to protect you in case things go pear-shaped, eh?'

Hanton allowed a beat to pass. 'Yes. Frankly, that is my exact concern.'

'Heh, well, I can't say I blame you,' said Voreese.

'I should hope not,' said the Sparrow. 'Reapers aren't exactly known for their courage, either.'

'True. And I know it's a convenient excuse, but there's only so much we can do without physical bodies of our own to work with.'

'How droll. In any event, while I may not be able to tell you about the other servants in the country, I can at least tell you about the President, if you are interested.'

'Please do,' said Garovel.

However, Voreese answered first. 'His name is Allen Dance, and he was elected under highly unusual circumstances. His opponent, Clark Griffon was the previous President who was running for a third and final term, and by all accounts, it seemed like Dance was going to be crushed in a landslide. But one day before the final debate was to be held, Griffon dropped out of the race with no explanation.'

Hector blinked. Come to think of it, he thought he remembered hearing about some crazy political stuff like that a few years ago.

'Griffon's party nearly dissolved overnight,' Voreese went on. 'They managed to prop up a last minute replacement for him to debate Dance, but Dance absolutely wiped the floor with him.'"

"2407

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

'You've been following Lorentian politics,' Hanton observed.

'I do it for all of Atreya's neighbors,' said Voreese.

'How long have you been haunting Atreya?' said Hanton.

Voreese paused. 'That supposed to be an insult?'

'Oh, is ""haunting"" not the proper word?' said Hanton. 'I meant no disrespect. I would have asked how long you had been ""living"" there, but that word does not seem appropriate, either.'

'Heh, yeah, well, I guess haunting is fine,' said Voreese.

'We've been known to use that term ourselves occasionally,' added Garovel. 'I think Voreese is just looking for an excuse to get into an argument.'

'Oho! You lookin' to throw down, Gary?'

'Maybe later.'

'Hmph.'

Hanton took hold of the conversation again. 'In any case, as a result of that hectic election, Dance's presidency has been marred by a larger-than-usual amount of distrust among the general public.'

Hector had to ask. ""What's your opinion of him?""

'Mine?' said Hanton. 'Well, going on policy alone, I would say that he is actually not doing a bad job. He has an image for being corrupt, but it seems to me that he has worked hard to regain public trust.'

""If the public thinks he's so corrupt, then why did they vote for him in the first place?"" said Roman.

'The answer to that would depend on whom you ask,' said Hanton. 'His more extreme opponents would tell you that the public did NOT, in fact, vote for him, and that the entire election was rigged.'

""Hmm,"" hummed Roman, ""but I'm not asking them. I'm asking you.""

'Ah. In my view, the public simply viewed him as the better of two bad options. Griffon's replacement was barely even a candidate.'

'Same,' said Voreese. 'I don't think Dance is that bad of a dude. I mean, he might be, but as far I've been able to tell, he hasn't committed any crimes against humanity.'

'I think your standards might be a little too low,' said Garovel."
"2508

'Eh, maybe so,' said Voreese. 'But anything less heinous than that should be left for the living to ponder over, don't you think?'

'Perhaps,' said Garovel, 'but I know a rather large amount of reapers who would disagree with you on that particular point.'

'So do I,' said Voreese.

Hanton cut in. 'And I know even more who would only SAY they agreed with you.'

That left a stinging silence in its wake, until Voreese gave a small chortle. 'You know that many reapers, do you? Because I'm pretty sure I know more of 'em than you.'

Hanton made no response.

'I gotta say, though,' Voreese went on, 'I appreciate you havin' the guts to speak your mind. It's the ones who don't that ya really gotta watch out for. So feel free to talk as much shit as you like while I'm around, Mr. Bird. It's what I live for, in fact.'

""It really is,"" added Roman.

'That is an admirable quality,' said Hanton. 'I think.'

'Thanks.'

'In that vein, please do not call me Mr. Bird again.'

'Aw, c'mon. It's a code name! Since we're in foreign territory! Makes total sense!'

The Lord Gaoalanet just gave a telepathic grumble.

Garovel pushed the conversation onward again. 'So is there anything else we should know about the President?'

'Nothing I would consider terribly urgent,' said Hanton. 'If there were, I--' Hanton cut himself off. 'Someone approaches.'

And indeed, when Hector checked more closely on what the Scarf was telling him, he could sense a lone figure walking briskly toward their group from the direction of the main building. He turned to face the apparent attendant as the man came a stop and gave a hasty bow.

""Lord Goffe. A call for you. Queen Helen of Atreya.""
"2509 -- CCXXXIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Three: 'The Mouth of Atreya...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

At the Queen's behest, Hector ended up spending considerably more time in Lorent than expected. After she heard his version of events so far, she told him that she was sending her best negotiator to meet up with him and that he should hold off on a formal meeting with the President until then. Apparently, it was going to be a few days.

Hector had of course asked for the name of this negotiator, and when she told him, a smile crossed his face.

In the interim while they waited, Hector had to find things to do. Thankfully, it wasn't very hard. He was able to explore the city a bit more and see some of the sights. He still couldn't really get over the fact that there were so many houses with trees growing out of them, but he did have to admit that they were usually quite beautiful, especially the larger ones.

He dined on more Lorentian cuisine, too, of course. Personally, he didn't think it was all that different from Atreyan cuisine, but Garovel pointed out that maybe he was being a bit biased after having tried some of the crazy food in the Undercrust.

And he made sure to meditate as well. He wanted to practice his materialization more, but this didn't quite seem like the time or place for it when there were so many strangers around. He tried out that ""Sto"" technique that Emiliana had mentioned to him, and even thought he got a handle on it.

But he wasn't really sure what to do with it. A so-called ""storage"" state of consciousness. There had to be some way he could use this, he felt. Just because it was designed for mutation users didn't mean that he couldn't take advantage of it at all, right?

Well, maybe not. Nothing was coming to mind, at least. Maybe he could store techniques in there? But in what way, exactly? And more importantly, for what purpose?"

"2509 -- CCXXXIII.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Three: 'The Mouth of Atreya...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

At the Queen's behest, Hector ended up spending considerably more time in Lorent than expected. After she heard his version of events so far, she told him that she was sending her best negotiator to meet up with him and that he should hold off on a formal meeting with the President until then. Apparently, it was going to be a few days.

Hector had of course asked for the name of this negotiator, and when she told him, a smile crossed his face.

In the interim while they waited, Hector had to find things to do. Thankfully, it wasn't very hard. He was able to explore the city a bit more and see some of the sights. He still couldn't really get over the fact that there were so many houses with trees growing out of them, but he did have to admit that they were usually quite beautiful, especially the larger ones.

He dined on more Lorentian cuisine, too, of course. Personally, he didn't think it was all that different from Atreyan cuisine, but Garovel pointed out that maybe he was being a bit biased after having tried some of the crazy food in the Undercrust.

And he made sure to meditate as well. He wanted to practice his materialization more, but this didn't quite seem like the time or place for it when there were so many strangers around. He tried out that ""Sto"" technique that Emiliana had mentioned to him, and even thought he got a handle on it.

But he wasn't really sure what to do with it. A so-called ""storage"" state of consciousness. There had to be some way he could use this, he felt. Just because it was designed for mutation users didn't mean that he couldn't take advantage of it at all, right?

Well, maybe not. Nothing was coming to mind, at least. Maybe he could store techniques in there? But in what way, exactly? And more importantly, for what purpose?"

"2510

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))He spoke to Emiliana through the Shard, and thankfully, her circumstances seemed to be fine, still. With the war going on, he feared that she would somehow get thrown into it, but from the sound of things, nothing had changed for her at all.

It made him wonder if she wasn't even on the Eloan continent, right now. It was pointless to speculate, since he knew that she wouldn't tell him her location. And even if he did figure it out, what in the world would he do with that information? Telling it to Zeff would be tantamount to sending the man to his death.

Or at least, that was what Emiliana was obviously worried about. As time went on, Hector wasn't sure that Zeff would do anything that reckless. The man would have to know that a direct assault on the Monster of the East would be suicide, so he would probably take a different approach, right? Zeff was always lecturing him about making use of appropriate tactics in battle, after all.

Perhaps he'd been thinking too little of his teacher this whole time.

Well, it didn't matter now. There was nothing to be done.

During the downtime, Hanton ""arrived"" at Riverton Hall in his illusory human form, and Hector saw him making the rounds, probably trying to learn more about the current political environment here. He and Hector spoke a few more times.

Hector didn't feel like he'd achieved emergence in the battle with Chort, but... he did feel like something was different. It had to be this aura stuff that Pauline and now Hanton were talking about.

And after discussing it more with Garovel, the two of them came to the conclusion that Hector's own aura must have been the result of the blessing that Malast gave him, Domain."

"2511

It seemed to be the only explanation. They'd been trying to discern what the effects of Domain might be for some time now, so their lack of progress on that front made sense if those effects were all but invisible to them.

They didn't think that was all there was to it, though. From the way the Sparrows--and Chort, for that matter--talked about aura, it sounded like something natural to all life, like souls. And also like souls, it had its levels of intensity and variation. So while Domain was probably responsible for some of the things that Pauline and Hanton described to him, Hector had the feeling that Domain was not itself synonymous with his aura.

Malast's blessing had not granted him the power of aura. It had modified it. The specifics of that modification... were still quite debatable, Hector thought.

All in all, it was really fucking confusing. Had Domain just made his aura more powerful or something? Without knowing how strong his aura was before being granted the blessing, he had no way of figuring that out. And were there going to be other effects?

He sure would've liked to ask Malast about it, though he doubted that asshole would tell him anything. Rasalased might know something, if he could figure out how to talk to him again.

Which was yet another thing on Hector's mind. Rasalased had said his two blessings were ""interacting"" with one another, that they had created that ""headspace.""

Despite sleeping a few more times, Hector had yet to speak to the Dry God again. It had to be possible, though. The timing of it was too suspicious. Right after the battle with Chort, when he'd learned about auras and shit? When it seemed like his might have... changed in some way?

That couldn't be a coincidence, Hector felt. He just had to keep trying."
"2512

More than anything, though, Hector was curious about the apparent ability of Sparrows to look into the past via locations of ""geographic resonance"" or whatever it was. To him, that seemed like an absurdly useful power--especially as it might pertain to treasure hunting.

According to Hanton, such locations were actually quite rare to find, especially without anyone around who was guarding them. Sparrows were known to cherish them, for obvious reasons, but many humans could also sense that they were in some way special, even if they couldn't necessarily discern why.

Hector's hopes of finding more of them and discovering the secrets of history were somewhat dashed upon hearing that, but if nothing else, he was still curious to know what they actually were. What made those locations ""resonate"" more than others?

Hanton said that no one really knew the answer to that for certain. He seemed to believe that were simply a naturally occurring phenomenon, an effect of the planet's own life force spilling out into nature, but he also mentioned a contradictory theory that resonance might be determined by some unknown historical factor related to each location.

Whatever the case, it fascinated him. And it kind of reminded him of the mysterious holes to the Undercrust. Those were also rare, highly valued, and of dubious origin. He might've asked Hanton about them, too, if he wasn't so concerned about keeping the one in Warrenhold a secret for as long as possible. While he did want to fulfill the wishes of Warrenhold's founder and make it a thriving center of trade between the surface and the Undercrust, that goal still seemed like a long ways off.

So until then, all he had was this dreadful feeling that, for one reason or another, that hole would become a really big problem if too many people learned of its existence."

"2513

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

During the wait, Hector was also able to meet the Vanguardian servant and reaper pair that were stationed here. Their names were Carl Rondel and Joviza, and they were about as stiff and formal as could be. Roman and Voreese had departed before that meeting, and despite Garovel's best efforts to lighten the mood of the conversation, the Vanguardians did not appear to loosen up at all.

They didn't express any gratitude to Hector for killing the Beast of Lorent, either. Which was perfectly fine with Hector, honestly, seeing as he'd actually grown a bit exhausted of hearing people praising him about that. He might not have even noticed if Garovel hadn't brought it up after the fact.

'What difference does it make?' said Hector.

'Not much, perhaps,' said Garovel. 'But I do feel it demonstrates a concerning lack of political savvy, if nothing else. That Rondel guy is supposed to be an advisor to the President. It's not very comforting to me when the Abolish advisor is seemingly much more personable than the Vanguardian one.'

Hector found that logic difficult to argue with. Ravi had been pretty polite and charming, which probably went a long way around here. In fact, the more he thought about it, the more Carl and Ravi seemed like complete opposites of one another.

It made him curious to see the two of them interact, but he never saw them together. Maybe he would get to see that either during or after his meeting with the President--which drew close when the wait for the Atreyan negotiator finally ended.

Prince David of House Lumenbel was a man that Hector had come to know fairly well but not seen in quite a while--or what felt like quite a while, at least. Hector was only too happy to have him here now.

Briefly, Hector had thought that the Queen might have changed her mind without telling him and sent Hanton as the negotiator instead, but no, the Sparrow had simply decided to show up in his human form all on his own, citing the reason for his visit to the Lorentians as ""a wonderful coincidence.""

Oddly enough, they seemed to buy it, which made Hector wonder if Hanton was influencing their minds in some way."

"2514

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""Apologies for the protracted delay,"" said Prince David upon seeing Hector and exchanging handshakes and smiles. The latter of his seemed noticeably strained, and the rotund man paused for a heavy sigh. ""My time in Intar has not been nearly as pleasant as it was in my youth.""

Hector locked gazes with David's stout bodyguard as they all walked together toward Hector's room.

The bodyguard returned a knowing nod. That man was one Vito Sebolt, and his reaper, Kerikos, floated alongside him.

Back at the Gala, Prince David had expressed some trepidation regarding his safety while serving as an ambassador to Intar. He'd even gone so far as to ask Hector to accompany him personally, which Hector would have certainly agreed to if not for all his new responsibilities as Lord of Warrenhold at the time.

So instead, Hector sought out the most powerful servant-reaper pair who were still unknown to the wider world. And that had been Vito and Kerikos here. Hector had even sparred with them personally before ultimately asking Lord Dimas to let them accompany Prince David.

This was all before the outbreak of the Second Continental War, however.

""Intar is still at peace, isn't it?"" said Hector.

""Technically, yes, it is,"" said David. ""But there is so much infighting going on right now that it is a madhouse nonetheless. And there was a time, not so long ago, when I was merely happy to not draw too much attention to our humble little nation to the south, but as time went on, I felt that I could not play the role of demure wallflower any longer.""

Hector wasn't sure he understood most of that. So he said so. ""What do you mean?""

The Prince released a tired chuckle. ""I mean, I opened my big mouth and started speaking my mind.""

Hector snorted. ""Is that supposed to surprise me?""
"2515

""Heh, perhaps not,"" said David. ""But as a result, they have begun calling me the Mouth of Atreya. And while a part of me finds that moniker to be actually quite funny, I cannot say that I appreciate the overall impression that it gives people of my character.""

Hector blinked. ""The Mouth of Atreya...? That's, uh...""

""Not very flattering. You can say it.""

""Oh, ah, I mean--it's kinda flattering, though, isn't it? In its own way? They're saying you have a way with words.""

""A generous interpretation if ever there was one.""

They arrived at the room, and Hector showed him in, after which Matteo and Vito followed. Garovel and Kerikos just phased through the wall without waiting for anyone, of course.

The Prince plopped down on the couch with an impressive thud and sighed.

In truth, there was one question that Hector most wanted to ask, and he'd been waiting until they had some privacy in order to do so. ""Has there been any... developments on the matter of Atreya's annexation?""

For a moment, Prince David just stared at him. ""Funny you should mention that.""

Hector cocked an eyebrow, uncertain if he would like whatever he was about to hear. ""Why?""

""My little venture to Intar was only supposed to be for a week or two, at most. But then this annexation offer arrived, which complicated my job greatly. And now, of course, there is the war as well, complicating it further. In fact, for a while, it seemed like the business of annexation had almost been entirely forgotten, as the war tended to overwhelm all other discussions. At that point, only a bit of progress had been made--minor haggling here and there as, in truth, I was simply buying more time for my sister to come to a final decision.

""Oh, and how could I forget? A certain bank opened up at some point in the middle of all that as well. I honestly cannot remember the proper sequence of events now, because to me, it has all been a series of monkey wrenches being thrown continually into the machinery which I, alone, have been attempting to operate.""

Hector just pressed his lips together flatly."

"2516

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

David still wasn't done, though. ""And then, not three days ago, I discover that there has been yet another wrench thrown my way in the form of one Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold receiving international acclaim from the Lorentian government.""

Hector scratched his cheek. ""Ah..."

""You were aware that Intar had previously sent multiple warriors to deal with this monster problem, yes?"" said the Prince.

""Er. Yes..."

""Mmhmm. And so, of course, the fact that you have succeeded where they failed has brought you to the attention of Intar.""

Yeah, Hector had been a little worried about that possibility. Prince David's mildly exasperated tone almost made Hector want to apologize, but he refrained, because he didn't really see how he could have handled the situation differently. Innocent lives had been at stake, and he'd come here with the Queen's approval, so...

David's frustrated expression melted into a smile as quickly as it had appeared, though. ""Intar has sweetened their offer of annexation by a substantial amount.""

Hector blinked. ""They have? I, uh... I kinda thought they would lose interest, what with the war going on.""

""That is what I thought as well,"" said David. ""Especially because my sister's bargaining power has only continued to increase, thanks to your exploits. But apparently, they are not deterred by the rising costs. If anything, they seem more eager than ever.""

""Why?""

""Why, indeed. Only Intar knows what Intar is thinking--and at the moment, even that is debatable."" The Prince broke for a weary laugh. ""But I must say, it does worry me. Perhaps they are thinking that they would like to bring this new Lord of Warrenhold under their command.""

Hector exchanged glances with Garovel, who was still just listening quietly. ""...I doubt that's the reason,"" he said. ""Or if it is, then it's probably not the only one. Intar has plenty of servants already at its disposal. And from what I've heard, Intar has a great relationship with the Vanguard, too, so I can't really imagine that they would have that much use for me.""

"2417

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

""You surprise me, Hector,"" said David. ""You think quite lowly of yourself despite all you have accomplished.""

That wasn't it. Well, okay, maybe it was, partially. But Hector still remembered the conversation that he'd had with the Queen back at the Gala, when Garovel had explained his thoughts regarding why Intar might be interested in acquiring Atreya. Prince David hadn't been present for that conversation; and even if he had been, he wouldn't have been able to hear Garovel, so now Hector was thinking that perhaps he should try to reiterate the reaper's points as best he could.

'Heh,' said Garovel privately. 'You thinkin' about explaining what I told you guys before?'

'Er, yeah. How could you tell?'

'Just a guess, based on the conversational context combined with the sneaky looks you're givin' me. Go on and tell him, then. Don't worry. I'll correct you if you fuck up horribly.'

'Thanks.'

Hector took a seat in a maple wood chair across from the Prince. ""So... we have a suspicion that the reason Intar wants to annex Atreya... is because it wants to prevent Atreya from paying back its debt to Intar's enemies. Specifically, Dozer.""

Prince David's eyes went vacantly down to the coffee table in front of him as he processed that thought. ""I see...""

""And, er, if that's been their motivation this whole time,"" said Hector, ""then it would make sense why the budgetary problems of the war aren't making them change their mind.""

""Because in their eyes, the annexation is part of the war,"" concluded David, rubbing his chin. ""Yes. That may well be the case.""

'Good job,' said Garovel, again privately. 'Now ask him if he's caught wind of Intar offering to annex any other countries.'

Hector did so.

""...As a matter of fact, I have,"" said David. ""Two of our neighbors, Kahm and Rendon, have received offers. And this one is only a rumor, a very dubious one at that, but I have also heard Czacoa has recently been sent an offer as well.""

Hector blinked. ""In the middle of the war with Vantalay?""
"2518

""Yes,"" said David. ""It would be quite absurd, if true. If Czacoa accepted, then Intar would immediately be thrust into the greater continental war, which is what Intar seems to have been trying to avoid this entire time. Such an action goes against all conventional wisdom, at the moment, but...""

""You think the rumor might be true?"" said Hector.

The Prince's expression became strained. ""I am torn on that. I would not have even brought it up if I thought it to be completely baseless. And I do think that Intar's government is currently chaotic enough for such a thing to happen..."

"But?"

The Prince nodded. "But this could also be an instance of information warfare. Even spreading the mere idea that Intar might enter the war... could have a profound impact. I can imagine Czacoa spreading this rumor, if for no other reason than to discourage Vantalay, but the source could of course come from elsewhere. With so many participants in the war, motivations abound."

Interesting. Frankly, Hector hadn't even considered that possibility.

"As for Kahm and Rendon," the Prince continued, "well, those two offers combined with our own do end up painting a rather clear picture of Intar's interest in our region."

That caused a new thought to strike Hector. "Do you think there's something about the land itself that they could want?"

"That is, of course, also a possibility. I think it likely that Intar's interest in us is not driven by a single factor."

"Hmm."

"And lest we forget, there was another group of Abolish instigators working in Rendon at the same time as there were in Atreya, remember? That nation may not have struggled quite so publicly as we did, but if you look at their economic numbers for the last several months, you will see that they were hurt just as badly by that conflict as we were--perhaps more, even, because their recovery does not appear to be going quite as smoothly as ours is.""

"2519

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector had to cock an eyebrow at that last remark. "You think ours is going smoothly?"

"Compared to Rendon's, yes," said David. "Your bank may still be new, but its effects have gone far beyond merely those who have signed up for an account. Word of mouth alone of the Darksteel National Bank has reignited confidence in the economy from foreign investors. Where before, they saw us as rubble to be sifted through and picked clean of whatever valuables might remain, now they are beginning to see us as a potential dark horse.""

He tilted his head. ""A dark horse?""

""Oh, are you unfamiliar? It is a gambling term. In horse racing. When a horse wins unexpectedly, it is a dark horse.""

""...But if they see us as a 'potential' dark horse, then it wouldn't be unexpected, would it?""

""Heh. Perhaps. But all I am saying is that speculation is beginning to turn in our favor, albeit slowly. Foreign investors are taking more risks on our companies, instead of merely trying to buy them on the cheap and scrap them for parts. Which is not to say that we are out of danger, of course, but there is at least now a visible turn and step toward economic stability.""

Hector felt like he understood what the Prince was saying, though he wasn't sure how to respond to it. For his part, he was still quite wary of getting too comfortable with the Bank's progress. On the one hand, he felt like he'd done all he could before leaving for Lorent, but on the other, he expected to hear a bunch of bad news when he returned to Warrenhold. Maybe he was just being cynical, though.

""I must say, however,"" said David, ""it does make one curious about how, precisely, Abolish managed to crash Rendon's economy. From what I have been able to discern, it was not the work of my incarcerated brother.""

"2520

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

It had been quite a while since Hector had thought about Prince Luther. It felt a little strange to know that a man whom he'd never even met was almost entirely responsible for the events that had thrown Atreya into such chaos all those months ago, events that had changed Hector's life in more ways than he could even count. Hell, if not for all the news coverage, Hector might not have even known what the guy looked like.

Truthfully, a part of Hector was curious to meet him, to hear his justifications for his actions. It didn't really matter now, of course, and it wouldn't change anything, but still.

Maybe one day, if he ever found the time, Hector would pay him a visit.

""Do you think that they had saboteurs in their government, too?"" said Hector.

""Probably,"" said David. ""I cannot imagine a scenario in which they accomplished such economic devastation without abusing some type of governing influence. Perhaps I am being small-minded, though. I should have a chat with our ambassador to Rendon soon, I think.""

Hmm. Hector didn't even know who that was, and abruptly, he felt as though he probably should. Considering how close their two nations had come to war, the Queen wouldn't be allowing just anyone to have that position.

Prince David decided to push the conversation onward before Hector thought to ask for elaboration. ""But in any event, we're here to talk about Lorent, not Rendon. And it is already getting quite late in the evening. Why don't you tell me your version of events regarding this Beast you fought?""

Hector did so over dinner. Hector had eaten in the extravagant dining hall a few times by now and was prepared to do so again, but much like the Rainlords, the Prince seemed to prefer the privacy that Hector's room afforded them.

The Prince mostly just listened, and as usual, the man's laidback expression didn't betray much of what he might be thinking or feeling."
"2521

Hector decided to leave out some of the more confusing details, such as auras and Sparrows--and what Sparrows even were for that matter. He was a little torn on keeping that information from the Prince, but it was all rather complicated to delve into, and he didn't really think that David would be comforted by the knowledge that there were giant, invisible birds skulking around who were also capable of screwing with his mind in all sorts of terrifying ways.

Plus, Hanton had already tried to impress upon him the importance of keeping the Sparrows' existence in Atreya a secret. Hector had already made the decision to tell some of his closest allies about them, but if he allowed that circle of awareness to keep expanding, then it would only make things more difficult in the long run, he felt. Not to mention, Hector had an unpleasant feeling that such knowledge might in some way imperil Prince David.

In a background thought process, though, he kept thinking it through. This was someone he didn't want to keep secrets from, no matter how good the reason. He might change his mind, Hector felt.

They stayed up and talked for quite a while longer, catching up on more subjects and simply enjoying each other's company. The Prince spoke more generally about Intar, describing some of its lighter sides to Hector, including its food and entertainment. Hector ended up asking where David had been staying while in Intar, hoping to hear about a castle or two in the region, but sadly, the Prince's answer was a hotel.

The discussion of entertainment, however, bled into a more general one regarding Intarian culture, and the conversation began to turn more serious again.

""I remember you mentioning at the Gala,"" said Hector, ""that there's some kind of big ideological divide in Intar, right now.""
"2522

""Indeed,"" said David. ""Politically, the divide is between the Blue Moon Party and the Grand National Republic Party. Ideologically, it is between pacifism and interventionism. They have other issues dividing them as well, but that is the primary one, and now with the war, it has only been amplified to heights that were previously thought impossible.""

""I see,"" said Hector. ""And have you taken a side?""

""Oh, of course not. Not officially, at least. As a representative of the nation, that would just be asking for trouble.""

""And... unofficially?""

The Prince regarded Hector a moment, then briefly Matteo and Vito as well. ""Well. The party currently in power is the GNRP--or the Grands, as they're often called. The Moons have been making strides, particularly among young people, but their actual degree of influence within the government is... questionable, at the moment."

"The Grands are the interventionists, I take it?"

"Yes. And the Moons are the pacifists."

"So you favor the interventionists, then?"

David bobbed his head. "Favor is a strong word. Ideologically, I can appreciate both sides of the argument. But in the interest of our country, I would say that the Grands are the more valuable allies for us. For now, at least."

"Hmm. And do you think that could change soon?" Hector was mildly more interested in hearing the ideological elements of the argument, but he could appreciate the difficulty of the Prince's position here. And it didn't seem all that relevant, either way, he supposed. Intarian issues were for the Intarians to worry about. Plus, Hector doubted that he would have much to contribute to such a complex-sounding debate, anyway.

"Ah. Whew. Tough question. Could the Moons become a more valuable ally to us? Hypothetically, sure. The political tide is turbulent enough at the moment that I feel like almost anything 'could' happen, but do I think it likely? Not especially. The Grands may be the interventionists, but they aren't advocating for direct involvement in the war, and that seems to be the most pressing issue on the public's mind, right now."

"2523

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector scratched his chin as he thought about that. "I guess it's understandable that the public wouldn't be in favor of war... but, uh..."

Prince David tilted his head. "Hmm?"

Man, he really felt out of his depth here, but he figured that this was a pretty safe environment to be asking potentially stupid questions. Hopefully. "Er. Do the Intarian people think that the war is unjust?"

"Ah," said David with an air of realization. "That... particular point does not often get discussed, perhaps because it would conflict with the prevailing narrative of Intarian neutrality. Not that I blame them. I may not have been back to Atreya since the war broke out, but I highly doubt that our people are any different in this regard.""

Hector nodded.

""The Grands, I suspect, want to intervene more forcefully,"" said David, ""but I think they understand that admitting as much to the general public would be political suicide. The Moons are already arguing--and loudly--that Intar's current contributions to the war effort are too great. They say that even sending aid to allies is unacceptable. Though, I am sure they would choose different words than mine. They argue that the Grands are just trying to 'profiteer off of all the death and destruction.' Which, quite frankly, may hold truth to it, also. War is big business.""

Damn. Now Hector wasn't sure what to think.

""But it is true that the justness of the war is difficult to dispute,"" said David. ""Fighting in defense of so many sovereign lands that have been violently invaded--that's a slam dunk legally and morally, if not politically. Perhaps if the Grands were able to highlight that aspect of the situation more, they could spin the public narrative back in their favor. I don't know how feasible that is in the middle of all this chaos, though.""

"2524

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

What a tough situation, Hector thought. He didn't envy the leaders of Intar right now, nor Prince David here. A new question occurred to him, though. ""Do you know what the Intarian Rainlords are up to?""

Vito and his reaper perked up a little, as did Matteo in Hector's peripheral vision.

""Yes, I was curious about them, too, so I have been trying to keep an eye on their movements,"" said the Prince. ""But it has not been easy. Unlike in Sair, their presence in the government is quite small. They appear to be keeping to themselves. I would have expected their representatives to voice more concern regarding the Calthosi invasion of Sair, but they were noticeably quiet on that front. The issue might not have been brought up at all if the ambassador from Sair had not done so himself."

A briefly awkward silence gripped the room.

David glanced at his bodyguard. "Vito explained to me that... certain relations with the Intarian Rainlords are rather complicated, at the moment, so I did not think it wise to make contact with them."

Vito merely gave a grim nod.

"...Who was the ambassador from Sair?" said Hector.

"I believe it was Lord Hasan Duxan," said Prince David.

Hector blinked. "Did you meet him?"

"I did not." David turned his head slightly. "Should I have?"

Hector shrugged. "I don't know. But I met him while I was in Sair. He's the head of Hahl Duxan and one of the most powerful figures in the country, right now."

"Ah. I must admit, my knowledge of Sairi politicians is comparatively lacking. My brother Meriwether would know them better. Perhaps I will call him soon."

Hector hadn't forgotten. Prince Meriwether was the entire reason he'd gone to Sair in the first place. The man was married to one of the Saqqaf women. Hector remembered their reunion at the airport not feeling particularly warm despite the desert's blistering heat.

"2525

"If Hasan Duxan went to Intar himself," said Hector, "then he must have had a really good reason. The Sandlords have their hands full with the war. I don't think they would want to spare one of their most powerful warriors for a diplomatic mission unless they thought it was extremely important."

"I see..." The Prince touched his bare chin as he eyed Hector intently for a moment. "You seem surprisingly familiar with the Sandlords' thinking."

""Ah... well, I've been keeping in contact with Lord Asad Najir. And I did spend several days sitting in on the meetings of the Golden Council.""

David blinked at him. ""The Golden Council..."

He'd just kind of blurted that out, but now that he thought about it more, that had sounded like a bigger deal than he'd meant for it to. ""Uh. In Moaban. After the attack on Dunehall. It was actually pretty informal. The Sandlords just requested that I show up to the meetings. I didn't participate. Much. Uh..."

Technically, that last meeting had been when he and Garovel invited the Rainlords to Warrenhold. Without asking the Queen's permission.

Okay, maybe it was kind of a big deal. He'd been so busy during those days with trying to help civilians evacuate the city that he hadn't given the matter much thought. Hell, he hadn't even known that the collective group of Sandlord heads was referred to as the Golden Council until Garovel mentioned it.

The Prince was still just sort of staring at him, though.

""...Er, a-anyway, if you get a chance to talk to Lord Duxan when you return, you might wanna take it. That's... all I was trying to say.""

""Very well..." More gears seemed to be turning in the man's head. ""If your assessment is correct, however, then it sounds like Lord Duxan would only have been there to request military assistance from Intar. Nothing else would strike me as important enough, given the timing.""
"2526

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector bobbed his head to the side. ""You're probably right, but... you never know. I've seen a lot of weird stuff over the last few months. Lord Duxan having some other kind of motive for his visit would hardly even make the list.""

""I shall try to keep that in mind,"" said the Prince with a mild laugh.

The conversation didn't last much longer before they finally turned in for the night. They'd scheduled their meeting with the President for tomorrow morning, since Prince David wanted to be back in Intar before nightfall.

It would be a shame to see him off so soon, but Hector had no doubt the man's work there was important, if for no other reason than to keep an eye on what was happening in that country. Intar was one of the three great superpowers of the Eloan continent, the other two being Steccat and Melmoore. If the situation changed there, the consequences would surely be far-reaching.

In the morning, Hector had breakfast together with David and Hanton. They were both exceptionally polite while in each other's company--even more so than when either of them spoke to him individually.

It was kind of uncomfortable, Hector thought. While their words were nice, he got the impression that they were actually quite wary of one another, like they were being careful not to say anything too revealing. Perhaps Hanton was worried about how much Hector had told Prince David about him, and the Prince probably knew of Hanton's reputation as a political enigma.

Hector felt like he should serve as some kind of icebreaker for the two of them, but he honestly had no idea how to go about it.

Which annoyed him. A proper lord would've known what to do. And worse, by the time he thought to consult Garovel for help, everyone was nearly done eating--or nearly done appearing to eat, in Hanton's case."

"2527

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

As a member of the Riverton Hall staff guided them toward the President's office, it gradually became clear to Hector that this was going to be an even bigger occasion than he'd expected. There were more people around than ever, and he occasionally caught glimpses of camera crews through windows or among the crowd.

He'd known that this was going to be televised, of course, but that did little to settle his discomfort now, especially without his armor. He so badly wanted to materialize it again and hide behind it, but there was really no good justification for that.

Or at least, that was what Garovel kept telling him. Maybe the reaper didn't know what he was talking about, though. It's not like Garovel was always right about everything, right?

Agh. He just had to focus. He'd done this sort of thing before. He was more experienced now. He could handle it. Probably.

The President's office was actually quite huge, but it didn't feel that way with all these people crammed into it. Hector immediately spotted Ravi Zaman and Carl Rondel among the onlookers, as their accompanying reapers made them rather easy to notice. Aside from them, he also recognized the faces of Secretary Karr, Ambassador Stoutamire, and several other officials that he had met briefly over the course of his stay here.

Which included the President himself, actually. Allen Dance was a tall man with a black-and-gray beard. His expression had a natural severity to it, not entirely unlike several Rainlords whom Hector could think of.

""On behalf of the Free Nation of Lorent, allow me to thank you for all that you have done for this country, Lord Hector Goffe of Atreya."" And the President offered him a handshake.

Hector took it, of course, but it hardly felt like a normal handshake with all this pomp and circumstance going on around them."

"2528

""I hope the amicable relationship between our two countries will continue indefinitely into the future,"" said President Dance. It wasn't quite a smile that crossed his face, but it might've been an attempt at one.

And.

Uh.

Hector was supposed to say something here. He knew that. He and Garovel had discussed how to handle this meeting at length before going to bed and again while getting ready this morning.

Words. Were needed. Really simple ones, too. So what the fuck were they again?

Uhhh.

Shit.

The cameras were all looking at him.

Standing calmly in front of them was one thing, but actually talking in front of them was another. Now that he was thinking about it, the only time that he'd ever actually spoken in front of a camera was when he had recorded that fake threat video in order to prevent Abolish from destroying the town of Harold. And he was suddenly recalling with perfect clarity how many fucking takes that recording had required.

Agh. Right now, it was all he could do to maintain his composure. He had to do something, though. Quick. Before the moment got too awkward. Or was it already too awkward? With all these parallel thought processes freaking out simultaneously, it was somehow difficult to tell how much time was actually passing here. A few seconds? A few minutes? Definitely not the second one, right? Oh god.

Would a nod suffice? Could he even manage that much? He could, right? He wasn't a fucking baby.

Yeah.

A nod.

He nodded.

And he breathed.

Agh.

Why did that have to be so difficult? Was talking in front of a camera really that different to talking to a person?

He felt like such a dumbass.

The President turned around to his desk, and for a terrible second, Hector thought that he'd fucked everything up, but then the man turned back around again, holding a finely engraved box in both hands.

"2529

Hector didn't know what to expect here. He hadn't been told what the exact reward for killing the Beast of Lorent would be--which seemed a little odd, considering this ceremony was being broadcast live across the country. Prince David had expressed some concern when he'd learned about that fact last night, but there wasn't much to be done about it. Ultimately, they were still just guests here.

So when President Dance pulled back the lid of the box and revealed its contents, Hector did his best to look pleasantly surprised despite having zero idea what he was looking at.

Inside the box, on a faintly blue cushion, lay an object about the size of a dagger. An object that, to Hector's eyes, looked... like a big noodle. It was a pale brown color, nearly white and mildly translucent.

And it was... fuzzy.

Was it some kind of plant?

""Please accept this symbol of our esteem,"" said the President, and he held the box closer.

Hector didn't see much choice but to accept it, but he sure hoped the man was about to explain what the hell this thing was, because asking directly seemed like it might be pretty rude.

""This Root of the Farakano Tree is one of our most sacred items,"" said Dance. ""Few in our nation's history have been given, and of those, you are only the second foreigner to have ever received one. We hope you will cherish it as we will cherish your remarkable service to Lorent.""

Well, when he put it like that, it sure sounded important. Hector nodded another time and tried not to look as lost for words as he felt again.

A sudden round of applause filled the chamber as all the Lorentians began clapping for some reason, including the two servant advisors.

Garovel was peering over Hector's shoulder at the Root. 'Hmm,' he hummed privately. 'I gotta say, I wasn't expecting a big white hairy turd as a gift.'

"2530 -- CCXXXIV.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The rest of the ceremony proceeded normally enough, and thankfully, Hector didn't have to actually talk during it. There were more opportunities for him to do so, of course, but he was able to remain silent through them all without drawing more unwanted attention than he already had.

Afterwards, the camera crews were ushered out of the office by the President's black-suited security guards, and from there, the actual meeting could begin.

Surprisingly, the Lord Gaolanet was the first to speak up once everyone was seated. "'President Dance,'" he said with a stern expression on his illusory face, "'is it your intention to insult the Queen of Atreya with this gift?'"

Dance's own expression was just as steely, however. "'Not at all. There will of course be a monetary reward rendered for Lord Goffe's services as well. However, we did not feel that we should present it before the cameras, especially since we did not know who, exactly, would be the recipient.'"

"'What do you mean by that?'" said Prince David. "'Lord Goffe is obviously the recipient.'"

"'Ah.'" Dance eyed Hector for a moment. "'We thought, perhaps, the Atreyan government would be accepting payment in your stead. Forgive the confusion. We certainly meant no insult.'"

Hmm. This guy wasn't easy to read. But Hector was a little more familiar with Prince David, and with the help of the Scarf, he was able to notice the ever so slight narrowing of the man's eyes before that easy smile returned to his face.

Hanton was the one who spoke up again, though. "'That is not what I was getting at, President Dance. And I think you know that. The Roots of the Farakano Tree are part of an obscure Lorentian tradition that few in Atreya are likely to be aware of, but I highly doubt that you and the people advising you are ignorant of the historical precedence behind what you have just done.'"

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 2 of 24))~~

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Four: 'When compeers doth vie...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The rest of the ceremony proceeded normally enough, and thankfully, Hector didn't have to actually talk during it. There were more opportunities for him to do so, of course, but he was able to remain silent through them all without drawing more unwanted attention than he already had.

Afterwards, the camera crews were ushered out of the office by the President's black-suited security guards, and from there, the actual meeting could begin.

Surprisingly, the Lord Gaolanet was the first to speak up once everyone was seated. ""President Dance,"" he said with a stern expression on his illusory face, ""is it your intention to insult the Queen of Atreya with this gift?""

Dance's own expression was just as steely, however. ""Not at all. There will of course be a monetary reward rendered for Lord Goffe's services as well. However, we did not feel that we should present it before the cameras, especially since we did not know who, exactly, would be the recipient.""

""What do you mean by that?"" said Prince David. ""Lord Goffe is obviously the recipient.""

""Ah."" Dance eyed Hector for a moment. ""We thought, perhaps, the Atreyan government would be accepting payment in your stead. Forgive the confusion. We certainly meant no insult.""

Hmm. This guy wasn't easy to read. But Hector was a little more familiar with Prince David, and with the help of the Scarf, he was able to notice the ever so slight narrowing of the man's eyes before that easy smile returned to his face.

Hanton was the one who spoke up again, though. ""That is not what I was getting at, President Dance. And I think you know that. The Roots of the Farakano Tree are part of an obscure Lorentian tradition that few in Atreya are likely to be aware of, but I highly doubt that you and the people advising you are ignorant of the historical precedence behind what you have just done."""

"2531

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 3 of 24))~~

The whole room went quiet, and Hector waited for elaboration on what Hanton was talking about. Just from the Sparrow's tone alone, it seemed that this was more serious than Hector realized.

The President leaned back in his chair a little. ""I think perhaps you are reading too much into our actions, Lord Hanton. The Root is simply a means of expressing the depth of our gratitude. What you call 'historical precedence,' I would merely refer to as 'historical significance.' I hope it is clear--to you, Lord Goffe, especially--that we did not gift you this cherished item lightly.""

'Okay, Garovel, what the hell are they talking about?' said Hector.

'I honestly don't know,' the reaper said privately from over his shoulder. 'But I'm sure Hanton will explain if you ask him.'

As it turned out, there was no need for that.

""The Roots of the Farakano Tree have rarely ever been gifted to anyone,"" said the Lord Gaolanet, ""but on those occasions, they always doubled as a symbol of land ownership."" He shot Hector a look. ""Lord Goffe, President Dance has just granted you sovereignty over some unknown portion of Lorentian territory.""

Hector's eyes widened, and he looked at the engraved box in his hands again.

'Oooh,' was all Garovel had to say.

""Obviously, this is extremely generous,"" said Hanton. ""My issue is not with the stinginess of the Lorentian government, as the President seemed to be implying. Rather, my issue is that he has granted this land to you, not Atreya. And I do not think the Queen will find this little stunt very amusing.""

""Ah,"" said Prince David. ""I see now. How cunning. And you made a show of the gift on national television, no less. That is quite the bold strategy, Mr. Dance."

"It was no strategy," said the President. "The reward was suited to the accomplishment. Anything less would have been an insult, we felt."

David snorted a laugh. "I do not think my sister will see it that way. In fact, I am quite certain that she will see it as you attempting to poach our dear Lord Goffe from us."

"2532

~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 4 of 24))~

Hector didn't know what to say here, and it didn't particularly help that Garovel was just laughing his ass off at the moment.

"We have no such designs on your Lord of Warrenhold," said President Dance, "but even if we did, 'poaching' would be an incorrect and needlessly inflammatory term, Prince David. We are not forcing anything on him, and Lord Goffe can make his own decisions, no?"

The Prince's big belly trembled as he broke for a chuckle. "So if he were to return the Root, that would be no problem, then? The Lorentian government and general public wouldn't see that as an incredible insult?"

The President folded his arms. "What cause would there be for him to return it? Other than the Atreyan government putting an inordinate amount of pressure on him to do so?"

"As I said, our Queen will not find this amusing," said Hanton.

"And so she will do him an injustice by depriving him of a well-deserved reward?" said the President. "If that is the case, then perhaps your government's relationship with Lord Goffe is not as healthy as it should be."

A tense silence arrived.

'Yikes.' Garovel wasn't laughing, anymore.

Hector felt a bit like the rope in a tug-of-war contest. He should probably say something here, but what?

The President was the one to pick the conversation back up. ""Lord Goffe, if the matter of land ownership is too uncomfortable for you to talk about in this present meeting, might I suggest we postpone and discuss it another time?""

Oh fuck. Lord Hanton and Prince David were both looking at him like they had something they wanted to say but couldn't.

Uhh.

Uhhhhh.

'Ask where this land in question even is,' said Garovel privately.

And Hector hesitated. Should he really do that? Well, it was Garovel saying it, so it probably wasn't a horrible idea, even though it kinda seemed like one...

Agh.

""...What land are you offering me, exactly?"" said Hector."
"2533

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 5 of 24))~~

""Well, seeing as Warrenhold is already so close,"" said President Dance, ""we were thinking that the southern Jagwa territory would be the best suited to you, but there is some room for negotiation if you would prefer a different region.""

""Oh, like the central Nyani territory, perhaps?"" said Prince David.

The President's eyes shifted to David, and his face remained like stone. ""There is some room for negotiation, I said. I should hope it is obvious that certain areas cannot be offered.""

""Don't want to grant him sovereignty of your capital city, huh?"" said David with another laugh. ""And here I thought you were trying to be generous.""

As seemed usual, the President did not look amused.

Hector gave the Prince a look of mild pleading. ""Prince David...""

""My apologies."" He took a deep breath and nodded. ""Perhaps I have let this situation tickle my fancy just a bit too much. In all seriousness, however, I must say that I am quite curious about how you intend for this whole situation to work, precisely. Lorent is not a monarchy, and you are not a king. As far as I understand your system, you do not have the power to grant lordship over land in the same way that our Queen can.""

""Yes,"" said Dance. ""In legal terms, it would not be a 'lordship.' He would not hold the same degree of power over Lorentian citizens as he does over those in Atreya.""

He had power over Atreyan citizens? Come to think of it, Hector had never really bothered to look into the legal definition of 'lordship' in Atreya. Hmm. Maybe he should do that sometime.

""It would simply be 'ownership,'" the President went on. ""We will of course provide the full legal details to you in writing of your rights as a Lorentian land owner. Additionally, since the land in question is so large, there will likely be other regulations that apply to you--and others that may not.""

"2534

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 6 of 24))~~

""So he will still be subject to Lorentian law,"" said Prince David.

""When it applies to him, yes,"" said the President.

""And I assume you intend to grant him full citizenship as well?"" said David.

""Of course,"" said Dance. ""That is a prerequisite for owning land in this country. The process has already been fast-tracked for him and is ready to be completed whenever Lord Goffe wishes to sign the accompanying paperwork.""

""I see,"" said David. ""And would he also have a responsibility to protect any other Lorentian citizens that happen to live on his land?""

The President stared at the Prince for another long moment. ""No. That would be a matter for law enforcement.""

""Mm."" David nodded again and scratched his chin. ""But I suppose you would not have a problem with it if he took such a responsibility upon himself voluntarily, eh?""

""It would be his land. He can do with it as he likes, as long as it is within the confines of the law.""

""Right. And is it only land that you are offering? Or is there also a specific homestead you have in mind? A base of operations, perhaps?""

""That would depend on which region is chosen, but it is negotiable. I am sure that there are many historical buildings that might serve such a function, but if Lord Goffe would prefer an entirely new construction, that could be arranged as well. And I would ask that any further questions regarding the minute details of this reward be saved for a discussion with our Secretary of Agriculture and Land Development. He can provide you with more specific information.""

""Very well."" The Prince looked around the room at the remaining observers. ""He wouldn't happen to be present, would he?""

""He would not,"" said the President. ""However, his office is only a few doors down from mine, and he should be expecting a visit from you after this one, unless you prefer to reschedule.""

""How accommodating of you,"" said David."
"2535

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 7 of 24))~~

""It is not our intention for this gift to feel like a burden in any way,"" said the President. ""Ultimately, that is all that I had hoped to achieve with this meeting here today. If there are any larger questions concerning the nature of the reward, I would be happy to answer them.""

""Thank you,"" said David. ""As it so happens, I have many more that come to mind.""

""As do I,"" said Hanton.

And Hector, for his part, merely continued listening. And as the meeting drew out, Hector had to wonder if the two men sitting next to him were actually on his side in this particular conversation.

--++--++--

Just as the Vantalayans had said, these rings were surprisingly easy to use. The Rainlords still took precautions and decided to practice with them anyway, but Raul felt like he'd gotten the hang of it pretty quick.

Once he understood the way the invisibility functioned, the ring just seemed to respond to his intent. If he wanted to become invisible, he became invisible. If he wanted to see his companions who were also invisible, the ring revealed them.

It was unfortunately still unclear whether or not these rings could reveal the locations of all other invisibility users in the vicinity. If so, then these items could very well prove to be supremely valuable tools in the fight against Abolish, both now and in the foreseeable future. But the reapers all seemed to be concerned that this function might be limited.

They felt there was a high probability that these rings would only work on other, similar rings. As in, perhaps they would only be able to penetrate the invisibility of rings that had been ""harvested"" from the same aberration.

And with that possibility in mind, caution was still the order of the day. At first, this mission had seemed like it might well become trivial with the power of these rings now in their hands, but the Rainlords had suffered too many losses too recently. They were not going to let overconfidence be their downfall here."

"2536

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 8 of 24))~~

The plan, therefore, was to have only one person infiltrate the town of Miro before attempting to send everyone. In the event that it turned out to be some sort of trap, they didn't want to risk them all getting captured at once.

It probably wasn't a trap, though, in all honesty. If it was, then that would mean those Vantalayans had been in on it, and Raul Blackburn really didn't think that they were.

Nonetheless, the reapers wanted to be extra careful. And if it wasn't a trap, then this plan would work out just fine, too.

That was part of the reason why Raul had volunteered for it. The other part was because he still felt responsible for this whole mess in the first place. If he had been more vigilant, then his two brothers wouldn't have been captured. He very much wanted to be the one to go in and free them. Perhaps that would make up for his previous failure, if only slightly.

The others had required some convincing before eventually agreeing to it. The Lady Stroud in particular had seemed quite against letting him shoulder this responsibility, and Raul hadn't been able to tell if it was because she was worried about him or if she just didn't think he was capable of pulling it off. Maybe both.

The reapers ended up overruling her, though. They reasoned that it would be better not to risk one of their strongest warriors on this task.

A bit insulting, perhaps, but not inaccurate, he supposed.

So here he now was, all on his own, sneaking into town behind an invisible shroud. In broad daylight, no less. There was no point in waiting until nightfall again. The cover of darkness didn't really matter if the enemy wouldn't be able to see him, anyway. In fact, it would just make it more difficult for him to find his way around."

"2537

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 9 of 24))~~

The town was still in shambles from their first battle here, the one that had lasted a full twenty-four hours ended in a stalemate. He tried to take note of any new developments, though.

Several buildings were now completely gone, leveled to the ground. That seemed a bit odd, considering the fact that one of the reasons that fight had lasted so long and been such a problem for the Rainlords was because they had deliberately tried to avoid obliterating any buildings. The reapers had been able to sense innocent bystanders within many of them, and the whole point of this operation was to rescue those poor people.

As far as Raul was aware, they had thus far been successful in that aspect of their mission, at least. While some of these squat, little buildings may have gotten punctured a few times accidentally, none of the civilians had actually been killed.

Raul had been proud of that, if not much else here.

But now, looking at these piles of rubble where houses used to stand, he found himself wondering if even that accomplishment had been undone. These civilians might have survived the fight, but they had still been forced to endure the tyranny of those Abolish maniacs for a few more days.

Raul had wanted to believe that these Abolishers wouldn't kill their hostages, their most valuable bargaining chips, but now he wasn't so sure. He hadn't seen any bodies yet, but a part of him was expecting to.

The streets were torn up, missing giant chunks of pavement or simply replaced by craters that made it more difficult to get around. No doubt, that was the point. And as Raul slowly made his way deeper toward the town center, he began to notice tall barricades that had not been there before, either.

Hmm. Perhaps that was where some of the materials from those destroyed homes had gone. To erecting defenses."

"2538

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 10 of 24))~~

Fortunately, there weren't that many barricades, and Raul was able to slip past them easily enough. The only thing he had to worry about was not making any noise. The invisibility couldn't conceal the sound of his footsteps on this wildly uneven ground, so he needed to move very slowly and carefully.

He informed his reaper, Arumoro, of his position. Arumoro was still all the way back in Warrenhold, but he was in communication with the reapers of his two cousins who were here, Dino and Rafael Blackburn. It was bit of a lengthy relay--and somewhat slow, besides--but it worked. Cousin Melchor and the others would be kept apprised of the situation as it developed.

He knew they were all on high alert while they waited for him. He had to check in with Arumoro every two minutes, at least to confirm that he was not dead yet.

Slowly, he made his way toward the largest building in Miro. That was where Abolish seemed to be operating out of, the last time he was here.

He still hadn't seen a single person, though, which was putting him even more on edge than he already was. The streets were empty, and he began taking the opportunity to peer through windows as he passed by each building, yet still he found nothing. Without a doubt, all the non-servants had been rounded up and herded somewhere like cattle.

At length, he reached his destination, the apparent town hall. The building's old wooden beams groaned against the early afternoon wind, and the floorboards made Raul question every single step he took. His pace slowed to even more of a crawl than before.

The first floor appeared to be empty, but there were two more to check and possibly a basement as well."

"2539

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 11 of 24))~~

As Raul made his way upstairs, he began to feel sweat gathering on his brow. And it was not the temperature's fault. Vantalay may have had a tropical climate, but today, the weather was actually quite cool.

No, this was field density. Heightening his discomfort. Testing his nerves.

The enemy was here somewhere.

In all likelihood, his two brothers, Esai and Adan, were currently nothing more than frozen heads, so naturally, Raul was hoping that he would be able to locate them and destroy them so that their reapers might be able to regrow them from scratch back at Warrenhold. And of course, freeing the civilians would be even more of a boon, if he could somehow accomplish that. Perhaps with this ring, it would be possible, though he doubted it.

However, his real objective at the moment was nothing so grandiose as being the heroic rescuer. As much as he might have preferred otherwise, his task now was far more simple and mundane than that. He needed only to confirm that these rings were actually working, that Abolish truly could not sense his presence while he was invisible.

That was the reason he was here alone, after all. Once he accomplished that small feat, it would be safe to alert the others and have everyone else join him here so that they could mount a surprise attack with full force.

And that was why it was such a problem that he couldn't find anyone. The second floor appeared to be just as empty as the first, and he continued up the stairs again, he had a dreadful feeling that the third wasn't going to be any different.

The notion that they might also be using invisibility crossed his mind. This power did originate from their aberrations. But it still seemed unlikely to him. If they had that tool at their disposal, then surely, they would've used it by now instead of enduring this stalemate over the last few days."

"2540

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 12 of 24))~~

Raul had seen Abolish patrolling the town last night through his binoculars, but he supposed that he didn't have confirmation that they were still using this town hall as their headquarters. It would make sense if they had decided to move it.

As far as he knew, there were currently eight Abolishers in Miro. Over the course of their first battle, Raul had been able to commit all of their faces to memory, but the only one whose name he knew was Thaddeus Croll, the so-called Killer of Krohin. That man was clearly the most dangerous, but the others had held their own during the fight, too.

That day had been absolutely insane. The Rainlords and Leo had come into town with full force, not holding anything back. Everyone who could use a hyper-state had been doing so. And at first, it seemed as if Croll's team would be quickly overwhelmed, until Croll himself entered pan-rozum and began repelling both Leo and Cousin Melchor simultaneously.

Even now, Raul wasn't entirely sure how he had done that. Croll's subordinates had assisted him and utilized hyper-states of their own, but even so. He may have witnessed it with his own two eyes, but the whole thing had been confusing beyond belief. A total madhouse.

In pan-rozum, Cousin Melchor's power of mercury transfiguration was like that of a monster. An amorphous beast that splashed down on its opponents and smothered them into submission. That was why they called him Darktide.

And Leo, while he couldn't use a hyper-state and was no doubt trying not to destroy the town he loved, had still been materializing so many things in such rapid succession that it was like watching a storm moving across the battlefield.

And yet somehow, Croll had endured all of that.

With a sword, no less."

"2541

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 13 of 24))~~

Raul had never seen such a thing. The way that Croll's blade had cut through Melchor's liquid body and Leo's flurry of materialized boron--it didn't seem physically possible, quite frankly.

Naturally, Croll's soul must have played a significant role in strengthening his weapon in such a way, but still. That couldn't have been all there was to it, right? Swordsmanship would've been much more common among servants, if that were case.

And of course, Raul had not forgotten the reason why he and his brothers had been sent all the way here to Vantalay in the first place.

To search for a treasure called the Sword of Unso.

It had therefore occurred to him that the Killer of Krohin might have been wielding it. That might've explained the seemingly supernatural nature of the man's swordsmanship.

Cousin Melchor and Leo didn't seem to think so, however. When Raul had voiced that idea after the battle, they both said that such skill was achievable without the aid of a magical artifact.

""You youngins would be surprised what some people can accomplish with raw talent, the right teacher, and a hundred years of practice,"" Leo had said.

It seemed like Leo had meant for that to be encouraging, but after hearing that, Raul had been anything but.

""It does strike me as strange, though,"" Melchor had added, ""that a swordsman of such caliber would be in this region at the same time that we were searching for the Sword of Unso. Somehow, I doubt that's a coincidence.""

On that point, Raul was at least able to agree. If Croll wasn't wielding the Sword, then perhaps he was looking for it.

And after seeing what the man was already capable of, it was terrifying to imagine what he would be able to do if he ever managed to get his hands on it."

"2542

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 14 of 24))~~

Perhaps the most ridiculous thing, however, was the fact that even after twenty-four hours of fighting the man, Croll's other abilities aside from his swordsmanship were still somehow unclear. He didn't appear to be a materialization, destruction, or alteration user, as the wielding of those powers should have been obvious.

That left transfiguration, integration, and mutation, but even after debating the matter for sometime, the reapers couldn't puzzle it out. If it was transfiguration, then he wasn't using it in the normal manner of creating explosive compounds and corrosive acids. If it was integration, that would make sense as to why he was relying so heavily upon his weapon, but there were still minor ways that he could have used integration in combat--theoretically, at least.

And mutation, well. That was usually obvious just by looking at someone, and Croll had the appearance of a very normal human man.

Well... mostly normal.

Those dark eyes were something else. The weight behind the man's gaze felt almost like another blade of its own. Raul never heard him utter a single word, yet Thaddeus Croll's murderous determination still seemed obvious from those eyes alone.

'That is no accident,' Orric had observed. 'I believe that man has something called czort-jasnosc. It has been a very long time since I have seen it.'

""What in the world are you talking about?"" said the Lady Stroud.

'It is a unique form of psychosis,' the reaper said, 'and quite possibly supernatural, as well. It's rare, and I can't claim to know exactly what causes it--or if anything does, for that matter. I have heard speculation that it is simply a natural phenomenon attributed to genetics. But I have also heard that it is something that only happens after someone has murdered countless innocent people.'

"2543

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 15 of 24))~~

'What do you mean when you say it's a ""unique"" form of psychosis?' asked Ezura.

'Specifically, I am referring to the potentially supernatural aspect of it,' said Orric. 'Psychosis is a rather broad term that covers many different conditions, but many psychoses are characterized by delusions and/or hallucinations. Czort-jasnosc--or czorja, as some call it--is distinct in that the things it causes the person to experience... are always incredibly violent and gruesome. Those inflicted with it often believe that they are literally living in Hell--or something like it.'

'Wow,' said Ezura. 'That sounds... horrible. But not exactly supernatural.'

'Ah. Yes, well. The reason for that is because there are many disputed accounts of some of the ""sufferers"" having seen hallucinations that turned out to be real or surprisingly close to real. Some reports have even mentioned ""predictive capabilities that occasionally made it seem like the patient could see into the future.""'

Needless to say, no one had been pleased to hear that.

Certainly, Raul did not want to believe that the Killer of Krohin was capable of such a thing, but the more he thought back to that fight from the other day--and to that penetrating stare--the more he thought it might just be true.

And if it was, then this surprise attack strategy was even more important. While it might be tempting to get discouraged and say that there was no point in attempting an ambush if the enemy could see into the bloody future, Raul was convinced that it might still work.

Especially if they didn't attack Croll first. If they could ambush his subordinates while he wasn't around, then they could isolate him. And from there, they could overwhelm and possibly even capture him or his reaper.

That was the hope, anyway."

"2544

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 16 of 24))~~

With the third floor confirmed to be clear, Raul made his way all the way back down. The basement was his next destination, and it took him a little while to find. The entrance to it was squirreled away behind the kitchen, probably for ease of retrieving food from storage.

The stairs leading down into it were even creakier than the previous ones had been, and Raul again found himself moving at a snail's pace. His foot had to flirt with each step before actually taking it, testing out the wood with light taps, trying to discern if it was going to squeal. The favored tactic was to step near the corners of each step, where the wooden boards intersected and were therefore strongest, but he still wanted to be exceptionally careful here.

If his presence was discovered, there was no telling how many of the hostages might end up dead--either now or later.

The basement was dark but thankfully not pitch black.

Nor was it empty.

The hostages were gathered in the middle of the chamber, tied up and sitting together in apparent silence.

And Raul counted two Abolish guardsmen for them, both fairly close to his position. The basement only had the one entrance, so it made sense that they wouldn't want to stray too far from it.

Neither one of them was Croll, thank god. They weren't looking in his direction, so it was little difficult to tell if they genuinely couldn't see him or if they just hadn't seen him yet.

It was boding well, though. The staircase was rather well lit compared to the rest of the basement, so they most likely should have seen him as he'd descended it.

He moved directly into their lines of sight, just to be sure.

Yes.

They looked straight through him, unfazed.

The invisibility was working just as hoped."
"2545

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 17 of 24))~~

He informed Arumoro immediately. With this, the operation could truly begin. The others had been waiting on word from him for quite a while, and now they could finally move into the town and get into position.

It was his turn to wait. Arumoro kept him apprised of their progress.

He used the time to reevaluate his situation. This basement floor was comprised of one large room with three smaller ones attached to it. Two storage rooms and one small office.

He would've liked to lure one of the Abolishers into one of those smaller rooms in order to isolate and ambush him without alerting the other, but that might've been too much to ask for.

The hostages, for their part, were utterly silent. They were not gagged, but their dirty faces, ragged clothes, and downcast eyes all painted a clear enough picture for Raul of what these people had been through.

Were these all of them, though? No. By his count, there should have been twenty or so more.

And these two Abolishers. He may not have known their names, but after that first battle, he certainly recognized their faces. They wore matching uniforms, both about as dirtied and torn as Raul's more casual clothing. They both carried a sidearm, though he only recalled the short one using his. The taller one was a materializer of a silvery metal. The reapers suspected it was zinc, but they acknowledged that there were simply too many other elements that fit that description to be sure.

Not that the element mattered too much for Raul. Being an alteration user, he thankfully didn't have to be terribly concerned about unexpected chemical reactions suddenly turning the tide of battle for or against him.

Most of the time, anyway.

Judging from the skill that the man had displayed previously, he was probably at least twenty years old as a servant. Which was a problem, of course, so Raul wanted to take him out first, though he was still going over options for potentially eliminating them both at once."

"2546

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 18 of 24))~~

Raul's power over friction allowed for quite a large amount of versatility, and the elder servants in his family had frequently told him and his brothers that it might just become one of the strongest abilities in the world, one day.

For the longest time, he didn't believe them in the slightest, but recently, he'd begun to see what they were talking about. Just a little.

Because in one form or another, friction was in everything. Air resistance was a type of friction. Even the internal structure of many physical objects was held together by friction. That was why he could dig his fingers into a solid rock wall as easily as if it were a bowl of pudding and pull out a baseball-sized chunk. That was why he could shear off the side of a hill as cleanly as a hot knife through butter.

But friction could also be finicky and weird. Moving objects--like living bodies, for instance--were always fluctuating and oftentimes had a fluidity to them that made them surprisingly difficult to manipulate. Not impossible, perhaps, but difficult nonetheless. And he was still trying to hone that aspect of his power.

The idea that he might one day be able to simply separate a servant's head from their neck at range, with little more than a snap of his fingers... certainly, that seemed quite potent, indeed. However, that particular use of his power was still out of reach, and he had a suspicion that it always would remain so. Even if he could figure that trick out, there was still the matter of passive soul defenses to overcome, and sufficiently aged servants would have that in spades.

Separating their head from their neck up close, however, was still doable. He had discovered quite young that, like most servant abilities, his power was significantly more potent when harnessed nearer to his own body--at the tips of his fingers, for example."

"2547

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 19 of 24))~~

Raul closed the gap between him and the taller Abolisher, but he didn't want to get too close just yet. While he now had a fair amount of faith in the invisibility power of this bone ring on his finger, a part of him still worried that perhaps the man would be able to sense his presence in some other, subtler way.

Smell, for one. Raul hadn't bathed in days. It would be pretty goddamn embarrassing if he botched the mission because of his body odor.

And maybe he was just being superstitious, but he felt like there might be something that he didn't quite understand about presence detection. He'd heard the rumors among the Rainlords back in Warrenhold. The ones about Lord Goffe. They said it was like he had eyes in the back of his head, even when his reaper wasn't around.

Raul remembered asking Melchor about it, too, and the man had just smiled at him like he knew something but couldn't tell him.

So Raul wanted to be careful here, as ever. He didn't have Arumoro to heal his wounds or grant him superhuman strength, but he was confident that he could take both of these Abolishers if he just made the right decisions. Tall one first, short one second.

And he bided his time, waiting for word from Arumoro that the others were in position. It took a long time. The two Abolishers alternated between sitting in a corner chair and pacing across the room, observing the hostages. They were probably waiting on word from their reapers, too, Raul figured.

Then it came. Confirmation.

'On zero,' said Arumoro. 'Five... Four... Three...'

Raul's heart was racing, and his palms were clammy. He tried not to shift his feet in anticipation, because the sound of his shoes scraping against the stony basement floor would be too loud at this range.

'Two... One...'

The taller Abolisher's head perked up suddenly. He didn't look at Raul, but it was enough to cause confusion.

'Zero! Go!'

From a crouched position and still invisible, Raul bounded on the guy, going straight for the neck with his left hand."

"2548

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 20 of 24))~~

The fingers dug into the man's flesh but caught halfway. And though that might've been enough to kill a normal person, it was barely enough to even slow a servant down.

The tall man growled in agony and gurgled blood up from his mouth, but his reaction was still quick. Silver metal coated the majority of his body in an instant, making it immediately more difficult for Raul to complete his intended task.

They both hit the ground in a messy heap. The shorter man was alerted, but with Raul still being invisible, he must not have been able to tell what exactly was happening or how to attack, because he just sort of stood there, watching with apparent confusion.

The silvery metal lashed out haphazardly with materialization, searching for Raul's hidden flesh, and Raul knew that he couldn't afford to let it hit him, even by accident. So he resorted to one of his most favored tactics.

A massive increase in air resistance all around his body, like an invisible cocoon.

The reason it was one of his most favored was because he had been able to hone it enough to stop even bullets in midair.

Unfortunately, it wasn't yet perfected. At his current skill level, the caliber of the firearm and travel speed of the bullet still mattered greatly, but here and now, he wasn't dealing with high-powered rifles. The wild flailing of blind materialization was no trouble by comparison. Scraps of metal appeared all around the two of them on the ground, scratching the floor and wall, toppling boxes and furniture, and flying through the air--until they came within Raul's range. Then they got stuck like pins in an invisible cushion."

"2549

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 21 of 24))~~

With his attention divided between guarding himself against the materialized flurry and trying to take off the enemy's head, Raul struggled to maintain his focus. His fingers were still stuck in the tall man's neck. He just had force them the rest of the way through.

He could feel the bone in the way. Blood was gushing everywhere now, splattering over the aberration ""shadow"" that granted him his invisibility. If it wasn't already obvious to the other Abolisher what was happening, it would be soon.

Raul forced his left hand deeper, and he felt the bone give. Whether that was the result of his ability or simply brute force, even he wasn't quite sure, but the head came off all the same, and then Raul was scrambling to get back on his feet. It didn't help that the floor was slick with blood.

So he fixed that. And he got his footing back instantly.

He was still covered in blood himself, though, and therefore not particularly invisible anymore. The other Abolisher had already drawn his sidearm.

Aberration shadows were supposed to be quite good at blocking purely physical attacks, but Raul didn't have the luxury of mulling his decision over, nor would there have been any logic in taking that risk.

His right hand became a fist, and he reached for the absolute limit of that which he was capable. He needed to maximize the air resistance in front of him if he was going to have any hope of stopping bullets.

The piercing crack of the gun firing came so quickly and repeatedly that, at first, Raul couldn't even tell if he'd been fast enough. But when the bullets started pelting his chest harmlessly, having been slowed down to the speed of spitballs, he was able to exhale a relieved breath."

"2550

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 22 of 24))~~

The shorter man scowled at the sight of what had just happened, and he holstered his gun again. His posture straightened, and he looked like he was about to say something until the ground began to shake.

Trails of dust shook loose from the basement's ceiling. The old building groaned and cracked. Raul's breathing paused as he waited for the trembling to subside, and thankfully, it did.

He was reasonably certain that the fighting elsewhere in the town had caused that just now. Faint popping sounds arrived as well, probably from explosions in the distance. They must have been pretty loud if they were making it all the way down here.

But Arumoro wasn't informing him that anyone needed his help just yet, so Raul tried not to worry. He still had one more opponent to focus on.

And the other man was taking his time, too, perhaps to consult with his reaper and assess the situation.

Raul took the opening not to attack but instead to undo the invisibility-inducing shadow from the ring. The blood that had been splattered across it suddenly had nothing to hold onto and dropped in midair, splashing around him. Some of it got on his clothes, but that was fine, because he immediately resummoned the shadow. He made sure to engulf the severed head under his arm as well, carrying it like a football.

The remaining Abolisher sighed and muttered something in Valgan.

Then he drew his weapon again and blew his own brains out.

Raul just blinked and stared.

It took more than one bullet. The undead man had to unload the rest of the magazine into his head before his body finally went limp, and he dropped to the ground in a bloody heap.

Wide-eyed, Raul needed a few moments to process what had just happened."

"2551 -- CCXXXV.

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 23 of 24))~~
Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Five: 'O, twisted Mover...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'Please tell me you are done with this nonsense,' said Bool privately.

""It's not nonsense,"" said Morgunov. ""It's a great humanitarian effort. This could change the world for the better if I decide to mass produce it.""

'Setting aside the first absurdity you uttered--how, pray tell, would a vending machine be able to change the world?'

""Because! It'll feed people! While also imparting a valuable life lesson that everyone should understand!""

'Which is?'

""That pain is incredibly valuable.""

The truth was, he was nearly done. When it came to machinery, he didn't usually need very long unless it was something truly cutting edge. It had only taken him a couple hours to jury-rig the thing to his liking. He'd actually spent most of his time trying to decide on what the appropriate prices for each product should be.

A slap to the face for a pack of gum seemed fair, as did a boxing of the ears for a bag of chips and a purple nurple for a candy bar. He wondered if anyone would go for the bag of mini-donuts, though. Maybe a needle in the eye was too much to ask.

Eh, oh well.

The real problem was that servants with strong enough passive soul defenses would be able to just shrug all this stuff off. The longer he'd spent on this thing, the more he'd realized that he really wanted to make a version that could assess the buyer's soul power and adapt accordingly in order to ensure that they experienced the optimal degree of pain.

But that would obviously be a much more involving project. He'd have to invent a mechanism that could analyze soul power, and as far as he was aware, there was no modern technology that could accomplish that.

Dang, that sounded like fun."
"2551 -- CCXXXV.

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 23 of 24))~~
Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Five: 'O, twisted Mover...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'Please tell me you are done with this nonsense,' said Bool privately.

""It's not nonsense,"" said Morgunov. ""It's a great humanitarian effort. This could change the world for the better if I decide to mass produce it.""

'Setting aside the first absurdity you uttered--how, pray tell, would a vending machine be able to change the world?'

""Because! It'll feed people! While also imparting a valuable life lesson that everyone should understand!""

'Which is?'

""That pain is incredibly valuable.""

The truth was, he was nearly done. When it came to machinery, he didn't usually need very long unless it was something truly cutting edge. It had only taken him a couple hours to jury-rig the thing to his liking. He'd actually spent most of his time trying to decide on what the appropriate prices for each product should be.

A slap to the face for a pack of gum seemed fair, as did a boxing of the ears for a bag of chips and a purple purple for a candy bar. He wondered if anyone would go for the bag of mini-donuts, though. Maybe a needle in the eye was too much to ask.

Eh, oh well.

The real problem was that servants with strong enough passive soul defenses would be able to just shrug all this stuff off. The longer he'd spent on this thing, the more he'd realized that he really wanted to make a version that could assess the buyer's soul power and adapt accordingly in order to ensure that they experienced the optimal degree of pain.

But that would obviously be a much more involving project. He'd have to invent a mechanism that could analyze soul power, and as far as he was aware, there was no modern technology that could accomplish that.

Dang, that sounded like fun."

"2552

~~((National Senior Citizens Day -- page 24 of 24))~~

'You realize that you're holding back our entire operation while you waste time fiddling with this thing, don't you?' said Bool.

""Eh, it's just another day of sieging,"" said Morgunov, rubbing his chin. A fresh shave always made him feel like a million sparks. Hmm, was that still a modern currency? Didn't matter. ""The boys can handle it, I'm sure.""

'It would go a lot faster if you lent a hand yourself.'

""How will they ever learn to stand on their own two feet, then?""

'They won't. That's the point. We WANT them to remain reliant on us.'

""Hmm, that seems a little selfish of us.""

'Could you please stop talking aloud? Someone will overhear.'

It was true that there were many in their encampment now. When Morgunov had sent the call out to gather his forces, he hadn't quite expected this many to respond. How much had Abolish grown while he wasn't looking? Was this Jercash's doing? Probably.

All the attention had been rather nice, at first. It had felt like years since he'd been out in public and interacted with anyone.

Wait. Had it been years? Oh, maybe it had.

In any case, he'd been able to enjoy himself for a time. Meeting all the eager young folks, seeing that starry look in their eyes as so many of them laid eyes on him for the first time. It was no wonder why so many of his peers had gotten such a big ego over the years. So many of these youngins treated him like some sort of messiah, come to cleanse the land and show them a rollicking good time in the process.

Which wasn't inaccurate, he supposed. But still. No sense in getting a big head about it. Anyone could've orchestrated this war. In this political climate? And all the resources at his disposal? All the eager participants?

Child's play, as far as war games went."
"2553

It wouldn't be easy going forward, though. Kicking the hornet's nest wasn't the hard part. Getting away with it was.

He felt like this plan was pretty good, especially considering he'd only come up with it in about a day, but there was no telling what the future might hold.

At least, in the long-term.

The Vannies had obviously gotten all hot and bothered over all these fights breaking out simultaneously, but heck, they probably enjoyed having some real problems to deal with for a change. No doubt, they would've protested until the sun went down if someone were to say that to their faces, but there was no doubt in Morgunov's mind that they were just as sick as his boys were of this endless staring contest between the two of them.

Someone had to make something happen. Just a quaint little push.

And bam. Second Continental War.

It was a bit more than he'd bargained for, honestly. Old as he was, the actual depth of cultural strife between nations still managed to surprise him, sometimes. This one seemed like it might last for a good while.

His real objective, though, wasn't the war. That was just a useful distraction. Unfortunately, these days, he was far too famous to be traipsing around wherever he pleased. Sure, he had various means of stealthily entering or exiting countries--even ones hostile to him--but at the end of the day, this wasn't just about touring the world for funsies. If he was going to find his pet ""god,"" then he would have to ruffle more than a few feathers in the process.

Which was why he was here in Calthos.

The recent events in this place were quite convenient for him. Apparently, the Rainlords of Sair had been run out by the Vanguard, and his own boys had already been harassing the Sandlords for a while, weakening them."

"2554

To compensate, the Vanguard's presence here was now stronger than most other regions, but Morgunov was reasonably sure that they weren't expecting him to show up.

Benefits of being regarded as a madman.

Even if they had spies informing them of his movements, he had enough double agents on his side to run interference. They wouldn't know who to trust--or even if the misinformation being provided was intentional or not.

Psyops were a fun hobby. He was glad he'd gotten into it at such a young age. There weren't many thrills greater than that of swaying an entire country into doing his bidding without realizing it.

Historically, though, that was one of the big reasons why Sair was always such a problem. The Sairi were more difficult to manipulate than most, doubtless because their servant population was also their ruling class. It afforded them a level of cultural rigidity that was virtually unmatched.

Eheh. What a weird little experiment of a country. Even today, he still recalled how surprised he'd been when he heard that a bunch of Rainlords and Sandlords were getting together in order to jointly rule a newly formed nation. No one thought it would last, including him. Maybe even including them.

Yet here it was, two hundred years later.

Morgunov admired the accomplishment.

Wasn't looking too good for them at the moment, of course, but even so, Morgunov had to admit that a small part of him hoped that Sair would survive this whole thing.

Ehehe. If they pulled that off, then they would certainly deserve it.

Ooh, or maybe their little god buddy would rustle up a miracle for them. Wouldn't that be something?

Rasalased, the so-called Dry God, was of course not one of the Primordial gods that Morgunov was chiefly interested in, but he still felt like he would've been a fool to let this opportunity pass him by. Wasn't often that this region of the continent became this unstable. And heck, maybe the ol' Raw Salad would be able to help him capture one of those slippery little buggers."

"2555

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Oh, and he supposed he should try to free Ivan while he was at it. If he could be bothered. In a way, Ivan's capture was also somewhat fortunate, because the Vanguard and the Sandlords no doubt believed that he was Abolish's true objective in this campaign.

Plus, there were plenty of eager youngins who were hoping to be the one who found Ivan's head. It would be a pretty good way to earn some reputation, after all.

Eheh. The Void only knew how many young Abolishers were aiming to take advantage of this war in order to boost their fragile, piddling egos.

Good on them. The world needed more passion like that. And besides, Jercash always seemed to enjoy promoting the little dumplings.

Ah, Jercash. He hadn't been too pleased when he found out what Morgunov had done, but as much as that guy liked to protest, he'd been adapting to the war just fine. Better than fine, from the sound of it. He already had Hoss on the ropes, and the Vanguard had been forced to divert quite a significant chunk of their manpower just to keep him at bay. Kane, Grant, and Carson had all supposedly been dispatched to that region.

This would be the first real test for the sly boy in quite some time. Even for Morgunov, fending off three marshals at once wouldn't be easy.

But if Jercash really intended to lead Abolish on his own, one day, then he'd have to step up sooner or later.

Might as well be sooner.

Eheh.

As for the remaining marshals, that still left Sanko, Lamont, Jackson, and Graves. Lamont was here. Jackson was supposedly in Melmoore. Graves was supposedly in Vantalay. And Sanko was supposedly still in Korgum.

Morgunov was of course keenly aware that any of those could change at any time, especially once he revealed himself on the battlefield. And he probably wouldn't get much warning, either."

"2556

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

He was particularly skeptical of any intel he received regarding the current whereabouts of Jackson. After slaying both Gunther and Dunhouser and apparently achieving emergence in the process, that one was obviously the Vanguard's new golden boy.

It therefore struck Morgunov as rather strange that Jackson would be in Melmoore, of all places. Sure, the fighting currently going on there was said to be quite grisly, but none of Abolish's top figures were there, right now.

It seemed much more likely that, instead, Jackson was doing the very same thing that Sermung, Dozer, and Morgunov were doing.

Waiting.

When one of them made the first move, the others would then make theirs.

He might've also included Sai-hee on that list, but frankly, she was always waiting for someone else to make a move. And Morgunov had deliberately left her territory out of this. If she intended to involve herself in the war, then she would have to take action without direct provocation, which she almost never did.

Eheh. It sure would've been neat if she decided to do something, though. He hadn't seen the old bat in well over a hundred years now. He had to wonder how different she was these days, if at all.

And Dozer. That curmudgeon was his own brand of unpredictable. People liked to say that about Morgunov, that no one could ever tell what the Mad Demon would do next, but no one ever mentioned that Dozer was just as bad. Heck, maybe Dozer preferred it that way.

Over the many long years, Morgunov had often wondered with a smile on his face why Dozer bothered to put up with him. Yeah, strength and manpower were the main reasons, of course, but still. Was that really all there was to it? Morgunov enjoyed pressing ol' Wrinkle Brow's buttons more than just about anyone else in the entire world.

Maybe, on some level, Dozer kinda liked it, too.

Hmm, yeah, he should ask him about that the next time they saw each other."

"2557

As for this current campaign against Sair, Morgunov had the distinct feeling that he would, as usual, have to be the first one to move. Everyone else was so scared of everything. Dozer, Sermung, Sai-hee.

Cowards, all.

It sure would've been a breath of fresh air if one of the others would actually try to enact some type of meaningful change in the world, try to genuinely tip the centuries-long balance of power that had been established between them.

But no. It was always him. He shouldn't get his hopes up again.

And to think, there had once been a time when he thought himself too meek and introspective to ever do anything with his life. He'd just been another boy who'd learned to be quiet the hard way from a world that didn't want to listen to anything he had to say.

Eheheheheh.

It sure listened to him now, though, didn't it?

""Something funny, boss?"" came a familiar voice.

Morgunov popped his head out of the vending machine to see the angular face of Albert Crowe.

The black birds on the man's shoulder followed him around wherever he went, and even Morgunov wasn't quite sure why. There'd once been a joke going around that they did it because they mistook Albert's giant, pointy nose for a beak and therefore thought he was their mother.

That time was long gone, though. Morgunov didn't hear anyone laughing at the Man of Crows like that, anymore.

""Oh, I was just reminiscing to myself."" Morgunov wiped his hands and headed over to the rocky chamber's corner table, where an assortment of tools lay. The impromptu workshop that the boys had created for him was lacking in many ways, of course, but he wasn't feeling especially picky, at the moment. He'd made do with worse.

""Need something from me?""

"2558

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Albert was eyeing the vending machine up and down, but he didn't ask about it. ""I was just coming to report in, boss. The last of our scouts have been routed from Kuros. Seems the Sandies came up with a way to track the movements of our invisible units, unfortunately."

"Surprised it took 'em this long," said Morgunov. "Know how they did it?"

"Our running theory is some kind of specialized listening technology," said Crowe. "It's difficult to tell for sure. It seems they were able to spot them even in crowded areas, where they should have been impossible to hear."

Morgunov stopped and leveled a stare at the other man.

And Albert Crowe did something he rarely did. He hesitated. "Ah... where they should have been difficult to hear, boss. Is what I meant to say."

Morgunov allowed his gaze to linger a moment more. A part of him was simply curious about how uncomfortable he could make him. But then he relented with a smile and went back to assessing his tools.

"There are any number of ways it could've been done," said Morgunov. "Echolocation. Aerolocation. Stupiditylocation. Etcetera."

"...What is 'aerolocation,' sir?"

"The tracking of air currents within a given space for the purpose of determining the precise shape of said space and any objects therein."

"You can do that, sir?"

"Eheheh."

That almost sounded like a challenge. Now there was a thought. The urge to drop everything and build a device that could do exactly that reared up on him.

Eh, but would that even be useful?

Well, sure, of course it would.

But, eh. It wasn't really necessary. The enemy wasn't employing invisibility like they were.

Yet.

Eheh.

Well, the real trick wouldn't be building it. The real trick would be making it compact enough for easy use. Talk about a pain. He'd need rare materials from all over the world to pull that off. And maybe a few from outside the world. Hmm.

Neat thought, though. Dang."
"2559

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))
""That's not an answer, boss,"" said Crowe.

Morgunov ignored the question. ""Is that all you had to report?""

""Yes, sir.""

""Alright, you can go now.""

But the Man of Crows' footsteps did not arrive, and Morgunov could sense him lingering.

""...Was there something else?"" said Morgunov.

Crowe tilted his head slightly as he looked around the workshop. ""I suppose I'm just wondering the same thing that everyone who knows you're here is wondering, boss.""

""And what's that?""

""Whether or not you've got some special trick up your sleeve. With regard to our battle plan, specifically.""

""Ah. Eeh. Hmm.""

Bool, who had thus far only been listening, decided to chime in. 'You can always bet that he has something up his sleeve', the reaper said. 'What's less certain is whether or not he will actually decide to use it.'

'Hmph,' huffed Learxia, Crowe's reaper. 'Well, I hope he decides sooner rather than later. I'm sure it would save us all a lot of trouble.'

To Morgunov's eyes, the reapers were a pair of old, mangled clocks. Their faces were bent, their hands twisted out of position and pointing the wrong way, and gears and springs were visible brains through cracked open skulls.

"Maybe if you behave yourselves, I'll let you see something truly extraordinary," said Morgunov with a slight laugh.

Eheh. Wasn't often that a reaper other than Bool ever gave him any kind of attitude. And Learxia didn't used to do that. Perhaps she'd grown confident in Crowe's abilities over the years and thought he could protect her from him.

Ooh. A tempting thought. Morgunov decided to keep his back turned to them, just in the off chance that it might motivate them to try something.

'Don't tease them,' said Bool. 'This battle is still in its early stages. The importance of it cannot be overstated. The result of this battle will affect the entire war. Rushing in haphazardly, as fun as that might be for some of us, would hardly be a sound strategy.'

'Hmph. Do you fear Iceheart?'"
"2560

That made Morgunov chortle. For quite a while, in fact. By the time he settled again, everyone was staring at him. "Only a madman would not fear Iceheart," he said.

And no one responded.

Which made him laugh again. Harder, this time. The more uncomfortable his audience looked, the funnier it became.

There were so many things he could say here, so many demeaning or even infantilizing remarks that popped into his head. It was clear to him that Learxia just wanted him to hold Crowe's hand while they confronted the Vanguardian Field Marshal. To ensure the lad's safety. And hers, of course.

But pointing that fact out might just embarrass the two of them enough to go out and try to prove him wrong, to try to take down Iceheart on their own.

And yeah, that might've been amusing. Hell, imagine if they even pulled it off. The Man of Crows was a strong, growing boy. The possibility was non-zero.

But the risk was needless, all the same. Crowe was one of the two most powerful servants that Morgunov had at his disposal here. Bool would throw a fit if he allowed him to die so stupidly.

Especially when Morgunov was already planning to take to the field soon, anyway.

""I hope you aren't getting too eager for your own good,"" the Mad Demon said. ""You two are supposed to set an example for the young ones, and they've already got eagerness to spare, I'm sure.""

Still, no one said anything.

Well, that was fine.

""Anyway, good work so far,"" said Morgunov. ""Keep me apprised of further developments.""

""Of course, boss.""

And they departed without another word.

Bool lingered, of course. 'Sometimes I forget how skilled you used to be in leadership,' the reaper said privately.

Morgunov smiled as he returned to his vending machine. ""Y'know, there was once a time when I thought it was the reaper's job to lead and the servant's to follow.""

"2561

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

'Hmph.' Bool's twisted clockface became abruptly even more so. 'What are you trying to say?'

""Eheh, only that the term 'servant' is misleading,"" said Morgunov.

'Just because you don't do my bidding anymore doesn't mean that most servants are the same way.'

""I am quite exceptional, aren't I?""

'Oh, be quiet.'

""Hey, which of the Primordials do you think would actually make for the best pet, by the way? I've been thinking about it for a while now, and I can't quite decide.""

'What does it matter? We both know that you'll go after whichever one you can find first.'

""Eheh. True. But say that we had to choose, for some reason. Who would you pick?""

The reaper sighed. 'Hada.'

""Ooh, the God of Storms and Wrath, huh? Are you just saying that in the hopes that it will make my job harder?""

'...Frankly, yes.'

""Eheheh.""

'An avatar of destruction that supposedly hates humanity sounds like a useful ""pet"" for Abolish to have, wouldn't you say?'

""Hmm. Guess so. There would definitely be plenty of ego there to break down. But I don't know. Hada just doesn't seem like a real mushroom to me. And I'd kinda like one that's a mushroom.""

'What? You want a mushroom?'

""Yeah, y'know. A fun-guy.""

Bool fell dead silent.

Morgunov had to pop his head out of the vending machine again to check on him. Yeah, he was still floating there alright. He just wasn't saying anything. ""That was a joke, Boolie. I want a pet god that's a fun guy. And a fungi. They sound the same.""

Still, though, the reaper said nothing.

Yep. Morgunov knew he wouldn't, but that still never stopped him from trying. ""One of these days, I'm going to discover that sense of humor of yours. It's gotta be in there somewhere.""

'No, it truly doesn't. After half a millenium, you should know that by now.'

""Nah. ""

"2562 -- CCXXXVI.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Six: 'The land's attention...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector stepped up to the edge of the cliff for a better look. It was even taller than he'd expected. He could see the edge of the Imara Forest to the north, as well as the road that led to Atreya to the south. There was a clear gradient among the foliage as it slowly changed from the lush green north to a thinned out grassland and finally to the barren gray south.

It was a little strange to realize that his home was down south, in the mildly evil-looking region.

He could hear the ever present footsteps of Matteo Delaguna behind him, along with the much more distant ones of the survey team farther down the slope. The Lorentian Secretary of Agriculture and Land Development, Jonathan Nash, had insisted on sending them with him in order to answer any questions that he may have. Mostly, Hector had just been talking to them through his radio from a thousand or more feet away, because actually waiting up for them was pretty painful.

They weren't the only other members of the party, though. Ravi Zaman and Carl Rondel and both their reapers had decided to come along as well. The presidential advisors from Abolish and the Vanguard, respectively.

Precisely what their goal here was, Hector really couldn't say, though Garovel seemed to think that it was to ingratiate themselves with the new hero of Lorent. With the war going, Hector would've thought they were too busy for something so trivial, but he was having a hard time imagining a different reason.

They actually weren't even talking to him much, though. Mr. Rondel in particular had barely said five words to him so far, and from what Hector had seen, both men were constantly on their phones."

"2562 -- CCXXXVI.

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Chapter Two Hundred Thirty-Six: 'The land's attention...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector stepped up to the edge of the cliff for a better look. It was even taller than he'd expected. He could see the edge of the Imara Forest to the north, as well as the road that led to Atreya to the south. There was a clear gradient among the foliage as it slowly changed from the lush green north to a thinned out grassland and finally to the barren gray south.

It was a little strange to realize that his home was down south, in the mildly evil-looking region.

He could hear the ever present footsteps of Matteo Delaguna behind him, along with the much more distant ones of the survey team farther down the slope. The Lorentian Secretary of Agriculture and Land Development, Jonathan Nash, had insisted on sending them with him in order to answer any questions that he may have. Mostly, Hector had just been talking to them through his radio from a thousand or more feet away, because actually waiting up for them was pretty painful.

They weren't the only other members of the party, though. Ravi Zaman and Carl Rondel and both their reapers had decided to come along as well. The presidential advisors from Abolish and the Vanguard, respectively.

Precisely what their goal here was, Hector really couldn't say, though Garovel seemed to think that it was to ingratiate themselves with the new hero of Lorent. With the war going, Hector would've thought they were too busy for something so trivial, but he was having a hard time imagining a different reason.

They actually weren't even talking to him much, though. Mr. Rondel in particular had barely said five words to him so far, and from what Hector had seen, both men were constantly on their phones."

"2563

As for Prince David, he had already gone back to Intar, which was a shame. Hector had enjoyed his company, even if their meeting with President Dance had gotten a little awkward.

Lord Hanton had technically departed as well, supposedly back to Atreya, but he was actually still following Hector while invisible. He wasn't trying to hide his presence from Hector himself, however.

'It's rather barren,' said Hanton, presumably from somewhere up in the sky.

'I'm sure we could find a use for it,' said Garovel, who was hanging on his shoulder. The reaper still didn't seem to be terribly comfortable in the presence of Sparrows, and Hector couldn't really blame him much.

'I still can't believe you're considering their offer,' said Hanton. 'The only reason they are interested in granting you this land is because it will compel you to defend Lorent for them in the event of another crisis.'

'So you've mentioned. Multiple times now.'

'You must realize that if Lorent gets dragged into the war, you will have a serious dilemma on your hands.'

'And passing up this opportunity without first giving it appropriate consideration would be incredibly stupid.'

'There is nothing in this empty land that could possibly be valuable enough to counterbalance the level of risk that you would be taking by accepting it.'

'Dunno about that,' said Garovel. 'I seem to recall hearing something about a point of ""geographic resonance"" in this country, which sounded like it could possess all sorts of value.'

'Hmph. Yes, well, that location was further north, and moreover, it was destroyed in the battle.'

'I'm just saying that if we happened to find another one in this Jagwa region here, then that might be valuable enough to take the risk, wouldn't you say?'

Hanton gave a psychic grumble, one that seemed to harbor begrudging agreement."

Hector, for his part, was still a bit torn about this whole deal. He certainly didn't want to upset the Queen, but from the sound of things, he'd also be upsetting the Lorentians if he refused. And he could see Hanton's point, too. If Lorent really was just doing this in order to manipulate him, then this wasn't exactly the start of a healthy relationship, he felt.

But it was free land. And lot of it, too.

The Jagwa territory alone spanned over three hundred thousand square kilometers--almost double the size of Atreya in its entirety. And the deal currently on the table would grant Hector ownership of about a third of Jagwa, including the areas nearest Warrenhold around the Atreyan border.

A hundred thousand square kilometers...

That was pretty generous. It was no small wonder why Garovel didn't want to make a hasty decision here. Hector doubted that they would be able to make up their minds even after conducting this little survey out here. He very much wanted to hear Amelia Carthrace's opinion about this whole thing.

He was thinking about calling her right now, in fact, but he knew how busy she was. And if this expedition turned up anything crazy, Garovel might just tell him to take the deal immediately.

Thus far, it all looked fairly normal, though. The land was quite easy on the eyes, too. The morning sun made for quite a picture over the windswept grasslands below. He could see the occasional stone formation dotting the plains as the land stretched closer toward Atreya to the south. He even spotted a couple mobs of wild horses grazing in the distance.

He also knew that there were four towns that would technically be falling under his ""ownership"" as a result of this deal. That wasn't very many, considering how huge the section of land in question was, but one of those towns had a population of around two hundred thousand people."

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

Hector would hardly call this place ""empty,"" as Hanton had, when so many were living in this region. But then again, compared to the forty million or so people who were crammed into Atreya, he could kind of understand what the Sparrow had meant.

He just hoped that Hanton would actually tell him if he sensed anything strange in this region.

""Lord Goffe,"" arrived the voice of Carl Rondel, making Hector turn to see him approaching. ""What is your opinion on the war?""

Hector blinked, unsure what to even say to that.

The man's reaper, Joviza, hovered nearer. 'Excuse our bluntness,' she said. 'We did not mean to blindside you with such a heavy question, but we are curious. And we find it best not to dance around the subjects we are interested in discussing.'

Ravi and his reaper were observing, seemingly also interested in how he would answer.

Well, shit.

'Remain non-committal,' advised Garovel privately. 'But try to also sound strong, if you can.'

Hector could agree with those sentiments. He had a question of his own first, though. ""Why are you asking?""

""Because it is relevant,"" said Carl flatly. ""If the war comes to this part of the continent, do you intend to get involved?""

Did this guy even know the meaning of the word tact? ""...I would defend Atreya from invaders, if that's what you're asking,"" said Hector.

""And what about Lorent?"" pushed Carl.

No. Hector was pretty sure he didn't.

And Hector didn't feel particularly compelled to answer that question.

So he decided to just leave the guy hanging without a response and began to descend the cliff, taking the slow route by simply walking.

Mr. Rondel put himself in the way, however. ""I asked you a question.""

Hector stopped and met his gaze evenly.

""Would you defend Lorent from invaders?"" he repeated.

""Would the Vanguard?"" asked Hector.

Carl's dark eyes narrowed."

"2566

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

The tense silence lasted long enough for the non-servants in the survey team to begin catching up. They seemed to sense that something was amiss and gradually slowed their pace even further as they approached.

At length, Ravi seized the opening. ""I am sure Mr. Rondel meant no offense, Lord Goffe. He is merely eager to hear what your ultimate decision will be with regard to this historic offer that has been made to you.""

Carl and Ravi exchanged looks but not words.

Garovel chose to chime in publicly. 'And we meant no offense, either. We appreciate that the Vanguard is in a difficult position, at the moment, and we sympathize.'

That seemed to smooth things over well enough for Mr. Rondel to stop glaring at them, but the expression on the man's face was still far from warm.

The survey continued on foot for a while longer until they reached a main road. A group of vehicles were already there for them. They had left these behind earlier in order to get a closer look at what Jagwa's wilderness had to offer, and the drivers had been following them in the distance all the while, waiting for the chance to link back up with them.

Naturally, there was still plenty more land left to explore. They used the cars to go a bit farther before setting out on foot again. Hector tried telling the non-servants to hang back, but they were adamant about accompanying him.

This pattern of walking, then driving, then walking again repeated a couple more times before Hanton's voice arrived in Hector's head once more.

'I sense something peculiar,' the Sparrow said.

That was enough for Hector to ask Hanton for directions. The Sparrow rendered himself visible in order to do so, and Hector was briefly concerned that others would notice him, but apparently, Hanton was able to pick and choose who could actually see him. So for everyone but Hector, the Lord Gaolanet remained invisible."

"2567

Their destination was in the middle of an enormous plain, where land depressed ever so slightly around the base of a lone tree.

But what a tree it was.

It rivaled even the largest ones that Hector had seen in the Imara Forest, which included the Riverton, P.J. and all the gargantuan building-supporters that had been there. This one here looked like it was about ten or more stories tall, and its canopy of yellow-green leaves could probably shade half a city block by itself.

Still, though, it seemed like a pretty normal tree. Not supernatural.

Hanton's clarification arrived on its own. 'The tree isn't what's peculiar. There's something in its trunk. Or rather, a lack of something. The aura is distinctly empty. Missing.'

Hector didn't quite understand. The others were still catching up, so he asked in a low voice, ""So the trunk is hollow?""

'No,' said Hanton. 'The absence of aura means more than just empty air. Or even a vacuum, potentially. Everything has an aura. The aura of the planet itself should fill any and all ""gaps"" like this. So the fact that it's still there means that there must be something quite strange inside this tree.'

Hector's gaze went up the length of the trunk as he stepped over one of the roots that was jutting partway out of the ground. Something inside it, huh? Well, it was wide enough to conceal a small house--or several, perhaps, stacked on top of each other.

'Hmm,' hummed Garovel privately. 'Now that we're this close to it, I can sense something a little odd inside there, too.'

He and Garovel circled around the base of the tree together, looking for anything out of the ordinary. He never really considered himself a nature lover, exactly, but this was a pretty magnificent specimen, he felt. And he would hate to have to tear into its trunk."

"2568

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 1 of 2))

""How big is this mysterious thing inside of it?"" Hector asked.

'Hmm, tough to say,' said Hanton. 'The gap in the aura seems relatively large to me. About the size of a car, perhaps. But the gap may not be reflective of the size of the object that is responsible for its creation. For all I know, it could be something quite small.'

'Hector.' Garovel pointed a skeletal finger.

He couldn't tell what the reaper was trying to show him at first, until he noticed a small hole in the tree, no bigger than cat. Hector approached it, squinting and trying to discern what it was, if anything.

Something was there, beneath the wood. It looked like the bark of the tree had crowded over it, as if from slow growth over time. But what was that? It was a faded brown color and almost looked like it was just what the wood inside the tree looked like, but it was too uniform. Too flat.

He tried focusing on what the Scarf could tell him, but he doubted that there would be enough space for any air to flow through. It looked pretty solid, and--

No.

There was space. Slight, but it was there.

""...I think there's a door behind this,"" said Hector, close enough to touch the bark now.

Yep. The tree had grown very tightly over it, but he could still sense a bunch of tiny gaps between the flat wood of the door and the uneven wood of the tree.

That was a pretty weirdly shaped doorknob, though. It was just a long cylinder. A stick, really. Not like anything he'd seen before--or sensed, in this case.

'Welp,' said Garovel, readying a hand over Hector's shoulder, 'in that case, looks you've gotta yank some of this bark off. Wanna use materialization or brute strength?'

"2569

((The Mon/Wen/Fri Double -- page 2 of 2))

Hector hesitated. 'You don't think the Lorentians will be upset if I just start hacking away at this thing?'

Garovel spared them a glance. 'Well, Carl and Ravi are on their phones again, and they're trying to give this land to you, anyway. I doubt they'll care.'

Still, Hector held back. 'And what if we find something in there that suddenly MAKES them care?'

'Oh, you mean if we find something so good that it makes them take their offer off the table entirely? I figured that was the point of them coming with us in the first place, so it can't really be helped.'

'There's that, too,' said Hector. 'But I meant, like... what if Carl and Ravi tell the Vanguard and Abolish about whatever we find here?'

'Oh, I'm sure they will. Especially Carl. Seems like a real prick, that guy.'

'I mean, he would just be doing his job...'

'A loyal prick, then.'

Hector deliberately avoided looking in their direction and instead relied on the Scarf to observe them. They hardly seemed to be paying attention to him now, but he knew that their reapers were still with them even though the Scarf couldn't pick them up.

'So what should we do, then?' asked Hector.

'Start hacking away.'

'Really?'

'Sure. Whatever's in there probably isn't all THAT crazy, and even if it is, well... we can ask Hanton for a favor.'

Hector's expression hardened. 'Garovel...'

'As a last resort, that is.'

With how casually the reaper was bringing it up, Hector got the impression that Garovel had considered this possibility before they even set out.

He really didn't like the idea of allowing Hanton to mess with anyone's memories, but he could also see Garovel's point about how it might be necessary. If it could prevent Abolish or the Vanguard from coming down on Lorent like a sack of bricks, then maybe...

Agh. Dammit."

"2570

'Well, we already know something is here, so maybe we should cut this expedition short and take the deal,' said Hector. 'Then we can come back later to investigate it when we don't have a tail.'

'I'm still not convinced that whatever this thing is would make the deal worth pissing off the Queen,' the reaper said. 'And honestly, I was hoping that we could use what we find here in order to temper her anger. Our relationship with her is one of the most important things we have, you know. If this fuckin' thing turns out to be a big pile of shit, then I don't think it'll help us convince her of how much we still love her.'

Hector gave a muted sigh. 'Alright, well, maybe we could cut the expedition short, tell them we haven't made up our minds yet, and then sneak back out here later on our own.'

The reaper was quiet a moment. 'Heh, yeah, we could do that.' The tone of his voice, however, was implying something else. Something unsaid.

And Hector waited for elaboration that never arrived. His eyes went to Carl and Ravi, who were steadily drawing closer. 'But?' he pushed.

'But... I'm kinda curious to know what these nosy buggers following us will have to say about this thing, too.'

'Garovel, are you fucking serious?'

'What?'

'You're playing with fire. What if they tell their bosses about this place, and then a whole bunch of super strong servants show up to check it out?'

'Eh, there's no risk of that when we can just wipe all their memories.'

Hector's jaw clenched as he glared at the reaper. 'The Sparrows' memory wipes don't always work, remember? One of them could resist it.'

'That's highly unlikely.'

'Yeah, and knowing our luck, that means it's a virtual certainty!'

'You're being a real drama king, right now, y'know that?'

